THE PREFACE.

OW unfit, and how unworthy a choice I have made of my self, to undertake a Work of this mixture ; mine own reason , though exceeding weak , hath sufficiently resolved me. For had it been begotten then with my first dawn of Day, when the light of common Knowledge began to open it self to my younger Years : and before any wound received , either from Fortune or

Time : I might yet well have doubted, that the darkness of Age and Death would have covered over both it and me, long before the performance. For, beginning with the Creation , I have proceeded with the History of the World ; and lastly purposed (some few fallies excepted) to confine my discourse, within this our renowned Island of Great Britain. I confess that it had better sortd with my disability, the better part of whose times are run out in other Travels ; to have set together (as I could) the unjoynted and scattered frame of our English Affairs, than of the Universal : in whom had there been no other defect, (who am all defect) than the time of the Day, it were enough ; the Day of a tempestuous life, drawn on to the very Evening ere I began. But those inmost, and soul-piercing wounds, which are ever akeing while uncured : with the desire to satisfy those few Friends, which I have tried by the Fire of Adversity ; the former enforcing, the latter perswading ; have caused me to make my thoughts Legible, and my self the Subject of every Opinion, wise or weak.

To the World I present them, to which I am nothing indebted : neither have others that were, (Fortune changing) sped much better in any Age. For, Prosperity and Adversity have ever more tied and untied vulgar Affections. And as we see it in experience, That Dogs do always bark at those they know not ; and that it is in their nature to accompany one another in those clamours : so is it with the inconsiderate Multitude. Who, wanting that virtue which we call Honesty in all Men, and that especial Gift of GOD which we call Charity in Christian Men ; condemn, without hearing ; and wound, without offence given : led thereunto by uncertain report only ; which his Majesty truly acknowledgeth for the Author of all Lyes.

Blame*

Eccl. t. 11. v. 7. Blame no Man (saith Siracides) before thou have inquired the matter : understand first; and then reform righteously. Rumor, res sine teste, sine judice, maligna, fallax; Rumor is without witness, without judge, malicious and deceivable. This vanity of vulgar opinion it was, that gave S. Augustine Argument to affirm, That he feared the praise of good Men, and detested that of the evil. And herein no Man hath given a better rule, than this of Seneca, Conscientia satisfacimus: nihil in famam laboremus; sequatur vel mala, dum bene merearis. Let us satisfy our own Consciences, and not trouble our selves with fame: be it never so ill, it is to be despised so we deserve well.

*Laudem à bonis vires, & amari
à malis deservit.

For my self, if I have in any thing served my Country, and prized it before my private: the general acceptation can yield me no other profit at this time, than doth a fair Sunshine Day to a Sea-man after Shipwrack; and the contrary, no other harm than an outrageous Tempest after the Port attained. I know that I lost the love of many, for my fidelity towards Her, whom I must still honour in the Dust; though further than the Defence of Her excellent Person, I never persecuted any Man. Of those that did it, and by what device they did it: He that is the Supreme Judge of all the World, hath taken the account; so as for this kind of suffering, I must say with Seneca, Mala opinio, bene parata, delectat.

As for other Men; if there be any that have made themselves Fathers of that fame, which hath been begotten for them: I can neither envy at such their purchased glory, nor much lament mine own mishap in that kind; but content my self to say with Virgil, Sic vos non vobis, in many particulars.

To labour other satisfaction, were an effect of phrenzie, not of hope: seeing it is not Truth, but Opinion, that can travel the World without a Passport. For were it otherwise; and were there not as many internal forms of the Mind, as there are external Figures of Men; there were then some possibility, to perfwade by the mouth of one Advocate, even Equity alone.

But such is the multiplying and extensive virtue of dead Earth, and of that breath-giving life which GOD hath cast upon Slime and Dust: as that among those that were, of whom we read and hear, and among those that are, whom we see and converse with; every one hath received a several Picture of Face, and every one a divers Picture of Mind; every one a form apart, every one a fancy and cogitation differing: there being nothing wherein Nature so much triumpheth, as in dissimilitude. From whence it cometh, that there is found so great diversity of Opinions; so strong a contrariety of inclinations; so many natural and unnatural; wise, foolish; manly, and childish Affections and Passions in Mortal Men. For it is not the visible fashion and shape of Plants, and of reasonable Creatures, that makes the difference, of working in the one, and of condition in the other; but the form internal.

And though it hath pleased GOD, to reserve the Art of reading Mens thoughts to himself: yet, as the Fruit tells the name of the Tree; so do the outward works of Men (so far as their cogitations are acted) give us where-of to guess at the rest. Nay, it were not hard to express the one by the other, very near the life: did not craft in many, fear in the most, and the Worlds love in all, teach every capacity, according to the compels it hath, to qualifie and mask over their inward deformities for a time. Though it be also true, Nemo potest diu personam ferre fictam: cito in naturam suam recidunt, quibus veritas non subest. No Man can long continue masked in a counterfeited behaviour: the things that are forced for pretences, having no ground of truth, cannot long dissemble their own Natures. Neither can any Man (saith Plutarch) so change himself, but that his Heart may be sometimes seen at his Tongues end.

Plutarch

In this great discord and dissimilitude of reasonable Creatures, if we direct our selves to the Multitude; Omnis honestæ rei malus iudex est vulgus. The common People are evil Judges of honest things, and whose Wisdom (saith Ecclesiastes) is to be despised; if to the better sort; every Understanding hath a peculiar Judgment; by which it both censureth other Men, and valueth it self. And therefore unto me it will not seem strange, though I find these my worthless Papers torn with Rats: seeing the slothful Censurers of all Ages, have not spared to tax the Reverend Fathers of the Church, with Ambition; the severest Men to themselves, with Hypocrisie; the greatest lovers of Justice, with Popularity; and those of the truest Valour and Fortitude, with Vain-glory. But of these Natures, which lie in wait to find Fault, and to turn good into evil, seeing Salomon complained long since: and that the very Age of the World renders it every day after other more malicious; I must leave the Professors to their easie ways of reprehension, than which there is nothing of more facility.

*Nihil facilius,

To me it belongs in the first part of this Preface, following the common and approved Custom of those who have left the memories of time past to after Ages; to give, as near as I can, the same Right to History which they have done. Yet seeing therein I should but borrow other Mens words; I will not trouble the Reader with the Repetition. True it is, that among many other Benefits, for which it hath been honoured; in this one it triumpheth over all humane Knowledge, that it hath given us Life in our Understanding, since the World it self had Life and Beginning, even to this day: yea it hath triumphed over Time, which besides it, nothing but Eternity hath triumphed over: for it hath carried our Knowledge over the vast and devouring space of so many thousands of Years, and given so fair and piercing Eyes to our Mind; that we plainly behold living now, as if we had lived then, that great World, Magni Dei sapientis opus, the wise Work (saith Hermes) of a great GOD, as it was then, when but new to it self. By it I say it is, that we live in the very time when it was created: we behold how it was governed: how it was covered with Waters, and again re-peopled: How Kings and Kingdoms have flourished and fallen; and for what Virtue and Piety GOD made prosperous; and for what Vice and Deformity he made wretched, both the one and the other. And it is not the least Debt which we owe unto History, that it hath made us acquainted with our dead Ancestors; and, out of the depth and darkness of the Earth, delivered us their Memory and Fame. In a word, we may gather out of History a Policy no less wise than eternal; by the comparison and application of other Mens fore-passed Miseries, with our own like Errours and ill deservings.

But it is neither of Examples the most lively Instructions, nor the words of the wisest Men, nor the terror of future Torments, that hath yet so wrought in our blind and stupified Minds; as to make us remember, That the infinite Eye and Wisdom of GOD doth pierce through all our Pretences; as to make us remember, That the Justice of GOD doth require none other Accuser, than our own Consciences: which neither the false Beauty of our apparent Actions, nor all the Formalty, which (to pacifie the Opinions of Men) we put on; can in any, or the least kind, cover from his Knowledge. And so much did that Heavhen Wisdom confels, no way as yet qualified by the Knowledge of a true GOD. If any (saith Euripides) having in his Life committed wickedness, think he can hide it from the everlasting gods, he thinks not well.

To repeat GOD's Judgments in particular, upon those of all degrees, which have played with his Mercies; would require a Volume apart: for the Sea of examples hath no bottom. The marks, set on private Men, are with their Bodies cast into the Earth; and their Fortunes, written only in the memories of those that lived with them: so as they who succeed, and have not seen the fall of others, do not fear their own faults. GOD's Judgments upon the greater and greatest, have been left to Posterity; first, by those happy Hands which the Holy Ghost hath guided; and secondly, by their virtue, who have gathered the acts and ends of Men, mighty and remarkable in the World. Now to point far off, and to speak of the conversion of Angels into Devils, for Ambition: Or of the greatest and most glorious Kings, who have gnawn the Grails of the Earth with Beasts, for Pride and Ingratitude towards GOD: Or of that wise working of Pharaoh, when he slew the Infants of Israel, ere they had recovered their Cradles: Or of the Policy of Jezebel, in covering the Murder of Naboth by a trial of the Elders, according to the Law: with many thousands of the like: what were it other, than to make an hopeless proof, that far-of examples would not be left to the same far-of respects, as heretofore? For who hath not observed, what labour, practice, peril, bloodied, and cruelty, the Kings and Princes of the World have undergone, exercised, taken on them, and committed; to make themselves and their issues Masters of the World? And yet hath Babylon, Persia, Egypt, Syria, Macedon, Carthage, Rome, and the rest, no Fruit, Flower, Grails, nor Leaf, springing upon the Face of the Earth, of those Seeds: No; their very Roots and Ruins do hardly remain. Omnia quæ manu hominum facta sunt, vel manu hominum evertuntur, vel stando & durando deficiunt. All that the Hand of Man can make, is either overturned by the Hand of Man, or at length by standing and continuing consumed. The reasons of whose ruines, are diversly given by those that ground their Opinions on second causes. All Kingdoms and States have fallen (say the Politicians) by outward and Foreign Force, or by inward negligence and dissension, or by a third cause arising from both. Others observe, That the greatest have sunk down under their own weight; of which Livy hath a touch: eo crevit, ut magnitudine laboret sua: Others, That the Divine Providence (which Cratippus objected to Pompey) hath set down the Date and Period of every Estate, before their first Foundation and Erection. But hereof I will give my self a Day over to resolve.

For seeing the first Books of the following Story, have undertaken the discourse of the first Kings and Kingdoms: and that it is impossible for the short life of a Preface, to travel after and overtake far-of Antiquity, and to judge of it; I will, for the present, examine what profit hath been gathered by our own Kings, and their Neighbour Princes: who having beheld, both in Divine and Humane Letters, the success of Infidelity, Injustice, and Cruelty; have (notwithstanding) planted after the same Pattern.

True it is that the Judgments of all Men are not agreeable; nor (which is more strange) the Affection of any one Man stirred up alike with examples of like Nature: But every one is touched most, with that which most nearly seemeth to touch his own private; or otherwise best suited with his apprehension. But the Judgments of GOD are for ever unchangeable; unchangeable; neither is he wearied by the long process of time, and won to give his Blessing in one Age, to that which he hath Cursed in another. Wherefore those that are wise, or whose wisdom, if it be not great, yet is true and well grounded; will be able to discern the bitter Fruits of irreligious policy, as well among those examples that are found in Ages removed far from the present, as in those of latter times. And that it may no less appear by evident proof, than by asseveration, That ill doing hath always been attended with ill success; I will here, by way of Preface, run over some examples, which the work ensuing hath not reached.

Among our Kings of the Norman Race, we have no sooner passed over the violence of the Norman Conquest; than we encounter with a singular and most remarkable example of God's Justice, upon the Children of Henry the First. For that King, when both by force, craft, and cruelty, he had disposed, over-reach'd, and lastly made blind and destroyed his elder Brother Robert Duke of Normandy, to make his own Sons Lords of this Land: GOD cast them all, Male and Female, Nephews and Nieces (Maud excepted) into the bottom of the Sea, with above a hundred and fifty others that attended them; whereof a great many were Noble, and of the King dearly beloved.

To pass over the rest, till we come to Edward the Second; it is certain, that after the Murder of that King, the issue of Blood then made, though it had some times of stay and stopping, did again break out; and that so often, and in such abundance, as all our Princes of the Masculine Race (very few excepted) died, of the same Disease. And although the young Years of Edward the Third, made his knowledge of that horrible fact no more than suspicious: yet in that he afterwards caused his own Uncle the Earl of Kent to die, for no other offence than the desire of his Brothers Redemption, whom the Earl as then supposed to be living; (the King making that to be Treason in his Uncle, which was indeed Treason in himself, had his Uncle's intelligence been true) this I say made it manifest, that he was not ignorant of what had past, nor greatly desirous to have had it otherwise; though he caused Mortimer to die for the same.

This cruelty the secret and unsearchable Judgment of GOD revenged, on the Grand-child of Edward the Third: and so it fell out, even to the last of that Line, that in the second or third descent they were all buried under the ruines of those Buildings, of which the Mortar had been tempered with innocent Blood. For Richard the Second, who saw, both his Treasurers, his Chancellor, and his Steward, with divers others of his Counsellors, some of them slaughtered by the People, others in his absence executed by his Enemies; yet he always took himself for over-wise, to be taught by examples. The Earls of Huntington and Kent, Montague and Spencer, who thought themselves as great Politicians in those Days, as others have done in these: hoping to please the King, and to secure themselves, by the Murder of Glocester; died soon after, with many other their adherents, by the like violent Hands; and far more shamefully than did that Duke. And as for the King himself (who in regard of many deeds, unworthy of his Greatness, cannot be excused, as the disavowing himself by breach of Faith, Charters, Pardons, and Patents) he was in the Prime of his Youth deposed; and murdered by his Cousin-german and Vassal, Henry of Lancaster, afterwards Henry the Fourth.

This King whose Title was weak, and his obtaining the Crown traitorous : who brake Faith with the Lords at his Landing, protesting to intend only the recovery of his proper Inheritance ; brake Faith with Richard himself ; and brake Faith with all the Kingdom in Parliament, to whom he swore that the deposed King should live. After that he had enjoyed this Realm some few years, and in that time had been set upon on all sides by his Subjects, and never free from Conspiracies and Rebellions : he saw (if Souls immortal see and discern any things after the Bodies death) his Grand-child Henry the sixth, and his Son the Prince, suddenly, and without mercy, murdered ; the possession of the Crown (for which he had caused so much Blood to be poured out) transferred from his Race ; and by the Issues of his Enemies worn and enjoyed : Enemies, whom by his own Practice he supposed, that he had left no less powerless, than the Succession of the Kingdom questionable ; by Entailing the same upon his own Issues by Parliament. And out of doubt, humane Reason could have judged no otherwise, but that these cautious Provisions of the Father, seconded by the Valour and signal Victories of his Son Henry the fifth, had buried the hopes of every Competitor, under the despair of all Reconquest and Recovery. I say, that humane Reason might so have judged : were not this passage of Cassaubon also true, Dies, hora, momentum, evertendis dominationibus sufficit, quæ adamantinis credebantur radicibus esse fundata ; A day, an hour, a moment, is enough to overturn the things, that seemed to have been founded and rooted in adamant.

Now for Henry the sixth, upon whom the great storm of his Grand-fathers grievous Faults fell, as it formerly had done upon Richard the Grand-child of Edward : although he was generally esteemed for a gentle and innocent Prince ; yet as he refused the Daughter of Armagnac, of the House of Navarre, the greatest of the Princes of France, to whom he was affianced (by which Match he might have defended his Inheritance in France) and married the Daughter of Anjou, (by which he lost all that he had in France) so as in contending to the unworthy Death of his Uncle of Gloucester, the main and strong Pillar of the House of Lancaster ; He drew on himself and this Kingdom the greatest Joynt-loss and Dishonour, that ever it sustained since the Norman Conquest. Of whom it may truly be said, which a Counsellor of his own spake of Henry the Third of France, Q'il estoit un fort gentil Prince ; mais son reigné est advenu en une fort mauvais temps, That he was a very gentle Prince ; but his Reign happened in a very unfortunate Season.

It is true, that Buckingham and Suffolk were the Practisers and Contrivers of the Dukes death : Buckingham and Suffolk, because the Duke gave Instructions to their Authority, which otherwise under the Queen had been absolute ; the Queen, in respect of her personal wound, spretaque injuria forma, because Gloucester disswaded her Marriage. But the Fruit was answerable to the Seed ; the success to the Counsel. For after the cutting down of Gloucester, York grew up so fast, as he dared to dispute his Right, both by Arguments and Arms ; in which Quarrel, Suffolk and Buckingham, with the greatest number of their Adherents, were dissolved. And although for his breach of Oath by Sacrament, it pleased God to strike down York : yet his Son the Earl of March, following the plain Path which his Father had troden out, despoiled Henry the Father, and Edward, the Son, both of their Lives and Kingdoms. And what was the end now of that politick Lady the Queen, other than this, That she lived to behold the the wretched ends of all her partakers : that she lived to look on, while her Husband the King, and her only Son the Prince, were hewen in sunder ; while the Crown was set on his Head that did it. She lived to see her self despoiled of her Estate, and of her Moveables : and lastly, her Father, by rendering up to the Crown of France, the Earldom of Provence and other places, for the payment of Fifty thousand Crowns for her Ransom, to become a stark Beggar. And this was the end of that subtilty, which Siracides calleth fine, but unrighteous : for other Fruit hath it never yielded since the World was.

And now came it to Edward the Fourth's turn (though after many difficulties) to triumph. For all the Plants of Lancaster were rooted up ; one only Earl of Richmond excepted : whom also he had once bought of the Duke of Britain, but could not hold him. And yet was not this of Edward such a Plantation, as could any way promise it self stability. For this Edward the King (to omit more than many of his other cruelties) beheld and allowed the slaughter, which Gloucester, Dorset, Hastings, and others, made of Edward the Prince in his own presence : of which tragical Actors, there was not one that escaped the Judgment of GOD in the same kind. And he, which (besides the execution of his Brother of Clarence, for none other offence than he himself had formed in his own imagination) instructed Gloucester to kill Henry the Sixth, his Predecessor ; taught him also by the same art to kill his own Sons and Successors Edward and Richard. For those Kings, which have sold the Blood of others at a low Rate ; have but made the Market for their own Enemies, to buy of theirs at the same Price.

To Edward the Fourth succeeded Richard the Third, the greatest Master in mischief of all that fore-went him : who although, for the necessity of his Tragedy, he had more Parts to play, and more to perform in his own Person, than all the rest ; yet he so well fitted every affection that plaid with him, as if each of them had but acted his own interest. For he wrought so cunningly upon the affections of Hastings and Buckingham, enemies to the Queen and to all her Kindred : as he easily allured them to condescend, that Rivers and Grey, the Kings Maternal Uncle and half Brother, should (for the first) be severed from him : secondly, he wrought their consent to have them imprisoned : and lastly (for the avoiding of future inconvenience) to have their Heads severed from their Bodies. And having now brought those his chief Instruments to exercise that common Precept, which the Devil hath written on every Post ; namely, To deprecise those whom they had grieved, and to destroy those whom they had deprecised ; He urged that Argument so far and so forcibly, as nothing but the Death of the young King himself, and of his Brother, could fashion the conclusion. For he caused it to be hammered into Buckingham's Head, That, whensoever the King, or his Brother, should have able years to exercise their power ; they would take a most severe revenge of that cureless wrong, offered to their Uncle and Brother, Rivers and Grey.

But this was not his manner of reasoning with Hastings, whose fidelity to his Masters Sons was without suspect : and yet the Devil, who never dissuades by impossibility, taught him to try him. And so he did. But when he found by Catesby, who founded him, that he was not fordable ; he first resolved to kill him sitting in Council : wherein having failed with his Sword ; he set the Hangman upon him, with a Weapon of more weight. And because nothing else could move his Appetite, he caused his Head to be stricken off, before he eat his Dinner. A greater Judgment of GOD, than

this upon Hastings, I have never observed in any Story. For the self-same Day that the Earl Rivers, Grey, and others, were (without trial of Law, or offence given) by Hastings advice executed at Pomfret: I say Hastings himself in the same Day and (as I take it) in the same Hour, in the same lawless manner had his Head stricken off in the Tower of London. But Buckingham lived a while longer; and with an Eloquent Oration perswaded the Londoners to elect Richard for their King. And having received the Earldom of Hereford for reward, besides the high hope of marrying his Daughter to the Kings only Son; after many grievous vexations of mind, and unfortunate attempts, being in the end betrayed and delivered up by his trustiest Servant; he had his Head severed from his Body at Salisbury, without the trouble of any of his Peers. And what success had Richard himself after all these Mischiefs and Murders, Policies and Counter-policies to Christian Religion: and after such time, as with a most merciless Hand he had pressed out the breath of his Nephews and Natural Lords; other than the prosperity of so short a life, as it took end, ere himself could well look over and discern it? The great outcry of innocent Blood, obtaining at GOD's Hands the effusion of his; who became a spectacle of shame and dishonour, both to his Friends and Enemies.

This cruel King, Henry the Seventh cut off; and was therein (no doubt) the immediate Instrument of GOD's Justice. A politick Prince he was, if ever there were any, and who by the Engine of his Wisdom, beat down and overturned as many strong oppositions both before and after he wore the Crown as ever King of England did: I say by his Wisdom, because as he ever left the reins of his Affections in the hands of his Profit, so he always weighed his Undertakings by his Abilities, leaving nothing more to hazard than so much as cannot be denied it in all humane actions. He had well observed the proceedings of Loy the Eleventh, whom he followed in all that was Royal or Royal-like, but he was far more just, and began not their Processes whom he hated or feared by the execution, as Loy did.

He could never indure any mediation in rewarding his Servants, and therein exceeding wise; for whatsoever himself gave, he himself received back the thanks and the love, knowing it well that the affections of Men (purchased by nothing so readily as by benefits) were Trains that better became great Kings, than great Subjects. On the contrary, in whatsoever he grieved his Subjects, he wisely put it off on those, that he found fit Ministers for such actions. Howsoever, the taking off, of Stanley's Head, who set the Crown on his, and the Death of the young Earl of Warwick, Son to George D. of Clarence, shews, as the success also did, that he held somewhat of the Errors of his Ancestors, for his possession in the first Line ended in his Grand-children, as that of Edward the Third and Henry the Fourth had done.

Now for King Henry the Eight: if all the Pictures and Patterns of a merciless Prince were lost in the World, they might all again be painted to the life, out of the Story of this King. For how many Servants did he advance in haste (but for what virtue no Man could suspect) and with the change of his fancy ruined again; no Man knowing for what offence? To how many others of more desert gave he abundant Flowers, from whence to gather Hony, and in the end of Harvest burnt them in the Hive? How many Wives did he cut off, and cast off, as his fancy and affection changed? How many Princes of the Blood (whereof some of them for Age could hardly crawl towards the Block) with a world of others of all Degrees

(of whom our common Chronicles have kept the account) did he Execute? Yea, in his very death Bed, and when he was at the point to have given his account to GOD for the abundance of Blood already spilt: he imprisoned the Duke of Norfolk the Father; and executed the Earl of Surrey the Son; the one, whose deservings he knew not how to value, having never omitted any thing that concerned his own honour, and the Kings service; the other, never having committed any thing worthy of his least displeasure: the one exceeding valiant and advised; the other, no less valiant than learned, and of excellent hope. But besides the sorrows which he heaped upon the Fatherless and Widows at home: and besides the vain enterprises abroad, wherein it is thought that he consumed more Treasure, than all our victorious Kings did in their several Conquests: what causeless and cruel Wars did he make upon his own Nephew King James the fifth? What Laws and Wills did he devise, to establish this Kingdom in his own issues? using his sharpest Weapons to cut off, and cut down those Branches, which sprang from the same Root that himself did. And in the end (notwithstanding these his so many irreligious provisions) it pleased GOD to take away all his own, without increase; though, for themselves in their several kinds, all Princes of eminent virtue. For these words of Samuel to Ayeg King of the Amalekites, have been verified upon many others: As thy Sword hath made other Women childless: so shall thy Mother be childless among other Women. And that Blood, which the same King Henry affirmed, that the cold Air of Scotland had frozen up in the North, GOD hath diffused by the Sunshine of his Grace: from whence His Majesty now living, and long to live, is descended. Of whom I may say it truly, That if all the malice of the World were infused into one Eye: yet could it not discern in His life, even to this day, any one of those foul spots, by which the Consciences of all the forenamed Princes (in effect) have been defiled; nor any drop of that innocent Blood on the Sword of his Justice, with which the most that forewent him, have stained both their hands and fame. And for this Crown of England; it may truly be avowed, That he hath received it even from the hand of GOD, and hath stayed the time of putting it on, howsoever he were provoked to hasten it: That He never took revenge of any Man, that sought to put him beside it: That He refused the assistance of Her Enemies, that wore it long, with as great glory as ever Princes did: That His Majesty entered not by a breach, nor by Blood; but by the ordinary Gate, which his own right set open; and into which, by a general love and obedience, He was received. And howsoever His Majesties preceding Title to this Kingdom, was preferred by many Princes (witness the Treaty at Cambray in the Year 1559) yet he never pleaded to dispute it, during the life of that renowned Lady, his Predecessor; no, notwithstanding the injury of not being declared Heir, in all the time of Her long Reign.

Neither ought we to forget, or neglect our thankfulness to GOD for the uniting of the Northern parts of Britany to the South, to wit, of Scotland to England, which though they were severed but by small Brooks and Banks, yet by reason of the long continued War, and the cruelties exercised upon each other, in the affection of the Nations, they were infinitely severed. This I say is not the least of God's Blessings which His Majesty hath brought with him unto this Land: No, put all our petty grievances together, and heap them up to their height, they will appear but as a Mole-hill, compared with the Mountain of this Concord. And if all the Historians since then, have acknowledged the uniting of the red Rose, and the white, for the greatest happiness, (Christian Religion excepted) that ever this Kingdom received from GOD, certainly the Peace between the two Lions of Gold and Gules, and the making them one, doth by many degrees exceed the former; for by it, besides the sparing of our British Blood, heretofore and during the difference so often and abundantly shed, the State of England is more assured, the Kingdom more enabled to recover her ancient Honour and Rights, and by it made more invincible than by all our former Alliances, Practices, Policies and Conquests. It is true that hereof we do not yet find the effect. But had the Duke of Parma in the Year 1588, joynd the Army which he commanded, with that of Spain, and landed it on the South-Coast; and had his Majesty at the same time declared himself against us in the North: it is easy to Divine what had become of the Liberty of England, certainly we would then without murmur have bought this Union at a far greater price than it hath since cost us.

It is true, that there was never any Common-weal or Kingdom in the World, wherein no Man had cause to lament. Kings live in the World and not above it. They are not infinite to examine every Man's cause, or to relieve every Man's wants. And yet, in the latter, (though to his own prejudice) His Majesty hath had more compassion of other Men's necessities, than of his own Coffers. Of whom it may be said, as of Salomon, Dedit Deus Salomoni latitudinem Cordis: which if other Men do not understand with Pineda, to be meant by Liberality, but by Latitude of knowledge; yet may it be better spoken of His Majesty, than of any King that ever England had; who as well in Divine, as Humane understanding, hath exceeded all that fore-went him, by many degrees.

I could say much more of the Kings Majesty, without flattery: did I not fear the imputation of presumption, and withal suspect, that it might befall these Papers of mine, (though the loss were little) as it did the Pictures of Queen Elizabeth, made by unskilful and common Painters; which by her own Commandment, were knockt in pieces and cast into the Fire. For ill Artists, in setting out the beauty of the external: and weak Writers, in describing the virtues of the internal; do often leave to Posterity, of well-formed Faces a deformed memory; and of the most perfect and Princely minds, a most defective representation. It may suffice, and there needs no other discourse, if the honest Reader but compare the cruel and turbulent passages of our former Kings, and of other their Neighbour Princes (of whom for that purpose I have inserted this brief discourse) with His Majesties temperate, revengeless, and liberal disposition: I say, that if the honest Reader weigh them justly, and with an even hand: and withal, but bestow every deformed Child on his true Parent; he shall find, that there is no Man which hath so just cause to complain, as the King himself hath.

Now as we have told the successes of the trumperies and cruelties of our own Kings, and other great Personages, so we find, that GOD is every where the same GOD. And as it pleased him to punish the usurpation, and unnatural cruelty of Henry the First, and of our Third Edward, in their Children for many Generations: so dealt he with the Sons of Loys Debonaire, the Son of Charles the Great, or Charlemain. For after such time as Debonaire of France, had torn out the Eyes of Bernard his Nephew, the Son of Pepin, the eldest Son of Charlemain, and Heir of the Empire, and then caused him to die in Prison, as did our Henry to Robert his elder Brother: there followed nothing but Murders upon Murders, Poisonings, Imprisonments, and civil War; till the whole Race of that famous Emperour was extinguished.

And

And though Debonaire, after he had rid himself of his Nephew by a violent death; and of his Bastard Brothers by a civil death (having inclosed them with sure Guard, all the days of their Lives, within a Monastery) held himself secure from all opposition: Yet GOD railed up against him (which he suspected not) his own Sons, to vex him, to invade him, to take him Prisoner, and to depose him; his own Sons, with whom (to satisfy their Ambition) he had shared his Estate, and given them Crowns to wear, Kingdoms to govern, during his own Life. Yea his eldest Son Lothaire (for he had four, three by his first Wife, and one by his second; to wit, Lothaire, Pepin, Loys, and Charles) made it the cause of his Deposition, That he had used violence towards his Brothers and Kinmen; and that he had suffered his Nephew (whom he might have delivered) to be slain, eo quod, scilicet the Text, fratribus & propinquis violentiam intulerit, & nepotem suum, quem ipse liberare poterat, interficere permisit. B. cause he used violence to his Brothers and Kinmen, and suffered his Nephew to be slain whom he might have delivered.

Yet did he that which few Kings do; namely, repent him of his Cruelty. For among many other things, which he performed in the General Assembly of the States, it follows, Post hæc autem palam se errasse confessus, & imitatus Imperatoris Theodosii exemplum, penitentiam spontaneam suscepit, Pags. libidem tam de his, quam que in Bernardum proprium nepotem gesserat. After this he did openly confess himself to have erred, and following the example of the Emperour Theodosius, he underwent voluntary Penance as well for his other Offences, as for that which he had done against Bernard his own Nephew.

This he did: and it was Praise-worthy. But the Blood that is unjustly spilt, is not again gathered up from the ground by Repentance. These Medicines, ministered to the dead, have but dead Rewards.

This King, as I have said, had four Sons. To Lothaire his eldest he gave the Kingdom of Italy; as Charlemain, his Father, had done to Pepin the Father of Bernard, who was to succeed him in the Empire. To Pepin the second Son he gave the Kingdom of Aquitaine: to Loys, the Kingdom of Bavaria: and to Charles, whom he had by a second Wife, called Judith, the Remainder of the Kingdom of France. But this second Wife, being a Mother-in-law to the rest, perswaded Debonaire to cast his Son Pepin out of Aquitaine; thereby to greatness Charles: which, after the death of his Son Pepin, he prosecuted to effect, against his Grand-child bearing the same Name. In the mean while, being invaded by his Son Loys of Bavaria, he dies for Grief.

Debonaire dead: Loys of Bavaria, and Charles afterwards called the Bald, and their Nephew Pepin of Aquitaine, joyn in League against the Emperour Lothaire their eldest Brother. They fight near to Auxerre the most bloody Battle that ever was stricken in France: in which, the marvellous loss of Nobility, and Men of War, gave courage to the Saracens to invade Italy; to the Hunnes, to fall upon Almain; and the Danes, to enter upon Normandy. Charles the Bald by Treason seizeth upon his Nephew Pepin, kills him in a Cloyster, Carloman rebels against his Father Charles the Bald, the Father burns out the Eyes of his Son Carloman; Bavaria invades the Emperour Lothaire his Brother, Lothaire quits the Empire, He is assailed and wounded to the Heart by his own Conscience, for his Rebellion against his Father and for his other Cruelties, and dies in a Monastery. Charles the Bald the Uncle oppresseth his Nephews the Sons of Lothaire, he usurpeth the Empire to the prejudice of Loys of Bavaria his elder Brother, Bavaria's Armies and his Son Carloman are beaten, he dies of Grief, and the Usurper Charles is poisoned by Zede-kias a Jew his Physician, his Son Loys le Beque dies of the same Drink.

Beque

Beque had Charles the simple, and two Bastards, Loys and Carloman; they rebel against their Brother, but the eldest breaks his Neck, the younger is slain by a wild Boar; the Son of Bavie had the same ill Destiny and brake his Neck by a Fall out of a Window in sporting with his Companions. Charles the gross becomes Lord of all that the Sons of Debonaire held in Germany, wherewith not contented, he invades Charles the simple, but being forsaken of his Nobility, of his Wife, and of his Understanding, he dies a distracted Begger. Charles the simple is held in Wardship by Eudes Major of the Palace, then by Robert the Brother of Eudes, and lastly being taken by the Earl of Vernandois, he is forced to die in the Prison of Peron: Loys the Son of Charles the simple breaks his Neck in chasing a Wolf, and of the two Sons of this Loys, the one dies of Poyson, the other in the Prison of Orleans, after whom Hugh Capet of another Race, and a stranger to the French, makes himself King.

These miserable ends had the issues of Debonaire: who after he had once apparelled Injustice with Authority, his Sons and Successors took up the Fashion; and wore that Garment so long without other Provisions, as when the same was torn from their shoulders, every Man despised them as miserable and naked Beggars. The wretched success they had, (saith a learned French-man) shews, qu'en ceste mort il y avoit plus du fait des hommes que de Dieu, ou de la justice: That in the death of that Prince, to wit of Bernard the Son of Pepin, the true Heir of Charlemaine, Men had more meddling, than either GOD, or Justice had.

But to come nearer home; it is certain that Francis the first, one of the worthiest Kings (except for that Fact) that ever the French-men had, did never enjoy himself; after he had commended the destruction of the Protestants of Mirandol and Cabrières, to the Parliament of Provence, which poor People were thereupon burnt, and murdered; Men, Women, and Children. It is true, that the said King Francis repented himself of the Fact, and gave Charge to Henry his Son, to do Justice upon the Murderers; threatening his Son with GOD's Judgments, if he neglected it. But this unreasonable Care of his, GOD was not pleased to accept for Payment. For after Henry himself was slain in Sport by Montgomery, We all may remember what became of his four Sons, Francis, Charles, Henry and Hercules. Of which although three of them became Kings, and were married to beautiful and virtuous Ladies: Yet were they, one after another, cast out of the World, without Stock or Seed. And notwithstanding their subtilty, and breach of Faith; with all their Massacres, upon those of the Religion, and great effusion of Blood; the Crown was set upon his Head, whom they all laboured to dissolve; the Protestants remain more in number than ever they were, and hold to this day more strong Cities than ever they had.

Let us now see if GOD be not the same GOD in Spain, as in England and France. Towards whom we will look no further back than to Don Pedro of Castile: in respect of which Prince, all the Tyrants of Sicily, our Richard the third, and the great Evan Vasilowich of Muscovia, were but petty ones: this Cassilian, of all Christian and Heathen Kings, having been the most mercilefs. For besides those of his own Blood and Nobility which he caused to be slain in his own Court and Chamber, as Sancho Ruis the great Master of Calatrava, Ruis Gonzales, Alphonso Tello, and Don John of Arragon, whom he cut in pieces and cast into the Streets, denying him Christian Burial: I say besides these, and the Slaughter of Gomes Manriques, Diego Peres, Alphonso Gomes, and the great Commander of Ca-

stile; He made away the two Infants of Arragon his Cousin-germans; his Brother Don Frederick, Don John de la Cerde, Albuquerque, Nugnes de Guzman, Comel, Cabrera, Tenorio, Mendes de Toledo, Gutiérrez his great Treasurer, and all his Kindred; and a world of others. Neither did he spare his two youngest Brothers, innocent Princes: whom after he had kept in close Prison from their Cradles, till one of them had lived sixteen years, and the other, fourteen; he murdered them there. Nay he spared not his Mother, nor his Wife the Lady Blanch of Bourbon. Lastly as he caused the Arch-Bishop of Toledo, and the Dean, to be killed of Purpose to enjoy their Treasures: so did he put to death Mahomet A'en Alhamar King of Barbary, with seven and thirty of his Nobility; that came unto him for Succour, with a great Summ of Money, to levy (by his Favour) some Companies of Souldiers to return withall. Yea he would needs assist the Hangman with his own hand, in the execution of the old King; in so much as Pope Urban declared him an Enemy both to GOD and Man. But what was his End? Having been formerly beaten out of his Kingdom, and re-established by the Valour of the English Nation, led by the famous Duke of Lancaster: He was stabbed to death by his younger Brother the Earl of Athramara, who dispossessed all his Children of their Inheritance; which, but for the Father's Injustice and Cruelty, had never been in danger of any such thing.

If we can parallel any Man with this King, it must be Duke John of Burgoyne: who, after his traitorous murder of the Duke of Orleans, caused the Constable of Armagnac, the Chancelour of France, the Bishops of Constance, Bayeux, Eureux, Senlis, Saintes, and other religious and Reverend Church-men, the Earl of gran Prè Hector of Chartres, and (in effect) all the Officers of Justice, of the Chamber of Accompts, Treasury and Request, (with sixteen hundred others to accompany them) to be suddenly and violently slain. Hereby, while he hoped to govern, and to have mastered France: He was soon after stricken with an Axe in the Face, in the presence of the Dauphin; and, without any leisure to repent his misdeeds, presently slain. These were the Lovers of other Mens miseries: and Misery found them out.

French Inveni;
in Anno 1418:

Now for the Kings of Spain, which lived both with Henry the seventh, Henry the eighth, Queen Mary, and Queen Elizabeth; Ferdinand of Arragon was the first: and the first that laid the Foundation of the present Austrian greatness. For this King did not content himself to hold Arragon by the Usurpation of his Ancestor; and to fasten thereunto the Kingdom of Castile and Leon, which Isabel his Wife held by strong hand, and his assistance, from her own Niece the Daughter of the last Henry: but most cruelly and craftily, without all colour or pretence of Right; He also cast his own Niece out of the Kingdom of Nacarre; and, contrary to Faith, and the Promise that he made to restore it, fortified the best Places, and so wasted the rest, as there was no means left for any Army to invade it. This King I say, that betrayed also Ferdinand and Frederick Kings of Naples, Princes of his own Blood, and by double Alliance tied unto him; sold them unto the French: and with the same Army, sent for their Succour under Gonsalvo, cast them out; and shared their Kingdom with the French, whom afterwards he most shamefully betrayed.

This wife and politick King, who fold Heaven and his own Honour, to make his Son, the Prince of Spain, the greatest Monarch of the World: saw him die in the flower of his years; and his Wife great with Child, with her untimely Birth, at once and together buried. His eldest Daughter married unto Don Alphonso Prince of Portugal, beheld her first Husband break his Neck in her presence; and being with Child by her second, died with it. A just just Judgment of GOD upon the Race of John, Father to Alphonso, now wholly extinguished: who had not only left many disconsolate Mothers in Portugal, by the slaughter of their Children; but had formerly slain, with his own Hand, the Son and only comfort of his Aunt the Lady Beatrix, Dutches of Viseo. The second Daughter of Ferdinand, married to the Arch-Duke Philip, turned Fool, and died mad and deprived. His third Daughter, bestowed on King Henry the Eighth, he saw cast off by the King: the Mother of many troubles in England; and the Mother of a Daughter that in her unhappy zeal shed a world of innocent Blood; lost Callice to the French; and died heart-broken without increase. To conclude, all those Kingdoms of Ferdinand have Masters of a new name; and, by a strange Family are governed and posselt.

Charles the Fifth, Son to the Arch-duke Philip, in whose vain enterprises upon the French, upon the Almans, and other Princes and States, so many Multitudes of Christian Soldiers, and renowned Captains, were consumed: who gave the while a most perilous entrance to the Turks, and suffered Rhodes, the Key of Christendom, to be taken; was in conclusion chased out of France, and in a sort out of Germany; and left to the French, Metz, Toul, and Verdun, places belonging to the Empire; stole away from Spain; and scaled the Alpes by Torch-light, pursued by Duke Maurice; having hoped to swallow up all those Dominions, wherein he concocted nothing save his own disgraces. And having, after the slaughter of so many Millions of Men, no one Foot of Ground in either: He crept into a Cloyster, and made himself a Pensioner of an Hundred thousand Duckers by the Year to his Son Philip; from whom he very slowly received his mean and ordinary maintenance.

His Son again, King Philip the Second, not satisfied to hold Holland and Zeland (wrested by his Ancestors from Jaqueline their lawful Princess) and to possess in peace many other Provinces of the Netherlands: persuaded by that mischievous Cardinal of Granvil, and other Romish Tyrants; not only forgot the most remarkable services, done to his Father the Emperor by the Nobility of those Countries; not only forgot the Present, made him upon his entry, of Forty Millions of Florens, called the Naval aid; nor only forgot, that he had twice most solemnly sworn to the General States, to maintain and preserve their Ancient Rights, Privileges, and Customs, which they had enjoyed under their thirty and five Earls before him, conditional Princes of those Provinces: but beginning first to constrain them, and enthrall them by the Spanish Inquisition, and then to impoverish them by many new devised and intolerable Impositions; He lastly, by strong hand and main force, attempted to make himself not only an absolute Monarch over them, like unto the Kings and Sovereigns of England and France; but Turk-like, to tread under his Feet all their National and Fundamental Laws, Privileges, and Ancient Rights. To effect which, after he had easily obtained from the Pope a Dispensation of his former Oaths (which Dispensation was the true cause of all the War and bloodshed since then) and after he had tried what he could perform, by dividing of their own Nobility, under the Government of his base Sister Margaret of Austria, and the Cardinal Granvil; He employed that most merciless Spaniard Don Ferdinand Alvarez of Toledo Duke of Alva, followed with a powerful Army of strange Nations: by whom he first slaughtered that renowned Captain the Earl of Egmont, Prince of Gavare; and Philip Montmorency Earl of Horn: made away Montigne, and the Marquis of Bergues; and cut off in those six Years (that

(that Alva governed) of Gentlemen and others, eighteen thousand and six hundred, by the Hands of the Hangman, besides all his other barbarous Murders and Massacres. By whose ministry when he could not yet bring his affairs to their wished ends, having it in his hope to work that by subtlety, which he had failed to perform by force: He sent for Governor his Bastard Brother Don John of Austria; a Prince of great hope, and very gracious to those People. But he, using the same Papal advantage that his Predecessors had done; made no scruple to take Oath upon the Holy Evangelists, to observe the Treaty made with the general States; and to discharge the Low Countries of all Spaniards, and other Strangers, therein garisoned. Towards whose Pay and Passport, the Netherlands strained themselves to make payment of six hundred thousand pounds. Which Monies received, he suddenly surpris'd the Citadels of Antwerp and Nemours: not doubting (being unsuspected by the States) to have posselt himself of all the mastering places of those Provinces. For whatsoever he overtly pretended, He held in secret a contrary Council with the Secretary Escovedo, Rhodus, Barlemont, and others, Ministers of the Spanish Tyranny; formerly practis'd, and now again intended. But let us now see the effect and end of this Perjury, and of all other the Dukes Cruelties. First for himself, after he had murdered so many of the Nobility; executed (as aforesaid) Eighteen thousand six hundred in six years; and most cruelly slain Man, Woman, and Child, in Mecklin, Zutphen, Naerden, and other places: and after he had consumed six and thirty Millions of Treasure in six Years: notwithstanding his Spanish vaunt, That he would suffocate the Hollanders in their own Butter-barrels, and Milk-rubs: He departed the Country no otherwise accompanied, than with the Curse and Detestation of the whole Nation; leaving his Masters Affairs in a tenfold worse Estate, than he found them at his first arrival. For Don John, whose haughty conceit of himself overcame the greatest difficulties; though his Judgment were over weak to manage the least: what wonders did his fearful breach of Faith bring forth, other than the King his Brothers jealousy and distrust; with the untimely death that seized him, even in the flower of his youth. And for Escovedo his sharp-witted Secretary, who in his own imagination had conquered for his Master both England and the Netherlands; being sent into Spain upon some new project, He was at the first arrival, and before any access to the King, by certain Russians appointed by Anthony Peres (though by better warrant than his) rudely murdered in his own Lodging. Lastly, if we consider the King of Spain's Carriage, his Council, and Success in this business; there is nothing left to the memory of Man more remarkable. For he hath paid above an hundred Millions, and the lives of above four hundred thousand Christians, for the loss of all those Countries; which, for beauty gave place to none, and for Revenue, did equal his West-Indies: for the loss of a Nation, which most willingly obeyed him; and who at this Day, after forty Years War, are in despite of all his Forces become free Estates, and far more rich and powerful, than they were, when he first began to impoverish and oppress them.

Oh by what plots, by what forswearings, betrayings, oppressions, imprisonments, tortures, poisonings, and under what reasons of State, and politick subtlety, have these fore-named Kings, both Strangers, and of our own Nation, pulled the vengeance of GOD upon themselves, upon theirs, and upon their prudent Ministers! and in the end have brought those things to pass for their Enemies, and seen an effect so directly contrary to all their own counsels and cruelties; as the one could never have hoped for themselves; and the other never have succeeded; if no such opposition had ever been made. GOD hath said it and performed it ever: Perdam sapientiam sapientum, I will destroy the wisdom of the wise.

But what of all this? and to what end do we lay before the Eyes of the living, the fall and fortunes of the dead: seeing the World is the same that it hath been; and the Children of the present time, will still obey their Parents? It is in the present time, that all the wits of the World are exercised. To hold the times we have, we hold all things lawful: and either we hope to hold them for ever; or at least we hope, that there is nothing after them to be hoped for. For as we are content to forget our own experience, and to counterfeit the ignorance of our own knowledge, in all things that concern our selves; or perswade our selves, that GOD hath given us Letters Parents to pursue all our irreligious affections, with a non obstante: so we neither look behind us what hath been, nor before us what shall be. It is true, that the quantity which we have, is of the Body: we are by it joyned to the Earth: we are compounded of Earth; and we inhabit it. The Heavens are high, far off and unsearchable: we have sense and feeling of Corporal things; and of Eternal grace, but by Revelation. No marvel then that our thoughts are also Earthly: and it is less to be wondered at, that the words of worthless Men cannot cleanse them; seeing their Doctrine and Instruction, whose Understanding the Holy Ghost vouchsafed to inhabit, have not performed it. For as the Prophet Isaiah cried out long ago, Lord, who hath believed our reports? And out of doubt, as Isaiah complained then for himself and others: so are they less believed, every day after other. For although Religion, and the truth thereof, be in every Man's Mouth, yea in the discourse of every Woman, who for the greatest number are but Idols of vanity: what is it other than an universal dissimulation? We profess that we know GOD: but by works we deny him. For Beatitude doth not consist in the knowledge of Divine things, but in a Divine life: for the Devils know them better than Men. Beatitudo non est divinarum cognitio, sed vita divina. And certainly there is nothing more to be admired, and more to be lamented, than the private Contention, the passionate Dispute, the personal Hatred, and the perpetual War, Massacres, and Murders, for Religion among Christians: the discourse whereof hath so occupied the World, as it hath well-near driven the practice thereof out of the World. Who would not soon resolve, that took knowledge but of the Religious disputations among Men, and not of their lives which dispute, that there were no other thing in their desires, than the purchase of Heaven; and that the World it self were but used as it ought, and as an Inn or Place, wherein to repose our selves in passing on towards our Celestial habitation? when on the contrary, besides the discourse and outward profession, the Soul hath nothing but Hypocrisy. We are all (in effect) become Comedians in Religion: and while we act in gesture and voice, Divine virtues, in all the course of our lives we renounce our Persons, and the Parts we Play. For Charity, Justice, and Truth, have but their being in terms, like the Philosophers Materia prima.

Neither is it that Wisdom, which Salomon defineth to be the School-Mistress of the knowledge of God, that hath valuation in the World: it is enough that we give it our good word; but the same which is altogether exercised in the service of the World, as the gathering of Riches chiefly; by which we purchase and obtain honour, with the many respects which attend it.

These

These indeed be the Marks (which when we have bent our Consciences to the height) we all shoot at. For the obtaining whereof it is true, that the Care is our own; the Care our own in this Life, the Peril our own in the future: and yet when we have gathered the greatest abundance, we our selves enjoy no more thereof, than so much as belongs to one Man. For the rest; He that had the greatest Wildom, and the greatest Ability that ever Man had, hath told us that this is the Use: When Goods increase (saith Salomon) they also increase that eat them; and what good cometh to the Owners, but the beholding thereof with their Eyes? As for those that devour the rest, and follow us in fair Weather: they again forsake us in the first Tempest of Misfortune, and steer away before the Sea and Wind; leaving us to the malice of our Destinies. Of these, among a thousand Examples, I will take but one out of Master Darnet, and use his own words: Whilst the Emperour Charles the Fifth, after the resignation of his Estates, stayed at Vlushing for Wind, to carry him his last journey into Spain; He conferred on a time with Seldius, his Brother Ferdinand's Embassador, till the deep of the Night. And when Seldius should depart, the Emperour calling for some of his Servants, and no body answering him (for those that attended upon him, were some gone to their Lodgings, and all the rest asleep) the Emperour took up the Candle himself, and went before Seldius to light him down the Stairs; and so did, notwithstanding all the resistance that Seldius could make. And when He was come to the Stairs foot, He said thus unto him: Seldius, remember this of Charles the Emperour, when he shall be dead and gone, That thou, whom thou hast known in thy Time environed with so many mighty Armies, and Guards of Souldiers, thou hast also seen alone, abandoned, and forsaken, yea even of his own domestical Servants, &c. I acknowledge this change of Fortune to proceed from the mighty hand of GOD; which I will by no means go about to withstand.

But you will say that there are some things else, and of greater regard than the former. The first, is the reverend Respect that is held of great Men, and the Honour done unto them by all sorts of People. And it is true indeed: provided, that an inward Love for their Justice and Piety, accompany the outward Worship given to their Places and Power; without which what is the Applause of the Multitude, but as the outcry of an Herd of Animals, who, without the knowledge of any true Cause, please themselves with the Noise they make? For seeing it is a thing exceeding rare, to distinguish Vertue and Fortune: the most impious (if prosperous) have ever been applauded; and the most virtuous (if unprosperous) have ever been despised. For as Fortune's Man rides the Horse, so Fortune her self rides the Man. Who, when he is descended and on Foot: the Man taken from his Beast, and Fortune from the Man; a base Groom beats the one, and a bitter Contercept spurns at the other, with equal liberty.

The second, is the greatning of our Posterity, and the contemplation of their Glory whom we leave behind us. Certainly, of those which conceive that their Souls departed take any comfort therein, it may truly be said of them, which Lactantius spake of certain Heathen Philosophers, quod sapientes sunt in re stulti. For when our Spirits immortal shall be once separate from our mortal Bodies; and disposed by GOD: there remaineth in them no other Joy of their Posterity which succeed, than there doth of Pride in that Stone, which sleepeth in the Wall of a King's Palace; nor any other Sorrow for their Poverty, than there doth of Shame in that, which beareth up a Begger's Cottage. Nesciunt mortui, etiam sancti, quid agunt vivi etiam eorum filii; S. Aug. de civitate quia anime mortuorum rebus viventium non interfunt. The Dead though holy, know nothing of the Living, no, not of their own Children: for the Souls of those departed, are not conversant with their Affairs that remain. And if we doubt of Saint Augustine, we cannot of Job; who tells us, That we know not if our Sons shall be Honourable: neither shall we understand concerning them, whether they shall be of low Degree. Which Ecclesiastes also confirmeth: Man walketh in a shadow, and disquieteth himself in vain: he begetteth up Riches, and cannot tell who shall gather them. The living (saith he) know that they shall die; but the dead know nothing at all. For who can shew unto Man, what shall be after him under the Sun? He therefore accounted it among the rest of Worldly Vanities, to labour and travel in the World, not knowing after Death, whether a Fool or a wise Man should enjoy the Fruits thereof: which made me (saith he) endeavour even to abhor mine own Labour. And what can other Men hope, whose blessed or sorrowful estates after Death GOD hath reserved? Man's Knowledge lying but in his Hope; seeing the Prophet Ezay confesseth of the Elect, That Abraham is ignorant of us, and Israel knows us not. But hereof we are assured, that the long and dark Night of Death: of whose following Day we shall never behold the dawn, till his return that hath triumphed over it) shall cover us over, till the World be no more. After which, and when we shall again receive Organs glorified and incorruptible, the seats of Angelical Affections: in so great admiration shall the Souls of the blessed be exercised, as they cannot admit the mixture of any second or less Joy; nor any return of forgone and mortal Affection, towards Friends, Kindred or Children. Of whom whether we shall retain any particular knowledge, or in any sort distinguish them: no Man can assure us; and the wisest Men doubt. But on the contrary; If a Divine Life retain any of those Faculties, which the Soul exercised in a mortal Body; we shall not at that time fo divide the Joys of Heaven, as to cast any part thereof on the memory of their Felicities which remain in the World. No; be their Estates greater than ever the World gave, we shall (by the difference known unto us) even detect their consideration. And whatsoever Comfort shall remain of all forepast, the same will consist in the Charity, which we exercised living: and in that Piety, Justice, and firm Faith, for which it pleased the infinite mercy of GOD to accept of us, and receive us. Shall we therefore value Honour and Riches at nothing, and neglect them, as unnecessary and vain: certainly no. For that infinite Wisdom of GOD, which hath distinguished his Angels by Degrees: which hath given greater and less Light, and Beauty to Heavenly Bodies: which hath made differences between Beasts and Birds: created the Eagle and the Fly, the Cedar and the Shrub: and among Stones, given the fairest tincture to the Ruby, and the quickest light to the Diamond; hath also ordained Kings, Dukes or Leaders of the People, Magistrates, Judges, and other Degrees among Men. And as Honour is left to Posterity, for a Mark and Ensign of the Vertue and Understanding of their Ancestors: so, seeing Siracides preferreth Death before Beggery: and that Titles, without proportionable Estates, fall under the miserable succour of other Mens Pity; I account it foolishness to condemn such a Care: Provided, that worldly Goods be well gotten, and that we raise not our own Buildings out of other Mens Ruines. For as Plato doth first prefer the perfection of bodily Health; secondly, the Form and Beauty; and thirdly, Divitiar nulla fraude questas: so Jeremy cries, Wo unto them that erect their Houses by unrighteousness, and their Chambers without Equity: and Ezay the same, Wo to those that spoil and were not spoiled. And it was out of the true Wisdom of Salomon, that he commandeth us, not to drink the Wine of Violence; not to lie in wait for Blood; and not to swallow them up alive, whose Riches we covet: for such are the Ways (saith he) of every one that is greedy of Gain.

And

And if we could afford our selves but so much Leisure as to consider, That he which hath most in the World, hath, in respect of the World, nothing in it: and that he which hath the longest time lent him to live in it, hath yet no proportion at all therein, setting it either by that which is past when we were not, or by that time which is to come in which we shall abide for ever: I say, if both, to wit our proportion in the World, and our time in the World, differ not much from that which is nothing; it is not our of any excellency of Understanding, that we so much prize the one, which hath (in effect) no being: and so much neglect the other, which hath no ending: coveting those mortal things of the World, as if our Souls were therein immortal, and neglecting those things which are immortal, as if our selves after the World were but mortal.

But let every Man value his own Wisdom, as he pleaseth. Let the rich Man think all Fools, that cannot equal his abundance; the Revenger esteem all negligent, that have not trodden down their Opposites; the Politician, all gross, that cannot Merchandize their Faith: Yet when we once come in sight of the Port of Death, to which all Winds drive us; and when by letting fall that fatal Anchor, which can never be weighed again, the Navigation of this Life takes end: Then it is I say, that our own Cogitations (those sad and severe Cogitations, formerly beaten from us by our Health and Felicity) return again, and pay us to the uttermost for all the pleasing Passages of our Lives past. It is then that we cry out to GOD for mercy; then, when our selves can no longer exercise Cruelty towards others: and it is only then, that we are stricken through the Soul with this terrible Sentence, That GOD will not be mockt. For if according to Saint Peter, The Righteous scarcely be saved: and that GOD spared not his Angels: where shall those appear, who, having served their Appetites all their Lives, presume to think, that the severe Commandments of the All-powerful GOD were given but in sport; and that the short Breath, which we draw when death presseth us, if we can but fashion it to the sound of Mercy (without any kind of Satisfaction or Amends), is sufficient? O quam multi, saith a reverend Father, cum hac spe ad aeternos labores & bella descendunt: I confess that it is a great Comfort to our Friends, to have it said, that we ended well: for we all desire (as Balaam did) to die the death of the righteous. But what shall we call a disesteeming, an apportioning, or (indeed) a mocking of GOD; if those Men do not appose him, disesteem him, and mock him, that think it enough for GOD, to ask him forgiveness at leisure, with the remainder and last drawing of a malicious Breath? For what do they otherwise, that die this kind of well-dying, but say unto GOD as followeth? We beseech thee O GOD, that all the Falshoods, Forfeittings, and Treacheries of our Lives past, may be pleasing unto thee; that thou wilt for our sakes (that have had no leisure to do any thing for thine) change thy Nature (though impossible) and forget to be a just GOD; that thou wilt love Injuries and Oppressions, call Ambition Wisdom, and Charity Foolishness. For I shall prejudice my Son (which I am resolved not to do) if I make restitution; and confess my self to have been unjust (which I am too proud to do) if I deliver the oppressed. Certainly, these wise Worldlings have either found out a new GOD; or have made One: and in all likelihood such a Leaden One, as Lewis the Eleventh ware in his Cap; which, when he had caused any that he feared, or hated, to be killed, he would take it from his Head and kiss it: beseeching it to pardon him this one evil act more, and it should be the last, which, (as at other times) he did; when by the practice of a Cardinal and a falsified Sacrament, he caused the Earl of Ar-

magnack to be stabbed to death; Mockeries indeed fit to be used towards a Leaden, but not towards the ever-living GOD. But of this Composition are all the devout lovers of the World, that they fear all that is dureless and ridiculous: they fear the Plots and Practices of their Opposites, and their very Whisperings: they fear the Opinions of Men which beat but upon shadows: they flatter and forsake the prosperous and unprosperous, be they Friends or Kings: yea they dive under Water, like Ducks, at every Pebble-stone, that's but thrown towards them by a powerful hand: and on the contrary, they shew an obdurate and Giant-like Valour, against the terrible Judgments of the All-powerful GOD: yea they shew themselves gods against GOD, and slaves towards Men; towards Men whose Bodies and Consciences are alike rotten.

Now for the rest: If we truly examine the difference of both Conditions; to wit of the Rich and Mighty, whom we call Fortunate; and of the Poor and Oppressed, whom we account Wretched: we shall find the Happiness of the one, and the miserable Estate of the other, so tied by GOD to the very instant, and both so subject to interchange (witness the sudden downfall of the greatest Princes, and the speedy uprising of the meanest Persons) as the one hath nothing so certain, whereof to boast; nor the other so uncertain, whereof to bewail it self. For there is no Man so assured of his Honour, of his Riches, Health or Life; but that he may be deprived of either or all, the very next Hour or Day to come. Quid vesper vokat, incertum est, What the Evening will bring with it, it is uncertain. And yet ye cannot tell (saith Saint James) what shall be to morrow. To day he is set up, and to morrow he shall not be found: for he is turned into dust, and his Purpose perisheth. And although the Air which compasseth Adversity, be very obscure: yet therein we better discern GOD, than in that shining Light which environeth worldly Glory; through which, for the clearness thereof, there is no Vanity which escapeth our Sight. And let Adversity seem what it will; to happy Men, ridiculous, who make themselves merry at other Mens Misfortunes; and to those under the Cross, grievous: yet this is true, That for all that is past, to the very instant, the Portions remaining are equal to either. For be it that we have lived many years, and (according to Salomon) in them all we have rejoiced; or be it that we have measured the same length of Days, and therein have evermore sorrowed: yet looking back from our present being, we find both the one and the other, to wit, the Joy and the Woe, failed out of sight; and Death which doth pursue us and hold us in chase, from our infancy, hath gathered it. Quicquid etatis retro est, mors tenet: Whatsoever of our age is past, Death holds it. So as whosoever be, to whom Fortune hath been a Servant, and the Time a Friend: let him but take the account of his Memory (for we have no other keeper of our Pleasures past) and truly examine what it hath retained, either of Beauty and Youth, or foregone Delights; what it hath saved, that it might last, of his dearest Affections, or of what ever else the amorous Spring-time gave his thoughts of Contentment, then unvaluable; and he shall find that all the Art which his elder years have, can draw no other Vapour out of these Dissolutions, than heavy, secret, and sad Sighs. He shall find nothing remaining, but those Sorrows, which grow up after our fast-springing Youth; overtake it, when it is at a stand; and over-top it utterly, when it begins to wither: in so much as looking back from the very instant time, and from our now being; the poor, diseased, and captive Creature, hath as little Sense of all his former Miseries and Pains; as he, that is most blest in common Opinion, hath of his fore-passed Pleasures and delights. For whatsoever is cast behind us, is just nothing: and what is to come, deceitful hope hath it. Omnia quæ eventura sunt, in incerto jacent. Only those few black Swans I must except, who having had the grace to value worldly vanities at no more than their own price; do, by retaining the comfortable memory of a well-acted life, behold Death without dread, and the Grave without fear; and embrace both, as necessary guides to endless Glory.

For my self, this is my consolation, and all that I can offer to others, that the sorrows of this life, are but of two sorts: whereof the one hath respect to GOD; the other, to the World. In the first, we complain to GOD against our selves, for our offences against him; and confess, Et tu justus es in omnibus quæ conerunt super nos. And thou, O Lord, art just in all that hath befallen us. In the second, we complain to our selves against GOD, as if he had done us wrong, either in not giving us worldly Goods and Honours, answering our Appetites; or for taking them again from us, having had them: forgetting that humble and just acknowledgment of Job, The Lord hath given, and the Lord hath taken To the first of which S. Paul hath promised Blessedness; to the second, Death. And out of doubt he is either a Fool or ungrateful to GOD, or both, that doth not acknowledge, how mean soever his Estate be, that the same is yet far greater, than that which GOD oweth him: or doth not acknowledge, how sharp soever his Afflictions be, that the same are yet far less, than those which are due unto him. And if an Heathen wife Man call the Adversities of the World, but tribula vivendi, the tributes of living: a wise Christian Man ought to know them, and bear them, but as the tributes of offending. He ought to bear them Man-like, and resolvedly; and not as those whining Soldiers do, qui gementes sequuntur Imperatorem.

For seeing God, who is the Author of all our Tragedies, hath written out for us, and appointed us all the Parts we are to Play: and hath not, in their distribution, been partial to the most mighty Princes of the World; That gave unto Darius the part of the greatest Emperor, and the part of the most miserable Begger; a Begger begging Water of an Enemy, to quench the great drought of Death; That appointed Bajazet to play the Grand Signior of the Turks in the Morning, and in the same Day the Foot-stool of Tamerlane (both which Parts Valerian had also played, being taken by Sapores) that made Belisarius play the most Victorious Captain, and lastly the Part of a blind Begger; of which examples many thousands may be produced: why should other Men, who are but as the least Worms, complain of wrongs? Certainly there is no other account to be made of this ridiculous World, than to resolve, That the change of Fortune on the great Theatre, is but as the change of Garments on the less. For when on the one and the other, every Man wears but his own Skin; the Players are all alike. Now if any Man, out of weakness, prize the passages of this World otherwise (for saith Petrarch, Magni ingenii est revocare mentem a sensibus) it is by reason of that unhappy fantasie of ours, which forgeth in the Brains of Man all the miseries (the corporal excepted) whereunto he is subject: Therein it is, that Misfortune and Adversitie work all that they work. For seeing Death, in the end of the Play, takes from all, whatsoever Fortune or Force takes from any one: it were a foolish madness in the Shipwrack of worldly things, where all sinks but the Sorrow, to save it. That were, as Seneca saith, Fortuna succumbere, quod tristius est omni fato; to fall under Fortune, of all other the most miserable destiny.

But

But it is now time to found a Retreat; and to desire to be excused of this long pursuit: and wishal, that the good intent, which hath moved me to draw the Picture of time past (which we call History) in so large a table, may also be accepted in place of a better reason.

The examples of Divine Providence, every where found (the first Divine Histories being nothing else but a continuation of such examples) have persuaded me to fetch my beginning from the beginning of all things; to wit, Creation. For though these two glorious actions of the Almighty be so near, and (as it were) linked together, that the one necessarily implieth the other: Creation, inferring Providence: (for what Father forsaketh the Child that he hath begotten?) and Providence presupposing Creation) yet many of those that have seemed to excel in worldly wisdom, have gone about to disjoin this coherence; the Epicure denying both Creation and Providence, but granting that the World had a beginning; the Aristotelian granting Providence, but denying both the Creation and the Beginning.

Now although this Doctrine of Faith, touching the Creation in time (for by Faith we understand, that the World was made by the Word of God) be too weighty a Work for Aristotle's rotten Ground to bear up, upon which he hath (notwithstanding) founded the Defences and Fortresses of all his Verbal Doctrine: Yet that the necessity of Infinite Power, and the Worlds beginning, and the impossibility of the contrary even in the judgment of Natural reason, wherein he believed, had not better informed him; it is greatly to be marvelled at. And it is no less strange, that those Men which are desirous of knowledge, (seeing Aristotle hath failed in this main point; and taught little other than terms in the rest) have so retrench'd their minds from the following and overtaking of truth, and so absolutely subjected themselves to the Law of those Philosophical Principles; as all contrary kind of teaching, in the search of causes, they have condemned either for phantastical, or curious. But doth it follow, that the positions of Heathen Philosophers, are undoubted Grounds and Principles indeed, because so called? Or that ipsi dixerunt, doth make them to be such? certainly no. But this is true, That where natural reason hath built any thing so strong against it self, as the same reason can hardly assail it, much less batter it down: the same in every question of Nature, and finite Power, may be approved for a Fundamental Law of Humane knowledge. For saith Charron in his Book of Wisdom, Tout proposition humaine a autant d'autorité que l'autre, si la raison n'en fait la difference. Every Humane proposition hath equal Authority, if reason make not the difference, the rest being but the Fables of Principles. But hereof how shall the upright and impartial Judgment of Man give a Sentence, where Opposition and Examination are not admitted to give in Evidence? And to this purpose it was well said of Lactantius, Sapientiam sibi adiungunt, qui sine ulla judicio inventa majorum probant, & ab aliis peculum more ducuntur. They neglect their own Wisdom, who without any Judgment approve the invention of those that fore-went them; and suffer themselves, after the manner of Beasts, to be led by them. By the advantage of which sloth and dulness, ignorance is now become so powerful a Tyrant: as it hath set true Philosophy, Physick, and Divinity, in a Pillory; and written over the first, Contra negantem Principia; over the second, Virtus specifica; and over the third, Ecclesia Romana.

But for my self, I shall never be persuaded, that GOD hath shut up all light of Learning within the Lanthorn of Aristotle's Brains: or that it was ever said unto him, as unto Esdra, Accendam in Corde tuo Lucernam intellectus: that GOD hath given invention but to the Heathen; and that they only have have invaded Nature, and found the strength and bottom thereof; the same Nature having consumed all her Store, and left nothing of Price to after-ages. That these and these be the causes of these and these effects, Time hath taught us; and not Reason: and so hath Experience, without Art. The Cheefe-wife knoweth it as well as the Philosopher, that sowre Runnet doth coagulate her Milk into a Curd. But if we ask a reason of this cause, why the sowre-ness doth it? whereby it doth it? and the manner how; I think that there is nothing to be found in vulgar Philosophy, to satisfie this and many other like vulgar questions. But Man, to cover his ignorance in the least things, who cannot give a true reason for the Grass under his Feet, why it should be green rather than red, or of any other colour; that could never yet discover the way and reason of Natures working, in those which are far less noble Creatures than himself; who is far more Noble than the Heavens themselves: Man (saith Salomon) that can hardly discern the things that are upon the Earth, and with great labour find out the things that are before us; that hath so short a time in the World, as he no sooner begins to learn, than to die; that hath in his memory but borrowed knowledge; in his understanding, nothing truly; that is ignorant of the Essence of his own Soul, and which the wisest of the Naturalists (if Aristotle be he) could never so much as define, but by the action and effect, telling us what it works (which all Men know as well as he) but not what it is, which neither he, nor any else, doth know, but GOD that created it; (for though I were perfect, yet I know not my Soul, saith Job.) Man I say, that is but an Idiot in the next cause of his own life, and in the cause of all the actions of his life, will (notwithstanding) examine the Art of GOD in Creating the World; of GOD who (saith Job) is so excellent as we know him not; and examine the beginning of the Work, which had end before Mankind had a beginning of being. He will disable GOD's Power to make a World, without matter to make it of. He will rather give the Moths of the Air for a cause; cast the work on necessity or chance; bestow the honour thereof on Nature; make two Powers, the one to be the Author of the Matter, the other of the Form; and lastly, for want of a Work-man, have it Eternal: which latter opinion Aristotle, to make himself the Author of a new Doctrine, brought into the World: and his Sectators have maintained it; parati ac conjurati, quos sequuntur, Philosophorum animis invictis opinionibus tueri. For Hermes, who lived at once with, or soon after, Moses, Zoroaster, Museus, Orpheus, Linus, Anaximenes, Anaxagoras, Empedocles, Melissus, Perecydes, Thales, Cleantes, Pythagoras, Plato, and many others (whose opinions are exquisitely gathered by Stoichus Engubinus) found in the necessity of invincible reason, one Eternal and Infinite Being, to be the Parent of the Universal. Horum omnium sententia quamvis sit incerta, eodem tamen spectat, ut Providentiam unam esse consentiant: sive enim Natura, sive Ether, sive Ratio, sive mens, sive fatalis necessitas, sive divina Lex; idem esse quod à nobis dicitur Deus. All these Mens opinions (saith Lactantius) though uncertain, come to this, That they agree upon one Providence; whether the same be Nature, or Light, or Reason, or Understanding, or Destiny, or Divine Ordinance; that it is the same which we call GOD. Certainly, as all the Rivers in the World, though they have divers risings, and divers runnings; though they sometimes hide themselves for a while under Ground, and seem to be lost in Sea-like Lakes; do at last find, and fall into the great Ocean: so after all the searches that Humane capacity hath; and after all Philosophical contemplation and curiosity; in the necessity of this Infinite Power, all the Reason of Man ends and dissolves it self.

Evang. l. 7. c. 8.*

As for others; and first touching those, which conceive the matter of the World to have been Eternal, and that God did not create the World ex nihilo, but ex materia præexistente: the supposition is so weak, as is hardly worth the answering. For (saith Eusebius) Mibi videntur qui hoc dicunt, fortissimam quoque Deo amittere. They seem unto me, which affirm this, - to give part of the work to God, and part to Fortune. Inasmuch as if God had not found this first matter by chance, He had neither been Author, nor Father, nor Creator, nor Lord of the Universal. For were the Matter or Chaos, Eternal: it then follows, That either this supposed Matter did fit it self to God; or God, accommodate himself to the Matter. For the first; it is impossible, that things without sense could proportion themselves to the Workman's will. For the second; it were horrible to conceive of God, That as an Artificer he applied himself, according to the proportion of Matter which he lighted upon.

But let it be supposed, That this matter had been made by any Power, not Omnipotent, and infinitely wise: I would gladly learn how it came to pass, that the same was proportionable to his intention, that was Omnipotent and infinitely wise; and no more, nor no less, than served to receive the form of the Universal. For, had it wanted any thing of what was sufficient; then must it be granted, That God created out of nothing so much of new matter, as served to finish the work of the World: Or had there been more of this matter, than sufficed, then did God dissolve and annihilate whatsoever remained and was superfluous. And this must every reasonable Soul confess, That it is the same Work of God alone, to Create any thing out of nothing: And by the same Art and Power, and by none other, can those things, or any part of that Eternal matter, be again changed into Nothing; by which those things, that once were nothing, obtained a beginning of being.

Again, to say that this matter was the cause of it self; this, of all other, were the greatest Idiotism. For, if it were the cause of it self at any time; then there was also a time when it self was not: at which time of not being, it is easie enough to conceive, that it could neither produce it self, nor any thing else. For to be, and not to be, at once, is impossible, Nihil autem seipsum præcedit, neque seipsum componit corpus. There is nothing that doth precede it self, neither do Bodies compound themselves.

For the rest; Those that feign this matter to be Eternal, must of necessity confess, that Infinite cannot be separate from Eternity. And then had infinite matter left no place for infinite form, but that the first matter was finite, the form which it received proves it. For conclusion of this part; whoever will make choice, rather to believe in Eternal deformity, or in Eternal dead matter, than in Eternal light and Eternal life: let Eternal death be his reward. For it is a madness of that kind, as wanteth terms to express it. For what reason of Man (whom the curse of presumption hath not stupefied) hath doubted, That Infinite Power (of which we can comprehend but a kind of Shadow, quia comprehensio est intra terminos, qui infinito repugnant) hath any thing wanting in it self, either for matter or form; yea for as many Worlds (if such had been GOD's Will) as the Sea hath Sands? For where the Power is without limitation, the Work hath no other limitation, than the Workman's will. Yea Reason it self finds it more easie for infinite Power, to deliver from it self a finite World, without the help of matter prepared; than for a finite Man, a Fool and Dust, to change the form of matter made to his Hands. They are Dionysius his words, Deus in una existentia omnia omnia præhabet: and again, Esse omnium est ipsa Divinitas, omne quod videt, et quod non videt: to wit, casually, or in better terms, non tanquam forma, sed tanquam causa universalis. Neither hath the World Universal closed up all of GOD: For the most parts of his Works (saith Siracides) are hid. Neither can the depth of his Wisdom be opened, by the glorious Work of the World: which never brought to knowledge all it can; for then were his Infinite Power bounded, and made finite. And hereof it comes, That we seldom entitle GOD, the all-shewing, or the all-willing; but the all-mighty; that is, infinitely able.

But now for those, who from that ground, That out of nothing, nothing is made, infer the Worlds Eternity; and yet not so salvage therein, as those are, which give an Eternal being to dead matter: It is true, if the word [nothing] be taken in the Affirmative; and the making, imposed upon Natural Agents and finite Power; That out of nothing, nothing is made. But seeing their great Doctor Aristotle himself confesseth, Quod omnes antiqui decreverunt quasi quoddam rerum principium, ipsumque infinitum. That all the Ancient decree a kind of beginning, and the same to be Infinite: and a little after, more largely and plainly, Principium ejus est nullum, sed ipsum omnium cernitur esse principium, ac omnia completi ac regere. It is strange that this Philosopher, with his followers, should rather make choice out of falshood, to conclude falsely; than out of truth, to resolve truly. For if we compare the World Universal, and all the unmeasurable Orbs of Heaven, and those marvelous Bodies of the Sun, Moon, and Stars, with ipsum infinitum: it may truly be said of them all, which himself affirmeth of his imaginary Materia prima, That they are neither quid, quale, nor quantum; and therefore to bring finite (which hath no proportion with infinite) out of infinite (qui destruit omnem proportionem) is no wonder in GOD's Power. And therefore Anaximander, Melissus, and Empedocles, call the World Universal, but particular Universitatis & Infininitatis: a parcel of that which is the Universality and the Infinity it self; and Plato, but a shadow of GOD. But the other, to prove the Worlds Eternity, urgeth this Maxime, That, A sufficient and effectual cause being granted, an answerable effect thereof is also granted: inferring, that GOD being for ever a sufficient and effectual cause of the World, the effect of the cause should also have been for ever; to wit, the World Universal. But what a strange mockery is this in so great a Master, to confess a sufficient and effectual cause of the World, (to wit an almighty GOD) in his Antecedent: and the same GOD to be a GOD restrained in his Conclusion; to make GOD free in Power, and bound in Will; able to effect, unable to determine; able to make all things, and yet unable to make choice of the time when? For this were impiously to resolve of GOD, as of natural necessity; which hath neither choice, nor will, nor understanding; which cannot but work matter being present; as fire, to burn things combustible.

Again he thus disputes, That every Agent which can work, and doth not work: if it afterward work, it is either thereto moved by it self, or by somewhat else; and so it passeth from power to act. But GOD (saith he) is immovable, and is neither moved by himself, nor by any other; but being always the same, doth always work: whence he concludeth, if the World were caused by GOD, that he was for ever the cause thereof; and therefore Eternal. The answer to this is very easie; For that GOD's performing in due time that, which he ever determined at length to perform, doth not argue any alteration or change, but rather constancy in him. For the same action of his Will, which made the World for ever, did also withhold the effect to the time ordained. To this Answer, in it self sufficient, others add further, that the Pattern or Image of the World may be said to be Eternal: which the Platonicks call, spiritualem mundum; and do in this sort distinguish the Idea, and Creation in time. Spirituális ille mundus, mundi hujus exemplar, primumque Dei opus, vixit æquali est Architecto; fuit semper cum illo, æritque semper. Mundus autem corporalis, quod secundum opus est Dei, decedit jam ab æpice ex parte una, quia non fuit semper; retinet alteram, quia fit semper futurus. That Representative, or the intentional World (say they) the Sampler of this visible World, the first Work of GOD, was equally ancient with the Architect; for it was for ever with him, and ever shall be. This material World, the second Work or Creature of GOD, doth differ from the Worker in this, That it was not from everlasting, and in this it doth agree, that it shall be for ever to come. The first Point, That it was not for ever, all Christians confess: The other they understand no otherwise, than that after the consummation of this World, there shall be a new Heaven and a new Earth; without any new creation of Matter. But of these things we need not here stand to argue: though such Opinions be not unworthy the propounding; in this Consideration, of an eternal and unchangeable Cause, producing a changeable and temporal Effect. Touching which Point Proclus the Platonist disputeth, That the compounded essence of the World, (and because compounded, therefore dissapable) is continued, and knit to the Divine Being, by an individual and inseparable Power, flowing from Divine Unity; and that the Worlds natural Appetite of GOD sheweth, that the same proceedeth from a Goodness and Understanding Divine; and that this Vertue, by which the World is continued and knit together, must be infinite, that it may infinitely and everlastingly continue and preserve the same. Which infinite Vertue, the finite World (saith he) is not capable of, but receiveth it from the divine Infinite, according to the temporal Nature it hath, successively every moment by little and little; even as the whole Material World is not altogether: but the abolished Parts are departed by small Degrees, and the parts yet to come, do by the same small Degrees succeed; as the shadow of a Tree in a River, seemeth to have continued the same a long time in the Water, but it is perpetually renewed, in the continual ebbing and flowing thereof.

But to return to them, which denying that ever the World had any beginning, withall deny that ever it shall have any end; and to this purpose affirm, That it was never heard, never read, never seen, no not by any reason perceived, that the Heavens have ever suffered Corruption; or that they appear any way the Elder by continuance; or in any sort otherwise than they were; which had they been subject to final corruption, some change would have been discerned in so long a time: To this it is answered, That the little change as yet perceived, doth rather prove their newness, and that they have not continued so long; than that they will continue for ever as they are. And if conjectural Arguments may receive Answer by Conjectures: it then seemeth, that some alteration may be found. For either Aristotle, Pliny, Strabo, Beda, Aquinas, and others were grossly mistaken: or else those parts of the World, lying within the burnt Zone, were not in elder times habitable, by reason of the Sun's Heat; neither were the Seas under the Equinoctial, navigable. But we know by Experience, that those Regions, so situate, are filled with People, and exceeding temperate; and the Sea, over which we navigate, passable enough. We read also many Histories of Deluges: and how that in the time of Phaeton, divers places in the World were burnt up by the Sun's violent Heat.

But in a Word, this observation is exceeding feeble. For we know it for certain, That Stone-walls, of matter molding and friable, have stood two or three thousand years: that many things have been digged up out of the Earth, of that depth, as supposed to have been buried by the general Flood; without any alteration either of Substance or Figure, yea it is believed, and it is very probable, that the Gold which is daily found in Mines, and Rocks, under ground, was created together with the Earth.

And if Bodies elementary, and compounded, the eldest times have not invaded and corrupted: what great alteration should we look for in Celestial and Quintessential Bodies? And yet we have reason to think, that the Sun, by whose help all Creatures are generate, doth not in these latter Ages assist Nature, as heretofore. We have neither Gyants, such as the eldest World had: nor mighty Men, such as the elder World had: but all things in general are reputed of less Vertue, which from the Heavens receive Vertue. Whence, if the nature of a Preface would permit a larger Discourse, we might easily fetch store of proof: as that this World shall at length have end, as that once it had beginning.

And I see no good Answer that can be made to this Objection: If the World were Eternal; why not all things in the World Eternal? If there were no First, no Cause, no Father, no Creator, no incomprehensible Wisdom, but that every Nature had been alike eternal; and Man more Rational than every other Nature: Why had not the eternal Reason of Man, provided for his eternal being in the World? For if all were equal: why not equal Conditions to all? why should Heavenly Bodies live for ever; and the Bodies of Men rot and die.

Again, who was it that appointed the Earth to keep the Center, and gave Order that it should hang in the Air: that the Sun should travel between the Tropicks, and never exceed those Bounds, nor fail to perform that Progress once in every Year: The Moon to live by borrowed Light: the fixt Stars (according to common Opinion) to be fastened like Nails in a Cart-Wheel, and the Planets to wander at their Pleasure? Or if none of these had power over other: was it out of Charity and Love, that the Sun by his perpetual travel within those two Circles, hath visited, given Light unto, and relieved all parts of the Earth, and the Creatures therein, by turns and times? Out of doubt, if the Sun have of his own accord kept this Course in all Eternity: He may justly be called eternal Charity, and everlasting Love. The same may be said of all the Stars: who being all of them most large and clear Fountains of Vertue and Operation, may also be called eternal Vertues: the Earth may be called eternal Patience; the Moon, an eternal Borrower and Begger; and Man of all other the most miserable, eternally Mortal. And what were this, but to believe again in the old Play of the gods? Yea in more gods by Millions, than ever Hesiodus dream'd of. But in stead of this mad folly, we see it well enough with our feeble and mortal Eyes: and the Eyes of our Reason discern it better; That the Sun, Moon, Stars, and the Earth, are limited, bounded, and constrained: themselves they have not constrained, nor could. Omne determinatum causam habet aliquam efficientem; quæ illud determinaverit, Every thing bounded hath some efficient cause, by which it is bounded.

Now for Nature; As by the ambiguity of this Name, the School of Aristotle hath both commended many Errors unto us, and sought also thereby to obscure the Glory of the high Moderator of all things, shining in the Creation, and in the governing of the World: so if the best defininition be taken out of the second of Aristotle's Physics, or primo de Caelo, or out of the fifth of his Metaphysics; I say that the best is but nominal, and serving only to difference the beginning of Natural Motion, from Artificial: which yet the Academicks open better, when they call it A seminary Strength, infused into Matter by the Soul of the World: who give the first place to Providence, the second to Fate, and but the third to Nature. Providentia (by which they understand GOD) dux & caput; Fatum, medium ex Providentia prodians; Natura postremum. But be it what he will, or be it any of these (GOD excepted) or participating of all: yet that it hath Choice or Understanding (both which are necessarily in the cause of all things) no Man hath avowed. For this is unanswerable of Lactantius: Is autem facit aliquid, qui aut voluntatem faciendi habet, aut scientiam; He only can be said to be the doer of a thing, that hath either will or knowledge in the doing it.

Dei l. 1. c. 10.*

Ficin. in Plat.

But the Will and Science of Nature, are in these words truly exprest by Ficinus: Potest ubique Natura, vel per diversa media, vel ex diversis materiis, diversa facere: sublata vero mediorum materialiumque diversitate, vel unicum vel simillimum operatur, neque potest quando adest materia non operari; It is the power of Nature by diversity of Means, or out of diversity of Matter, to produce divers things: but taking away the diversity of Means, and the diversity of Matter, it then works but one or the like Work; neither can it but work, Matter being present. Now if Nature made choice of diversity of Matter, to work all these variable Works of Heaven and Earth; it had then both Understanding and Will; it had Counsel to begin; Reason to dispose; Virtue and Knowledge to finish; and Power to govern: without which, all things had been but one and the same: all of the Matter of Heaven; or all of the Matter of Earth. And if we grant Nature this Will, and this Understanding, this Counsel, Reason, and Power: Cur Natura potius, quam Deus nominetur? Why should we then call such a Cause rather Nature, than GOD? GOD of whom all Men have Notion, and give the first and highest place to Divine Power: Omnes homines rationem deorum habent, omnesque summum locum divino cuidam nomini assignant. And this I say in short; that it is a true effect of true Reason in Man (were there no Authority more binding than Reason) to acknowledge and adore the first and most sublime Power. Vera Philosophia, est ascensus ab his que fluunt, & oriuntur, & occidunt, ad ea que vire sunt, & semper eadem: True Philosophy, is an ascending from the things which flow, and rise, and fall, to the things that are for ever the same.

caelo, c. 2. T. 22.*

For the rest; I do also account it not the meanest, but an impiety monstrous, to confound GOD and Nature: be it but in terms. For it is GOD, that only disposeth of all things according to his own Will; and maketh of one Earth, Vessels of Honour and Dishonour. It is Nature that can dispose of nothing, but according to the will of the matter wherein it worketh. It is GOD, that commandeth all: It is Nature that is obedient to all. It is GOD that doth good unto all, knowing and loving the good he doth: It is Nature, that secondarily doth also good, but it neither knoweth nor loveth the good it doth. It is GOD, that hath all things in himself: Nature, nothing in it self. It is GOD, which is the Father, and hath begotten all things: It is Nature, which is begotten by all things; in which it liveth and laboureth; for by it self it existeth not. For shall we say, that it is out of affection to the Earth, that heavy things fall towards it? Shall we call it Reason, which doth conduct every River into the salt Sea? Shall we term it knowledge in Fire, that makes it to consume combustible matter? If it be Affection, Reason, and Knowledge in these: by the same Affection, Reason, and Knowledge it is, that Nature worketh. And therefore seeing all things work as they do, (call it by Form, by Nature, or by what you please) yet because they work by an impulsion, which they cannot resist; or by a faculty, infused by the supremest Power: we are neither to wonder at, nor to worship, the faculty that worketh, nor the Creature wherein it worketh. But herein lies the Wonder, and to him is the Worship due, who hath created such a Nature in things, and such a Faculty, as neither knowing it self, the matter wherein it worketh, nor the virtue and power which it hath; doth yet work all things to their last and uttermost perfection. And therefore every reasonable Man, taking to himself for a ground that which is granted by all Antiquity, and by all Men truly learned that ever the World had; to wit, That there is a Power Infinite, and Eternal, (which also necessity doth prove unto us, without the help of Faith; and Reason, without the force of Authority) all things do as easily follow which have been delivered by Divine Letters, as the Waters of a running River do successively pursue each other from the first Fountains.

This much I say it, that Reason it self hath taught us: and this is the beginning of Knowledge. Sapientia precedit, Religio sequitur: quia prius est Deum scire, consequens colere; Sapience goes before, Religion follows: because it is first to know God, and then to worship him. This Sapience Plato calleth, absoluti boni scientiam; The Science of the absolute good: and another, Scientiam rerum primarum, sempiternarum, perpetuarum. For Faith (saith Isidore) is not extorted by violence; but by reason and examples perswaded: fides nequaquam vi extorquetur; sed ratione & exemplis suadetur. I confess it, That to inquire further, as of the Essence of GOD, of his Power, of his Art, and by what mean he created the World: Or of his secret Judgment, and the Causes; is not an effect of Reason: Sed cum ratione insaniant, but they grow mad with Reason, that inquire after it. For as it is no shame nor dishonour (saith a French Author) de faire arrest aubut qu'on nasceu surpasser; For a Man to rest himself there, where he finds it impossible to pass on further: so whatsoever is beyond, and out of the reach of true Reason, it acknowledgeth it to be so; as Understanding it self not to be Infinite, but according to the Name and Nature it hath, to be a Teacher, that best knows the end of his own Art. For seeing both Reason and Necessity teach us (Reason, which is pars divini spiritus in corpus humanum meriti) that the World was made by a Power Infinite; and yet how it was made, it cannot teach us: and seeing the same Reason and Necessity make us know, that the same Infinite Power is every where in the World; and yet how every where, it cannot inform us: our belief hereof is not weakened, but greatly strengthened, by our ignorance; because it is the same Reason that tells us, That such a Nature cannot be said to be God, that can be in all conceived by Man.

Quod est infinitum & non secundum naturam terminatum, non constituitur a Scientia; Arist. Poster.

I have been already over-long, to make any large discourse either of the parts of the following Story, or in mine own excuse: especially in the excuse of this or that passage; seeing the whole is exceeding weak and defective. Among the grossest, the unsuitable division of the Books, I could not know how to excuse, had I not been directed to enlarge the Building after the Foundation was laid, and the First Part finished. All Men know that there is no great Art in the dividing evenly of these things, which are subject to number and measure. For the rest, it suits well enough with a great many Books of this Age, which speak too much, and yet say little; Ipse nobis furto subducitur,

We

We are stollen away from our selves, setting a high price on all that is our own. But hereof, though a late good Writer, make complaint, yet shall it not lay hold on me, because I believe as he doth; that who so thinks himself the wisest Man, is but a poor and miserable ignorant. Those that are the best Men of War, against all the vanities and fooleries of the World, do always keep the strongest Guards against themselves, to defend them from themselves, from self-love, self-estimation, and self-opinion.

Generally concerning the order of the Work, I have only taken counsel from the Argument. For of the Assyrians, which after the downfal of Babel take up the first part, and were the first great Kings of the World, there came little to the view of Posterity: some few enterprises, greater in fame than faith, of Ninus and Semiramis excepted.

It was the Story of the Hebrews, of all before the Olympiads, that overcame the consuming Disease of Time; and preserved it self, from the very cradle and beginning to this Day: and yet not so entire, but that the large discourses thereof (to which in many Scriptures we are referred) are no where found. The fragments of other Stories, with the actions of those Kings and Princes which shot up here and there in the same time, I am driven to relate by way of digression: of which we may say with Virgil, Apparent rari nantes in gurgite vasto.

They appear here and there floating in the great gulf of time.

To the same first Ages do belong the report of many Inventions therein found, and from them derived to us; though most of the Authors Names have perished in so long a Navigation. For those Ages had their Laws; they had diversity of Government; they had Kingly Rule; Nobility, Policy in War; Navigation; and all, or the most of needful Trades. To speak therefore of these (seeing in a general History we should have left a great deal of Nakedness by their omission) it cannot properly be called a digression. True it is that I have also made many others: which if they shall be laid to my charge, I must cast the fault into the great heap of Humane error. For seeing we digress in all the ways of our lives: yea seeing the life of Man is nothing else but digression; I may the better be excused, in writing their Lives and Actions. I am not altogether ignorant in the Laws of History, and of the Kinds.

The same hath been taught by many; but by no Man better, and with greater brevity, than by that excellent learned Gentleman Sir Francis Bacon. Christian Laws are also taught us by the Prophets and Apostles; and every Day preach'd unto us. But we still make large digressions: yea the Teachers themselves do not (in all) keep the path which they point out to others.

For the rest; after such time as the Persians had wrested the Empire from the Chaldeans, and had raised a great Monarchy, producing Actions of more importance than were elsewhere to be found: it was agreeable to the order of Story, to attend this Empire; whilst it so flourished, that the Affairs of the Nations adjoining had reference thereunto. The like observance was to be used towards the fortunes of Greece, when they again began to get ground upon the Persians, as also towards the Affairs of Rome, when the Romans grew more mighty than the Greeks.

As for the Meds, the Macedonians, the Sicilians, the Carthaginians, and other Nations, who resisted the beginnings of the former Empires, and afterwards became but parts of their composition and enlargement: it seemed best to remember what was known of them from their several beginnings, in such times and places, as they in their flourishing estates opposed those Monarchies; which in the end swallowed them up. And herein I have followed the best Geographers, who seldom give names to those small Brooks, whereof many joined together, make great Rivers; till such time as they become united, and run in a main Stream to the Ocean Sea. If the Phraze be weak, and the Style not every where like it self: the first, shews their legitimation and true Parent; the second, will excuse it self upon the variety of Matter. For Virgil, who wrote his Ecloques, gracili avena, used stronger Pipes when he founded the Wars of Aeneas. It may also be laid to my charge, that I use divers Hebrew words in my First Book, and elsewhere: in which Language others may think, and I my self acknowledge it, that I am altogether ignorant: but it is true, that some of them I find in Montanus; others in Latin Character in S. Severus, and of the rest I have borrowed the interpretation of some of my learned Friends. But say I had been beholding to neither, yet were it not to be wondered at, having had Eleven Years leisure, to attain the knowledge of that, or of any other Tongue; howsoever, I know that it will be said by many, That I might have been more pleasing to the Reader, if I had written the Story of mine own times; having been permitted to draw Water as near the Well-head as another. To this I answer, That whosoever in writing a modern History, shall follow truth too near the Heels, it may happily strike out his Teeth. There is no Mistress or Guide, that hath led her followers and servants into greater miseries. He that goes after her too far off, loseth her sight, and loseth himself: and he that walks after her at a middle distance; I know not whether I should call that kind of course Temper or Baseness. It is true, that I never travelled after Mens opinions, when I might have made the best use of them: and I have now too few days remaining, to imitate those, that either out of extream ambition, or extream cowardice, or both, do yet, (when death hath them on his Shoulders) flatter the World, between the Bed and the Grave. It is enough for me (being in that state I am) to write of the eldest times: where-in also, why may it not be said, that in speaking of the past, I point at the present, and tax the vices of those that are yet living, in their Persons that are long since dead; and have it laid to my charge. But this I cannot help, though innocent. And certainly if there be any, that finding themselves sported like the Tigers of old time, shall find fault with me for painting them over a new, they shall therein accuse themselves justly, and me falsely.

For I protest before the Majesty of GOD, That I malice no Man under the Sun. Impossible I know it is to please all: seeing few or none are so pleased with themselves, or so assured of themselves, by reason of their subjection to their private passions; but that they seem divers Persons in one and the same day. Seneca hath said it, and so do I: Unus mihi pro populo erat: and to the same effect Epicurus, Hoc ego non multis sed tibi; or (as it hath since lamentably fallen out) I may borrow the resolution of an ancient Philosopher, Satis est unus, Satis est nullus. For it was for the service of that inestimable Prince Henry, the successive hope, and one of the greatest of the Christian World, that I undertook this Work. It pleased him to peruse some part thereof, and to pardon what was amiss. It is now left to the World without a Master; from which all that is presented, hath received both blows and thanks. Eadem probamus, eadem reprehendimus: hic exitus est omnis judicii, in quo his secundum plures datur. But these discourses are idle. I know that as the charitable will judge charitably: so against those, qui gloriantur in malitia, my present adversity hath disarmed me. I am on the ground already; and therefore have not far to fall: and for rising again, as in the Natural privation there is no recession to habit; so is it seldom seen in the privation politick. I do therefore forbear to file my Readers Gentle, Courteous, and Friendly, thereby to beg their good Opinions, or to promise a Second and Third Volume (which I also intend) if the First receive Grace and good Acceptance. For that which is already done, may be thought enough; and too much: and it is certain, let us claw the Reader with never so many courteous Phrases; yet shall we evermore be thought Fools, that write foolishly. For conclusion, all the hope I have lies in this, That I have already found more ungentle and uncourteous Readers of my Love, towards them, and well-deserving of them, than ever I shall do again. For had it been otherwise, I should hardly have had this leisure, to have made my self a Fool in Print.

OF THE

Chapters, Paragraphs, and Sections, of the FIRST BOOK of the FIRST PART of the HISTORY of the WORLD.

CHAP. I.

Of the Creation, and Preservation of the World.

§. I.
THAT the invisible God is seen in his Creatures.

§. II.
That the wisest of the Heathen, whose Authority is not to be despised, have acknowledged the World to have been created by God.

§. III.
Of the meaning of In principio, Gen. I. 1.

§. IV.
Of the meaning of the words [Heaven and Earth]
Gen. I. 1.

§. V.
That the substance of the Waters, as mixt in the body of the Earth, is by Moles understood in the word [Earth] and that the Earth, by the Attributes of Unformed and Void, is described as the Chaos of the ancient Heathen.

§. VI.
How it is to be understood, that the Spirit of God moved upon the Waters: and that this not to be searched curiously.

§. VII.
Of the Light created, as the material substance of the Sun: and of the nature of it, and difficulty of knowledge of it: and of the excellency and use of it: and of motion, and heat annexed unto it.

§. VIII.
Of the Firmament, and of the Waters above the Fir-mament: and whether there be any crystalline Heaven, or any Primum Mobile.

A conclusion, repeating the sum of the works in the Creation, which are reduced to three heads: The creation of matter; The forming of it; The finishing of it.

§. X.
That Nature is no Principium per se, nor Form, the giver of being: and of our ignorance, how second causes should have any proportion with their effects.

§. XI.
Of Fate; and that the Stars have great influence:
and that their operations may diversely be prevented or furthered.

§. XII.
Of Providence.

§. XIII.
Of Providence.

§. XIV.
Of Predestination.

§. XV.
Of Fortune, and of the reason of some things that seem to be by Fortune, and against Reason and Providence.

CHAP. II.

Of Man's Estate in his first Creation: and of God's Refl.

§. I.
OF the Image of God, according to which Man was first created.

§. II.
Of the intellectual mind of Man, in which there is much of the Image of God: and that this Image is much deformed by sin.

§. III.
Of our hese and frail Bodies: and that the care thereof should yield to the immortal Soul.

§. IV.
Of the Spirit of Life, which God breathed into Man in his Creation.

§. V.
That Man is (as it were) a little World: with a digestion touching our mortality.

§. VI.
Of the free power, which Man had in his first Creation to dispose of himself.

§. VII.
Of God's ceasing to create any more: and of the cause thereof, because the Universal created was exceeding good.

CHAP. III.

Of the place of Paradise.

§. I.
THAT the Seat of Paradise is greatly mistaken: and that it is no marvel that Men should err.

§. II.
A recital of strange opinions touching Paradise.

§. III.
That there was a true local Paradise, Eastward, in the Country of Eden.

§. IV.
Why it should be needful to intreat diligently of the place of Paradise.

§. V.
That the Flood hath not utterly defaced the marks of Paradise, nor caused Hills in the Earth.

§. VI.
That Paradise was not the whole Earth, as some have thought, making the Ocean to be the Fountain of those four Rivers.

§. VII.
Of their opinion which make Paradise as high as the Moon: and of others which make it higher than the middle Region of the Air.

§. VIII.
Of their opinion that seat Paradise under the Equinoctial: and of the pleasant habitation under those Climates.

Of the change of the names of places: and that besides that Eden in Coelestria, there is a Country in Babylon, once of this name, as is proved out of Isaiah 37. and Ezekiel 27.

§. X.
Of divers other testimonies of the Land of Eden: and that this is the Eden of Paradise.

§. XI.
Of the difficulty in the Text, which seemeth to make the four Rivers to rise from one Stream.

§. XII.
Of the strange fertility and happiness of the Babylonian soil, as it is certain that Eden was such.

§. XIII.
Of the River Pison, and the Land of Havilah.

§. XIV.
Of the River Gehon, and the Land of Cush: and of the ill translating of Ethiopia for Cush, a Chron. 21. 16.

§. XV.
A conclusion, by way of repetition of some things spoken of before.

CHAP. IV.

Of the two chief Trees in the Garden of Paradise.

§. I.
THAT the Tree of Life was a material Tree: and in what sense it is to be taken, that Man by his eating the forbidden Fruit, is made subject to death.

§. II.
Of Becanus his opinion, that the Tree of Knowledge was Ficus Indica.

§. III.
Of Becanus his not unworthy allegorizing of the Story of his Ficus Indica.

§. IV.
Of the name of the Tree of Knowledge of Good and Evil: with some other notes touching the Story of Adam's sin.

CHAP.

CHAP. V.

Of divers memorable things between the Fall of Adam, and the Flood of Noah.

§. I.
OF the cause, and the revenge of Cain's sin: and of his going out from God.

§. II.
Of Cain's dwelling in the Land of Nod: and of his City Enoch.

§. III.
Of Moses his emitting sundry things concerning Cain's Generation.

§. IV.
Of the diversities in the Ages of the Patriarchs, when they began their Children.

§. V.
Of the long lives of the Patriarchs: and of some of late memory.

§. VI.
Of the Patriarchs delivering their Knowledge by Tradition: and that Enoch writ before the Flood.

§. VII.
Of the Men of renown before the Flood.

§. VIII.
That the Giants, by Moses so called, were indeed Men of huge Bodies: as also divers in latter times.

CHAP. VI.

Of Idolatrous corruptions, quickly rising, and hardly at length vanishing in the World: and of the Relicks of Truth touching these ancient Times, obscurely appearing in Fables and old Legends.

§. I.
THAT in old corruptions we may find some signs of more ancient Truth.

§. II.
That the corruptions themselves were very ancient: as in the Family of Noah, and in the old Egyptians.

§. III.
That in process of time these lesser Errors drew on greater, as appeareth in the gross superstitions of the Egyptians.

§. IV.
That from the Relicks of ancient Records among the Egyptians and others, the first Idols and Fables were invented: and that the first Jupiter was Cain; Vulcan, Tubalcain, &c.

§. V.
Of the three chiefest Jupiters; and the strange Story of the third.

§. VI.
Of Cham, and other wicked ones, whereof some get, some affected the name of Gods.

§. VII.
That the wisest of the ancient Heathen had far better opinions of God.

§. VIII.
That Heatenism and Judaism, after many wounds, were at length about the same time under Julian miraculously confounded.

Of the last refuges of the Devil to maintain his Kingdom.

CHAP. VII.

Of Noah's Flood.

§. I.
OF God's fore-warning: and some Homeric testimonies: and some doubting touching the truth of Noah's Flood.

§. II.
Of the Flood in the time of Ogges: and that this was not Noah's Flood.

§. III.
Of Deucalions Flood: and that this was not Noah's Flood: nor the Umbri in Italy a Remnant of any Universal Flood.

§. IV.
Of some other Records testifying the Universal Flood: and of two ancient deluges in Egypt: and of some elsewhere.

§. V.
That the Flood of Noah was supernatural, though some say it might have been foreseen by the Stars.

§. VI.
That there was no need of any new Creation of matter to make the Universal Flood: and what are Cattle Coeli, Gen. 7. v. 11.

§. VII.
Of some remainder of the memory of Noah among the Heathen.

§. VIII.
Of sundry particulars touching the Ark: as the place where it was made; the matter's fashion; and name.

That the Ark was of sufficient capacity.

§. X.
That the Ark rested upon part of the Hill Taurus (or Caucasus) between the East-Indies and Scythia.

†. I.
A preterition of some questions left material: with a note of the use of this question, to find out the Metropolis of Nations.

†. II.
A proposal of the common opinion, that the Ark rested upon some of the Hills of Armenia.

†. III.
The first Argument against the common opinion. They that came to build Babel, would have come sooner, had they come from so near a place, as Armenia.

†. IV.

†. IV.
The second Argument; That the Eastern People were more ancient in Populosity, and in all humane Glory.

†. V.
Of the first Argument; From the wonderful resistance which Semiramis found in the East Indies.

†. VI.
The fourth Argument; From divers Considerations in the Person of Noah.

†. VII.
Of the sensible Opinion of Annius the Commenter upon Berofus; that the Ark rested upon Montes Caspii in Armenia; and yet upon Gordiaz, which are three hundred miles distant off in Armenia, and yet in Scythia.

†. VIII.
The fifth Argument; The Vine must grow naturally near the place where the Ark rested.

Answer to an objection out of the words of the Text. The Lord scattered them from thence upon the face of the whole Earth.

†. X.
An answer to an objection from the Name of Ararat, taken for Armenia; and the height of the Hills there.

†. XI.
Of Chus, and divers for higher Hills than the Armenian.

†. XII.
Of divers Incongruities, if in this story we should take Ararat for Armenia.

†. XIII.
Of the contrary situation of Armenia to the place noted in the Text: and that it is no marvel, that the same ledge of Hills running from Armenia to India, should keep the same name all along, and even in India, be called Ararat.

†. XIV.
Of the best Vine naturally growing on the South-side of the Mountains Cauca, and toward the East Indies: and of other excellencies of the Soil.

†. XV.
The conclusion, with a brief repeating of divers chief Points.

C H A P. VIII.

Of the first planting of Nations after the Flood: and of the Sons of Noah; Sem, Ham, and Japhet, by whom the Earth was repopled.

§. I.
Whether Sem and Ham were elder than Japhet.

§. II.
Of divers things that in all reason are to be presumed, touching the first planting of the World; as that all Histories must yield to Moles; that the World was not planted all at once, nor without great direction: and that the known great Lords of the first Ages, were of the issue of Ham.

§. III.
Of the Isles of the Gentiles in Japhet's Portion: of Berofus his too speedy seating Gomer the Son of Japhet in Ita y; and another of Japhet's Sons Tubal in Spain: and of the Antiquity of Longynque Navigation.

§. IV.
Of Gog and Magog, Tubal, and Mefech, seated first about Asia the left, out of Ezekiel, cap. 38. 39.

§. V.
Against the fabulous Berofus his Fiction, That the Italian Janus was Noah.

§. VI.
That Gomer also and his Son Togorma, of the Posterity of Japhet, were first seated about Asia the left: and that from thence they spread Westward into Europe; and Northward into Sarmatia.

§. VII.
Of Javan the fourth Son of Japhet; and of Mefech of Aram, and Mefech of Japhet.

§. VIII.
Of Alcanaz and Siphath, the two elder Sons of Gomer.

Of the four Sons of Javan: and of the double signification of Tharhis, either for a proper Name, or for the Sea.

§. X.
That the Seat of Chush, the eldest Son of Ham, was in Arabia; not in Ethiopia: and of strange Fables, and ill Translations of Scripture, grounded upon the mistaking of this Point.

†. I.
Of Josephus his Tale of an Ethiopels Wife to Moles, grounded on the mistaking of the Seat of Chush.

†. II.
A Dispute against the Tale of Josephus.

†. III.
Chush ill expounded for Ethiopels. Ezek. 29. 10.

†. IV.
Another place of Ezekiel, cap. 30. v. 9. in like manner mistaken.

†. V.
A place Elay 18. v. 1. in like manner corrupted by taking Chush for Ethiopels.

†. VI.
That upon the like mistaking, both Terhaka in the Story of Sennacherib, and Zera in the Story of Asa, are unwisely made Ethiopians.

†. VII.
A farther Exposition of the place. Elay 18. 1.

†. VIII.
Of the Plantation and Antiquities of Egypt.

†. I.
That Mizraim the chief Planter of Egypt, and the rest of the Sons of Ham, were seated in order, one by another.

†. II.
Of the time, about which the Name of Egypt began to be known: and of the Egyptians Lunar years, which made their Antiquities seem the more fabulous.

†. III.
Of certain vain Assertions of the Antiquities of the Egyptians.

†. IV.
Against Pererius; That it is not unlikely, but that Egypt was peopled within two hundred years after the Creation; at least, then built in, and the most part of the World, were peopled before the Flood.

†. V.
Of some other Reasons against the Opinion of Pererius.

†. VI.
Of the words of Moles, Gen. 10. v. ult. whereupon Pererius grounded his Opinion.

†. VII.

†. VII.
A Conclusion, respecting of that which is most likely, touching the Egyptian Antiquities: with somewhat of Phut, another Son of Ham, which peopled Lybia.

§. XII.
Of the eleven Sons of Canaan, the fourth Son of Ham.

†. I.
Of the Bounds of the Land of Canaan; with the Names of his eleven Sons.

†. II.
Of the Portions of Zidon and Heth.

†. III.
Of the Jebusites, and Amorites.

†. IV.
Of the Gergesites, Hevites, and Harkites.

†. V.
Of Sini and Arvaci.

†. VI.
Of Zemari.

†. VII.
Of Hamathi.

§. XIII.
Of the Sons of Chush, excepting Nimrod, of whom hereafter.

†. I.
That the most of the Sons of Chush were seated in Arabia the happy: and of the Sabaeans that robbed Job: and of the Queen that came to Salomon.

†. II.
Josephus his opinion of Dedan, one of the issue of Chush, to have been seated in the West Ethiopia, disproved out of Ezekiel and Jeremy.

§. XIV.
Of the issue of Mizraim: and of the place of Jeremy, cap. 9. v. 7.

§. XV.
Of the issue of Sem.

†. I.
Of Elam, Assur, Arphaxad, and Lud.

†. II.
Of Aram, and his Sons.

†. III.
Of the division of the Earth in the time of Phaleg, one of the Sons of Heber, of the issue of Sem.

†. IV.
Of the Sons of Joctan, the other Son of Heber.

†. V.
Of Ophir, one of Joctan's Sons, and of Peru: and of that Voyage of Salomon.

†. VI.
Of Havilah the Son of Joctan, who also passed into the East Indies: and of Meiba, and Sepher, named in the bordering of the Families of Joctan: with a conclusion of this Discourse touching the Plantation of the World.

C H A P. IX.

Of the beginning and establishing of Government.

§. I.
Of the proceeding from the first Government under the eldest of Families to Regal, and from Regal absolute to Regal tempered with Laws.

§. II.
Of the three commendable sorts of Government, with their opposites: and of the degrees of humane Society.

§. III.
Of the good Government of the first Kings.

§. IV.
Of the beginning of Nobility: and of the vain vanity thereof without Vertue.

C H A P. X.

Of Nimrod, Belus, and Ninus: and of memorable things about those times.

§. I.
That Nimrod was the first after the Flood that reigned like Sovereign Lord: and that his Beginning seemed to have been of just Authority.

§. II.
That Nimrod, Belus, and Ninus, were three distinct Persons.

§. III.
That Nimrod, not Assur, built Ninive: and that it is probable out of Elay 23. 13. that Assur built Ur of the Chaldees.

§. IV.
Of the Acts of Nimrod and Belus, as far as now they are known.

§. V.
That we are not to marvel how so many Kingdoms could be creted about these times: and of Vexoris of Egypt; and Tanais of Scythia.

§. VI.
Of the Name of Belus, and other Names affixed unto it.

§. VII.
Of the worshipping of Images, begun from Belus in Babel.

§. VIII.
Of the Wars of Ninus: and lastly of his War against Zoroaster.

C H A P.

CHAP. XI.

Of Zoroaster, supposed to have been the chief Author of Magick Arts: and of divers kinds of Magick.

§. I.
THAT Zoroaster was not Cham, nor the first Inventor of Astrologie, or of Magick: and that there were divers great Magicians of this name.

§. II.
Of the name of Magia: and that it was anciently far divers from Conjuring and Witchcraft.

§. III.
That the good knowledge in the ancient Magick is not to be condemned; though the Devil here, as in other kinds, hath sought to obtrude evil things under the name and colour of good things.

§. IV.
That Daniel's mistaking Nabuchodonosor's condemning of the Magicians, doth not justify all their practices.

§. V.
The abuse of things, which may be found in all kinds, is not to condemn the right use of them.

§. VI.
Of the divers kinds of unlawful Magick.

§. VII.
Of divers ways by which the Devil seemeth to work his wonders.

§. VIII.
That none was ever raised from the dead by the power of the Devil: and that it was not the true Samuel which appeared to Saul.

CHAP. XII.

Of the memorable Buildings of Ninus: and of his Wife Semiramis: and of other her acts.

§. I.
OF the magnificent Building of Ninivie by Ninus: and of Babylon by Semiramis.

§. II.
Of the end of Ninus: and beginning of Semiramis.

§. III.
Of Semiramis Parentage, and Education: and Memorabilia of her Mother.

§. IV.
Of her Expedition into India, and Death after disfigurement: with a note of the improbability of her vices.

§. V.
Of the Temple of Belus, built by Semiramis: and of the Pyramids of Egypt.

The Contents of the Chapters, Paragraphs, and Sections, in the Second Book of the First Part of the HISTORY of the WORLD.

CHAP. I.

Of the time of the Birth of Abraham: and of the use of this Question, for the ordering of the Story of the Assyrian Empire.

§. I.
OF some of the Successors of Semiramis: with a brief transition to the question, about the time of the Birth of Abraham.

§. II.
A proposal of Reasons or Arguments, that are brought to prove Abraham was born in the Year 292 after the Flood, and not in the Year 352.

§. III.
The Answer to one of the Objections proposed, shewing that Abraham made but one journey out of Melopotamia into Canaan; and is, after his Fathers Death.

§. IV.
The Answer to another of the Objections proposed, shewing that it was not unlikely, that Terah should beget Abraham in his hundred and thirtieth Year.

§. V.
The Answer to two more of the Objections, shewing that we may have certainty of Abraham's Age from the Scripture, though we make not Abraham the eldest Son: and that there was great cause, why in the Story of Abraham his two Brethren should be respected.

§. VI.
That the naming of Abraham first of the three Brethren, Gen. 11. v. 26. doth not prove that he was the eldest: together with divers reasons, proving that Abraham was not the eldest Son of Terah.

§. VII.
A conclusion of this dispute, noting the Authors on both sides: with an admonition, that they which flourish the times, make all ancient Stories the more improbable.

§. VIII.
A computation of the times of the Assyrians, and others, grounded upon the times noted in the Story of Abraham.

That Amraphel, one of the four Kings whom Abraham overthrew, Gen. 14. may probably be thought to have been Ninias the Son of Ninus.

§. X.
Of Arioch, another of the four Kings: and that El-las, wherof he is said to have been King, lies between Coelefrynia, and Arabia Petrea.

§. XI.
Of Tidal, another of the four Kings.

§. XII.

§. XII.
That Chedorlaomer, the chief of the four Kings, was not of Assyria, but of Persia: and that the Assyrian Empire at this time was much impaired.

§. XIII.
That it is not unprobable, that the four Kings had no Dominion in the Countries named, but that they had elsewhere with their Colonies planted themselves; and so retained the names of the Countries whence they came: which if it be so, we need not to say that Amraphel was Ninias, nor trouble our selves with many other difficulties.

CHAP. II.

Of the Kings of Egypt from the first Peopling of it after the Flood, to the time of the delivery of the Israelites from thence.

§. I.
A Brief of the Names and Times of the first Kings of Egypt: with a note of the causes of difficulty in relating of the truth in these points.

§. II.
That by the account of the Egyptian Dynasties, and otherwise, it appears that Cham's Reign in Egypt began in the Year after the Flood 191.

§. III.
That these Dynasties were not divers Families of Kings, but rather successions of Regents; oft-times many under one King.

§. IV.
Of Cham, and his Son Mizraim, or Ofiris.

§. V.
Of the time when Ofiris's Reign ended: and that

Jacob came into Egypt in the time of Orus, the Son of Ofiris.

§. VI.
Of Typhon, Hercules, Egyptus, Orus, and the two Sesostris, successively reigning after Mizraim, and of divers errors about the former Sesostris.

§. VII.
Of Bufiris, the first oppressor of the Israelites: and of his Successor Queen Thermutis, that took up Moles out of the Water.

§. VIII.
Of the two Brethren of Queen Thermutis: and what King it was, under whom Moles was born: and who it was that perished in the Red Sea.

CHAP. III.

Of the delivery of Israel out of Egypt.

§. I.
OF the time of Moles's Birth: and how long the Israelites were oppressed in Egypt.

§. II.
Of divers Cities and Places in Egypt, mentioned in this Story, or elsewhere in the Scripture.

§. III.
Of the cruelty against the Israelites young Children in Egypt: and of Moles his preservation and education.

§. IV.
Of Moles his flying out of Egypt; and the opinions of certain ancient Historians, of his War in Ethiopia; and of his Marriage there: Philo his judgment of his Pastoral life: and that of Paterius of the Books of Genesis, and Job.

§. V.
Of Pharaoh's pursuit of the Israelites: and of their passage towards the Red Sea, so far as Succoth.

§. VI.
Of the Solar and Lunar Years: and how they are reconciled: with the form of the Hebrew Year, and their manner of intercalation.

§. VII.
Of the passage of Israel from Succoth towards the Red Sea: and of the divers ways leading out of Egypt.

§. VIII.
Of their passage over the Red Sea: and of the Red Sea it self.

That the passage through the Red Sea was miraculous; and not as a low ebb.

CHAP. IV.

Of the journeying of the Israelites from the Red Sea, to the place where the Law was given them: with a discourse of Laws.

§. I.
A Transition, by way of recapitulation of some things touching Chronologie: with a continuance of the Story, until the Amalekites met with the Israelites.

§. II.
Of the Amalekites, Midianites, and Kenites, upon occasion of the Battle with the Amalekites, and Jethro's coming, who being a Kenite, was Priest of Midian.

§. III.
Of the time when the Law was given: with divers commendations of the invention of Laws.

§. IV.
Of the name and meaning of the words, Law, and Right.

§. V.
Of the definition of Laws, and of the Law Eternal.

§. VI.
Of the Law of Nature.

§. VII.
Of the written Law of God.

§. VIII.
Of the unwritten Law of God, given to the Patriarchs by Tradition.

Of the Moral, Judicial, and Ceremonial Law: with a Note prefixed, how the Scripture speaketh not always in one sense, when it nameth the Law of Moles.

§. X.

The CONTENTS

§. X.
A Proposal of nine other Points to be considered; with a touch of the five first.

§. XI.
Of the sixth Point, to wit, of the difference and agreement of the Old and New Testament.

§. XII.
Of the rest of the Points proposed.

§. XIII.
Of the several Commandments of the Decalogue: and that the difficulty is not in respect of the Commandments, but by our default.

The Carthaginians desire Truce: and break it.

CHAP. V.

The Wars of the Romans with Antiochus the Great, and his Adherents.

§. I.
Has Kings, of the Races of Seleucus and Ptolemy, reigned in Asia and Egypt before Antiochus the Great.

§. II.
The beginning of the great Antiochus his Reign, Of Ptolemy Evergetes and Philopator, Kings of Egypt. War between Antiochus and Philopator. The Rebellion of Molo; and Expedition of Antiochus against him. The re-continuance of Antiochus his Egyptian War: with the passages between the two Kings: the Victory of Ptolemy; and Peace concluded. Of Achæus and his Rebellion; his Greatness, and his Fall. Antiochus his Expedition against the Parthians, Bactrians, and Indians. Somewhat of the Kings reigning in India, after the Death of the Great Alexander.

§. III.
The lewd Reign of Ptolemy Philopator in Egypt: with the tragical end of his favourites, when he was dead. Antiochus prepares to War on the young Child Ptolemy Epiphanes, the Son of Philopator. His resolution, in preparing for divers Wars at once. His Voyage toward the Hellespont. He seeks to hold amity with the Romans, who make friendly letters to him; intending nevertheless to have War with him. His doings about the Hellespont; which the Romans made the first ground of their quarrel to him.

§. IV.
The Romans hold friendly correspondence with Antiochus, during their War with Philip: after which they quarrel with him. The doings of Hannibal at Carthage: whence he is chased by his Enemies, and by the Romans. His flight unto the King Antiochus. The Ætolians murmur against the Romans in Greece. The War of the Romans and Achæans, with Nabis the Tyrant of Lacedæmon. The departure of the Romans out of Greece. T. Quintius his Triumph. Peace desired to Antiochus by the Romans.

§. V.
Of the long Wars which the Romans had with the Gauls, Ligurians, and Spaniards. Of M. Porcius Cato. Injuries done by Mafaniffa to the Carthaginians; that sue to the Romans for justice in vain.

§. VI.
The Ætolians labour to provoke Antiochus, Philip, and Nabis, to War upon the Romans; by whom they hold themselves wronged and disgraced. Nabis besieges Cythæum, and wasteth some part of Achæa. The exact skill of Philopomen in advantage of ground: whereby he utterly vanquishes Nabis. Antiochus being denied Peace by the Romans, joins with the Ætolians. The Ætolians surprise Demetrius; and, by hiding Nabis their Confederate, seize upon Sparta. But they are driven out by the Citizens: who at Philopomen his persuasions annex themselves to the Achæans.

§. VII.
Antiochus, persuaded by Thoas the Ætolian, comes over into Greece, ill attended. Sundry passages between him, the Ætolians, Chalcidians, and others. He wins Chalcis, and thereby the whole Isle of Euboea. The vanity of the Kings Embassadors, and the Ætolians: with the civil answer of Titus to their discourse, before the Achæans. That it concerned the Greeks to have desired Peace, between the Romans and Antiochus: as the best assurance of their own liberty. Of many petty Estates that fell to the King. Of Amnander: and an idle vanity, by which King Philip was left. Hannibal gives good Council in vain. Some Towns won in Thessaly. The King returns to Chalcis: where he marrieth a young wife, and revels away the rest of the Winter. Upon the coming of the Roman Consul, all forsake Antiochus. He with two thousand Ætolians keeps the Streights of Thermopylae. He is beaten, and flies into Asia: leaving all in Greece unto the Victors.

§. VIII.
Lucius Scipio, having with him Publius the African his elder Brother, for his Lieutenant, is sent into Greece. He grants long Truce to the Ætolians, that so he might at leisure pass into Asia. Much troublesome business by Sea: and divers fights. An invasion upon Eumenes his Kingdom: with the Siege of Pergamus, raised by an handful of the Achæans. L. Scipio the Consul comes into Asia: where Antiochus most earnestly desireth Peace, and is denied it. The Battle of Magnesia: wherein Antiochus, being vanquished, yieldeth to the Romans good pleasure. The conditions of the Peace. In what sort the Romans used their Victory. L. Cornelius Scipio, after a most sumptuous Triumph over Antiochus, is furnished. The Asiatick, as his Brother was styled The African.

The Ætolians, and the Gallo greeks, vanquished by the Roman Consul Fulvius and Manlius. Manlius hardly obtains a Triumph: being charged (among other objections) with attempting to have passed the bounds appointed as fatal to the Romans by Sybyl. Of Sybils Prophecies: the Books of Permes: that of Infertion SIMONI DEO SANCTO. The ingratitude of Rome to the two Scipios; and that beginning of Faction among the Roman Nobility.

§. XX.
In what sort Hannibal spent the time after the Battle of Metaurus. The doings of Mago in Italy. Hannibal and Mago called out of Italy. How the Romans were diversly affected by Hannibal's departure.

§. XXI.
Hannibal in Africk prepares to fight with Scipio; treats with him about Peace in vain; loseth a Battle at Nadagara; and persuades the Carthaginians to sue for Peace. Of the Peace granted from Rome to Carthage.

CHAP. IV.

Of Philip the Father of Perseus, King of Macedon; his first Acts and War with the Romans, by whom he was subdued.

§. I.
How the Romans grew acquainted in the East Countries, and desirous of War there. The beginning of many Princes, with great Wars, at one time. The Ætolians over ran Peloponnesus. Philip and his Associates make War against the Ætolians. Alteration of the State in Sparta. The Ætolians invade Greece and Macedon; and are invaded at home by Philip.

§. II.
How Philip was misadvised by ill Counsellors: who afterwards wrought Treason against him; and were justly punished. He invadeth the Ætolians a second time: and forceth them to sue for Peace; which is granted unto them.

§. III.
Philip, at the persuasion of Demetrius Pharius, enters into League with Hannibal against the Romans. The renour of the League between Hannibal and Philip.

§. IV.
How Philip yielded to his natural Vices, being therein foisted by Demetrius Pharius. His desire to tyrannise upon the free States his Associates: with the vanities upon which he thereby fell, whilst he bore a part in the second Punick War. He persecuteth Aratus: and grows hateful to the Achæans.

§. V.
Of Philopomen, General of the Achæans: and Machanidas Tyrant of Lacedæmon. A Battle between them, wherein Machanidas is slain.

§. VI.
Philip having Peace with Rome, and with all Greece, prepares against Asia. Of the Kings of Pergamus, Cappadocia, Pontus, Paphlagonia, Bithynia; and their Lineages. Of the Galatians.

§. VII.
The Town of Cios taken by Philip, at the instance of Prusias King of Bithynia, and cruelly destroyed. By this and like actions, Philip grows hateful to many of the Greeks: and is warred upon by Attalus King of Pergamus, and by the Rhodians.

§. VIII.
The Romans, after their Carthaginian War, seek matter of quarrel against Philip. The Athenians, upon slight cause, proclaim War against Philip; moved thereto by Attalus whom they flatter. Philip wins divers Towns: and makes peremptory answer to the Roman Embassador. The furious resolution of the Abydeni.

The Romans decree War against Philip, and send one of their Consuls into Greece, as it were in defence of the Athenians their Confederates. How poor the Athenians were at this time, both in quality and estate.

§. X.
The Town of Chalcis in Euboea, taken and sacked by the Romans and their Associates, that lay in Garrison at Athens. Philip attempteth to take Athens by surprise: wasteth the Country about; and makes a journey into Peloponnesus. Of Nabis, the Tyrant of Lacedæmon, and his Wife. Philip offers to make War against Nabis for the Achæans. He returneth home through Attica, which he spoileth again; and provides against his Enemies. Some exploits of the Romans. Divers Princes join with them. Great labouring to draw the Ætolians into the War.

§. XI.
The meeting of Philip with the Romans, and skirmishing with them on his borders. The Ætolians invade his Dominions: and are beaten home. Some doings of Attalus and the Roman Fleet.

§. XII.
Villius the Roman Consul wastes a Year to no effect. War of the Gauls in Italy. An Embassy of the Romans to Carthage, Mafaniffa and Vermina. The Macedonian prepares for defence of his Kingdom: and T. Quintius Flaminius is sent against him.

§. XIII.
The Romans begin to make War by Negotiation. T. Quintius wins a passage against Philip. Thessaly wasted by Philip, the Romans, and Ætolians. The Achæans forsaking the Macedonian, take part with the Romans. A Treaty of Peace that was vain. Philip delivers Argos to Nabis the Tyrant; who presently enters into League with the Romans.

§. XIV.
The Battle at Cynosephale, wherein Philip was vanquished by T. Quintius.

§. XV.
T. Quintius falls out with the Ætolians, and grants Truce unto Philip, with conditions, upon which the Peace is raised. Liberty proclaimed unto the Greeks. The Romans quarrel with Antiochus.

§. I.
THE Condition wherein those Princes and Estates remained, which were Associates of the Romans, when the War with Antiochus was finished. The Romans quarrel with Philip. They deal insolently with the Achæans. The Macedonian, being surety for War, obtains Peace at Rome by his Son Demetrius; of whom therefore he becomes jealous.

§. II.
The death of Philopœmen, Hannibal, and Scipio. That the Military Profession is of all other the most unhappy: notwithstanding some Examples, which may seem to prove the contrary.

§. III.
Philip making provision for War against the Romans, deals hardly with many of his own Subjects. His Negotiation with the Bactaræ. Demetrius accused by his Sister Perseus; and shortly after slain, by his Father's appointment. Philip repenteth him of his Son's death, whom he findeth to have been innocent: and intending to revenge it on Perseus, he dieth.

§. IV.
How the Bactaræ fell upon Dardania. The behaviour of Perseus in the beginning of his Reign. Some Wars of the Romans: and how they suffered Mafaniffa, cruelly to oppress the Carthaginians. They quarrel with Perseus. They allow not their Confederates to make War without their leave obtained. The Treason of Callicrates; whereby all Greece became more obnoxious to Rome, than in former times. Further Quarrels to Perseus. He seeks Friendship of the Achæans, and is withstood by Callicrates. The Romans discover their intent of warring upon him.

§. V.
How Eumenes King of Pergamus was busied, with Pharnaces, the Rhodians and others. His hatred to the Macedonian: whom he accuseth to the Roman Senate. The Senate honours him greatly, and condemns his Enemies the Rhodians; with the Causes thereof. The unusual stoutness of the Macedonian Embassadors. Perseus his attempt upon Eumenes. The brotherly love between Eumenes and Attalus. Perseus his device to poison some of the Roman Senators: whereupon they decree War against him, and send him Deputies. Other things concerning the justice of this War.

§. VI.
The Romans solicit the Greeks to join with them in the War against Perseus. How the Greeks stood affected in that War. The timorousness of Perseus. Martius a Roman Embassador deludes him with hopes of Peace. His Forces. He takes the Field; and wins part of Thessaly. The Forces of Licinius the Roman Consul: and what Assistants the Romans had in this War. Of Tempe in Thessaly; and what advantages the Macedonian had or might have had, but lost by his Fear. Perseus braves the Romans, fights with them, knows not how to use his Victory, sues for Peace, and is denied it by the vanquished. Perseus, having the worst in a Skirmish, forsakes all the Country lying without Tempe. The Bœotians rebel against the Romans, and are rigorously punished. The Roman Commanders victorious in the War against Perseus. They vex the Greeks their Friends; for whose sake the Senate makes provision; having heard their Complaints. The flattering Alabanders.

§. VII.
Q. Martius the Roman Consul, with extremum difficulty and danger, enters into Tempe. The Cowardice of Perseus in abandoning Tempe. The Town of Diium quitted by Martius, repaired and fortified by the King. The Romans attempt many places, with ill success. Their Affairs in hard estate. Martius a cunning and a bad Man. Polybius sent Embassador to Martius from the Achæans. Polybius his honest Wisdom beneficial to the Achæans. King Eumenes grows averse from the Romans. Perseus negotiates with Antiochus and Eumenes. His false dealing with Gentius King of Illyria, whom he draws into the Roman War. He sends Embassadors to the Rhodians, who vainly take upon them to be Arbitrators between him and the Romans. Perseus loseth a mighty Succour of the Bactaræ, by his wretched Parjurny.

§. VIII.
Of L. Æmilius Paulus, the Consul. His Journey, He forceth Perseus to discamp. He will not hazard Battle with any disadvantage. Of an Eclipse of the Moon. Æmilius his Superstition. The Battle of Pydna. Perseus his Flight. He forsakes his Kingdom: which hastily yields to Æmilius. Perseus at Samothrace. He yields himself to the Roman Admiral; and is sent Prisoner to Æmilius.

Gentius King of the Illyrians, taken by the Romans.

§. X.
How the Romans behaved themselves in Greece and Macedon, after their Victory over Perseus.

§. XI.
The War of Antiochus upon Egypt, brought to end by the Roman Embassadors.

§. XII.
How the Romans were dreadful to all Kings. Their demeanour towards Eumenes, Prusias, Mafaniffa, and Corys. The end of Perseus and his Children. The instability of Kings Estates. The Triumph of Paulus, Anicius, and Octavius. With the Conclusion of the War.

S^r Walter Raleigh.

Determine to write the Life, the Rise, Fortunes and End of Sir Walter Raleigh, Knight, his Memoires being certainly worthy to be transmitted to Posterity, who hath been so successfully industrious in retrieving the Actions of former Ages from the Ruines of Time, even in its very Infancy, in a well-compil'd, masculine, and learned History of the World. The Image of so great a Person should not be quite lost, though drawn in little, which deserves to be portray'd by the greatest Masters of Policy, and with the boldest Touches. Indeed his Shadows cannot now well be left exact, seeing they must be taken so long after his Death; when Time hath defac'd his best Features, and shed Oblivion on the most beautiful of his Actions. Who follows Truth (as Sir Walter has wisely remark'd) too near the heels, may have his teeth struck out: and he that goes after her, oft loseth her sight, and himself too. Distance of time doth sometimes, like some mediums, make the straightest Actions seem crooked, and sometimes gives them the advantage of Landscapes, which appear taking and agreeable afar off, though when nearly search'd, and pry'd into by a curious and intelligent Eye, they seem rude, harsh, and unpleasant.

In his Preface to the History of the World.

We must therefore despair of a just and exact Account of him, unless we could by some Magick Power (as the Author of a Pamphlet has done, to terrifie and make Gondamore speak the Truth) raise him from the Dead, and converse a while with his Ghost. I shall however with what imperfect Clue our Histories have bequeathed, trace him through the various Labyrinths of Fortuæ, and take a Prospect of him in the several Scenes of Court and Camp, Peace and War, till I have followed him to the Scaffold, the place of his much lamented and unhappy End; keeping as near as I can a medium between Those who in their Annals drive on with an implicit faith; and Those, who to get the reputation of Observers and Men of Reach, steal into the private recesses of Princes, and disrobe Majesty it self to find some Deformities; which Love to their Prince, and Interest of State should cover; The best Vail for all deform'd Actions.

I find him born at a place, call'd Budley, or Budleigh, in the County of Devon, in an House which his Family had long possessed, call'd Hays: A County (as Mr. Census has observ'd) renown'd among foreign Nations for the Valour of its Inhabitants in Sea-Services of all sorts. That Spain thought so, Sir Francis Drake, with many others of that County, as well as our Sir

Sir Walter, are very convincing Arguments.

That he was well defended, was never yet questioned, but by my Lord of Oxon, who indeed was wont to call him the Jack, and Upstart. But these were words which only Envy and Emulation could extort, and every one very easily confute.

Indeed that he was a Gentleman, because a Favourite, was no ill Argument amongst the Politicians of those Times, if we may believe a Secretary of State, who hath left this as a Maxima then, That the Queen through her whole Reign never was guilty of creation, never in her choice took into her Favour a mere New-Man, or a Mechanick.

That he was but poor in the beginning seems not strange, if we consider him the youngest Brother, and the Fortunes of his Family much diminished by the Generosity (if not Prodigality) of his Ancestors. But the wants of Fortune are often recompenc'd with the richer gifts of the Mind; Nature foreseeing the disability of his Estate, stock'd him with a larger portion of Sense, bequeath'd him the fairer Patrimony of a faithful Memory, plausible Tongue, strong Wit, and solid Judgement.

But because the natural Endowments of the Mind, though never so great, are capable of Advancement by the help of Education, he resolv'd for one of the Universities. Oxon had the happiness to own him, where I find him in Oriel Collegd. His slender Fortune, and his active Genius, always pointed with a restless Ambition, would not let him settle here, so that he could only (like a Spy) take a transient view of, or (like an haughty Enemy) make some incursions and inroads into those parts of Learning, which he afterward conquered, and was entirely Master of.

Therefore that he might the better feed those Hopes Ambition had kindled in his thoughts, and remove nearer to the Mists of Court, which he knew were always Places of Esteem with the Queen, who would say, they fitted youth for the future. Here he spent his time, and improv'd himself in the intricate knowledge of our Laws, and in the studies of all Manly and Real Accomplishments.

But he said not long here neither; for Fate it seems would have him of the Sword first. Yet though he laid aside his Gown, it was not with a design of never re-assuming it; for through the frequent Vicissitudes of his whole Life, he challenged a Reputation amongst the most Eminent Statesmen, being upon all Emergencies of Affairs consulted, as one of the best Oracles of Government and Policy in his time. It's true he was never sworn, for some Reasons of State which Courts spread a Vail over, but was frequently called in Council. Through his Life he made good his Motto, Tam Marti, quam Mercurio: and it is still a Question, whether he was the better States-man or Souldier? incomparably excelling in both the Arts of Peace and War. To rise by his Studies, probably his Condition and Ambition would not let him judge the speediest course; much time and a considerable Fortune being often spent in climbing up the tedious steps of Preferment that way. He thought it more easie to fight, than talk himself into a Reputation. Active times, and a buisie Warlike Princess, pointed him out the readiest way to the Temple of Honour. The Sword he judged, with Alexander, the quickest Instrument to unty all the Knots and tedious Obstacles of Greatness.

Nor could he want Occasions enough to draw forth his Spirits into Action. France was engaged in a Civil War; And the Queen whether out of concern for the Protestants, or for Reason of State, to divert the Giant-Enemy the Spaniard, assisted the poor distressed Dutch. And the Spaniard by a Policy of the same nature, rais'd Rebellions in Ireland; which like subterranean Fires, broke out over all that Kingdom at several times; When one Mac had in one place spent his Force, presently we hear of the eruption of another. This Fire was kept in to the end of her Reign, being maintained by that lasting fessel of Rebellion, and common pretext of change in Government, RELIGION: the Pope pretending the Kingdom belonged to S. Peter.

Of his first Publick Appearance Mr. Canden hath given us this Account: The Queen though imbroil'd in a Rebellion at home of the Earl of Northumberland and Dacres in the North, yet failed not to relieve the Protestants in France, who were now brought into a distressed and almost desperate condition; she exhorted all the Protestant Princes to assist the Common Cause, supplied the Queen of Navary with Money, taking Jewels in pawn; Permitted Henry Champernown to carry into France a Troop of Gentlemen-Volunteers, who were resolved to make good the Motto their Colours bore, Finem det nobis Virtus. Among these Sir Walter engaged himself, though (as Mr. Canden goes on) very young, and now first beginning to be of any note. So soon the early blossoms of his Valour began to appear, which afterwards grew up to an exact ripeness and perfection. France was the first School, wherein he learnt the Rudiments of War; and the Low-Countries and Ireland (the Military Academies of those Times) made him Master of that Discipline; for in both places he expos'd himself afterwards to Land-Service: But their slender Pay discourag'd him from staying long in either. The Service of Ireland especially, scarce supplying the necessities of a Military Life.

Being restless and impatient of a narrow and low Condition, and his Services being not so successful as his Hopes were great, and his Merits not answered with a Fortune strong enough to buoy up his Reputation, he was resolv'd to leave no Stone unturned, nor any Method of living unexperienced. And since his Land-Expeditions could make no Additions to his Fortunes, Novelty, and a desire of putting himself into a better capacity, urg'd him to a Sea-Voyage. At both Sea and Land he was the true Pattern of Industry; and if any Man ever manag'd Necessity to his furthest Improvements, it was He. No expert Souldier or Mariner escap'd his Acquaintance or Enquiries; nothing that related to the Arts of War and Navigation mis'd his perusal: and one who was Master of those parts he enjoy'd, could with no great difficulty make those Arts his own. Add to this the Methods he us'd to improve himself: He slept but five hours; four he spent in reading and mastering the best Authors, two in a select Conversation and an Inquisitive Discourse, the rest in Business. He underwent all the labours that attend a Souldier, and far'd as the meanest. No common Mariner took more pains, or hazarded more in the most difficult Attempts.

What his Sea-Voyages produc'd, Histories are silent in; but not long after his return I find him get again into Ireland, appearing with his own Colours flying in the Field, under the command of the Deputyship of that Kingdom. He had not been long there, before a Quarrel was rais'd between the Lord-Deputy and our Captain, (for with that Title he went into Ireland) which being complain'd of to a Council of War, was refer'd to the Council-Table in England. Our Historians would make the Lord Grey's Cause the fairest; but Justice, and the Result of the Council, gave Raleigh the Victory. What were the occasions of this Quarrel our Annals slip over, and have only left a large Field for Conjecture to tire it self in. Whether an eager pursuit after Honour, without exact obedience to Military Command, occasioned by a restless desire of doing something Great, or what ever else it might be, we leave the Reader to fancy: However if his Cause had not been good, no Apology, how well so ever manag'd, could have brib'd the Judgment of so wise a Council, wholly strangers to his Worth and Person.

About this time Authors place the Era of his Rise, but cannot well agree about the occasion of it. Some would have Leicester to be the chief Agent in it, and that he related the whole business at Council to the Queen with no little advantage to our Captain. Not so much probably out of respect to Raleigh, as to his own Interest. For Favourites, like their Princes, seldom espouse any Cause upon any other ground than what advances or stands with their own Designs. His own Designs indeed on the Queen were blasted, and finding the burden and envy of a Statesman too heavy for his aged shoulders, he was willing handsomely to impart them to a more active Genius. Though great Favourites seldom admit of a Partner, till Age makes them willing to withdraw, and leave the trouble of Business to more sprightly years. They care not to have new Plants set, till themselves are almost wither'd and laps'd.

Others would have his Rise attributed to Suffex, who brought him to Court to outshine Leicester, and eclipse the splendor of his Enemy. But what was the strongest Argument and only Perswasive with the Queen was his Merits, which she soon saw, and presently encouraged. Nor must I here pass by one final step to his future Health, which our Chronicles have over-look'd, as below the Pen of an Historian, though some have judg'd an Account of some little transactions the best Inters to Truth and Mysteries of State. The occasion was thus: Our Captain coming over out of Ireland upon the aforementioned Cause to Court, in very good habir, (which it seems was the greatest part of his Estate) which is often found to be no mean Introducer where Deserts are not known, found the Queen walking, till she was stop'd by a plain-place which the scrupled treading on; presently he spread his new Plush-Coat on the Ground, on which the Queen gently trod, being not a little pleas'd, as well as surpris'd with so unexpected a Complement. Thus, as one remarks upon this Story, An Advantagious Admission into the first Notices of a Prince, is more than half a degree to Preferment. For he presently after found some gracious Beams of Favour reflecting on him, which he was resolv'd, and well knew how to cherish and contract. To put the Queen in remembrance, he wrote in a Window obvious to her Eye, Fain would I climb, yet fear I to fall.

Which her Majesty either espying, or being shewn, under-wrote this Answer,

If

If thy heart fail thee, climb not at all.

But his aspiring Soul could not rest in the lower, though safer way of living; He could not be mean, whose Resolutions were so great, and whose Prudence and Activity made him capable of the highest Preferments. Inspir'd with a restless and ambitious Genius, he design'd nothing but what was extreme; and had rather not be, than not be one of the most Eminent. And to the greatest height probably he had arrived, had he lived in any other Princes Reigns than that of Queen Elizabeth and King James; the former being not over-hasty to raise any to any great Honour, and the latter not caring for Men of War and Blood.

Raleigh was so towards an Apprentice in the Court-Trade, that he soon set up for himself, and would have improved this stock of favour to a great advantage, had he not lost by those common Enemies to it, Envy and Jealousy. In a short time he is become a Minion, obtains the Queen's Ear, is often consulted, and nothing done without him. Her Favour and his Parts began to alarm his Rivals, who like some envious Neighbours will not easily permit any Fabrick to stand long that hinders their own Prospect. Jealous Favourites, like wife Planters, will not suffer the Under-Wood to raise, which may obstruct the growth of taller Trees.

Leicester began to repent his choice of his Creature, and thought he grew too fast in his Mistress's Favour. To stop the current of her Affection, he privately endeavours to undermine his Esteem, and introduce a new Favourite that might be his Rival. To bring about this Design, Leicester thought there would be nothing wanting, if by Raleigh's absence he could have opportunity to introduce the Earl of Essex; nor did he long expect before one offer'd it self: for the Queen being willing to encourage Raleigh, (who, as Mr. Canden is pleas'd to tell us, was never sufficiently to be commended for the great pains he took to discover remote Countries, and to advance the Glory of the English Navigation and Trade) sent him on a Voyage to Sea. Nor did he make a vain and fruitless one; for at his Return he brought news of a new Country, discover'd by him in the Year 1584, call'd in honour of the Queen, Virginia, before call'd Catingandaco by the barbarous Inhabitants. A Country that hath been since of no inconsiderable Profit to our Nation. But though Patents were granted to him to settle a Plantation there, it grew not famous till the Reign of King James: Wherein this Nation quickly found out the Excellency and Fruitfulness of the Place, so agreeable to our English Bodies, and profitable to the Exchequer. Nature there is prodigal, and makes amends for her parsimony to other parts of the World. An Acre there yieldeth often forty Bushels of Corn; and which is more strange, there being three Harvests in a Year: For, their Corn is sown, ripe, and cut down in little more than two Months.

For this, and other beneficial Expeditions and Designs, this Year her Majesty was pleas'd to confer on him the Honour of Knighthood, which in her Reign was more esteem'd than in her Successors. The Queen keeping the Temple of Honour close shut, and never open'd but to Virtue and Desert. Nor was she indeed ever hasty to reward; for she seldom paid in any other Coin than Patents and good Words. So that the greatest number of those who might pretend to Favour, were the Architects of their own Fortunes, and had little or no Encouragement from her, more than that of a Speitator, who praises the Workmanship, and commends the handson Contrivances of a Building, but is at no part of the Expenses of raising it. Hence our Sir Walter's Rewards are quickly enumerated, for he got nothing after all his Exploits and Designs, but the Wardenship of the Stanneries, Command of the Guard, and the Government of Jersey and Virginia; Places of no very great Profit, nor answerable to his Worth, or just Ambition.

In 1588, the grand Cyphaisterick of Spain, (for Bodies Politick have their Critical Times) I find Sir Walter by his Example encouraging others of the Gentry to set out Ships at their proper Charges, and by his admirable Conduct and Courage to put them to the best use. Which hired Ships were Actors of no small use in that fatal Blow given to the Invincible Armada. Three Years this Giant had been growing to that portentous Greatness, with infinite Expenses and Industry; but was beaten, ruin'd, and dishonourably overthrow'n in less than a Months space: the Spaniards finding that our Ships as well as the Heavens could fight against them.

But this Shock, like some Ague-fit, was easily recover'd, and in a short time after the Spaniards began to renew their former Designs. For in the Parliament which began Febr. 19. 1592. I find Sir Walter Raleigh informing the House, that the Queen could not without Subsidies prevent the eminent dangers threatened from the Spaniard. Of which Subsidies he spake (as he protest'd) not only to please the Queen, to whom he was infinitely oblig'd, but but for the necessity he both saw and knew; He told them; he very well discovered the great Strength of the King of Spain; and to shew his Mightiness, he inform'd the house how he posselt all the World. And that his Malice and ill purposes against this Realm might be evident, he shew'd how on every side he had beleaguerr'd us; In Denmark, the King being young, he had corrupted the Council and Nobility; so it was very likely he would speed himself of Ships from thence. In the Maritime Towns of the Low-Countries, and in Morrey he hath laid in great store of Shipping. In France he hath the Parliament-Towns at command; In Britanny he hath all the best Havens; and in Scotland he hath corrupted the Nobility, and promis'd them Forces to assist the Papists, and that they were ready to joyn with any Foreign-Aids, that would make them strong enough to be by themselves, and to resist others; for, as he thought, there were not six Gentlemen of that Country of one Religion. In his own Country there are all possible Preparations making, and he is coming with sixty Gallies besides other Shipping. If our Subsidies are not sudden, he may with ease invade us riding at Anchor; but all will be little enough to withstand him. At his coming he fully resolveth to get Plymouth, or at least to possess some of the Havens this Summer within our Land. And Plymouth is in most danger; for no Ordinance can be carried thither to remove him, the Passages will not give leave. Now the way to defeat him, is to send a Royal Army and supplant him in Britanny, and to possess our selves there; and to send a strong Navy to Sea, and to lie with it on the Cape, and at Lambuck; to which places come all his Ships with Riches from all places, and there they may set upon all that come.

What success this Speech alone had I know not, but the Subsidy was granted with the general Consent of the House, to carry on the War against Spain. His Expedition a little after demonstrates that the Queen took his Advice, which was to afflict the Spaniards at a distance; and whilst the could not handsonly assault his more neighbourly and guarded parts, to disturb those that were more naked and farther off, his Indies. The Moneys brought from thence being the Nerves and Sinews of his Power, and the chiefest Incendiary in the Irish Rebellion, which if handsonly stop'd, would put an end to his Greatness, and humble the Mighty Monarch.

That he might not want an opportunity to shew his Valour and Conduct in this Affair, the Queen sends him to Sea to manifest both; thinking none more fit to be employ'd in a Business, than the Person that counsel'd and started it; having the Courage of a Soldier to put in execution the sober Advices of the Governor. To America he is sent with 15 Men of War to possess himself of Panama, where the Spaniards ship their Riches, or to intercept them in their passage home-wards. But he found more Encouragement from the willingness of the Seamen than from the Winds, which held the Ships in their Havens for three Months: A Circumstance which put an ill look upon the enterprize, and had almost made it vain. But nothing could allay the Courage of the Seamen, who were buoy'd up with the hopes of Prey, and the success of their Commander. Having set sail at last, they got beyond the Spanish Cape, call'd the Land-end, where they met with new Intelligence, viz. That by express command from his Catholic Majesty no Ship was to stir from the West-Indies that Year. Together with this News, instead of meeting with the long'd-for Enemy, they were attack'd with a more invincible one, a furious Tempest, which dispers'd and disorder'd the Fleet, and sunk their Ship-Boats. Thus being on all sides assauled with Tempests, Distresses, and the worse news of the Spaniards stay in the other World, he thought the Heavens had dash'd his Designs, and rendred a well-ordered Contrivance abortive. Upon which at first he intended to make for home with the whole Fleet; but another Project offer'd it self after second thoughts, of dividing the Navy into two Squadrons, from the hope that though while together they had been successful, yet Fortune might offer them when separated something worthy their patience and desires. Immediately one Squadron is committed to the Conduct of Sir John Burroughs, Son to the Lord Burroughs; the other to Sir Martin Forbisher, with their respective Commissions. Sir Martin's charge was to lie off and on the Coast of Spain, to hinder the coming in of their Vessels. Sir John's to wait at the Azores for the coming of the Carracks out of the East-Indies.

Sir Walter was much blamed for this Action, and thought short in his Politics, in giving over the hopeful part of the Design to Sir John Burroughs, and retiring himself to Court. But the Success was the only Argument of his Oversight, and nothing but the Event could charge him with Imprudence. The Division of the Fleet prov'd a wise Design, and amazed the Spaniard. For while the Spanish Admiral eyed Forbisher, the mighty Carracks were unregarded, and left to the mercy of Burroughs's Men of War as an easie Prey. Who having ving according to Order arriv'd at Santa Cruz, a small Town in the Isle of Azores, a little after got fight of a Portugal Merchantman, (briskly parlied by a Privateer of the Earl of Cumberland's) but could not reach her, an unhappy Calm keeping him at too far a distance. But a more welcome Storm arising in the night, forc'd both to weigh Anchor. Alsoon as day appear'd, the Portugees was unloading as fast as she could at Flores, and upon the approach of the Englisb fired their Carack: But though their Designs were ruin'd as to that Ship, yet the news they got from some Prisoners taken, gave them fresh hopes, and heartned them with the Information, that several other Merchant-men were behind coming for Spain. This put Sir John Burroughs upon placing his Men of War at several distances, to reach as far about as was possible. But they had not long waited, before their diligence was rewarded with the surprisal of a large Vessel, call'd The Mother of God, which was 165 foot long from Head to Stern, and seven Decks high, laden with Goods to the value of 150000 l. Englisb, besides what the Seamen privately took for their own use.

Sir Walter having now deferted his Naval Employ, and become again a Courtier, it was not long before he was seiz'd with the idle-Court-disease of Love, the unfortunate occasion of the worst Action of his whole Life. For in the Year 1595, I find him under a Cloud, banish'd the Court, and his Mistress Favour withdrawn, for degrading a Maid of Honour. But why for this one Action he should lie under the imputation of an Atheist, and from a single crime get the denomination of a Debauch, is the Logick of none but the Vulgar. By the same reason the other Favourites of those Times (Leicester, Cecil, and Essex) bid as fair for those titles, the latter making the Parallel good in this Vice with his successor Buckingham, though in other Circumstances there was a great disparity. Neither ever was it accounted any great Crime in the Orb of Courts. But to stop the Mouth of Fame, which is always open on such occasions, and to wipe out the Infamy of the Fact, he was shortly after married to the Object of his Love, the deflowred Lady. And to get Reputation among the People, who always were unjust to him in their sentiments, he put himself on a Voyage to Guiana, for the Improvement and honour of his Country. Having therefore obtained his Liberty, (for, for this Action he was imprisoned some months) and finding all things with an unpleasant Aspect, he followed his Genius of discovering New Places, and tracing Nature in her more retired and hidden Paths; thinking that Abſence, and a Fortunate Voyage, might re-vent him in his Mistress's thoughts, and merit a new Esteem.

Guiana had been talk'd of much by the Spaniards as an excellent Country, and for one Commodity the Spaniards had a great reverence for, very famous Gold, which put Sir Walter upon the Attempt, judging it besides a place (if matter'd) very convenient for its situation to annoy and disturb the Spaniards American Traffick, and would be no little help in building his Fortunes, and what was more estimable, place him in his Mistress's Favour again.

From Plymouth he set sail on the sixth of February, and on the 22d of March arriv'd at the Isle of Trinidad, eight degrees on this side the Equinoctial-Line; where he soon made himself Master of S. Joseph's, a small City; and, which was more considerable, of the Governour Antonio Beroe, from whom he got the best account of those Parts, and its Trade. Leaving his Ship at Trinidad, with some Pinaces and an hundred Men, and the small stock of Knowledge he obtain'd of Beroe, he made up the great River Orinoco, in search of Guiana. What he found, saw, and performed there, his most Ingenious History of those Parts may satisfy the Curious.

In his Return he fired Cumana, because the Inhabitants would not redeem it with Money; besides several Cottages at S. Maries, and Rio de la Hatch. Neither did he desist in this Design of Guiana; for once or twice Mr. Cambden tells us afterwards he prosecuted it with vast Expences, although the Spaniards had plac'd a Colony at Trinidad to hinder his farther Attempts.

Whilst Sir Walter is searching for a new World, Hawkins and Drake are attempting fresh Things in those parts of America which the Spaniards were already possess'd of. But their old Fortune had left them, and the unhappiness of the Action put an end to their Lives; In the Year 1596 both died with Grief, and bequeath'd their Hatred of the Spaniard to Sir Walter Raleigh to revenge their Quarrel.

Who this Year return'd, being satisfi'd with his Expedition, and much more with the Reception he found at Court. The Storm was blown over, and his Mistress's Brow was more smooth than at his departure; after his Eclipse he shone brighter at Court, and the Death of those two famous Sea-men, put them upon courting Sir Walter, whom the necessity of State forc'd them to cherish and encourage. It's strange, that what was Essex's Ruine, should confirm Sir Walter in Favour, frequent Abſence from his Mistress. But Sir Walter's Obsequiousness world much upon the humour of the Queen, who lov'd Plianctness, and exact Obedience, which Essex could not always counterfeit.

The

The Spaniard being encouraged with the possession of Cales, from whence it was but a short cut over into England, the Death of Hawkins, and their former scourge, Drake, and the earnest solicitations of the Irish, (who through her Reign had got the Itch of Rebellion, which was fed and maintained by the Spaniard, though they had been sufficiently bloodied by the Englisb;) and the Queen foreseeing a Storm gathering, thought 'twas the best way to scatter it before it grew too great, and came too near. She resolv'd therefore to begin with the Spaniard first, and fairly set on the Enemy in his own Ports. She speedily riggs a brave Fleet, consisting of 150 Ships, Mann'd by 6360 Souldiers, 1000 Volunteer-Gentlemen, 6772 Sea-Men, Robert Earl of Essex, and the Lord Howard were Commanders of equal Authority, having been both at an excessive charge in carrying on the War. To these were joyn'd a Council of War, consisting of several eminent Seamen and Souldiers, among whom was our Sir Walter. The Fleet was divided into four Squadrons; the first commanded by the Lord Admiral Howard; the second by Essex; the third by Sir Thomas Howard; the fourth by Sir Walter Raleigh.

In the beginning of June they set sail, and got to Gades the 20th their Design being perfectly unknown, as well to their Enemies as their own Men. Essex heated with Youth, and an ambition of doing bravely, would have presently landed and assaulted the Enemy: but this heat was allayed and corrected by Sir Walter's Advice, who impugned all such rash Attempts. At last a fit Opportunity presented it self, and by all it was resolv'd to fight them. At which News the Earl threw up his hat for joy. The Ebbing-Waters would not permit the great Ships to engage, the Shelves being of greater hazard than the Enemy. Therefore Raleigh is pitch'd on as the most proper Person in the midst of the Channel to provoke them, who accordingly in a little Ship, called the Walfflight, directed his Prow against the Spanisb Men of War, who thereupon presently fell back. Upon this the rest of the Fleet came in, and burnt and took several of their Ships. After this Victory at Sea, the Men were very importunate to go on shore, whom Essex landed at Punial, a league from the City. At first the Spaniards received them with a great deal of Courage, but the Englisb charged so warmly, that they thought it their prudentest way to retire with more speed than they came out. The Englisb pursued so close that they had almost recover'd the City-Gates as soon as they. The Earl got upon a Bulwark near the Gate, and from thence he espied an Entrance into the Town, but very hazardous, it being down a very steep Precipice but this did not affright several of our Englisb, who leap'd from thence into the Town, and engaged the Enemy in the Streets. In the mean time Sir Walter and others having forced the Gates, entered the Town, and the Castle was surrendred upon Merciful Conditions. But Sir Walter was not idle, or eager after the enjoyment of his Conquest; for whilst others were reaping the plentiful Harvest of War, he with some small Ships who could pass up the Chanel, fired their Merchant-Men which were withdrawn to Port-Real, although they offered two millions of Ducats for their Redemption. Great were the Losses to the Spaniards by this War; and if we may believe our Histories, amounted to no less than Twenty Millions of Ducats. Upon Consultation it was resolv'd to quit the Town, though contrary to the Opinion of Essex, who was for keeping it, as a future Annoyance to the Spaniards. After this they took Faro in Algarbe; and being weary at last of their Victories, they resolv'd for home, though much against Essex's will, whose youthful heat was but inflam'd by their Successes, but was wisely slack'd by the Prudence of the Admiral, and the sober Advice of Sir Walter: who finding their Men sick, and having gotten so ample Rewards, were not again for hazarding their Fortune upon hopes of a future Prey.

At their Return the Queen welcom'd and encourag'd her Souldiers with new Honours. All but Essex were pleas'd, who found State-Preferences not dispos'd of according to his mind. Vere was made Governour of the Briel, and Sir Robert Cecil Secretary of State.

To recover their Losses at Gades, the Spaniard riggs out a new Fleet, which were baffled alone by the Winds; for the greatest part were cast away and wreck'd. With the Reliques of this Fleet, in the Year following I find him upon his old Designs of Ireland: But the Queen was always too nimble for the grave Don whose Designs, like his Ships, mov'd slow and heavy.

Twenty Ships were rigg'd out at present, and afterwards encreas'd to an hundred and twenty Men of War and Victuallers; five thousand Men rais'd, besides a thousand old Souldiers brought from the Netherlands by Vere. To appease Essex, the whole Conduct of the Expedition is committed to him. The Navy was divided into three Squadrons; The first led by Essex himself; The second by Howard; The third by Sir Walter, who now was esteem'd the ablest Seaman of his Age. To enable this Expedition, several Persons of quality of all sorts engag'd themselves, who look'd rather like Courtiers than Souldiers, * * * * * being more adorn'd with Feathers and gay Cloaths, than arm'd with Courage and Resolution. On the ninth of July they set out with these Instructions, viz. To fleet to Faro and the Groine, to surprize the Spaniards in their Harbours, and to intercept their Indian Fleet (the Bait of the War) at the Azores. Which Design was built upon very good Maxims of State: For it would hinder the Fleet intended against England; Their Merchant-men wanting Convoys, might be seized on; The Azores won, (where the Indian Fleet always call'd for fresh Water in their Return); the Queen have the Dominion of the Seas, and the Spaniard be obliged to a Treatment of Peace. Essex gave out that he was resolv'd to sacrifice Himself and the Navy for his Country: But his brisk Resolutions were quickly daunted by a dismal Tempest, which astonish'd the Mariners themselves, and forc'd home our gaudy Volunteers, who thought no Enemy so terrible as a Tempest, and the severe motions of a Sea-sick stomach. Thus by this Contradiction of Heaven their Ships were torn, their Victuals spent, and they upon this Emergency forc'd to a Consultation what to do. Some were for laying aside the Faro and the Groine Attempts; others for a Voyage to the Azores, which was contradicted by Vere. So that at last Essex and Raleigh were pitch'd on to ride Post for Advice to the Queen. Essex talk'd to the Queen of strange Chimera's; how that if he were permitted to have the Fleet, he would with ease fire the Spanish Navy, and perform many other bold Designs; about which the Queen caution'd him, and desir'd the whole Business should be managed as their joint discretion should prompt, and opportunity offer it self. But if it were possible, if any occasion courted them to it, they should fire the Ships in Faro Haven, and intercept what other Ships they could from the Indies; And upon all Occasions manifest their Conduct and Valour. With these Instructions they set sail again from Plymouth, (whither they were returned the seventeenth of August) but were separated by a Tempest near the Lands-end. A cross Yard in Raleigh's Ship was broken by the impetuosity of the Storm, and fell, which forc'd him to stay behind to make it good; And having been falsly inform'd that the Spanish Fleet was bound for the Azores, after having repaired his Ship, he fleet'd his course thitherwards. In the mean time Essex's Jealousie, and the pernicious Insinuations of Raleigh's Enemies, had wrought him into a belief that this Division of the Navy was on purpose laid and fore-design'd by Raleigh: But however the business was put up at his arrival, and Essex welcom'd him, making an Apology for acquainting the Queen with the Division falsly represented, and built (as it appear'd) on wrong suppositions.

Here wanting Water, Sir Walter landed without leave, and scarce had taken in Water before he received Orders immediately to follow Essex to Fayal, whither he repaired: but not finding Essex there according to his Order, he spent his time in taking an exact survey of the Haven, and of the People there, who from the fear and apprehension of what followed, were hastily packing away their Goods. This fair Opportunity, upon Consultation, puts him upon taking the Town, and egg'd on the Soldiers in hopes of an ample Prey. Sir Gilly Merrick (one of Essex's Creatures) dissuaded Sir Walter from the Design, alledging it would rob the Earl of the honour of taking it, and to confirm him his Enemy. But Sir Walter's desire of Glory, and the Soldiers Avarice, urg'd him (after he had staid some time for Essex's Arrival) to the Assault of the Place, which was at last taken. The next day after this Exploit Essex arriv'd at Fayal, where he was quickly inform'd of what Raleigh had done, and that the whole business was transacted with no other design than to rob him of the Glory, which his Jealousie made him easily believe.

Some perswaded the Earl to try Sir Walter by a Council of War, and Censure him; others without more ado would have him put to Death, for landing without Orders: At last some of Raleigh's Officers were Cather'd, He himself frown'd on, and severely reprov'd by Essex. But he never wanted an Apology for his Ambition; insinuating that he was not obliged to the Orders the inferior Officers and Soldiers were, that the Commission did not reach him; being one of the three Generals; Moreover, that he staid for him four days; and that he was necessitated as last to land, being in extreme want of Water, which was not to be had without fighting. However, the Lord Howard became his Mediator, and perswaded him to an honourable submission; which was perform'd, and accepted of; and thereupon both himself and the cashier'd Officers and Soldiers were again admitted into favour. But this was only laying their Passions asleep a while, which in the sequel of our story were again awaken'd. I cannot here omit a speech of the Earls upon this occasion, (which Sir Henry Wotton calls a Noble Word) who being urg'd to put Sir Walter on Martial Law: That I would do, said he, if he were my Friend.

However, this Expedition was not so glorious and great as at first they hop'd it might have been. For after burning the Town, and taking Flores, Gratiosa, and Villa Franca in S. Michaels, with three American Spanish Ships, together with the burning of a Carack, they came home much torn, leaky, and weather-beaten, about the end of October. This Expedition was commended on variously by the People, who were strangely carried on with a blind Passion for Essex, and so very prone to misconstrue Raleigh's Actions, from a Prejudice they had entertain'd, that because he was not Essex's friend, he must be an Enemy to his Country. However, the Queen look'd on him with another eye, and he grew faster in her favour than his Rival, who from this time began rather to decline, by a fault Sir Walter was afterwards guilty of, insatiable Ambition; a Principle that put him on those Practices which brought him afterwards to the Block. Essex was incens'd that Sir Robert Cecil, Raleigh's Friend, was prefer'd in his absence. And because the Earl's Concerns are woven amongst Sir Walter's, it will not be impertinent to give some Account of him here.

Essex was arriv'd to the height of Favour, and might have staid there, had he taken his measures aright; had he own'd an Obsequiousness to the Queen, or been Master of the great Requisite in a Courtier, Diffimulation; but it was a part of his Character to be a great Resenter, and a weak Dissembler of the least Disgrace. His Ireland Transactions were ill contrived, and his Miscarriages nicely dissected by the curious Eyes of those State-Anatomists, the Lord-Treasurer Buckhurst, the Lord-Admiral Nottingham, and his mortal Enemy Secretary Cecil, who began to remove him out of that Favour he had long possess'd. But it was true, as the Earl of Clarendon has observ'd, "That though he was Rival'd by a strong and subtle Faction, which cared, consulted for his Ruine; yet the Danger was thus allayed, that they were all his publick and professed Enemies, and so known to the Queen, that they durst never impertinently urge ought against him, since they were sure that Malice was confuted, when the Reason of their Objection on haply might not be considered."

However, in 1601 the Earl drew near his Ruine: for being hurried on by Cuffs ill Counsel and his own Discontents, he projects new Plots against the State, and tamper with the King of Scots to remove his Enemies at Court by force, informing him that the Power of the Nation lay in their hands, Raleigh being Governour of Jersey, &c. and other of his Enemies having the strength of the Nation at their command. And vainly presuming upon the Love of the Citizens, he projects to seize the Court, and secure Raleigh, as the most considerable Enemy he had. Of which Designs Gorges informs Sir Walter. The better to carry on his designs, Essex goes into London, where he endeavour'd to excite the Citizens to an Insurrection: But the City then being Rich, was not so apt to rebel; Rebellion being usually the Daughter of Poverty and Discontent. For these Treasonable Actions, being found guilty, he was condemn'd and executed.

That he died bravely and like a Gentleman, is not to be question'd; but that Sir Walter Raleigh should come openly to see him dye on purpose only to fat his Eyes with the Sacrifice of his Enemy, can never be granted, if we may believe himself in the same circumstances on the Scaffold, where he told his Auditors on the words of a Dying-man, he only came there to defend himself if any thing had been urg'd against him by the Earl.

Thus ended that Favourite, whose Death struck a damp on the Queens prosperous days, and gave blackness to her declining Reign. This Blow, like that of Gunpowder, not only blew up his Friends and Neighbours, but shook his Enemies at a distance; for it reach'd Sir Walter too, who wanting strength to grapple with his Rival the Treasurer, and not owning humility enough to be his Servant, perish'd at last in the Encounter. This himself prefag'd (if we may believe Osborn) as he came from the Execution of Essex, in a Boat, when he was heard to say, That it was more safe to have many Enemies at Court of equal power, than one false and ambitious Friend who hath attain'd to the absoluteness of Command.

The Queen could not long survive her Favourite; for I find her Death to be the next year following. A Queen who had enrich'd the Nation, reform'd Religion, curb'd the Pride of Spain, supported France, preserv'd Scotland, protected the Hollander against the Spaniard, and had vanquish'd his Armies by Sea and Land, reduc'd Ireland to obedience notwithstanding all the subtil Practices of Spain, and open Assistance given in Arms to her Irish Rebels; with many other things, which might seem too much to be the Achievements of one Reign.

King James her Successor came to the possession of a Kingdom arriv'd at the height of Prosperity, which like other Bodies when they are at their Acme tend to Corruption, and degenerate. This Sir Walter perceiv'd, and would have (as he thought) remedied. Sir John Fortescue, the Lord Cobham, Sir Walter, and others, would have oblig'd the King by Articles before his coming to the Crown, that his Country-mens number should be limited: But this was stop'd by the prudent Treasurer, and the bold Northumberland. Sir Walter fear'd that the Scots, like Locusts, would quickly devour this Kingdom; it being probable that (like the Goths and Vandals) they would settle in any Country rather than their own, and would make it their business to render our Nation as poor as their own: for this, he, with the rest of them, was afterwards frown'd on by the King, and lost his Command of the Guards.

However, Sir Walter still pursued the Good and Glory of his Country; and as formerly in Active Times, gave his Advice against the Peace with Spain, which might now with no great difficulty be brought on its knees. At the entrance of the King he presented him with a Manuscript of his own writing, with no weak Arguments against the Peace. But Sir Walter was mistaken; for his Counsel was ill tim'd, and a new Part was now to be acted, the Scene being changed. Peace was the King's Aim, whether out of Fear, or Religious Principles I determine not. But with Spain a Peace is concluded, with an Enemy already humbled, who now had time given them to recover their former Losses, and were as it were cherish'd to assault us with the greater vigour: which how true it proved, every Man can tell. And as if the King would quite run counter to the Queens Politicks, the Estates of the Netherlands are despised, slighted, and deserted, under pretence that it was of ill example for a Monarch to protect them.

The King is hardly warm in his Throne, but there is a great noise of a Plot, generally call'd Sir Walter Raleigh's Treason; but upon what Grounds I know not, since he had the least hand in it, as by his Tryal will appear. A Plot that is still a Mystery, and hath a Vail spread over it; A Plot compos'd of such a Hodgepodge of Religion and Interests, that the World stands amazed Sir Walter Raleigh should ever be drawn into it; A Plot to unlikely to hurt others, or benefit themselves, that as Ossor tells us, If ever Folly was capable of the Title or Pity due to Innocence, theirs might claim so large a share, as not possibly to be too severely condemn'd, or slightly enough punished. Envy and Disdain, as Sir Walter has told us in his Remains, seek Innovation by Faction. Discontent is the great Seducer, which at first put him to search into a Plot, he afterwards was betray'd into. The chief Ingredients in this Medley were two Priests, Watson and Clerk, and Count Arem- bergh; Ambassador Extraordinary for the Arch-Duke, who brought in Cobham, and he his Brother George Brook, both Protestants; at least seeming so; George Brook hook'd in Parham and others, and they the Lord Grey of Wilton, a rank Puritan; then came in Sir Walter, the wisest of them all according to Sanderfon, who as he tells us, dallied like a Fly in the flame till it consum'd him. Willing he was to know it, and thought by his Wit to over-reach the Confederates, whom he knew well enough, though he dealt with none but Cobham, as I can find out. One Mr. Lawency an Antwerp-Merchant, was the property made use of by Arembergh, and a Crony of the Lord Cobham's. These carried on the Contrivance a long while, which (as Sanderfon tells us) was betray'd by Lawency, and the vigilancy of Cecil. And indeed it was morally impossible that so many disagreeing weak Souls should carry on a Project without taking Air; the least glimpse being enough to give light to the States-men of those times. Their Designs were,

1. To set the Crown on the Lady Arabella; or to seize the King, and make him grant their Desires, and a Pardon.
 2. To have a Toleration of Religion.
 3. To procure Aid and Assistance from Foreign Princes.
 4. To turn out of the Court such as they dislike'd, and place themselves in Offices.
- Watson* to be Lord-Chancellor.
George Brook Lord-Treasurer.
Sir Griffin Markham Secretary of State.
Lord Grey Master of the Horse, and Earl-Marshal of England.

But it seems they made no provision for Sir Walter; which is no inconsiderable Argument of his Innocency, who could have deserv'd, and might have expected as great a Reward as any of them, had he been engaged in the Plot.

To oblige to Secrecy, Watson draws up an Oath. But all is betray'd; they are seiz'd, examin'd, and try'd. How well or ill Sir Walter has acquitted himself, we shall leave to the Opinion of the Readers of the following TRYAL, which was exactly and faithfully taken.

THE

THE ARRAIGNMENT OF S^r Walter Raleigh, Knight.

T Winton, Thursday the 17th of November, Anno Dom. 1603, before the Right Honourable, the Earl of Suffolk, Lord Chamberlain.
Earl of Devon.

Lord Henry Howard.

Lord Cecil, Earl of Salisbury.

Lord Watson.

Sir John Stanhope, Vice-Chamberlain.

Lord Chief-Justice of England, Popham.

Lord Chief-Justice of the Common-Pleas, Anderson.

Justice Gaudie.

Justice Warburton, and Sir William Wade Commissioners.

First, The Commission of Oyer and Terminer was read by the Clerk of the Crown-Office; and the Prisoner bid hold up his Hand.

And then presently the INDICTMENT was in effect as followeth:

THAT he did Conspire, and go about to deprive the King of his Government; to raise up Sedition within the Realm; to alter Religion, to bring in the Roman Superstition, and to procure Foreign Enemies to invade the Kingdoms. That the Lord Cobham, the ninth of June last, did meet with the said Sir Walter Raleigh in Durham-House, in the Parish of St. Martins in the Fields, and then and there had Conference with him, how to advance Arabella Stuart to the Crown and Royal Throne of this Kingdom; and that then and there it was agreed, that Cobham should treat with Aremberg, Ambassador from the Arch-Duke of Austria, to obtain of him 600000 Crowns, to bring to pass their intended Treasons. It was agreed that Cobham should go to the Arch-Duke Albert, to procure him to advance the pretended Title of Arabella: from thence knowing that Albert had not sufficient means to maintain his own Army in the Low-Countries, Cobham should go to Spain to procure the King to assist and further her pretended Title.

It was agreed, the better to effect all this Conspiracy, that Arabella should write three Letters, one to the Arch-Duke, another to the King of Spain, and a third to the Duke of Savoy, and promise three things: First, to establish firm Peace between England and Spain. Secondly, To tolerate the Popish and Roman Superstition. Thirdly, To be ruled by them in contracting of her Marriage.

And for the effecting these Traiterous Purposes, Cobham should return by the Isle of Jersey, and should find Sir Walter Raleigh Captain of the said Isle there, and take Counsel of Raleigh for the distributing of the aforesaid Crowns, as the Occasion or Discontentment of the Subjects should give cause and way.

And

And further, That Cobham and his Brother Brook met on the 9th of June last, and Cobham told Brook all these Treasons: To the which Treasons Brook gave his Assent, and did joyn himself to all these; and after on the Thursday following, Cobham and Brook did speak these words: That there would never be a good World in England, till the King (meaning our Sovereign Lord) and his Cubs (meaning his Royal Issue) were taken away.

And the more to disable and deprive the King of his Crown, and to confirm the said Cobham in his Intent, Raleigh did publish a Book, fully written against the most just and Royal Title of the King, knowing the said Book to be written against the just Title of the King; which Book Cobham after that received of him. Further, for the better effecting these Traiterous Purposes, and to establish the said Brook in his Intent, the said Cobham did deliver the said Book unto him the 14th of June. And further, the said Cobham, on the 16th of June, for accomplishment of the said Conference, and by the Traiterous Instigation of Raleigh, did move Brook to incite Arabella to write to the three forenamed Princes, to procure them to advance her Title; and that she, after she had obtained the Crown, should promise to perform three things, viz. Peace between England and Spain. 2. To tolerate with impunity the Popish and Roman Superstitions. 3. To be ruled by them three in the contracting of her Marriage.

To these Motions the said Brook gave his Assent. And for the better effecting of the said Treasons, Cobham on the seventeenth of June, by the Instigation of Raleigh, did write Letters to Count Aremberg, and did deliver the said Letters to one Matthew de Lawrency, to be delivered to the said Count: which he did deliver for the obtaining of the 600000 Crowns; which Money by other Letters Count Aremberg did promise to perform the payment of; and this Letter Cobham received the eighteenth of June. And then did Cobham promise to Raleigh, that when he had received the said Money, he would deliver 8000 Crowns to him: to which motion he did consent; and afterwards Cobham offered Brook, that after he should receive the said Crowns, he would give to him 10000 thereof; to which Motion Brook did assent.

To the Indictment Sir Walter Raleigh pleaded Not Guilty.

The JURY.

Sir Ralph Conibey,
Sir Thomas Fowler,
Sir Edward Peacock,
Sir William Rowe,

Knights.

Henry Goodyer,
Roger Wood,
Thomas Walker,
Thomas Whisky,

Esquires:

Thomas Highgate,
Robert Kemphorn,
John Chankey,
Robert Brumley,

Gentlemen.

Sir Walter Raleigh Prisoner, was asked, whether he would take Exceptions to any of the Jury?

Raleigh. I know none of them; they are all Christians, and honest Gentlemen, I except against none.

E. Suff. You Gentlemen of the Kings Learned Counsel, follow the same course as you did the other day.

Raleigh. My Lord, I pray you I may answer the Points particularly as they are delivered, by reason of the weakness of my memory and sickness.

Popham, Chief Justice. After the Kings Learned Counsel have delivered all the Evidence, Sir Walter, you may answer particularly to what you will.

Heale, the Kings Sergeant at Law. You have heard of Raleigh's Bloody Attempts to kill the King and his Royal Progeny, and in place thereof to advance one Arabella Stuart: The particulars of the Indictment are these. First, That Raleigh met with Cobham the ninth of June, and had Conference of an Invasion, of a Rebellion, and an Insurrection, to be made by the King's Subjects, to depose the King, and to kill his Children, poor Babes that never gave offence: Here is Blood, here is a new King and Governour. In our King consists all our Happiness, and the true use of the Gospel, a thing which we all wished to be settled after the Death of the Queen. Here must be money to do this, for Money is the Sinew of War. Where should that be had? Count Aremberg must procure it of Philip King of Spain, five or six hundred thousand Crowns, and out of this Sum Raleigh must have eight thousand. But what is that Count Aremberg? though I am no good Frenchman, yet it is as much as to say in English, Earl of Aremberg. Then there must be Friends to effect this: Cobham must go to Albert Arch-Duke of Austria, for whom Aremberg was Ambassador at that time in England. And what then? He must persuade the Duke to assist the pretended

tended. Title of Arabella. From thence Cobham must go to the King of Spain, and persuade him to assist the said Title. Since the Conquest there was never the like Treason. But out of whose Head came it? Out of Raleigh's, who must also advise Cobham to use his Brother Brook to incite the Lady Arabella to write three several Letters, as aforesaid in the Indictment; all this was on the ninth of June. Then three days after Brook was acquainted with it: After this Cobham said to Brook, It will never be well in England till the King and his Cubs are taken away. Afterwards Raleigh delivered a Book to Cobham, treacherously written against the Title of the King. It appears that Cobham took Raleigh to be either a God, or an Idol. Cobham endeavours to set up a new King, or Governour. God forbid mine Eyes should ever see so unhappy a change. As for the Lady Arabella, the upon my Conscience hath no more title to the Crown than I have, which before God I utterly renounce. Cobham a Man bred in England, hath no experience abroad: but Raleigh, a Man of great Wit, Military, and a Sword-Man. Now whether these things were bred in a hollow Tree, I leave to them to speak of, who can speak far better than my self. And so let him down again.

Sir Edward Cook, the King's Attorney.

I must first, my Lords, before I come to the Cause give one Caution, because we shall often mention Persons of eminent Places, some of them great Monarchs: Whatever we say of them, we shall but repeat what others have said of them; I mean the Capital Offenders in their Confessions: We professing Law, must speak reverently of Kings and Potentates. I perceive these honourable Lords, and the rest of this great Assembly, are come to hear what hath been scattered upon the Wrack of Reputation. We carry a just Mind, to condemn no Man but upon plain Evidence. Here is Mischief, Mischief in summo Grade, exorbitant Mischief. My Speech shall chiefly touch these three Points; Imitation, Supportation, and Defence.

The Imitation of Evil ever exceeds the Precedent; as on the contrary Imitation of Good ever comes short. Mischief cannot be supported but by Mischief; yea, it will lo multiply, that it will bring all to confusion. Mischief is ever underprop'd by Falshood of foul Practices. And because all these things did concur in this Treason, you shall understand the Main, as before you did the Bye.

The Treason of the Bye, consisteth in these Points: First, That the Lord Grey, Brook, Markham, and the rest, intended by Force in the Night to surprize the King's Court: which was a Rebellion in the Heart of the Realm, yea in the Heart of the Heart, in the Court. They intended to take him that is a Sovereign, to make him subject to their Power, purposing to open the Doors with Mulqueys and Calievers, and to take also the Prince and Council. Then under the King's Authority to carry the King to the Tower; and to make a State of the Admiral. When they had the King there, to extort three things from him: First, A Pardon for all their Treasons. Secondly, A Toleration of the Roman Superstition: Which, their Eyes shall sooner fall out than they shall ever see; for the King hath spoken these words in the hearing of many, I will lose the Crown, and my Life, before ever I will alter Religion. And, Thirdly, To remove Counsellors: In the room of the Lord Chancellor, they would have plac'd one Watson a Priest, absurd in Humanity, and ignorant in Divinity. Brook, of whom I will speak nothing, Lord-Treasurer. The great Secretary must be Markham, Oculus Patria. A Hole must be found in my Lord Chief Justice's Coat. Grey must be Earl-Marshal, and Master of the Horse, because he would have a Table in the Court: marry, he would advance the Earl of Worcester to an higher Place. All this cannot be done without a Multitude. Therefore Watson the Priest tells a Resolute Man that the King was in danger of Puritans and Jesuites; so to bring him in blindfold into the Action, saying, That the King is no King till he be Crown'd; therefore every Man might right his own Wrongs: but he is Rex natus, His Dignity descends as well as yours, my Lords. Then Watson imposeth a blasphemous Oath, That they should swear to defend the King's Person; to keep secret what was given them in charge, and seek all ways and means to advance the Catholic Religion. Then they intend to send for the Lord Mayor and the Aldermen, in the King's Name, to the Tower, lest they should make any Resistance, and then to take Hostages of them; and to enjoyn them to provide for them Victuals and Munition. Grey, because the King removed before Midsummer, had a farther reach, to get a company of Sword-men to assist the Action: Therefore he would stay till he had obtained a Regiment from Offend, or Austria. So you see these Treasons were like Sampson's Foxes, which were joyned in their Tails, though their Heads were severed.

Raleigh.

Raleigh. Your Gentlemen of the Jury, I pray remember I am not charged with the Bye, being the Treason of the Priest.

Attourney. You are not. My Lords, you shall observe three things in the Treasons: First, They had a Watch-word (the King's safety) their Pretence was Bonus in se, their Intent was Malum in se. Secondly, They avouched Scripture; both the Priests had Scriptum est; perverting and ignorantly mistaking the Scriptures. Thirdly, They avouched the Common Law, to prove that he was no King till he was Crowned; alledging a Statute of Eliz. 13. This, by way of Imitation, hath been the course of all Traytors.

In the 20th of Edw. the 2d, Isabella the Queen, and the Lord Mortimer, gave out, That the King's Person was not safe, for the good of the Church and Commonwealth.

The Bishop of Carlisle did preach on this Text, My Head is grieved: meaning by the Head, the King; that when the Head began to be negligent, the People might reform what is amiss.

In the 3d Hen. 4. Sir Roger Clavingdon accompanied with two Priests, gave out, that Richard the Second was Alive when he was Dead.

Edward the 3d caused Mortimer's Head to be cut off, for giving counsel to Murder the King.

The 3 Hen. 7. Sir Henry Stanley found the Crown in the Duff, and set it on the King's Head; when Fitzwater and Garret told him that Edward the 5th was alive, he said, If the alive, I will assist him. But this cost him his Head.

Edmond de la Pool, Duke of Suffolk, killed a Man in the Reign of King Henry the 7th, for which the King would have him hold up his hand at the Bar, and then Pardoned him. Yet he took such an Offence thereat, that he sent to the Noblemen, to help to reform the Commonwealth; and then said, he would go to France, and get Power there. Sir Roger Compton knew all the Treason, and discovered Windon and others, that were Attainted.

He said there was another thing that would be stood upon, namely, that they had but one Witness. Then he vouched one Appleyard's Cafe, a Traytor in Norfolk, who said a Man must have two Accusers. Helm was the Man that accused him; but Mr. Just. Cawlin said, that that Statute was not in force at that day. His words were [Thrust her into the Ditch.]

Then he went on speaking of Accusers, and made this difference: An Accuser is a speaker by Report, when a Witness is he that upon his Oath shall speak his knowledge of any Man.

A third sort of Evidence there is like-wile, and this is held more forcible than either of the other two; and that is, when a Man by his Accusation of another, shall by the same Accusation also condemn himself, and make himself liable to the same Fault and Punishment: this is more forcible than many Witnesses. So then I much by way of Imitation. Then he defined Treason; there is Treason in the Heart, in the Hand, in the Mouth, in Consummation: comparing that in Corde to the Root of a Tree; in Ore, to the Bud; in Manu, to the Blossom; and that which is in Consummatione, to the Fruit.

Now I come to your Charge, you of the Jury. The greatness of Treason is to be considered in these two things, Determinatione finis, and Electione mediorum. This Treason excelleth in both, for that it was to destroy the King and his Progeny. These Treasons are said to be Crimen lese Majestatis; this goes further, and may be termed Crimen extirpande Regie Majestatis, & totius Progeniei sue. I shall not need, my Lords, to speak any thing concerning the King, nor of the Bounty and Sweetness of his Nature, whose Thoughts are Innocent, whose Words are full of Wisdom and Learning, and whose Works are full of Honour; although it be a true saying, Nunquam nimis quod nunquam satis. But to whom do you bear your Malice? To the Children?

Raleigh. To whom speak you this? You tell me News I never heard of.

Attourney. Oh Sir, do I? I will prove you the Notorious Traytor that ever came to the Bar. After you have taken away the King, you would alter Religion: as you, Sir Walter Raleigh, have followed them of the Bye in Imitation; for I will charge you with the words.

Raleigh. Your words cannot condemn me, my Innocency is my Defence: Prove one of these things wherewith you have charged me, and I will confess the whole Indictment, and that I am the horriest Traytor that ever lived, and worthy to be Crucified with a thousand thousand Torments.

Attourney. Nay, I will prove all: Thou art a Monster, thou hast an English Face, but a Spanish Heart. Now you must have Money: Aremberg was no sooner in England (I Charge thee Raleigh) but thou incitedst Cobham to go unto him, and to deal with him for Money, to bestow on discontented Persons, to raise Rebellion on the Kingdom.

Raleigh. Let me Answer for my self.

Attourney. Thou shalt not.

Raleigh. It concerneth my Life.

Lord Chief Justice Popham. Sir Walter Raleigh, Mr. Attourney is but yet in the Gene-general, but when the Kings Council have given the Evidence wholly, you shall answer every Particular.

Attourney. Oh! do I touch you.

Lord Cecil. M. Attourney, when you have done with this general Charge, do you not mean to let him answer to every Particular?

Attourney. Yes, when we deliver the Proofs to be read. Raleigh procured Cobham to go to Aremberg, which he did by his Intigation: Raleigh supped with Cobham before he went to Aremberg; after Supper, Raleigh conducted him to Durham House; from whence Cobham went with Lawency, a Servant of Aremberg's, unto him, and went in by a Back-way. Cobham could never be quiet until he had entertained this Motion, for he had four Letters from Raleigh. Aremberg answered, the Money should be performed, but knew not to whom it should be distributed. Then Cobham and Lawency came back to Durham House, where they found Raleigh. Cobham and Raleigh went up, and left Lawency below, where they had secret Conference in a Gallery, and after Cobham and Lawency departed from Raleigh. Your Jargon was Peace! What is that? Spanish Invasion, Scottish Subversion. And again, you are not a fit Man to take so much Money for procuring of a Lawful Peace, for Peace procured by Money is dishonourable. Then Cobham must go to Spain, and return by Jersey, where you were Captain: And then because Cobham had not so much Policy, or at least Wickedness as you, he must have your advice for the distribution of the Money. Would you have deposed so good a King, lineally descended of Elizabeth, Eldest Daughter of Edward the 4th? Why then must you set up another? I think you meant to make Arabella a Titular Queen, of whose Title I will speak nothing, but sure you meant to make her a Stale: Ah good Lady! you could mean her no good.

Raleigh. You tell me News, Mr. Attourney.

Attourney. Oh Sir! I am the more large, because I know with whom I deal: For we have to deal to day with a Man of Wit.

Raleigh. Did I ever speak with this Lady?

Attourney. I will track you out before I have done: English-Men will not be led by perfwade of Words, but they must have Books to perfwade.

Raleigh. The Book was written by a Man of your Profession, Mr. Attourney.

Attourney. I would not have you impatient.

Raleigh. Methinks you fall out with your self, I lay nothing.

Attourney. By this Book you would perfwade Men that he is not the Lawful King.

Now let us consider some Circumstances: My Lords, you know my Lord Cobham (for whom we all Lament, and Rejoice; Lament in that his House, which hath stood so long unperturbed, is now Ruinated; Rejoice, in that his Treasons are Revealed): he is neither Politician nor Sword-man; Raleigh was both, united in the Cause with him, and therefore cause of his Destruction. Another Circumstance is the secret Contriving of it. Hamphry Stafford claimed Sanctuary for Treason. Raleigh in his Machivilian Policy hath made a Sanctuary for Treason. He must talk with none but Cobham, because (saith he) one Witness can never condemn me. For Brook said unto Sir Griffith Markham, Take heed how you do make my Lord Cobham acquainted; for whatsoever he knoweth, Raleigh the Witch will get out of him. As soon as Raleigh was examined on one Point of Treason concerning my Lord Cobham, he wrote to him thus; I have been examined of you, and confessed nothing. Further you sent to him by your trusty Francis Kemish, that one Witness could not condemn; and therefore had his Lordship be of good Courage. Came this out of Cobham's Quiver? No: But out of Raleigh's Machivilian and Devilish Policy. Yea, but Cobham did retract it; Why then did you urge it? Now then see the most horrible Practices that ever came out of the bottomless Pit of the Lowest Hell. After that Raleigh had Intelligence that Cobham had Accused him, he endeavoured to have Intelligence from Cobham, which he had gotten by young Sir John Payton: But I think it was the Error of his Youth.

Raleigh. The Lords told it me, or else I had not been sent to the Tower.

Attourney. Thus Cobham by the Intigation of Raleigh, entered into these Actions: So that the Question will be, Whether you are not the principal Traitor, and he would nevertheless have entered into it? Why did Cobham retract all that fame? First, because Raleigh was so Odious, he thought he should fare the worse for his false. Secondly, he thought thus with himself, If he be free, I shall clear my self the better. After this Cobham asked for a Preacher to confer with, pretending to have Doctor Andrews; but indeed he meant not to have him, but Mr. Galloway; a Worthy and Reverend Preacher, who can do more with the King (as he said) than any other; that he, seeing his constant Denial, might inform the King thereof. Here he plays with the Preacher. If Raleigh could perfwade the Lords, that Cobham had no Intent to travel, then he thought all should be well. Here is Forgery. In the Tower Cobham must write to Sir Thomas Vane, a Worthy Man, that he meant not to go into Spain; which Letter Raleigh devised in Cobham's Name.

* Raleigh.

Raleigh. I will wash my hands of the Indictment, and die a true Man to the King.

Attorney. You are the absolute Traytor that ever was.

Raleigh. Your Phrases will not prove it, Mr. Attorney.

Attorney. Cobham writeth a Letter to my Lord Cecil, and doth will Mellis his Man, to lay it in a Spanisb Bible, and to make as though he found it by chance. This was after he had Intelligence with this Viper, that he was false.

Lord Cecil. You mean a Letter intended to me, I never had it.

Attorney. No, my Lord, you had it not. You, my Masters of the Jury, respect not the Wickedness and Hatred of the Man, respect his Cause; if he be guilty, I know you will have care of it, for the Preservation of the King, the Continuance of the Gospel authorized, and the Good of us all.

Raleigh. I do not hear yet, that you have spoken one word against me, here is no Treason of mine done: If my Lord Cobham be a Traytor, what is that to me?

Attorney. All that he did was by thy Infingation, thou Viper; for I show thee, thou Traytor.

Raleigh. It becometh not a Man of Quality and Virtue, to call me so: But I take comfort in it, it is all you can do.

Attorney. Have I anger'd you?

Raleigh. I am in no Cafe to be angry.

Popham. Sir Walter Raleigh, Mr. Attorney speaketh out of the Zeal of his duty, for the Service of the King, and you for your Life; be valiant on both sides.

Now they proceed to the Reading the Proofs.

The Lord Cobham's Examination read.

'He confesseth he had a Passport to go into Spain, intending to go to the Arch-Duke to confer with him about these Practices; and because he knew the Arch-Duke had not Money to pay his own Army, from thence he meant to go to Spain, to deal with the King for the 600000 Crowns, and to return by Jersey, and that nothing should be done, until he had spoken with Sir Walter Raleigh for distribution of the Money, to them which were discontented in England. At the first beginning he breathed out Oaths and Exclamations against Raleigh, calling him Villain and Traytor; saying he had never entered into these Courses, but by his Infingation, and that he would never let him alone.

Here Mr. Attorney willed the Clerk of the Crown Office to read over these last words again (he would never let him alone.)

The Lord Cobham's Examination.

'Besides he spake of Plots and Invasions: Of the Particulars whereof he could give no Account, though Raleigh and he had conferred of them. Further, he said, He was afraid of Raleigh, that when he should return by Jersey, that he would have him and the Money to the King. Being Examined of Sir Arthur Gorge, he freed him, saying:

They never durst trust him, but Sir Arthur Savage they intended to use, because they thought him a fit Man.

Raleigh. Let me see the Accusation: This is absolutely all the Evidence can be brought against me; poor shifts! You Gentlemen of the Jury, I pray you understand this: This is that which must either condemn, or give me Life; which must free me, or send my Wife and Children to beg their Bread about the Streets. This is that must prove me a notorious Traytor, or a true Subject to the King. Let me see my Accusation, that I may make my Answer.

Clerk of the Council. I did read it, and shew you all the Examinations.

Raleigh. At my first Examination at Windsor, my Lords asked me, what I knew of Cobham's Practice with Aremberg? I answered Negatively: And as concerning Arabella, I protest before God, I never heard one word of it. If that be proved, let me be guilty of ten thousand Treasons. It is a strange thing you will impute that to me, when I never heard so much as the Name of Arabella Stuart, but only the Name of Arabella.

After being Examined, I told my Lords, that I thought my Lord Cobham had Conference with Aremberg, I suspected his Visiting of him: For after he departed from me at Darham House, I saw him pass by his own Stairs, and passed over to S. Mary Savoyours, where I knew Lawrence, a Merchant, and a Follower of Aremberg, lay, and therefore likely to go unto him. My Lord Cecil asked my Opinion concerning Lawrence; I said, that if you do not apprehend Lawrence, it is dangerous he will die; if you do apprehend him, you shall give my Lord Cobham notice thereof. I was asked likewise, who was the greatest Man with my Lord Cobham? I answered, I knew no Man to great with him, as young Wyas of Kent.

As soon as Cobham saw my Letter to have discovered his Dealing with Aremberg, in his Fury he accused me, but before he came to the Stair-foot he repented, and said he had done me Wrong. When he came to the end of his Accusation, he added, That if

if he had brought this Money to Jersey, he fear'd that I would have deliver'd him and the money to the King. Mr. Attorney, you said this never came out of Cobham's Quiver, he is a simple Man. Is he so simple? No: He hath a Disposition of his own, he will not easily be guided by others, but when he has once taken Head in a Matter, he is not easily drawn from it; he is no Babe. But it is strange for me to devise with Cobham, that he should go to Spain, to persuade the King to disburse so much Money, he being a Man of no Love in England, and I having resigned my room of chiefest Command, the Wardenship of the Stanneries: Is it not strange for me to make my self Robin Hood, or a Kett, or a Cade? I knowing England to be in better Estate to defend it self than ever it was. I knew Scotland United; Ireland Quiet, wherein of late our Forces were dispersed; Denmark assured, which before was suspected. I knew that having a Lady whom Time had surprized, we had now an active King, a lawful Successor, who would himself be present in all his Affairs. The State of Spain was not unknown to me. I had written a Discourse, which I had intended to present unto the King, against Peace with Spain. I knew the Spaniards had fix Repulses, three in Ireland, and three at Sea, and once in 1588 at Cales, by my Lord Admiral. I knew he was Discouraged and Dishonoured. I knew the King of Spain to be the proudest Prince in Christendom; but now he cometh Creeping to the King my Master for Peace. I knew whereas before he had in his Port fix or seven score Sail of Ships, he hath now but Six or Seven. I knew of Twenty five Millions he had from his Indies, he hath scarce one left. I knew him to be so Poor, that the Jesuites in Spain, who were wont to have such large Allowance, were fain to beg at the Church-Door. Was it ever read or heard, that any Prince should disburse so much Money without a sufficient Pawn? I knew her own Subjects, the Citizens of London, would not lend her Majesty Money without Lands in Mortgage. I knew the Queen did not lend the States Money without Fifshing, Brill, and other Towns for a Pawn. And can it be thought, that he would let Cobham have so great a Sum?

I never came to the Lord Cobham's but about matters of his Profit, as the Ordering of his House, Paying of his Servants Board-wages, &c. I had of his when I was examined, Four Thousand Pounds worth of Jewels for a Purchase; a Pearl of three thousand Pound, and a Ring worth five hundred Pound: If he had had a fancy to run away, he would not have left so much to have purchased a Lease in Fee Farm. I saw him buy three hundred Pounds worth of Books to send to his Library at Canterbury, and a Cabinet of thirty Pound to give to Mr. Attorney, for drawing the Conveyances; and God in Heaven knoweth, not I, whether he intended to travel or no. But for that Practice with Arabella, or Letters to Aremberg framed, or any Discourse with him, or in what Language he spake unto him; if I knew any of these things, I would absolutely confess the Indictment, and acknowledge my self worthy ten thousand Deaths.

Cobham's second Examination Read.

The Lord Cobham being required to subscribe unto an Examination, there was shewed a Note under Sir Walter Raleigh's hand, the which when he had perused, he paused and after brake forth into these Speeches; Oh Villain! Oh Traytor! I will now tell you all the Truth: And then said, His purpose was to go into Flanders, and into Spain, for the obtaining the aforelaid Money, and that Raleigh had appointed to meet him in Jersey as he returned Home, to be advised of him about the Distribution of the Money.

Popham, Lord Chief Justice. When Cobham answer'd to the Interrogatories, he made scruple to subscribe, and being urged to it, he said, If he might hear me affirm, that a Person of his Degree ought to set his Hand, he would; I lying then at Richmond, for fear of the Plague, was sent for, and I told he ought to subscribe; otherwise it were a Contempt of a high Nature: Then he subscribed. The Lords questioned with him further, and he shewed them a Letter, as I thought written to me, but it was indeed written to my Lord Cecil: He desired to see the Letter again, and then said, Oh Wretch! Oh Traytor! Whereby I perceived you had not performed that Trust he had reposed in you.

Raleigh. He is as passionate a Man as lives, for he hath not spared the best Friends he hath in England in his Passion: My Lords, I take it, he that has been examined, has ever been asked at the time of his Examination, if it be according to his meaning, and then to subscribe. Methinks, my Lords, when he accuses a Man, he should give some Account and Reason of it; it is not sufficient to say, we talked of it. If I had been the Plotter, would not I have given Cobham some Arguments, whereby to persuade the King of Spain, and answer his Objections. I knew Westmorland, and Barthwell, Men of other Understandings than Cobham, were ready to beg their Bread.

Sir Thomas Fowler, one of the Jury. Did Sir Walter Raleigh write a Letter to my Lord before he was examined concerning him, or not?

Attorney. Yes.

Lord Cecil. I am in great Dispute with my self to speak in the Case of this Gentleman:

man: A former Dearnus between me and him tied so firm a Knot of my Conceit of his Virtues, now broken by a Discovery of his Imperfections. I protest, did I serve a King that I knew would be displeased with me for speaking, in this Case I would speak whatever came of it: But seeing he is compacted of Piety and Justice, and one that will not mislike of any Man for speaking a Truth, I will answer your Question.

Sir Walter Raleigh was said by me at Windfor, upon the first News of Coply, that the Kings Person should be surprised by my Lord Grey, and Mr. George Brook; when I found Brook was in, I suspected Cobham; then I doubted Raleigh to be a partaker. I speak not this, that it should be thought I had greater Judgment than the rest of my Lords, in making this haste to have them examined. Raleigh following to Windfor, I met with him, upon the Tarras, and willed him as from the King to stay, saying the Lords had something to say to him: Then he was examined, but not concerning my Lord Cobham, but of the Surprising Treason. My Lord Grey was apprehended, and likewise Brook; by Brook we found, that he had given notice to Cobham of the surprising Treason, as he delivered it to us, but with as much sparingness of a Brother as he might: We sent for my Lord Cobham to Richmond, where he stood upon his Justification and his Quality; sometimes being froward, he said he was not bound to subscribe, wherewith we made the King acquainted. Cobham said, if my Lord Chief Justice would say it were a Contempt, he would subscribe; whereof being resolved, he subscribed. There was a Light given to Aremberg, that Lawency was examined, but that Raleigh knew that Cobham was examined, is more than I know.

Raleigh. If my Lord Cobham had trusted me in the Main, was not I as fit a Man to be trusted in the Bye?

Lord Cecil. Raleigh did by his Letters acquaint us, that my Lord Cobham had sent Lawency to Aremberg, when he knew not he had any Dealings with him.

Lord H. How. It made for you, if Lawency had been only acquainted with Cobham, and not with you. But you knew his whole Estate, and were acquainted with Cobham's Practice with Lawency, and it was known to you before, that Lawency depended on Aremberg.

Attourney. 1. Raleigh protested against the surprising Treason. 2. That he knew not of the Matter touching Arabella. I would not charge you, Sir Walter, with a matter of Falshood: You say, you suspected the Intelligence that Cobham had with Aremberg, by Lawency.

Raleigh. I thought it had been no other Intelligence, but such as might be warranted.

Attourney. Then it was but lawful Suspicion. But to that whereas you said, that Cobham had accused you in Passion, I answer three Ways: 1. I observed when Cobham said, Let me see the Letter again? he paused, and when he did see that Count Aremberg was touched, he cried out, Oh Traitor! Oh Villain! Now will I confess the whole Truth. 2. The Accusation of a Man on Hear-say, is nothing: Would he accuse himself on Passion, and ruinate his Cause and Posterity, out of Malice to accuse you? 3. Could this be out of Passion? Mark the manner of it: Cobham had told this at least two months before to his Brother Brook, You are Fools, you are on the Bye. Raleigh and I are on the Main, we mean to take away the King and his Cabs; this he delivered two months before. So mark the manner and the matter, he would not turn the Weapon against his own Bosom, and accuse himself to accuse you.

Raleigh. Hath Cobham confessed that? Lord Chief Justice. This is spoken by Mr. Attourney, to prove that Cobham's Speech came not out of Passion.

Raleigh. Let it be proved that Cobham said so.

Attourney. Cobham said, He was a long time doubtful of Raleigh, that he would send him and the money to the King. Did Cobham fear lest you would betray him in Jersey? Then of necessity there must be Trust between you. No man can betray a man but he that is trusted, in my understanding. This is the greatest Argument to prove that he was acquainted with Cobham's Proceedings. Raleigh has a deeper reach than to make himself, as he said, Robin Hood, a Kett or Cade, yet I never heard that Robin Hood was a Traitor; they say he was an Outlaw. And whereas he said, that our King is not only more Wealthy and Potent than his Predecessors, but also more Politick and Wise, so that he could have no hope to prevail. I answer, There is no King so Potent, Wife and Active, but he may be overtaken through Treason. Whereas you say Spain is so Poor, discouraging so largely thereof: it had been better for you to have kept in Guiana, than to have been so well acquainted with the State of Spain. Besides, if you could have brought Spain and Scotland to have joyned, you might have hoped to prevail a great deal the better. For his six Overthrows, I answer; He hath the more Malice, because Repulses breed desire of Revenge. Then you say, you never talked with Cobham but about Leases, and letting Lands, and ordering his House; I never knew you Clerk of the Kitchen, &c. If you had fallen on your your Knees at first, and confessed the Treason, it had been better for you. You say, he meant to have given me a Cabinet of thirty Pounds, perhaps, he thought by those means to have anticipated me therewith. But you say, all these are Circumstances. I answer, all this Accusation in Circumstance is true: Here now I might appeal to my Lords, that you take hold of this, that he subscribed not to the Accusation.

Lord H. How. Cobham was not then pressed to subscribe.

Attourney. His Accusation being testified by the Lords, is of as great force, as if he had subscribed. Raleigh said again, if the Accuser be alive, he must be brought face to face to speak, and alledges 25th Edw. 3d. That there must be two sufficient Witnesses that must be brought face to face before the Accused, and alledgeth 10, and 13 Eliz.

Raleigh. You try me by the Spanish Inquisition, if you proceed only by the Circumstances without two Witnesses.

Attourney. This is a Treasonable Speech. Raleigh. Evertere hominem justum in Causa sua injustum est: Good my Lords, let it be proved either by the Laws of the Land, or the Laws of God, that there ought not to be two Witnesses appointed; yet I will not stand to defend this Point in Law, if the King will have it so: it is no rare thing for a Man to be falsely accused. A Judge condemned a Woman in Sarum for killing her Husband, on the Testimony of one Witness; afterwards his Man confessed the Murder, when he was executed. Who after being touched in Conscience for the Judgment, was used to say, Quod nunquam de hoc facto animam in vita sua purget. It is also commanded by the Scripture, Allocutus est Jehovah Moyses, In Ore duorum non trium Testium, &c.

If Christ requireth it, as it appeareth, Math. 18. If by the Canon, Civil Law, and God's Word, it be required, that there must be two Witnesses at the least, bear with me if I desire one.

I would not desire to live, if I were privy to Cobham's Proceedings: I had been a Slave, a Villain, a Fool, if I had endeavoured to set up Arabella, and refused so Gracious a Lord and Sovereign: But urge your Proofs.

Lord Chief Justice. You have offered Questions on divers Statutes, all which mention two Accusers in case of Indictments; you have deceived your self, for the Laws of 25 Ed. 3. and 5 Ed. 6. are repealed. It sufficeth now if there be Proofs made either under Hand, or by Testimony of Witnesses, or by Oaths; it needs not the Subscription of the Party, so there be Hands of credible Men to testify the Examination.

Raleigh. It may be an Error in me, and if those Laws be repealed, yet I hope the Equity of them remains still; but if you affirm it, it must be a Law to Posterity. The Proof of the Common Law is by Witnesses and Jury, let Cobham be here, let him speak it: Call my Accuser before my Face, and I have done.

Attourney. Scientia sceleris est mera Ignorantia: You have read the Letter of the Law, but understand it not. Here was your Anchor-hold, and your Randevous: you trust to Cobham, either Cobham must accuse you, or no body; if he did, then it would not hurt you, because he is but one Witness; if he did not, then you are safe.

Raleigh. If ever I read word of the Law or Statute before I was Prisoner in the Tower, God confound me.

Attourney. Now I come to prove the Circumstances of the Accusation to be true. Cobham confessed he had a passport to travel, hereby intending to prelate Overtures to the Arch-Duke, and from thence to go to Spain, and there to have Conference with the King for Money: You say he promised to come home by Jersey, to make merry with you and your Wife.

Raleigh. I said, in his return from France, not Spain.

Attourney. Further, in his Examination he said, nothing could be set down for the Distribution of the Money to the Discontented, without Conference with Raleigh. You said it should have been for procurement of Peace, but it was for raising Rebellion. Further, Cobham said, he would never have entered into these Courses, but by your Instigation, and that you would never let him alone. Your Scholar was not apt enough to tell us all the Plots, that is enough for you to do, that are, his Master: You intended to trust Sir Arthur Savage, whom I take to be an honest and true Gentleman, but not Sir Arthur Gorge.

Raleigh. All this is but one Accusation of Cobham's, I hear no other thing; to which Accusation he never subscribed nor avouched it; I beseech you, my Lords, let Cobham be sent for, charge him on his Soul, on his Allegiance to the King; if he affirm it, I am Guilty.

Lord Cecil. It is the Accusation of my Lord Cobham, it is the Evidence against you, must it not be of force without his Subscription? I desire to be relieved by the Judges, whether by the Law it is not a forcible Argument of Evidence.

The Judges. My Lord, it is.

Raleigh. The King at his Coronation is sworn, In omnibus Judiciis suis Aequitatem, non Rigorem Regis, observare: by the Rigour and Cruelty of the Law it may be a forcible Evidence.

Lord Chief Justice. That is not the Rigour of the Law, but the Justice of the Law;

Law; else when a Man hath made a plain Acculation, by Practice he might be brought to retract it again.

Raleigh. Oh my Lord, you may use Equity.

Lord Chief Justice. That is from the King, you are to have Justice from us.

Lord Anderson. The Law is, if the Matter be proved to the Jury, they must find you Guilty; for Cobham's Acculation is not only against you, there are other things sufficient.

Lord Cecil. Now that Sir Walter Raleigh is satisfied, that Cobham's Subscription is not necessary: I pray you Mr. Attorney go on.

Raleigh. Good Mr. Attorney be patient, and give me leave.

Lord Cecil. An unnecessary Patience is a hindrance, let him go on with his Proofs, and then refer them.

Raleigh. I would answer particularly.

Lord Cecil. If you would have a Table, and Pen, and Ink, you shall.

Then Paper and Ink was given him.

Here the Clerk of the Crown read the Letter, which the Lord Cobham did write in July, which was to the effect of his former Examination, further saying, I have disclosed all; to accuse any one falsely, were to burden my own Conscience.

Attorney. Read Copley's Confession the 8th of June, he saith, He was offered 1000 Crowns to be in this Action.

Here Watson's Additions were read.

"The great Mass of Money from the Count was impossible, saith Brook, &c."

Brook's Confession read.

"There have Letters passed, saith he, between Cobham and Aremberg, for a great Sum of Money, to assist a second Action for the surprising of his Majesty.

Attorney. It is not possible it was of Passion; for it was in talk before three Men being severally examined, who agreed in the Sum to be bestowed on discontented Persons. That Grey should have 12000 Crowns, and Raleigh should have 8000, or 10000 Crowns.

Cobham's Examination, July 18.

"If the Money might be procured (saith 'he') then a Man may give Pensions. Being asked if a Pension should not be given 'to his Brother Brook, he denied it not.

Lawrence's Examination.

"Within five days after Aremberg arrived, Cobham resorted unto him. That Night that Cobham went to Aremberg with Lawrence, Raleigh supped with him.

Attorney. Raleigh must have his part of the Money, therefore now he is a Tray-

tor. The Crown shall never stand one Year on the Head of the King (my Master) if a Traytor may not be condemned by Circumstances: For if A. tells B. and B. tells C. and C. D. &c. you shall never prove Treason by two Witnesses.

Raleigh's Examination was read

He confesseth Cobham offered him 8000 Crowns, which he was to have for the furtherance of the Peace between England and Spain; and that he should have it within three days. To which, he said, he gave this Answer, When I see the Money I will tell you more; for I had thought it had been one of his ordinary idle Conceits, and therefore made no account thereof.

Raleigh. The Attorney hath made a long Narration of Copley, and the Priests, which concerns me nothing, neither know I how Cobham was altered. For he told me, if I would agree to further the Peace, he would get me 8000 Crowns. I asked him, Who shall have the rest of the Money? He said, I will offer such a Noble Man (who was not named) some of the Money. I said, he will not be persuaded by you, and he will extremely hate you for such a Motion. Let me be pinched to Death with hot Irons, if ever I knew there was any Intention to bestow the Money on discontented Persons. I had made a Discourse against the Peace, and would have Printed it: If Cobham changed his mind; if the Priests, if Brook had any such intent, what is that to me? They must answer for it. He offered me the Money before Aremberg came, that is difference of time.

Serjeant Philips. Raleigh confesseth the Matter, but avoideth it by distinguishing of Times. You said it was offered you before the coming of Aremberg; which is false. For you being examined whether you should have such money of Cobham, or not: You said yea, and that you should have it within two or three days. Nemo meritis presumitur mentiri.

Lord Hen. Hon. Alledg me any Ground or Cause, wherefore you gave ear to my Lord Cobham for receiving Pensions; in Matters you had not to deal with.

Raleigh. Could I stop my Lord Cobham's Mouth?

Lord Cecil. Sir Walter Raleigh presleth, that my Lord Cobham should be brought face to face. If he ask things of Favour and Grace, they must come only from him that can give them. If we fit here as Commissioners, how shall we be satisfied whether he ought to be brought, unless we hear the Judges speak.

Lord Chief Justice. This thing cannot be granted, for then a number of Treasons should flourish: The Accuser may be drawn by Practice, whilst he is in Person.

Judge

Judge Gandy. The Statute you speak of, concerning two Witnesses in case of Treason is found to be inconvenient, therefore by another Law it was taken away.

Raleigh. The common Trial of England is by Jury and Witnesses.

Lord Chief Justice. No, by Examination: If three conspire a Treason, and they all confess it; here is never a Witness, yet they are condemned.

Judge Warburton. I marvel, Sir Walter, that you being of such Experience and Wit, should stand on this Point; for so many Horse-stealers may escape, if they may not be condemned without Witnesses. If one should rush into the King's Privy-Chamber, whilst he is alone, and kill the King (which God forbid) and this man be met coming with his Sword drawn all Bloody; shall not he be condemned to Death? My Lord Cobham hath, perhaps, been laboured withal; and to save you, his old Friend, it may be that he will deny all that which he hath said.

Raleigh. I know not how you conceive the Law.

Lord Chief Justice. Nay, we do not conceive the Law, but we know the Law.

Raleigh. The Wisdom of the Law of God is absolute and perfect, Hec fac, & vivet, &c. But now by the Wisdom of the State, the Wisdom of the Law is uncertain. Indeed where the Accuser is not to be had conveniently, I agree with you; but here my Accuser may, he is alive, and in the House. Sisanna had been condemned, if Daniel had not cried out: Will you condemn an innocent Israelite, without Examination or Knowledge of the Truth? Remember, it is absolutely the Commandment of God: If a false Witness rise up, you shall cause him to be brought before the Judges; if he be found false, he shall have the Punishment which the Accused should have had. It is very sure for my Lord to accuse me is my certain Danger, and it may be a means to excuse himself.

Lord Chief Justice. There must not such a Gap be opened for the Destruction of the King, as would be if we should grant this. You plead hard for your self, but the Laws plead as hard for the thing. I did never hear that Course to be taken in a Case of Treason, as to write one to another, or speak one to another during the time of their Imprisonment. There hath been Intelligence between you, and what underhand Practices there may be, I know not. If the Circumstances agree not with the Evidence, we will not condemn you.

Raleigh. The King desires nothing but the knowledge of the Truth, and would have no advantage taken by Severity of the Law. If ever we had a Gracious King, now we have; I hope, as he is, such are his Ministers. If there be but a Trial of five Marks at common Law, a Witness must be deposed. Good my Lords, let my Accuser come face to face, and be deposed.

Lord Chief Justice. You have no Law for it: God forbid any man should accuse himself upon his Oath.

Attorney. The Law presumes, a man will not accuse himself to accuse another. You are an odious man: For Cobham thinks his Cause the worse that you are in it. Now you shall hear of some Stirs to be raised in Scotland.

Part of Copley's Examination.

"Also Watson told me, that a special Person told him, that Aremberg offered to him a thousand Crowns to be in that Action; and that Brook said, the Stirs in Scotland came out of Raleigh's Head.

Raleigh. Brook hath been taught his Lesson.

Lord H. Hon. This Examination was taken before me; Did I teach him his Lesson?

Raleigh. I protest before God, I meant it not by any Privy Counsellor; but because Money is scant, he will juggle on both sides.

Raleigh's Examination.

"The way to invade England, were to begin with Stirs in Scotland.

Raleigh. I think so still: I have spoken it to divers of the Lords of the Council, by way of Discourse and Opinion.

Attorney. Now let us come to those words of Destroying the King and his Cubs.

Raleigh. O barbarous! if they, like unnatural Villains, should use those words, shall I be charged with them? I will not hear it, I was never any Plotter with them against my Country, I was never false to the Crown of England. I have spent 4000 Pounds of my own against the Spanish Faction, for the Good of my Country. Do you bring the words of these Hellish Spiders, Clark, Watson, and others against me?

Attorney. Thou hast a Spanish Heart, and thy self art a Spider of Hell; for thou confessest the King to be a most Sweet and Gracious Prince, and yet hast conspired against him.

Watson's Examination read.

"He said, that George Brook told him twice, That his Brother, the Lord Cobham, said to him, That you are but on the Bye, but Raleigh and I are on the Main.

Brook's

Brook's Examination read.

"Being askt what was meant by this Jar-
"the Bye and the Main? he said, That "the Lord Cobham told him, That Grey and "others were in the Bye, he and Raleigh
"were on the Main. Being askt what Ex"position his Brother made of these words?
"he said, he is loth to repeat it. And af"ter faith, by the Main was meant the ta"king away of the King and his Issue; and "thinks on his Conscience, it was infused
"into his Brother's Head by Raleigh."

Cobham's Examination read.

"Being askt, if ever he had said, It will "never be well in England, till the King
"and his Cabs were taken away. He said, he "had answered before, and that he would
"answer no more to that Point."

Raleigh. I am not named in all this: There is a Law of two sorts of Accusers, one of his own Knowledge, another by Hear-say.

Earl of Suffolk. See the Case of Arnold.
Lord Chief Justice. It is the Case of Sir
Will. Thomas, and Sir Nicholas Arnold.

Raleigh. If this may be, you will have a ny Mans Life in a Week.

Attorney. Raleigh faith, That Cobham was in a Passion when he said so. Would he tell his Brother any thing of Malice against Raleigh, whom he lov'd as his Life?

Raleigh. Brook never loved me; until his Brother had accused me, he said nothing.

Lord Cecil. We have heard nothing that might lead us to think that Brook accused you, he was only in the Surprising Treason; for by accusing you he should accuse his Brother.

Raleigh. He doth not care much for that.

Lord Cecil. I must judge the best. The Accusation of his Brother was not voluntary; he par'd every thing as much as he could, to save his Brother.

Cobham's Examination read.

"He said he had a Book written against "the Title of the King, which he had of "Raleigh, and that he gave it to his Brother
"Brook: and Raleigh said it was foolishly written."

Attorney. After the King came within twelve miles of London, Cobham never came to see him; and intended to travel without seeing the Queen and the Prince. Now in this Discontentment you gave him the Book, and he gave it his Brother.

Raleigh. I never gave it him, he took it off my Table. For I well remember a little before that time I received a Challenge from Sir Amias Preston, and for that I did intend to answer it, I resolv'd to leave my Estate fetted, therefore laid out all my loose Papers, amongst which was this Book.

Lord Howard. Where had you this Book?

Raleigh. In the old Lord Treasurer's Study, after his Death.

Lord Cecil. Did you ever shew or make known the Book to me?

Raleigh. No, my Lord.

Lord Cecil. My Father being employed in the Affairs of State at that time, it was like enough, he had many Books and Papers written against the then Queen and State, which might come to his hands by the Discovery of such Offences.

Attorney. I observe there was Intelligence between you and Cobham in the Tower; for after he said, it was against the King's Title, he denied it again.

Sir William Wade. First my Lord Cob- ham confesseth it, and after he had subscribed it, he revoked it again: To me he always said, that the Drift of it was against the King's Title.

Raleigh. I protest before God, and all his Works, I gave him not the Book.

Nota. Sir Robert Wroth speaketh, or whispereth something secretly.

Attorney. My Lords, I must complain of Sir Robert Wroth, he says this Evidence is not material.

Sir Robert Wroth. I never spake the words.

Attorney. Let Mr. Serjeant Philips testifie, whether he heard him say the Words or no.

Lord Cecil. I will give my Word for Sir Robert Wroth.

Sir Robert Wroth. I will speak as truly as you, Mr. Attorney, for by God, I never spake it.

Lord Chief Justice. Wherefore should this Book be burnt?

Raleigh. I burned it not.

Sergeant Philips. You presented your Friend with it, when he was discontented.
If it had been before the Queens Death it had been a less matter; but you gave it him presently when he came from the King, which was the time of his Discontentment.

Raleigh. Here is a Book supposed to be Treasonable; I never read it, commended it, or delivered it, nor urged it.

Attorney. Why this is cunning.

Raleigh. Every thing that doth make for me is cunning, and every thing that maketh against me is probable.

Attorney. Lord Cobham faith, that Kemish came to him with a Letter torn, and did with him not to be disdain'd, for one Witness could not hurt him.

Raleigh. This poor Man hath been close Prisoner these eighteen Weeks; he was offer'd the Rack to make him confess. I never sent any such Message by him, I

WIT

writ to him, to tell him what I had done with Mr. Attorney; having of his at that time a great Pearl and a Diamond.

Lord H. Howard. No Circumstance mov-eth me more than this. Kemish was never on the Rack, the King gave charge that no Rigour should be used.

Commissioners. We protest before God, there was no such matter intended to our knowledge.

Raleigh. Was not the Keeper of the Rack sent for, and he threatned with it?

Sir William Wade. When Mr. Solicitor and my self examined Kemish, we told him he delver'd the Rack, but did not threaten him with it.

Commissioners. It was more than we knew.

Cobham's Examination read.

"He said, Kemish brought him a Letter
"from Raleigh, and that part which was "concerning the Lords of the Council, was "sent out; the Letter contained, that he "was examined and cleared himself of all;
"and that the Lord H. Howard said, be"cause he was discontent, he was fit to be in "the Action. And further, that Kemish
"said to him from Raleigh, that he should "be of good Comfort, for one Witness could "not condemn a Man for Treason."

Lord Cecil. Cobham was ask'd, whether,
and when he heard from you? he said,
Every Day.

Raleigh. Kemish added more, I never bad him speak those Words.

Nota. Mr. Attorney here offered to interrupt him.

Lord Cecil. It is his last Discourse. Give him leave, Mr. Attorney.

Raleigh. I am accused concerning Arabel- la, concerning Money out of Spain. My Lord Chief Justice faith, a Man may be condemned with one Witness, yea, without any Witness. Cobham is guilty of many things, Conscientia mille Testes; he hath accused himself, what can he hope for but mercy? My Lords vouchsafe me this Grace.

Let him be brought, being alive, and in the House; let him avouch any of these things, I will confess the whole Indictment, and renounce the King's Mercy.

Lord Cecil. Here hath been a touch of the Lady Arabella Stuart, a near Kinwoman of the Kings. Let us not scandal the innocent by confusion of Speech: She is as innocent of all these things as I, or any Man here; only she received a Letter from my Lord Cobham, to prepare her; which she laught at, and immediately sent it to the King.
So far was she from Discontentment that she laught him to scorn. But you see how far the Count of Aremberg did consent.

The Lord Admiral (Nottingham) being by in a Standing, with the Lady Arabella, spake to the Court.

The Lady doth here protest upon her Salvation, that she never dealt in any of these things; and so she willed me to tell the Court.

Lord Cecil. The Lord Cobham wrote to my Lady Arabella, to know if he might come to speak with her, and gave her to understand, that there were some about the King, that laboured to disgrace her; she doubted it was but a Trick. But Brook faith, his Brother moved him to procure Arabella to write Letters to the King of Spain; but he faith, he never did it.

Raleigh. The Lord Cobham hath accused me, you see in what manner he hath for-sworn it. Were it not for his Accusation, all this were nothing. Let him be asked, if I knew of the Letter which Lawrence brought to him from Aremberg. Let me speak for my Life, it can be no hurt for him to be brought; he dares not accuse me. If you grant me not this Favour, I am strangely used. Campion was not denied to have his Accusers face to face.

Lord Chief Justice. Since he must needs have Justice, the Acquitting of his old Friend may move him to speak otherwise than the Truth.

Raleigh. If I had been the Infuser of all these Treasons into him. You Gentlemen of the Jury, mark this, he said I have been the Cause of all his Miseries, and the Destruction of his House, and that all Evil hath happened unto him; by my wicked counsel. If this be true, whom hath he cause to accuse, and to be revenged on, but on me? And I know him to be as revengefull as any man on Earth.

Attorney. He is a Party, and may not come; the Law is against it.

Raleigh. It is a Toy to tell me of Law.
I defie such Law, I stand on the Fact.

Lord Cecil. I am afraid my often speaking (who am inferior to my Lords here present) will make the World think I delight to hear my self talk. My Affection to you, Sir Walter Raleigh, was not extinguished, but slack'd in regard of your desires. You know the Law of the Realm (to which your mind doth not consent) that my Lord Cobham cannot be brought.

Raleigh. He may be, my Lord.

Lord Cecil. But dare you challenge it?

Raleigh. No.

L. Cecil. You say that my Lord Cobham, your main Accuser, must come to accuse
you. You say, he hath retract'd: I say, many particulars are not retract'd. What the Validity of all this is, is merely left to the Jury. Let me ask you this, If my Lord Cobham will say you were the only Infigitor

stigator of him to proceed in the Treasons, dare you put your self on this?

Raleigh. If he will speak it before God and the King, that ever I knew of Arabella's Matter, or the Money out of Spain, or of the surprising Treason; I put my self on it. God's Will and the King's be done with me.

Lord H. Howard. How if he speak things equivalent to that you have said.

Raleigh. Yes in the main Point.

Lord Cecil. If he say, you have been the Initiator of him to deal with the Spanish King, had not the Council cause to draw you hither?

Raleigh. I put my self on it.

Lord Cecil. Then Sir Walter Raleigh, call upon God, and prepare your self; for I do verily believe my Lords will prove this. Excepting your faults (I call them no worse) by God I am your Friend. The Hear and Passion in you, and the Attorney's Zeal in the King's Service makes me speak this.

Raleigh. Whosoever is the Workman, it is reason he should give account of his Work to the Work-master. But let it be proved that he acquainted me with any of his Conferences with Aremberg; he would surely have given me some account.

L. Cecil. That follows not. If I set you on work, and you give me no account, am I therefore innocent?

Attorney. For the Lady Arabella, I said she was never acquainted with the matter. Now that Raleigh had Conference in all these Treasons, it is manifest; The Jury hath heard the matter. There is one Dyer, a Pilot, that being in Lisbon, met with a Portugal Gentleman, who ask'd him if the King of England was Crown'd yet? To whom he answered, I think not yet, but he shall be shortly. Nay, saith the Portugal, that shall never be, for his Throat will be cut by Don Raleigh and Don Cobham before he be Crowned.

Dyer was called and sworn, and delivered this Evidence.

Dyer. I came to a Merchants House in Lisbon, to see a Boy that I had there; there came a Gentleman into the House, and enquiring what Countryman I was? I said, an Englishman. Whereupon he asked me, if the King was crowned? And I answered, No, but that I hoped he should be shortly. Nay, saith he, he shall never be Crowned; for Don Raleigh and Don Cobham will cut his Throat ere that day come.

Raleigh. What infer you upon this?

Attorney. That your Treason hath wings.

Raleigh. If Cobham did practise with Aremberg, how could it not but be known in Spain? Why did they name the Duke of Buckingham with Jack Straw's Treason, and the Duke of Tork with Jack Cade, but that it was to countenance his Treason.

Consider you Gentlemen of the Jury, there is no Cause so doubtful which the Kings Council cannot make good against the Law. Consider my Disability, and their Ability: They prove nothing against me, only they bring the Accusation of my Lord Cobham, which he hath lamented and repented as heartily, as if it had been for an horrible Murder for he knew that all this Sorrow which should come to me, is by his means. Presumptions must proceed from precedent or subsequent Facts. I have spent 40000 Crowns against the Spaniard. I had not purchased 40 Pound a Year. If I had died in Guiana, I had not left 300 Marks a Year to my Wife and Son. I that have always condemned the Spanish Faction, methinks it is a strange thing that now I should affect it! Remember what S. Austin says, Sic judicate tanquam ab alio mox judicandi, unus Judex, unus Tribunal. If you would be contented on Presumptions to be delivered up to be slaughtered, to have your Wives and Children turned into the Streets to beg their Bread; If you would be contented to be so judged, judge so of me.

Serj. Philips. I hope to make this so clear as that the Wit of Man shall have no Colour to answer it. The Matter is Treason in the highest Degree, the end to deprive the King of his Crown. The particular Treasons are these: First, To raise up Rebellion, and, to effect that, to procure Money to raise up Tumults in Scotland, by divulging a Treasonable Book against the Kings Right to the Crown; the Purpose, to take away the Life of his Majesty and his Issue. My Lord Cobham confesseth Sir Walter Raleigh to be guilty of all these Treasons. The Question is, Whether he be guilty as joining with him, or intigating of him? The Course to prove this was by my Lord Cobham's Accusation. If that be true, he is guilty; if not, he is clear. So whether Cobham lay true, or Raleigh? that is the Question. Raleigh hath no Answer, but the Shadow of as much Wit, as the Wit of Man can devise. He useth his Denial; the Denial of a Defendant must not move the Jury. In the Star-Chamber, or in the Chancery, for matter of Title, if the Defendant be called in Question, his Denial on his Oath is no Evidence to the Court to clear him, he doth it in propria causa; therefore much less in matters of Treason. Cobham's Testification against him before then, and since, hath been largely discountred.

Raleigh. If Truth be constant, and Constancy be in Truth, why hath he forsworn that that he hath said? You have not proved any one thing against me by by direct Proofs, but all by Circumstances. Attorney. Have you done? The King must have the last.

Raleigh. Nay, Mr. Attorney, he which speaketh for his Life, must speak last. False Repetitions and Mistakings must not mar my Cause. You should speak secundum allegata & probata. I appeal to God and the King in this Point, whether Cobham's Accusation be sufficient to condemn me?

Attorney. The Kings Safety and your Clearing cannot agree. I protest before God, I never knew a clearer Treason.

Raleigh. I never had intelligence with Cobham since I came to the Tower.

Attorney. Go to, I will lay thee upon thy Back, for the confidentest Traytor that ever came at a Bar. Why should you take 8000 Crowns for a Peace?

Lord Cecil. Be not so impatient good Mr. Attorney, give him leave to speak.

Attorney. If I may not be patiently heard, you will encourage Traytors, and discourage us. I am the King's sworn Servant, and must speak: If he be guilty, he is a Traytor; if not, deliver him.

Nota. Here Mr. Attorney sat down in a Chaise, and would speak no more, until the Commissioners urged and intreated him. After much ado he went on, and made a long Repetition of all the Evidence, for the direction of the Jury; and as the repeating of some things Sir Walter Raleigh interrupted him, and said, He did him wrong.

Attorney. Thou art the most vile and execrable Traytor that ever lived.

Raleigh. You speak indifferently, barbarously and uncivilly.

Attorney. I want words sufficient to express thy viperous Treasons.

Raleigh. I think you want words indeed, for you have spoken one thing half a dozen times.

Attorney. Thou art an odious Fellow, thy Name is hateful to all the Realm of England for thy Pride.

Raleigh. It will go near to prove a measuring Cast between you and me, Mr. Attorney.

Attorney. Well, I will now make it appear to the World, that there never lived a viler Viper upon the face of the Earth than thou, and therewithal he drew a Letter out of his Pocket, saying further, My Lords, you shall see, this is an Agent that hath writ a Treatise against the Spaniard, and hath ever so detested him; this is he that hath spent so much money against him in service; and yet you shall all see whether his Heart be not wholly Spanish. The Lord Cobham, who of his own nature was a good and honourable Gentleman, till overtaken by this Wretch, now finding his Conscience heavily burthened with some Courses which the Subtily of this Traytor had drawn him into, my Lords, he could be at no rest with himself, nor quiet in his thoughts, until he was eased of that heavy weight; out of which Rallion of his Mind, and discharge of his Duty to his Prince, and his Conscience to God; taking it upon his Salvation that he wrote nothing but the Truth, with his own hands he wrote this Letter. Now Sir you shall see whether you had intelligence with Cobham, within four days before he came to the Tower. If he be wholly Spanish, that desired a Pension of 1500 Pound a Year from Spain, that Spain by him might have intelligence, then Raleigh is a Traytor. He hath taken an Apple, and pinned a Letter unto it, and threw it into my Lord Cobham's Window; the Contents whereof were this, It is doubtful, whether we shall be proceeded with or no, perhaps you shall not be tried. This was to get a Retraction. Oh! it was Adam's Apple, whereby the Devil did deceive him. Further he wrote thus, Do not as my Lord of Essex did; take heed of a Preacher; for by his persuasion he confessed, and made himself guilty. I doubt not but this day God shall have as great a Conquest by this Traytor, and the Son of God shall be as much glorified, as when it was said, Viciisti Galilee; you know my meaning. What though Cobham retracted, yet he could not rest nor sleep till he confirmed it again. If this be not enough to prove him a Traytor, the King my Master shall not live three years to an end.

Nota. Here Mr. Attorney produced the Lord Cobham's Letter, and as he read it, inserted some speeches.

I have thought fit to set down this to my Lords, wherein I protest on my Soul to write nothing but the truth. I am now come near the period of my time, therefore I confess the whole Truth before God, and his Angels. Raleigh, four days before I came from the Tower, caused an Apple (Eves Apple) to be thrown in at my Chamber Window; the effect of it was to entreat me to right the wrong that I had done him, in laying, that I should have come home by Jerley; which under my hand to him I have retracted. His first Letter I answered not, which was thrown in the same manner, wherein he prayed me to write him a Letter, which I did. He sent me word that the Judges met at Mr. Attorney's House, and that there was good hope the Proceedings against us should be stayed; He sent me another time a little Tobacco. At Aremberg's coming, Raleigh was to have procured a Pension of fifteen hundred Pounds a Year; for which he promised that no Action should be against Spain, the Low Countries, or the Indies, but he would give knowledge before-hand. He told me the States had Audience with the King. (Attorney. Ah! is not this a Spanish Heart in an English Body?) He hath been the Original Cause of my Ruine; for I had no dealing with Arenberg, but by his instigation. He hath also been the cause of my Discontentment; he advised me not to be overtaken with Preachers, as Essex was; and that the King would better allow of a constant denial, than to accuse any.

Attorney. Oh damnable Atheist! he hath learned some Text of Scripture to serve his own purpose, but falsely alledged. He counsels him not to be counselled by Preachers, as Essex was: He died the Child of God, God honoured him at his death; thou wast by when he died. Et Lupus et rapaces instant morientibus Ursa. He died indeed for his Offence. The King himself spake these words; He that shall say Essex died not for Treason is punishable.

Raleigh. You have heard a strange Tale of a strange Man. Now he thinks, he hath matter enough to destroy me; but the King, and all of you shall witness, by our Deaths, which of us was the ruine of the other. I bid a poor Fellow throw in the Letter at his Window, written to this purpose, You know you have undone me: now write three Lines to justify me. In this I will die, that he hath done me wrong: Why did not he acquaint me with his Treasons, if I acquainted him with my Dispositions?

Lord Chief Justice. But what say you now of the rest of the Letter, and the Pension of 1500 l. per annum?

Raleigh. I say that Cobham is a base dishonourable poor Soul.

Attorney. Is he base? I return it into thy Throat, on his behalf: But for thee, he had been a good Subject.

Lord Chief Justice. I perceive you are not so clear a Man, as you have protested all this while; for you should have discovered these matters to the King.

Nota. Here Raleigh pulled a Letter out of his Pocket, which the Lord Cobham had written to him, and desired my Lord Cecil to read it, because he only knew his hand; the Effect of it was as followeth.

Cobham's Letter of Justification to Raleigh

'Seeing my self so near my End, for the discharge of my own Conscience; and freeing my self from your Bood, which else will cry Vengeance against me: I protest upon my Salvation, I never practised with Spain by your procurement; God so comfort me in this my Affliction, as you are a true Subject for any thing that I know. I will say as Daniel, Purus sum à sanguine hujus. So God have mercy on my Soul, as I know no Treason by you.

Raleigh. Now I wonder how many Souls this Man hath! he damns one in this Letter, and another in that.

Here was much ado. Mr. Attorney alledged that his last Letter was politically and cunningly urged from the Lord Cobham, and that the first was simply the Truth; and that lest it should seem doubtful that the first Letter was drawn from my Lord Cobham by promise of mercy, or hope of favour, the Lord Chief Justice willed that the Jury might herein be satisfied.

Whereupon the Earl of Devonshire delivered that the same was not voluntary, and not extracted from the Lord Cobham upon any hopes or promise of Pardon.

Nota. This was the last Evidence: whereupon a Martyr was sworn to keep the Jury private. The Jury departed, and staid not a quarter of an hour, but returned; and gave their Verdict, Guilty.

Serj. Heale demanded Judgment against the Prisoner.

Clerk of the Crown. Sir Walter Raleigh, Thou hast been indicted, arraigned, and pleaded not Guilty, for all these several Treasons, and for trayal thereof hast put thy self upon thy Country; which Country are these, who have found thee guilty. What canst thou say for thy self, why Judgment and Execution of Death should not pass against thee?

Raleigh. My Lords, the Jury have found me Guilty. They must do as they are directed. I can say nothing why Judgment should not proceed. You see whereof Cobham hath accused me. You remember his Protestations, that I was never guilty. I desire the King should know of the Wrongs done unto me since I came hither.

Lord Chief Justice. You have had no wrong, Sir Walter.

Raleigh. Yes, of Mr. Attorney. I desire my Lords to remember three things to the King. 1. I was accused to be a Practiser with Spain. I never knew that my Lord Cobham meant to go thither; I will ask no mercy mercy at the Kings hands if he will affirm it. 2. I never knew of the practice with Arabella. 3. I never knew of my Lord Cobham's practice with Arenberg, nor of the surprising Treason.

Lord Ch. Justice. In my Conscience I am perswaded that Cobham hath accused you truly. You cannot deny but that you were dealt with to have a Pension to be a Spy for Spain; therefore you are not so true to the King as you have protested your self to be.

Raleigh. I submit my self to the King's Mercy; I know his Mercy is greater than my Offence. I recommend my Wife, and Son of tender years, unbrought up, to his Compassion.

Lord Chief Justice. I had thought I should never have seen this Day, to have flood in this place to give Sentence of Death against you; because I thought it impossible, that one of so great Parts should have fallen so grievously.

God hath bestowed on you many Benefits. You had been a Man fit and able to have served the King in good Place. You had brought your self into a good State of living, if you had entered into a good Consideration of your Estate, and not suffered your own Wit to have entrapped your self, you might have lived in good comfort. It is best for Man not to seek to climb too high, lest he fall; nor yet to creep too low, lest he be trodden on. It was the Policy of the wisest and greatest Counsellor of our time in England, Lucretius, Lucretius mediocria firma locum. You might have lived well with 3000 Pound a Year, for so I have heard your Revenues to be. I know nothing might move you to be discontented; but if you had been down, you know Fortunes Wheel, when it is turned about, riseth again. I never heard that the King took away any thing from you, but the Captainship of the Guard, which he did with very good Reason, to have one of his own knowledge, whom he might trust, in that Place. You have been taken for a wife Man, and so have shewed Wit enough this Day. Again, for Monopolies for Wine, &c. If the King had said, it is a matter that offends my People, should I burthen them for your private Good? I think you could not well take it hardly, that his Subjects were eased, though by your private hindrance. Two Vices have lodged chiefly in you; one is an eager Ambition, the other corrupt Covetousness. Ambition in desiring to be advanced to equal Grace and Favour, as you have been before-time; that Grace you had then you got not in a Day or Year. For your Covetousness, I am sorry to hear that a Gentleman of your Wealth should become a base Spy for the Enemy, which is the vilest of all other; wherein on my Conscience Cobham hath said true: by it you would have increased your Living 1500 Pound a Year. This Covetousness is like a Canker, that eats the Iron Place where it lives. Your Canker being thus, let it not grieve you, if I speak a little out of zeal, and love to your good. You have been taxed by the World, with the Defence of the most Heathenish and Blasphemous opinions, which I lift not to repeat, because Christian Ears cannot endure to hear them, nor the Authors and Maintainers of them suffered to live in any Christian Common-Wealth. You know what Men said of Harpool. You shall do well before you go out of the World to give satisfaction therein, and not to die with these Imputations on you. Let not any Devil persuade you to think there is no Eternity in Heaven: for if you think thus, you shall find Eternity in Hell-Fire. In the first Accusation of my Lord Cobham, I observed his manner of speaking; I protest before the living God, I am perswaded he spoke nothing but the Truth. You wrote that he should not in any case confess any thing to a Preacher, telling him an Example of my Lord of Essex, that noble Earl that is gone; who if he had not been carried away with others, had lived in Honour to this day among us. He confessed his Offences, and obtained Mercy of the Lord, for I am verily perswaded in my Heart, he died a worthy Servant of God. Your conceit of not confessing any thing is very inhumane and wicked. In this World is the time of Confessing, that we may be absolved at the Day of Judgment. You have shewed a fearful sign of denying God, in advising a Man not to confess the Truth. It now comes in my mind, why you may not have your Accuser come face to face: for such an one is easily brought to retract, when he seeth there is no hope of his own Life. It is dangerous that any Traytors should have any Access to, or Conference with one another; when they see themselves must die, they will think it best to have their Fellow live, that he may commit the like Treason again, and so in some sort seek Revenge.

Now it resteth to pronounce the Judgment, which I wish you had not been this day to have received of me: For if the fear of God in you had been answerable to your other great Parts, you might have lived to have been a singular good Subject. I never saw the like Trial, and hope I shall never see the like again.

The Judgment.

But since you have been found guilty of these horrible Treasons, the Judgment of this Court is, That you shall be had from hence to the Place whence you came, there to remain 'till the day of Execution; and from thence you shall be drawn upon a Hurdle through the open Streets to the place of Execution, there to be hanged and cut down alive, and your Body shall be opened, your Heart and Bowels plucked out, and your Privy Members cut off, and thrown into the fire before your Eyes; then your Head to be stricken off from your Body, and your Body shall be divided into four Quarters, to be disposed of at the King's Pleasure: And

God have Mercy upon your Soul.

Sir Walter Raleigh beought the Earl of Devonshire, and the Lords to be Suitors on his behalf to the King; that in regard of Places of Estimation he did bear in his Majesties time, the Rigour of his Judgment might be qualified, and his Death honourable, and not ignominious.

Wherein after he had promised him to do their utmost Endeavours, the Court rose, and the Prisoner was carried up again to the Castle.

Here follows the Continuation of the Life.

IT was observed, that before the Lords (principally to my Lord Cecil) at Winchester (for there he was tried, the Sickness then reigning in London) he was humble, but not prostrate; dutiful, but not deject: For in some cases he would humbly thank them for gracious Speeches; in others acknowledge that their Honours said true, as in relating some Circumstances. And in such points wherein he would not yield unto them, he would crave pardon, and with reverence urge them, and answer them as in points of Law, or essential matters of Fact. To the Jury he was affable, but not fawning; hoping, but not trusting in them; carefully perswading them with Reason, not diffidently importuning them with Conjunction; rather shewing love of Life, than fear of Death. What made ill for Sir Walter was his Discovery of Lawrence and Cobham's frequent private Conferences; which so incensed Cobham, that he positively accused him: though the single Evidence of one already convicted of what Sir Walter was but yet impeached, could only make a Circumstance, and not convict him. The Judges and the King's Counsel did what they could to bawl him out of his Life; and since they wanted Proof, they would endeavour to tire him out. If we may believe Osborn, several of the Jurymen, after he was cast, were so far touch'd in Conscience as to ask of him pardon on their Knees.

A further Confirmation of his Innocency may be a Passage of his own in a Letter to Secretary Winwood, wherein he tells him, 'That the worthy Prince of Wales was extream curious in searching out the nature of his Offences. The Queens Majesty had informed her self from the beginning. The King of Denmark at both times of his being here, was thoroughly fatished of his Innocency; they would otherwise never have moved his Majesty on his behalf. The Wife, the Brother, and the Son of a King do not use to sue for Men suspect. Nay, further yet, the Scots themselves declar'd in favour of him; if we may believe him in another Letter of his to Sir Robert Carr, after Earl of Somerset, wherein are these words: 'I have ever been bound to your Nation, as well for many other Graces, as for the true Report of my Trial to the King's Majesty, against whom had I been malignant, the hearing of my Cause could not have changed Enemies into Friends, Malice into Compassion, and the Minds of the greatest number then present into Commiseration of mine Estate: It is not the nature of foul Treason to beget such fair Passions; neither could it agree with the duty and love of faithful Subjects (especially of your Nation) to bewail his Overthrow that had conspired against their most natural and liberal Lord.

Two days after Raleigh's Trial, were sentenced Brook, who pretended his intention was only to try faithful Subjects, and said he had a Commission for so doing, but produc'd it not; Markham, who confest the Indictment, pleaded Discontent, and desired Mercy; Watson, who confest he drew them all in, holding the King to be no Sovereign till he were crown'd, instancing in Saul and Jeroboam; And Clark,

Clark, who said the like. Parham and Brookshire were acquitted by the Jury; Watson, Clark, and Brook were executed; Markham, Cobham, and Grey brought severally on the Scaffold to dye, and at the instant on the Block, had their particular Executions remitted, by a Letter to the Sheriff under the King's own Hand, without the knowledge of any, save Mr. Gibbs, Gentleman of the Bedchamber, that brought it. However an evil Fate did attend these Men; Grey died in the Tower, the last of his Line; the rest were dishonour'd but died miserably poor: Markham and some others abroad; but Cobham (as Osborn tells us) in a Room ascend'd by a Ladder, at a poor Woman's House in the Minories (formerly his Landress) died rather of hunger than a natural disease.

Sir Walter was left to his Majesties Mercy, who thought him too great a Malecontent to have his Freedom, and probably too Innocent to lose his Life. Therefore in the Tower he is confin'd, but permitted to enjoy Libera Custodia; where he improv'd his Imprisonment to the greatest advantage of Learning and Inquisitive Men. Since his Majesty had civilly buried him, and as it were banish'd him this World, he thought it no Treason to disturb the Affairs of former times, and bring to view the Actions of deceased Heroes. And certainly none was so fit to comment on their Achievements, and so able to raise excellent Maxims from them, as he who had been brought up in so wife a Court as Queen Elizabeth's, and read so many wife Men. After some time past there, he was deliver'd of that great Minerva, the History of the World; a Book which for the Exactness of its Chronology, Curiousness of its Contexture and Learning of all Sorts, seems to be the Work of an Age. An History which never yet met with a Detractor, and was the Envy, if some Authors may be credited, of King James himself, who thought none could out-do him at the Pen. That a Man who had been the greatest part of his life taken up in Action, should write so judiciously, so critically of Times and Actions, is as great a Wonder as the Book it self. It still remains a Dispute whether the Age he lived in was more oblig'd to his Pen or his Sword, the one being buile in conquering the New, the other in so bravely describing the Old World. An History wherein the only fault, or defect rather, is, that it wanteth one half thereof; which was occasion'd, as our Story tells us, thus: Some few days before he suffered, he sent for Mr. Walter Barr, who formerly Printed his first Volum: of the History of the World, whom taking by the Hand, after some other Discourse, he ask'd how it had fild? Mr. Barr return'd this Answer, I told so slowly that it had undone him. At which words of his Sir Walter stepping to his Desk, reaches his other unprinted Part of his History, which he had brought down to the Times he lived in, and clapping his hands upon his breast, said with a sigh, Alas, my Friend, hath the first Part undone thee? the second Part shall undo no more; this ungrateful World is unworthy of it: and immediately going to the Fire-side, threw it in, and set his foot upon it till it was consumed. As great a loss to Learning as Christendom could have sustain'd; the greater, because it could be repaired by no hand but his. It often happening to Authors, as to great Masters in Painting, their Pieces are not valued till they are dead, and the succeeding Age find the Originals inimitable.

Whilst Sir Walter was thus confin'd, Death took away his and Effes's mortal Enemy, Sir Robert Cecil, after Earl of Salisbury, who had purchased the monopoly of Favour, and being jealous of Sir Walter's Parts, had some fear he might supplant him; which was the Cause, according to Osborn, that he was brought to the aforementioned Trial. However Sir Walter outlived his Enemies designs and hatred, and for all his kindness bestowed upon him the following Epitaph, which I am upon very good grounds assur'd to be his. King James was so much taken with the smartness of it, that he hoped the Author would die before him. The Verses are these:

*Here lies Hobnail, our Pastor while here,
That once in a quarter our flocks did shear.
To please us, his Car he kept under clogg,
And was ever after both Shepherd and Dog.
For Oblation to Pan his Custom was thus,
He first gave a trifle, then offer'd up us.
And through his false Worship such pow'r he did gain,
As kept him 'till o' his Mountain, and us on the Plain:
Where many a Hornpipe he tun'd to his Phillis,
And sweetly sung Walsingham to's Amarillis;
Till Atropos clapt him, a Pox on the Drab,
For spite of his Tar-box he dy'd of the Scab.*

If the Reader desires a Key to these Verses, he may meet with it in Osborn's Memoires, who yet for all his Intelligence hath not inform'd us that his Mistress's name was Walsingham.

Fourteen Years Sir Walter had spent in the Tower, and being weary of a state wherein he could be only servicable by his Pen, but not in a capacity of serving and enriching his Country any other way (of whom Prince Henry would say, that no King but his Father would keep such a Bird in a Cage;) At length he fell upon an Enterprize of a Golden Mine in Guiana in the Southern parts of America. The Proposition of this was presented and recommended to his Majesty by Sir Ralph Winwood the Secretary of State, as a Matter not in the Air, or Speculative, but Real, and of certainty: for that Sir Walter had seen of the Ore of the Mine, and tried the richness of it, having gotten a pound from thence by the hands of Captain Kemish his ancient Servant.

Sir Ralph Winwood's Recommendations of the Design, and the earnest Solicitations for his Enlargement, of the Queen, the Prince, and the French Lieger (with much affection to his Defects, not without some Politick Designs on Spain) together with the Asseverations of Sir Walter of the truth of the Mine, work'd upon his Majesty, who thought himself in Honour obliged, nay in a manner engaged (as the Declaration which he published after the Death of Sir Walter tells us) not to deny unto his People the Adventure and Hope of so great Riches to be fought and achieved at the Charge of Volunteers, especially since it stood so well with his Majesties Politick and Magnanimous Courses, in these his flourishing Times of Peace, to nourish and encourage Noble and Generous Enterprizes for Plantations, Discoveries, and opening of a new Trade.

Count Gondamor (an active and subtle Instrument to serve his Master's ends) took Allarm at this, and represented to his Majesty the Enterprize of Sir Walter to be hostile, and predatory, intending a breach of the Peace between the two Crowns. But notwithstanding; Power at last is granted to Sir Walter to set forth Ships and Men for that Service. However, the King commanded him upon pain of his Allegiance to give him under his Hand (promising on the word of a King to keep it secret) the number of his Men; the burthen and strength of his Ships; together with the Country and River which he was to enter; which being done accordingly by Sir Walter, that very Original Paper was found in the Spanish Governours Closet at St. Thomas. So active were the Spanish Ministers, that Advertisement was sent to Spain, and thence to the Indies, before the English Fleet got out of the Thames.

But as we have just Cause to admire the more than usual Activity of the Spanish Agents, so may we wonder no less at the Mis carriage of his Majesties present Ministers, who notwithstanding he had past his Royal Word to the contrary, yet they did help Count Gondamor to that very Paper; So much both King and Court were at Gondamor's service.

A Commission indeed is granted, but by Gondamor's means is limited; that the Fleet should commit no Outrages upon the King of Spain's Subjects by Land, unless they began first; with other limitations in the Commission, which for the Readers Curiosity and Satisfaction I have here inserted.

James

JAMES, by the Grace of GOD, &c. To all to whom these presents shall come, to be read, heard, or seen, and in charge of them greeting: Whereas Sir Walter Raleigh, Knight, intended to undertake a Voyage by Sea and Shipping, upon the South parts of America, or elsewhither within America, possessed and inhabited by Heathen and Savage People: to the end, to discover and find out some Commodities and Merchandizes in those Countries, that be necessary and profitable for the Subjects of these Our Kingdoms and Dominions, whereof the Inhabitants there make little or no use: and to have thereupon allowance by Trade and Commerce, some propagation of the Christian Faith, and to reform Religion amongst those Savage and Idolatrous People: And whereas we are credibly informed, that there are divers Merchants and owners of Ships, and others, well disposed to assist the said Sir Walter Raleigh in this his Enterprize, had they sufficient Assurance to enjoy their due parts of the Profits returned (in respect of the Peril of Law wherein the said Sir Walter Raleigh now standeth:) And whereas also we are informed, that divers other Gentlemen, the Kinsmen and Friends of the said Sir Walter Raleigh, and divers Captains and other Commanders, are also desirous to follow him, and to adventure their Lives with him in this his Journey, so as they might be commanded by no other than himself.

Know ye, that we, upon deliberate Consideration had of the Premises, being desirous by all ways and means to seek and procure the benefit and good of Our loving Subjects, and to give our Princely furtherance to the said Sir Walter Raleigh, his Friends and Associates herein, to the Intouragement of others in the like laudable Journeys and Enterprizes, to be hereafter prosecuted and pursued; and especially in advancement and furtherance, as well of the Conversion of Savage People, as of the increase of Trade, Traffique, and Merchandizes used by Our Subjects of this Our Kingdom, being most famous throughout all Nations: Of Our special Grace, certain knowledge, and meer motion, have given and granted, and by these Presents for Us, Our Heirs, and Successors, do give and grant unto the said Sir Walter Raleigh, full Power and Authority, and free Licence and Liberty out of this our Realm of England, or any other Our Dominions, to have, carry, take, and lead for and towards his said intended Voyage unto the said South parts, or other parts of America, (possessed and inhabited, as aforesaid) and to Travel thither, all such, and so many of Our loving Subjects, or any other Strangers that will become Our loving Subjects, and live under Our Obedience and Allegiance, as shall willingly accompany him, with sufficient Shipping, Armour, Weapons, Ordnance, Munition, Powder, Shot, Habillments, Cloaths, and such Wares and Merchandizes, as are esteemed by the wild People in those parts, Clothing, Implements, Furniture, Cattle, Horses, and Wares, and all other such things as he shall think most necessary for his Voyage, and for the use and defence of him and his Company, and Trade with the People there; and in passing and returning to and fro, and in those parts, to give away, Sell, Barter, Exchange, or otherwise dispose of the same Goods, Merchandizes, and Wares, to the most benefit, and at the will and pleasure of the said Sir Walter Raleigh and his Company, and such other Person, or Persons, as shall be Adventurers or Assistants with, or unto him in this his intended Voyage, and from thence to Return, Import, Convey, and bring in to this Our Kingdom, or any other Our Dominions, such Gold, Silver, Bullion, or any other Wares, or Merchandizes, or Commodities whatsoever, as they shall think most fit and convenient and the same being so Returned, Imported, Conveyed, and Brought into this Our Kingdom, or any other Our Dominions, to have, take, keep, retain, and convert to the only proper Use, Benefit, and Repose of the said Sir Walter Raleigh, and his said Company, and other Persons Adventurers and Assistants with, or to him in his Voyage, without the Lett, Interruption, molestation, or Disturbance of Us, Our Heirs, or Successors, or any the Officers, or Ministers of Us, Our Heirs, or Successors whatsoever: Paying and Answering unto Us, Our Heirs, and Successors, the full fifth part, in five parts to be divided, of all such Gold, and Silver, and Bullion, and Ore of Gold, or Silver, and Pearl, and precious Stones, as shall be Imported over and besides; and together with such Customs, Subsidies, and other Duties, as shall be due for, or in respect of any other Goods, Wares, or Merchandizes whatsoever to be so Imported by the true meaning of these

Prefens

Presents. And to the end the said Sir Walter Raleigh may be the more encouraged to go forward in this his Enterprise, and all our loving Subjects desirous to be Adventurers with him, or Assistant unto him, may be the more incited to further his Proceedings: We do hereby in verbo Regio, for Us, Our heirs and Successors, Covenants, Promises, and Grants, to and with the said Sir Walter Raleigh, and all other Persons that shall accompany him, or to be attendant upon him, or to be Adventurers or Assistants with, or to him in this his Voyage, that no Gold, Silver, Goods, Wares, or Merchandises whatsoever, of what kind or sort soever, by him or them, or any of them to be imported into this our Kingdom of England, or any other our Dominions, from any the said South, or other parts of America, (Possessed or Inhabited, as aforesaid) shall be attached, seized, or taken by Us, Our heirs or Successors, or to the use of Us, Our heirs or Successors; or by any the Officers or Ministers of Us, Our heirs or Successors whatsoever; But that the same, and every of them (the fifth part of the said Gold, Silver, or Bullion, and Ore of Gold and Silver, and other the Customs and Duties aforesaid, being truly answered and payed) shall be, and remain to the sole and proper use and behoof of the said Sir Walter Raleigh, and his said Company, and such Persons as shall be Adventurers with him, or Assistant to him in this his Voyage; any Law, Statute, Act of Parliament, Proclamation, Provision, or Restraint, or any Right, Title, or Claim of Us, Our heirs or Successors, or any other matter or thing whatsoever to the contrary in any wise notwithstanding. And further, of our more especial Grace, certain Knowledge; and mer Bottom, We do hereby for Us, Our heirs and Successors, ordain, constitute and appoint the said Sir Walter Raleigh to be the sole Governour and Commander of all Persons that shall travel, or be with him in the said Voyage, to the said South, or other parts of America, (so possessed and inhabited as aforesaid) or in returning from thence. And we do hereby give unto him full Power and Authority to Coerce, Punish, Pardon, Govern, and Rule them, or any of them, according to such Orders, Ordinances, Constitutions, Directions, and Instructions, as by the said Sir Walter Raleigh shall be from time to time Established, aswell in cases Capital and Criminal, as Civil, both Parine and other; So always as the said Statutes, Ordinances, and Proceedings (as near as conveniently may be) be agreeable to the Laws, Statutes, Government and Policy of this our Realm of England; and not against the true Christian Faith now professed in the Church of England. And because that in such and the like Enterprises and Voyages, great Inconveniences have grown by the mutinous and unruly carriage of the Mariners and Seamen employed in the same, for want of sufficient Authority to punish them according to their Offences; We do therefore by these Presents, give full Power and Authority to the said Sir Walter Raleigh, in case of Rebellion or Mutiny by Sea or Land, to use and exercise Martial Law (upon just ground and apparent necessity) in as large and ample manner as our Lieutenant General by Sea or Land, or our Lieutenants in our Counties, within our Realm of England, have had, or ought to have by force of their Commission of Lieutenantcy. And we do further by these Presents; give full Power and Authority to the said Sir Walter Raleigh, to Collect, Dominate and Appoint such Captains, and other inferior Commanders and Ministers under him; as shall be requisite for the better governing and governing of his Company; and the good of the Voyage. And further, We do by these Presents, for Us, Our heirs and Successors, straightly Charge and Command the Warden of our Cinque Ports, and all the Customers, Comptrollers, Surbepers, Searchers, Waiters, and other Officers and Ministers of Us, Our heirs and Successors, for the time being, that they and every of them do quietly permit and suffer the said Sir Walter Raleigh, and all Person and Persons that shall be willing to Travel and Adventure with him in this Voyage with their Ships, Munition, Goods, Wares, and Merchandises whatsoever out of this our Realm, or any other our Dominions, to pass into the said South or other parts of America, (Possessed and Inhabited as aforesaid) and from thence to return and import into this our Realm, or any other our Dominions, any Goods, Wares, or Merchandises whatsoever, and there to Sell, or otherwise dispose of the same, to the best benefit and advantage, and to the only use and behoof of the said Sir Walter Raleigh, and his Company, and such other Persons as shall be Adventurers with him in this Voyage; paying ing the fifth part of all Gold, and Silver, and Bullion, and Ore of Gold, and Silver, and of Pearl, and precious Stones imported, and other the Customs and Duties aforesaid. And these Presents, or the Inrolment thereof, shall be unto the said Wardens of the Cinque Ports, Customers, Comptrollers, and other the Officers and Ministers aforesaid, for the time being, a sufficient Warrant and Discharge in that behalf. And our Will and Pleasure is; And by these Presents, for Us, Our heirs and Successors, We do grant unto the said Sir Walter Raleigh, that these our Letters Patents, or the Inrolment thereof, and all and singular Grants, Clauses, and things therein contained, shall be firm, strong, sufficient, and effectual in Law, according to our gracious Pleasure and Meaning herein expressed; Any Law, Statute, Act, Prohibition, Ordinance, or Restraint, or any other Matter or Thing to the contrary thereof in any wise notwithstanding. Although express mention, &c. in Writings whereof, &c. Witness our Self at Westminster the six and twentieth Day of August, in the fourteenth Year of our Reign of England, France, and Ireland, and of Scotland the sixtieth.

Per breve de privato Sigillo.

With this Commission, and the Company of several brave Captains, and other Knights and Gentlemen of great Blood and Worth, he set out in Quest of the Mine, with a complete Fleet of Twelve Sail; letting fall a Speech at his Departure, which was rather an Argument of his Wit than his Wisdom, That his whole History of the World had not the like President: Of a Kings Prisoner to purchase Freedom, and his bosome Favorite to have the Halter; but in Scripture, Mordecai and Haman: Meaning himself and the Duke of Somerset. To which he was told, that the King replied, He might die in that Decree; which he did, for Somerset was saved. Of whom was made good what Sir Walter used to say of Favours; That Minions were not so happy as Vulgar Judgments thought them, being frequently commanded to uncomely, and sometimes to unnatural Employments.

On the 17th of November, he arrived at Guiana, having been much retarded by contrary Winds, and having lost several of his Volunteers in the Voyage, by a violent Calenture. But of the whole Transactions, Sir Walter hath given us an exact Account, in his Letter to Sir Ralph Winwood, Secretary; which I have here transcribed.

SIR,

AS I have not hitherto given you any Account of our Proceedings and Passages towards the Indies, so have I no other Subject to write of, than of the greatest Misfortunes that ever befall any Man. For whereas for the first, all those that navigate between Cape de Verd, and America, do pass between Fifteen or Twenty Days at most, we found the Wind so contrary, and (which are also contrary to Nature) so many Storms and Rains, as we spent six Weeks in the Passage; by reason whereof, and that in so great Heat, we wanted Water. For at the Isle Prano de Cape de Verd, we lost our Anchors and Cables, and our Water-Casks; and being driven from the Isle with a Hurricane, we were like all to have perished. Great sickness fell amongst us, and carried away great numbers of our ablest Men, both for Sea and Land. The 17th of November, we had sight of Guiana, and soon after came to Anchor in five Degrees of the River Galiano; here we staid till the fourth of December, landed our Sick-men, set up our Barges and Shallops, which were brought out of England in Quarters, washed our Ships, and took in Fresh-water, being fed and cherished by the Indians of my old Acquaintance, with a great deal of Love and Respect. My self being in the hands of Death this six Weeks, and not able otherwise to move, than as I was carried in a Chair, gave order to five small Ships to sail into Orinocoque, having Captain Kemish for their Conductor towards the Mines: And in those five Ships, five Companies of fifty, under the Command of Captain Parker, Captain North, Brethren to the Lord Montague, and the Lord North, valiant Gentlemen, and of infinite Patience, for the Labour, Hunger, and Heat which they have endured: My Son had the third Company; Captain Thornix of Kent the fourth Company; Captain Chidly, by his Lieutenant, the fifth. But as my Sergeant Major, Captain Piggot, died in the former miserable Passage; so my Lieutenant Sir Warham Saint Leiger, lay sick without hope of Life, and the Charge conferred on my Nephew, George Raleigh, who had also served long with infinite Commendations;

* * * * * 2 hope

but by reason of my absence, and of Sir War-ham's, was not so well obeyed as the Enterprize required. As they passed up the River, the Spaniards began the War, and shot at us, both with their Ordnance and Muskets; whereupon the Companies were forced to charge them, and soon after beat them out of the Town. In the Assault my Son (more desirous of Honour than Safety) was slain; with whom, to say truth, all the re-specks of this World have taken end in me; and although these five Captains had as weak Companies as ever followed valiant Leaders, yet were there among them some twenty or thirty valiant adventurous Gentlemen, and of singular Courage; as of my Sons Company, Mr. Knivet, Mr. Hammond, Mr. Langworth, Mr. John Pleasington; his Officers, Sir John Hamblen, Mr. Simmon Leak, Corporal of the Field, Mr. Hammond, the elder Brother, Mr. Nicholas of Buckingham, Mr. Roberts of Kent,
Mr. Perin, Mr. Trelham, Mr. Molinax,
Mr. Winter, and his Brother; Mr. Wray,
Mr. Miles Herbert, Mr. Bradshaw, Captain
Hall, and others.

Sir, I have set down the Names of these Gentlemen, to the end that if his Majesty shall have cause to use their Service, it may please you to take notice of them for very sufficient Gentlemen. The other five Ships staid at Trinidad, having no other Port capable of them near Guiana. The second Ship was Commanded by my Vice-Admiral Captain John Pennington, of whom (to do him right) he is one of the sufficientest Gentlemen for the Sea that England hath.
The third by Sir Warham Saint Legier, an exceeding valiant and worthy Gentleman.
The fourth by Sir John Fern. The fifth by Captain Chidley of Devon. With these five Ships I daily attended their Armada of Spain, which had they set upon us, our Force divided, the one half in Orinocoque, 150 Miles from us, we had not only been torn in pieces, but all those in the River had also perished, being of no force at all for Sea-fight. But we had resolved to be burnt by their sides, had the Armada arrived: But belike they staid for us at Margaret, by which they knew we must pass to the Indies. For it pleased his Majesty to value us at so little, as to command me upon my Allegiance, to set down under my hand the Country, and River by which I was to enter it; to set down the Number of my Men, and Burthen of my Ships, and what Ordnance every Ship carried: which being known to the Spanish Ambassador, and by him unto the King of Spain, a dispatch was made, and Letters sent from Madrid, before my departure out of the Thames. For his first Letter, sent by a Barque of Advice, was dated the 19th of March, 1617. at Madrid, which Letter I have here inclosed sent to your Honour; the rest I reserve, not knowing whether they may be intercepted or not.

The second by the King, dated the second of May, sent also by a Colonel of Diego de Polonioque, Governour of Guiana, Elderedo, and Trinidad. The third by the Bishop of Perericho, and delivered to Po-lonioque, the fifteenth of July at Trinidado. And the fourth was sent from the Farmer and Secretary of his Customs in the Indies. At the same time by that of the Kings Hand sent by the Bishop, there was also a Commission for the speed Levying of 300 Souldiers, and ten Pieces of Ordnance, to be sent from Portoriche for the Defence of Guiana.
One 150 from Nuevo Remo de Grando, under the Command of Captain Anthony Mu-fica; and the other 150 from Portoricho, to be conducted by Captain Francis Landio.

Now Sir, if all that have traded to the Indies since his Majesties time, knew that the Spaniards have slayed alive all the poor Men which they have taken, being but Merchant Men, what Death and cruel Torment shall we expect, if they conquer us? Certainly, they have hitherto failed grossly, being set out thence as we were, both for Number, Time, and Place.

Lastly, To make an Apology for not working the Mine (though I know his Majesty expected it, whom I am to satisfy as much as my self) having lost my Son and my Estate in the Enterprize; yet it is true, that the Spaniards took more care to defend the Passage leading unto it, than they did the Town, which by the Kings Instructions they might easily do, the Countries being Alpera & Nemorola.

But it is true, that when Captain Kemish found the River low, and that he could not approach the Banks in most places near the Mine by a Mile, and where he found a descent, a volley of Musquet shot came from the Woods upon the Boat, and slew two Rowers, hurt six others, and shot a valiant Gentleman of Captain Thornix, of which wound he languisheth to this day. He, to wit, Captain Kemish, following his own Advice, thought it was in vain to discover the Mine;
and he gave me this for an Excuse at his return, that the Companies of English in the Town of S. Thome were not able to defend it against the daily and nightly Assaults of the Spaniards; that the Passages to the Mines were thick and unpassable Woods; and that the Mine being discovered, they had no Men

Men to work it; did not discover it at all. For it is true, the Spaniards having two Gold Mines near the Town, the one possessed by Pedro Rodrigo de Paran, the second by Harmian Protimio, the third of Silver by Captain Francisco, are useless for want of Negroes to work them: For as the Indians cannot be constrained, by a Law of Charles the 5th, so the Spaniards will not, nor can endure the labour of those Mines, whatsoever the Bragadocio the Spanish Ambassador saith. I shall prove under the Proprietors hands, by the Custom-Brook and the Kings Quinto, of which I recovered an Ingot or two: I shall also make it appear to any Prince, or State, that will undertake it, how easily those Mines, and five or six more of them, may be possessed, and the most of them in those Parts, which have never as yet been attempted by any, nor by any Passage to them, nor ever discovered by the English, French, or Dutch. But at Kemish's return from Orinocoque, when I rejected his counsel and his counsel, and told him he had undone me, and wounded my Credit with the Kings past recovery, he flew himself: For I told him, seeing my Son was slain, I cared not if I had lost one hundred more in opening the Mine, so my Credit had been saved. For I protest before God, had not Captain Whitney (to whom I gave more countenance than to all the Captains of my Fleet) run from me at the Granadoes, and carried another Ship with him of Captain Woolfolds, I would have left my Body at Saint Thome, by my Sons, or have brought with me out of that or other Mines, so much Gold Ore as should have satisfied the King. I propounded no vain thing, what shall become of me I know not. I am unpardoned in England, and my poor Estate confused, and whether any Prince will give me Bread or no, I know not. I would desire your Honour to hold me in your good Opinion, to remember my Service to my Lord of Arundel and Pembroke, to take some pity on my poor Wife, to whom I dare not write for renewing her sorrow for her Son.
And I beseech you to give a Copy of this to my Lord Carew; for to a broken Mind, a sick Body, and weak Eyes, it is a torment to write many Letters. I have found many things of Importance for discovering the State and Weakness of the Indies, which if I live I shall hereafter impart unto your Honour, to whom I shall remain a faithful Servant,

WALTER RALEIGH.

Whilst this Action of S. Thome was performed, and the Repulse in the way to the Mine, Sir Walter staid at S. Point de Gallo the space of nine weeks, where the unwelcome news was brought him of the loss of his Son, and the Defeat they met with in their Design upon the Mine. However this ill News could not alter the Resolutions of Sir Walter, of Returning to England, though he knew he should meet with several Enemies there, who had by their Calumnies rendred the Voyage nothing but a Design; and though several of his Men were for landing at New-found-Land. For if we may believe himself at the hour of his Death, the two Noble Earls, Thomas of Arundel, and William of Pembroke, engaged him to return; and Sir Walter was resolv'd, though inevitable Danger threatened him, to keep his Promise.

No sooner had they arrived upon the Coasts of Ireland, but the Taking and Sacking of Saint Thome, firing of the Town, and putting the Spaniards there to the Sword (though in their own defence) was noised abroad in all parts, and was by special Advertisment come unto the knowledge of Count de Gonda-mor: Who thereupon desiring Audience of his Majesty, said he had but one word to say: His Majesty much wondering what might be delivered in one word; when he came before him, he only bawld out, Pyrates, Pyrates, Py-rates. A very pretty short Speech for an Ambassador. Whereupon his Majesty published his Royal Proclamation, for the discovery of the Truth of Sir Walter Raleigh's Proceedings, and the Advancement of Justice. But after all this Noise, Sir Walter is not question'd for his Guiana Action. For it is believed, not without very good Ground, that neither the transgression of his Commission, nor any thing acted beyond the Line, where the Articles of Peace between the two Crowns did not extend, could have in a legal course of Trial shortened his days.

When Sir Walter was arrived at Plymouth, Sir Lewis Stentky, Vice-Admiral of the County of Devon, seiz'd him, being Commissioned by his Majesty to bring him to London; which could add no Terror to a Person who could expect nothing less; and was now forc'd to make use of all the Arts imaginable to appease his Majesty, and defer his Anger. To which intent, Mynorny, a French Quack at Salisbury, gave him feveral Vomits, and an Artificial Cough,
 3 position,

position, which made him look gaily and dreadful, full of Pimples and Blisters, and put the Cheat upon the very Physicians themselves, who could not tell what to make of his Urine (though often inspected) being adulterated with a Drug in the Glass, that turn'd it even in their very hands, into an earthy humour of a blackish colour, and of a very offensive favour.

While he lay under this Politick disguise, he penn'd his Declaration and Apology, which have sufficiently proved his honourable Designs in that Voyage, and answered the little Calumnies of his Enemies. When he was brought to London, he was permitted the Confinement of his own House: But finding the Court wholly guided by Gondamor, he could hope for little Mercy; therefore he wisely contriv'd the design of an Escape into France, which Sir Lewis Stenckley betrayed. But the fate of Traytors pursued him, and brought him to a Contemptible End, to dye a poor distracted Begger in the Isle of Lindsey, having for a Bag of Money falsified his Faith, confirmed by the tye of the holy Sacrament, (if we may give credit to Mr. Hmel, who hath given us this Story;) as also before the Year came about, to be found clipping the same very Coin in the King's own House at White-Hall, which he had received for a Reward of his Perfidiousness: for which, being condemn'd to be hang'd, he was forc'd to sell himself to his Shirt, to purchase his Pardon of two Knights.

King James was willing to sacrifice the Life of Sir Walter to the Advancement of Peace with Spain, but not upon such Grounds as the Ambassadors had design'd: for he desir'd a Judgment upon the pretended Breach of Peace, that by this Occasion he might fly gain from the English an acknowledgment of his Master's Right in those Places, and hereafter both stop their Mouths, and quench their Heat and Valour. Hence upon his old Condemnation (for having had experience upon a former Tryal, they cared not to run the hazard of a second) he was sentenced: The old Judgment being only Averred against him; and from Westminster-Hall he was carried to the Gate-House; and from thence the next Morning to the Parliament-Yard, where he had the Favour of the Ax granted him. But all Persons have wonder'd how that Old Sentence, that had laid dormant sixteen Years and upwards against Sir Walter, could have been made use of to take off his Head afterwards: Considering the then Lord Chancellor Vernham told him positively, (as Sir Walter was acquainting him with that Proffer of Sir William St. Leon for a Pecuniary Pardon, which might have been obtained for a less Sum, than his Guiana Preparations amounted to) in these words: 'Sir, the Knee Timber of your Voyage is Money; spare your Purlie in this particular, for upon my Life you have a sufficient Pardon for all that is pass'd already, the King having under his Broad Seal made you Admiral of your Fleet, and given you Power of the Martial Law over the Officers and Souldiers. It was the Opinion of most Lawyers, that he, who by his Majesties Patent, had Power of Life and Death over the King's Liege People, should be esteemed or judged Reus in Curia, and free from all old Convictions. But Sir Walter hath made the best Defence for his Guiana Actions, in his Letter to his Majesty, which I have here insertet.

May it please your most excellent Majesty.

IF in my Journey outward bound, I had my Men Murdered at the Island, and yet spared to take Revenge. If I did discharge some Spanish Barques taken, without spoil. If I did forbear all parts of the Spanish Indies, wherein I might have taken twenty of their Towns on the Sea Coast, and did only follow the Enterprize I undertook for Guiana, where without any Directions from me a Spanish Village was burnt, which was new set up within three miles of the Mine; by your Majesty's favour, I find no Reason why the Spanish Ambassador should complain of me. If it were lawful for the Spaniards to Murder 26 Englishmen, binding them back to back, and then cutting their Throats, when they had traded with them a whole Month, and came to them on the Land without so much as one Sword; and that it may not be lawful for your Majesties Subjects, being charged first by them, to repel Force by Force; we may justly say, O miserable English! If Parker and Metham took Campeach and other places in the Honduras, seated in the heart of the Spanish Indies, burnt Towns, killed the Spaniards, and had nothing said to them at their Return, and my self forbore to look into the Indies because I would

'I would not offend; I may justly say, O miserable Sir Walter Raleigh! If I spent my poor Estate, lost my Son, suffered by Sickness, and otherwise a World of Miseries; if I have resisted with the manifest hazard of my Life, the Robberies and Spoils which my Company would have made; if when I was Poor, I might have made my self Rich; if when I had gotten my Liberty, which all Men, and Nature it self do so much prize, I voluntarily lost it; if when I was sure of my Life, I rendred it again; if I might elsewhere have sold my Ship and Goods, and put 5 or 6000 Pound in my Pocket, and yet have brought her into England. I beseech your Majesty to believe, that all this I have done, because it should not be said to your Majesty, that your Majesty had given Liberty and Trust to a Man whose End was but the Recovery of his Liberty, and who had betrayed your Majesty's Trust. My Mutineers told me, that if I returned for England, I should be undone; but I believed in your Majesty's Goodness more than in all their Arguments. Sure I am, that I am the first that being free, and able to enrich my self, have embraced Poverty and Peril: And as sure I am, that my Example shall make me the last. But your Majesty's Wisdom and Goodness I have made my Judges who have ever been, and shall ever be,

Your Majesty's most humble Vassal,

WALTER RALEIGH.

But this Apology, though never so perfwasive, could not satisfy Gondamor's Rage, who was resolv'd to sacrifice the only Favorite left of Queen Elizabeth, to the Spanish interest: And who, as Osborn remarks, was the only Person of Essex's Enemies that died lamented; and the only Man of Note left alive, that had help'd to beat the Spaniard in the Year 1588.

Upon Thursday the 29th of October 1618. Sir Walter Raleigh was conveyed by the Sheriffs of London to a Scaffold in the Old Palace at Westminster, where he was executed about nine of the Clock in the Morning of the same Day, whose Confession and several Speeches there delivered, with his Gesture and Behaviour, were as follows.

His first appearance upon the Scaffold, was with a smiling Countenance, saluting the Lords, Knights, and Gentlemen, with others of his Acquaintance there present; when after a Proclamation of Silence by an Officer appointed, he address'd himself to speak in this manner.

I desire to be born withal, because this is the third Day of my Favour: And if I shew any weakness, I beseech you attribute it to my Malady, for this is the hour I look for it.

Then pawing a while, directing himself towards a Window, where the Lord of Arundel, and the Lord of Doncaster, with some other Lords and Knights late, with a loud Voice he said as followeth:

'I thank God of his infinite Goodness that he hath sent me to dye in the sight of so Honourable an Assembly, and not in Darkness. But by reason the place where they sit was some distance from the Scaffold, that they could not easily hear him, he said, I will strain my self, for I would willingly have your Honours hear me. The Lord of Arundel answered, We will come upon the Scaffold; where after he had saluted every one of them severally, he began as follows:

'As I said, I thank my God heartily that he hath brought me into the light to dye, and not suffered me to dye in the dark Prison of the Tower, where I have suffered a great deal of Adversity, and a long Sickness; and I thank God that my Favour hath not taken me at this time, as I prayed God it might not.

'There are two main Points of Suspicion that his Majesty hath conceived against me, wherein his Majesty cannot be satisfied, which I desire to clear and resolve you in:

'One is, That his Majesty hath been informed that I have had some Plot with France, and his Majesty had some Reason to induce him thereto. One Reason that his Majesty had to conjecture so, was, That when I came back from Guiana, being come to Plymouth, I endeavoured to go to Rochel; which was because I would fain have made

'made my Peace before I came to Eng'land. Another Reason was, That upon
'on my Flight I did intend to fly to 'France for saving of my Life, ha'ving had some terror from above. A 'third Reason was, The French Agent's
'coming to me; and it was reported
'I had Commission from the King of 'France.

'But this I say, for a Man to call
'God to witness to a Falshood at any 'time is a grievous sin, and what shall
'he hope for at the Tribunal Day of 'Judgment? But to call God to wit'ness to a Falshood at the time of Death,
'is far more grievous and impious, and 'there is no hope for such an one. And
'what should I expect that am now go'ing to render an Account of my Faith?
'I do therefore call the Lord to wit'ness, as I hope to be saved, and as I 'hope to see him in his Kingdom, which 'will be within this quarter of this hour,
'I never had any Commission from the 'King of France, nor any Treaty with
'the French Agent, nor with any from
'the French King; neither knew I that 'there was an Agent, or what he was,
'till I met him in my Gallery at my 'Lodging unlook'd for. If I speak not 'true, O Lord, let me never come into 'thy Kingdom.

'The second Suspicion was, That his 'Majesty hath been informed, That I 'should speak dishonourably and dis-
'loyally of him. But my Accuser was 'a base Frenchman, a kind of a Chymi-
'cal Fellow, one whom I knew to be 'Perfidious; for being drawn into this 'Action at Winchester, in which my 'Hand was toucht, and he being sworn 'to secrecy over Night, reveal'd it in the 'Morning.

'But in this I speak now, What have
'I to do with Kings? I have nothing 'to do with them, neither do I fear them:
'I have now to do with God, therefore
'to tell a Lye now to get the Favour of 'the King were in vain. Therefore, as 'I hope to be saved at the last Day, I
'never spake dishonourably, disloyally,
'nor dishonestly of the King; neither to
'this Frenchman, nor to any other; nei'ther had I ever in all my Life a thought 'of ill of his Majesty. Therefore I can'not but think it strange, that this 'Frenchman being so base, so mean a Fel'low, should be so far credited; and so 'much for this Point. I have dealt tru'ly, and I hope I shall be believed. I 'confess, I did attempt to escape, and I did

'diflemble and fain: my self Sick at Salu-bury, but I hope it was no sin. The 'Prophet David did make himself a Fool,
'and did suffer Spittle to fall upon his
'Beard, to escape the hands of his Ene'mies, and it was not imputed to him
'as sin; and I did it to prolong Time
'till his Majesty came, hoping for some
'Commeration from him.

'I forgive this Frenchman, and Sir Levis Stenckly, and have received the Sa'crament this Morning of Mr. Dean, 'and I do also forgive all the World. But 'thus much I am bound in Charity to 'speak of this Man, that all Men may 'take good heed of him: Sir Lewis Stenck-ley, my Kinsman and Keeper, hath af'firmed that I should tell him, that I 'did tell my Lord Carew, and my Lord
'Doncaster of my present Escape; but 'I protest before God, I never told Stenck-ley any such thing, neither did I tell my 'Lord Carew, or my Lord Doncaster, of 'my pretended Escape. It was not like'ly that I should acquaint two Privy-'Counsellors of my purpose; neither would
'I tell him, for he left me six, seven, eight,
'nine or ten days to go where I listed,
'while he rode about the Country.

'Again, he accused me, that I should 'tell him, That my Lord Carew, and my 'Lord Doncaster would meet me in 'France: which was never my speech or 'thought.

'Thirdly, He accused me, That I
'shew'd him a Letter, and that I should 'give him 10000 l. for my Escape: but
'cast my Soul into everlasting Fire if e'ver I made him offer of 10000 l. or '1000 l. but merely I shew'd him a 'Letter, that if he would go with me,
'his Debts should be paid when he was 'gone; neither had I 1000 l. for if I 'had had so much, I could have done
'better with it, and made my Peace o'therwise.

'Fourthly, When I came to Sir Edward Pelham, who had been sometimes
'a follower of mine, who gave me good 'Entertainment; he gave out that I 'had receiv'd some dram of Poyson in
'Sir Edward Pelham's House: when I
'answered, that I feared no such thing;
'for I was well assured of them in the 'House. Now God forgive him, for I 'do, and desire God to forgive him: I 'will not only say God is the God of Re'venge, but I desire God to forgive him,
'as I hope to be forgiven.

Then

Then he looked over his Note of Remembrance; 'Well (saith he) thus far I 'have gone; now a little more, and I will 'have done by and by.

'It was told the King I was brought
'per force into England; and that I did 'not intend to come again: Whereas
'Captain Charles Parker, Mr. Tresham,
'Mr. Leak, and divers others that knew
'how I was dealt withal, shall witness
'for me: For the Common Souldiers
'(which were 150) mutined, and sent
'for me to come into the Gun-Room
'to them, (for at that time they would 'not come to me) and there was I forc'd
'to take an Oath, that I would not come 'into England till they would have me,
'else they would cast me into the Sea
'and drown me; afterwards they entred
'my Cabin and set themselves against me.
'After I had taken this Oath, with Wine
'and other things I drew the chieftest
'of them to desist, and at length perswaded
'them to go into Ireland: Then would
'they have gone into the North parts of 'Ireland, but I told them they were Redshanks: yet at last with much ado I per'suaded them to go into the South parts;
'promising to get their Pardons: but was 'forc'd to give them 125 l. at Kingsale to 'bring them home, otherwise I had never 'got from them.

'There was a Report that I meant
'not to go to Guiana at all; and that 'I knew not of any Mine, nor intended
'any such matter, but only to get my 'Liberty, which I had not the wit to 'keep. But it was my full intent to 'go for Gold, for the benefit of his 'Majesty, and those that went with me,
'with the rest of my Countrymen: But
'he that knew the Head of the Mine,
'would not discover it when he saw my 'Son was slain, but made himself away.
'Then he turned to my Lord of Arundel
'and said, Being in the Gallery in 'my Ship at my Departure, Your Ho'nour took me by the hand, and said
'you would request me one thing, that
'was, That whether I made a good Voyage
'or bad, yet I should return again into Eng'land; when I made you a Promise, and 'gave you my Faith that I would: And
'to you did (answered my Lord) it is 'true, they were the last words I spake un-
'to you.

'Another Opinion was that I carried
'to Sea with me 16000 Pieces, and that 'was all the Voyage I intended, only to 'get Money into my Hands, and that 'I had weigh'd my Voyage before:

'whereas I protest I had but 100 Pound
'in all the World, whereof I gave 25
'Pounds to my Wife: The Reason of 'this Speech was this; there was entered
'20000 Pound, and yet but 4000 Pound
'in the Surveyors Book; now I gave 'my Bill for the other 16000 Pound for 'divers Adventurers, but I protest I had 'not a Penny of Money more than 100
'Pound, as I hope to be saved.

'Another Slander was raised, that I 'would have gone away from them and 'left them at Guiana, but there were a 'great many of worthy Men that accom'panied me always, as my Serjeant Major
'George Raleigh, and divers others (which 'he then named) that knew my Intent
'was nothing false. And these be the Ma'terial Points I thought good to speak of;
'I am now at this instant to render my 'Account to God, and I protest as I shall 'appear before Him, this that I have spoken
'is true.

'I will speak but a word or two more, be'cause I will not trouble Mr. Sheriff too long.
'There was a Report spread, that I 'should rejoyce at the Death of my Lord
'of Essex, and that I should take Tobac'co in his presence; when as I protest I 'shed Tears at his Death, though I was 'home of the contrary Faction; and at the 'time of his Death I was all the while in 'the Armory at the further end, where
'I could not see him; I was sorry that I 'was not with him, for I heard he had 'a desire to see me, and be reconciled to 'me. So that I protest I lamented his Death,
'and good cause had I, for it was the world
'for me as is proved, for after he was gone
'I was little beloved.

'And now I intreat you all to joyn
'with me in Prayer, that the great God
'of Heaven, whom I have grievously of'fended, being a Man full of all Vanity,
'and have lived a sinful Life, in all sin'ful Callings, having been a Souldier, a
'Captain, a Sea-Captain, and a Courtier,
'which are all places of Wickedness and
'Vice; that God (I say) would for'give me, and cast away my Sins from 'me, and that he would receive me into 'everlasting Life. So I take my leave
'of you all, making my Peace with God.

Then Proclamation being made that all Men should depart the Scaffold, he prepared himself for Death, giving away his Hat and wrought Night-Cap, and some Money to such as he knew that stood near him: Taking his leave of the Lords, Knights, and other Gentlemen,
and

and among the rest taking his leave of the Lord of Arundel, he thanked him for his Company, and intreated him to defire the King, that no scandalous Writing to defame him might be published after his Death; saying further unto him, I have a long Journey to go, and therefore I will take my leave.

Then putting off his Gown and Doublet, he called to the Headman to shew him the Ax, which being not presently shewed him, he said, I pray thee let me see it, Dost thou think that I am afraid of it? And having it in his hands, he felt along upon the Edge of it, and smiling spake to the Sheriff, saying, This is a sharp Medicine, but it is a Physician for all Diseases. Then going to and fro upon the Scaffold, on every side he prayed the Company to pray to God to assist him and strengthen him.

And so being asked which way he would lay himself, on which side the Block, as he stretched himself along and laid his Head on the Block, he said, So the Heart be right, it is no matter which way the Head lieth. And then praying, after he had forgiven the Headman, having given him a Sign when he should do his Office, at two blows he lost both Head and Life, his Body never shrinking nor moving. His Head was shewed on each side of the Scaffold, and then put into a Red-Leather Bag, and his wrought Velvet Gown thrown over it, which was afterwards conveyed away in a Mourning Coach of his Ladies.

The large effusion of Blood which proceeded from his Veins, amaz'd the Spectators, who conjectur'd he had stock enough left of Nature to have survived many years, though now near fourscore years old.

He behav'd himself at his Death with so High and so Religious a Resolution, as if a Christian had acted a Roman, or rather a Roman a Christian: And by the Magnanimity which was then conspicuous in him, he abundantly baffled their Calumnies who had accus'd him of Atheism.

Various were the Repentments of his Death, and several Palquils (as it always happens on such Occasions) were scatter'd abroad:

Of the Gallantry of his Behaviour on the Scaffold, these following Verses may give a Confirmation, and a Taste of the Poetry of those Times.

Upon Sir Walter Raleigh's Execution and Death.

*Great Heart! who taught thee to die?
Death yielding thee the Victory.
Where took'st thou leave of Life? If here,
How could'st thou be so far from Fear?
But sure thou dyed'st, and quitd'st the State Of Fleish and Blood, before that Fate.
Life what a Miracle were wrought,
To triumph both in Fleish and Thought.
I saw in every Slander by Pale Death, Life only in thy Eye.
Farewel; Truth shall this Story say,
We ag'd, Thou only liv'dst that Day.*

Or if the Reader pleases, he may take this following Elegy, composed on the same Subject, by a Sacred Wit of those times.

An Elegy on Sir W. R.

*I will not weep: for 'twere as great a sin
To shed a Tear for Thee, as to have been An Actor in thy Death. Thy Life and Age
Was but a various Scene on Fortunes Stage; With whom thou jugg'dst and strov'st, even out of breath,
In thy long Toy, ne're master'd till thy Death;
And then, despite of Trains, and cruel Wit,
Thou didst at once subdue Malice, and it.
I dare not then so blast thy Memory,
As t' say I do lament or pity Thee.
Were I to choose a Subject to bestow
My Pity on, he should be one as lov'd
In Spirit as Desert: That durst not dye,
But rather were content by Slavery
To purchase Life: Or would I pity those Thy most industrious and friendly Foes,
Who when they thought to make Thee Scandal
duals story,
Lent Thee a swifter Flight to Heav'n and Glory.
They thought by cutting off some wish'd Days
(Which thou could'st spare them) to eclipse thy Praise;
Yet gave it brighter Foil, made thy ag'd Fame
Appear more White and Fair, than Foul their Shame.
And did promote an Execution,
Which, but for them, Nature and Age had done.
Such worthless things as these are only born
To live on Pities Alms (too mean for Scorn.)
Thou dyd'st an env'ous Wonder, whose high Fate
The World must still admire, scarce imitate.*

Thus

Thus died that Knight, who was Spain's Scourge and Terror, and Gondomar's Triumph, whom the whole Nation pitted, and several Princes interceded for; Queen Elizabeth's Favourite, and her Successors Sacrifice. A Person of so much Worth and so great Interest, that King James would not execute him without an Apology. One of such incomparable Policy, that he was too hard for Essex, was the Envy of Leicester, and Cecil's Rival; who grew jealous of his Excellent Parts, and was afraid of being supplanted by him. His Head was with on the Secretaries Shoulders, and his Life valued by some at a higher Rate than the Infanta of Spain, though a Lady incomparably excelling in both the Gifts of Body and Mind.

Authors are perplex under what To pick to place him, whether of Statesman, Seaman, Souldier, Chymist, or Chronologer; for in all these he did excel. He could make every thing he read or heard his own, and his own he could easily improve to the greatest Advantage. He seem'd to be born to that only which he went about, so Dexterous was he in all his Undertakings, in Court, in Camp, by Sea, by Land, with Sword, with Pen. Witness in the last, his

CHAP. I.

Of the Creation, and Preservation of the World.

S. I.

That the Invisible God is seen in his Creatures.

GOD, whom the wisest men acknowledge to be a Power uneffable, and Vertue infinite, a Light by abundant clarity invisible; an Understanding which it self can onely comprehend, an Essence eternal and spiritual, of absolute pureness and simplicity; was, and is pleased to make himself known by the Work of the World: in the wonderful magnitude wherof (all which he embraceth, filleth, and sustaineth) we behold the Image of that glory which cannot be measured, and withal, that one, and yet universal Nature, which cannot be defined. In the glorious Lights of Heaven, we perceive a shadow of his Divine Countenance; in his merciful provision for all that live, his manifold goodness; and lastly, in creating and making existent the World universal, by the absolute Art of his own Word, his Power and Almightiness; which Power, Light, Vertue, Wisdom, and Goodness, being all but Attributes of one simple Essence, and one God, we in all admire, and in part discern per speculum creaturarum, that is, in the disposition, order, and variety of Celestial and Terrestrial bodies: Terrestrial, in their strange and manifold diversities; Celestial, in their beauty and magnitude; which in their continual and contrary motions, are neither repugnant, intermixt, nor confounded. By these potent effects, we approach to the knowledge of the omnipotent cause, and by these motions, their Almighty Maker.

In these more than wonderful works, God (saith *Hugo) speaketh unto man: and it is true, that these be those discourses of God, whose effects, those that live, per Eccles. 8. witness in themselves; the sensible in their sensible natures; the reasonable, in their reasonable souls: for, according to *S. Gregory, Omnis homo eo ipso quod rationalis conditus est, ex ipsa ratione, illum qui se condidit, ad se. Deum esse colligere debet. Every man, in that he is reasonable, out of the same reason may know, that he Psalm 145. which made him, is God. This God all men behold signatur. (saith Job) which is, according to the Fathers, Dominum esse manifestum in creaturis, To discern him in manifestationem illius conspiciere in creaturis. per omnia apparet, & in omnibus. Apparentia sicut generum est; nihil apparitio qualem generat.

his Providence by his creatures. That God hath been otherwise seen, to wit, with corporal eyes, exceedeth the small proportion of my understanding, grounded on these places of S. John and S. Paul, Te habeo non habeo his voice at any time, neither have ye seen his shape. And again, Whom never man saw, nor can see.

And this I am free agrees with the nature of God's simplicity, of which S. Augustine, Ipse enim natura vel substantia, vel qualitas alio nomine appellandus est, id est, ipsum quod Deus est, corporalis videtur non potest: That nature, or that substance, or by whatsoever name that is to be called which is God, whatsoever he be, the same cannot be corporally perceived. And of this opinion were Origen, Cyril, Chrysostom, Gregory, Nazianzen, Hieron, Augustine, Gregory the great, Eusebius, Ambrose, Dionysius Areopagita, Aquinas, and all others of Authority. But by his own Word, and by this visible World, is God perceived of men; which is also the understood language of the Almighty, vouchsafed to all his Creatures, whose Hieroglyphical Characters are the unnumbered Stars, the Sun and Moon; written on these large Volumes of the Firmament: written also on the Earth and the Seas, by the letters of all those living Creatures, and Plants, which inhabit and reside therein. Therefore said that learned Celsanus, Mundum universum nihil aliud est, quam Deus explicatus: The World universal is nothing else but God explicated. And the invisible things of God (saith S. Paul) are seen by the creation of the World, being considered in his Creatures. Of all which, there was no other cause preceding than his own Will, no other matter than his own Power, no other Workman than his own Word, no other consideration than his own infinite goodness. The example and pattern of these his Creatures, as he beheld the same in all eternity in the abundance of his own love, so was it at length in the most wise order, by his unchanged Will moved, by his wise Will disposed, and by his Almighty Power perfected, and made visible. And therefore (saith Mirandula) we ought to love God, ex fide, & ex effectu (that is) both perfwaded by his Word, and by the effects of the Worlds Creation: Neque enim qui causa caret, ex causa & origine sciri, cognoscitur, potest, sed vel ex verumque facta sunt, quaeque sunt gubernantur, observatione & collatione; vel ex ipsius Dei verbo: For he of whom there is no higher cause, cannot be known by any knowledge of cause or beginning (saith Montanus) but either by the observing and conferring of things, which he hath, or doth create and govern; or else by the word of God himself.

§. II.

That the wisest of the Heathen, whose Authority is not to be despised, have acknowledged the World to have been created by God.

This work and creation of the World, did most of the ancient and learned Philosophers acknowledge, though by divers terms, and in a different manner exprest; I mean all those who are intitled by S. Augustine, Summi Philosphi, Philosophers of highest judgment and understanding. Mercatorius Trismegistus calleth God, Principium universorum. The original of the Universal; to whom he giveth also the Attributes of Mens, Natura, Almus, Necessitas, Finitis, & Renovatio. And wherein he truly with S. Paul, casteth upon God all power; conferring also, that the World was made by Gods Almighty Word, and not by hands: Verbo, non manibus, fabricatus est mundum. Zoroaster (whom Heracitus followed in opinion) took the word Fire to exprest God by (as in Dædemonium, and Hic. 1.2.19.) In S. Paul it is used Omnia ex uno igne genita sunt, All things (saith he) are created or produced out of one fire.

So did Orpheus plainly teach, that the World had beginning in time, from the will of the most high God; whose remarkable words are thus converted; Cum abscondisset omnia Jupiter Jovanne, deinde in laevam caelum emisit, ex sacro corde operans cogitavit & mirabilia: Of which I conceive this fence: When great Jupiter had hidden all things in himself, working out of the love of his sacred heart, he sent thence, or brought forth, into grateful light, the admirable work which he had first thought. Pindarus the Poet, and one of the wisest, acknowledged also one God, the most High, to be the Father and Creator of all things; Unus Deus, Pater, Creator summus. Plato calleth God the cause and original, the nature and reason of the universal; Totum rerum natura, videlicet causa, & origo Deus. But hereof more at large hereafter.

Now, although the curiosity of some men have found it superfluous, to remember the opinions of Philosophers in matters of Divinity: (it being true, that the Scripture hath not want of any foreign testimony) yet as the Fathers, with others excellently learned, are my examples herein; so S. Paul himself did not despise, but thought it lawful and profitable, to remember whatsoever he found agreeable to the word of God among the Heathen, that he might thereby take from them all escape, by way of ignorance, God reading vengeance to them that know him not, as in the Epistle to Timo he citeth Ephemerides against the Cretians, and to the Corinthians, Messenger; and in the seventeenth of the Alti, Aristotle. For, Truth (saith S. Ambrose) by whomsoever uttered, is of the holy Ghost; Veritas à quocunque dicitur, à Spiritu sancto est: and lastly, let those kind of men learn this rule: Quæ sciri servantur, propheta non sunt; Nothing is prophane, that serveth to the use of holy things.

§. III.

Of the meaning of In Principio, Gen. 1. 1.

This visible World of which Moses writeth, God created in the beginning, or first of all: in which (saith Tertullianus) things began to be. This word Beginning (in which the Hebrews seek some hidden mystery, and which in the Jews Targum is converted by the word Sapientia) cannot be referred to succession of time, nor to order, as some men have conceived, both which are subsequent: but only to Creation then. For before that Beginning, there was neither primary Matter to be informed, nor Form to inform, nor any Being, but the Eternal Nature was not, nor the next Parent or Time begotten, Time properly and naturally taken: for if God had but disposed of Matter already in being: then as the word Beginning could not be referred to all things, so must it follow, that the institution of Matter proceeded from a greater power, than that of God. And by what name shall we then call such an One (saith Laërtius) as exceedeth God in potency: for it is an act of more excellency to make, than to dispose of things made? whereupon it may be concluded, that Matter could not be before this Beginning: except we feign double creation, or allow of two Powers, and both infinite; the impossibility whereof scorneth defence. Non impossibile est plus esse infinitum, quoniam alterum esse, si sit in altero finitum: There cannot be more Infinities than one: for one of them would limit the other.

§. IV.

§. IV.

Of the meaning of the words Heaven and Earth, Gen. 2. 1.

The Universal matter of the World (which Moses comprehendeth under the names of Heaven and Earth) is by divers diversly understood; for there are that conceive, that by those words was meant the first matter, as the Peripatetics understand it; to which S. Augustine and Isidore seem to adhere, Fecit mundum (saith S. Augustine) de materia informi; quam fecit de nulla re, pene nullam rem: that is, Thou hast made the World of a matter without form; which matter thou madest of nothing, and being made, it was little other than nothing.

But this potential and imaginary materia prima, cannot exist without form. Peter Lombard, the Schoolmen, Beda, Lycanus, Comestor, Tostatus, and others affirm, that it pleased God first of all to create the Empyrean Heaven: which at the succeeding instant (saith Beda and Strabo) he filled with Angels. This Empyrean Heaven Stenobius Engubinus calleth Divine clarity and uncreated: an Error, for which he is sharply charged by Petrus, though (as I conceive) he rather failed in the subsequent, when he made it to be a place, and the seat of Angels, and just Souls, than in the former affirmation: for of the first, That God liveth in eternal Light, it is written, My Soul, praise thou the Lord, that covereth himself with light: and in the Revelation, And the City hath no need of the Sun, neither of the Moon to shine in it: for the glory of God did light it. And herein also John Mercer upon Genesis differeth not in opinion from Kugbynius: for as by Heaven created in the beginning, was not meant the invisible or supercelestial; so in his judgment, because it was in all eternity the glorious Seat of God himself, it was not necessary to be created; Quem mundum supercellestem meo iudicio creari (saith Mercer) non erat necesse.

But as Moses forbore to speak of Angels, and of things invisible and incorporate, for the weakness of their capacities, whom he then created to inform of those things which were most manifest, (to wit) that God did not only by a strong hand deliver them from the bondage of Egypt, according to his promise made to their fore-fathers; but also that he created, and was the sole cause of this agreeable, and perceivable Universal: so on the other side I dare not think, that any supercelestial Heaven, or whatsoever else (not himself) was increate and eternal; and as for the place of God before the World created, the finite wisdom of mortal men hath no perception of it, neither can it limit the Seat of Infinite Power, no more than Infinite Power can be limited: for his place is in Himself, whom no magnitude else can contain: How great is the love of God (saith Barnab) how large is the place of his possession: it is great, and hath no end, it is high and unmeasurable.

But leaving multiplicity of opinions, it is more probable and allowed, that by the words Heaven and Earth, was meant the solid matter and substance, as well of all the Heavens, and Orbs superal, as of the Globe of the Earth and Waters, which covered it over, (to wit) that very matter of all things, Materia, Chaos, possibilitas, sive posse fieri. Which matter (saith Calvin) was so called, Quod totius mundi semen fuerit; Because it was the seed of the Universal: an Opinion of Ancient Philosophers long before.

§. V.

That the substance of the Waters, as mixt in the body of the Earth, is by Moses understood in the word Earth: and that the Earth, by the Attributes of unformed and void, is described as the Chaos of the ancient Heathen.

Moses first nameth Heaven and Earth (putting Waters but in the third place) as comprehending Waters in the word Earth; but afterwards he names them apart, when God by his Spirit began to distinguish the confused Mass, and (as Basil faith) Preparare naturam aquae ad secundarium vitalem. To prepare the nature of water to a vital fruitfulness.

For under the word Heaven, was the matter of all heavenly bodies, and natures exprest: and by the name of Earth and Waters, all was meant, whatsoever is under the Moon, and subject to alteration. Corrupt feeds bring forth corrupt plants; to which the pure heavens are not subject, though subject to perishing. They shall perish (saith David) and the beasts shall vanish away like smoke, saith Ej. Neither were the Waters the matter of Earth; for it is written, Let the waters under the heavens be gathered into one Gen. 1. 9. place, and let the dry land appear: which proveth, that the dry Land was mixt and covered with the Waters, and not yet distinguished; but no way, that the Waters were the Matter or Seed of the Earth, much less of the Universal. Initio vis, Dominus, terram fundavit; Thou, O Lord, in the beginning hast founded the Earth: Ps. 104.6. And again, The Earth was covered with the Deep (meaning with Waters) as with a garment, saith David. And if by natural arguments it may be proved, That Water by condensation may become Earth, the same Reason teacheth us also, that Earth rarified may become Water: Water Air, Air Fire; and so on the contrary. Deus igitur substantiam per aërem in aquam convertit; Deus turnebat substantiam per Fire in aërem. For the Heavens and the Earth remained in the same state, in which they were created, as touching their substance, though there was afterwards added multiplicity of perfection, in respect of beauty and ornament. Calum vero & terra in sua creatione rursus, Gal. 1. 2. fuerunt quantum ad substantiam, licet multiplex perfectio decoris & ornatus eis postmodum superaddita est. And the word which the Hebrews call Maim, is not to be understood according to the Latine Translation simply, and as peculiar water; but the same more properly signifieth liquor. For (according to Montanus) A. Maim. Est autem Maim liquor generis; & hoc nomen propriè de naturarum pecuniarum, Latina lingua plurali numero Aquas fecit, For Maim (saith he) is a double liquor, (that is, of divers natures) and this name or word the Latins, wanting a voice to exprest it, call it in the Plural, Aquas, Waters.

This Mass, or indigested Matter, or Chaos, created in the beginning, was without Form, that is, without the proper Form, which it afterwards acquired, when the Spirit of God had separated the Earth, and digested it from the Waters. And the Earth was void, that is, not producing any creatures, or adorned with any Plants, Fruits, or Flowers. But after the Spirit of God had moved upon the waters, and wrought this indigested Matter into that form, which it now retaineth; then did the Earth bud forth the Herb, which feedeth seed, and the fruitful Tree according to his kind, and God saw that it was good; which Attribute was not given to the Earth, while it was confused; nor to the Heavens, before they had motion, and adornment. God saw that it was good, that is, made perfect: for perfection is to that which nothing is wanting. Et perfecti Dei perfecta sunt opera: The Work of the perfect God, are perfect.

cies of that, which may be Enlivened by Light; and so, this shining which proceedeth from the Sun, or other lights of Heaven, or from any other light, is an Image, or intentional Species thereof; and an intentional Species may be understood by example of a red or green colour, occasioned by the shining of the Sun through red or green glass: for then we perceive the same colour cast upon any thing opposite; which redness or other colour, we call the intentional Species of the colour in that glass. And again, as this light, touching its simple nature, is no way yet understood: so it is disputed, whether this light first created, be the same which the Sun inhaleth and casteth forth, or whether it had continuance any longer than till the Sun's creation.

But by the most wise and unchanged order, which God observed in the works of the World, I gather, that the Light, in the first day created, was the substance of the Sun: for Moses repeateth twice the main part of the Universal: first, as they were created in matter; secondly, as they were adorned with form: first, naming the Heavens, the Earth, the Waters, all created, confused; and afterward, the Waters congregated, the Earth made dry Land; and the Heavens distinguished from both, and beautified. And therefore the Earth, as it was earth, before it was uncovered, and before it was called Arida, or dry Land, and the Waters were waters, before they were congregated and called the Sea, though neither of them perfect, or enriched with their virtual forms: So the Sun, although it had not its formal perfection, his circle, beauty, and bounded magnitude, till the fourth day, yet was the substance thereof in the first day (under the name of Light) created; and this Light formerly dispersed, fell in the same fourth day united, and set in the Firmament of Heaven: for, to Light created in the first day God gave no proper place or fixation: and therefore the effects named by Anticipation (which was to separate day from night) were precisely performed, after this Light was congregated, and had obtained life and motion. Neither did the wisdom of God find cause why it should move (by which motion, day and nights are distinguished) till then: because there was not yet any Creature produced, to which, by moving, the Sun might give Light, heat, and operation.

But after the Earth (distinguished from Waters) began to bud forth the bud of the Herb, &c. God caused the Sun to move, and (by interchange of time) to visit every part of the inferior World; by his heat to stir up the fire of generation, and to give activity to the seeds of all natures: For, as a King, which commandeth some goodly building to be erected, doth accommodate the same to that use and end, to which it was ordained; so it pleased God (saith Procopius) to command the Light to be: which by his all-powerful Word he approved, and approving it, disposed thereof, to the use and comfort of his future Creatures.

But in that the pleased God to ask of Job, By what way is the Light parted, and where is the way where Light dwelleth? we thereby know, that the nature thereof falleth not under man's understanding; and therefore let it suffice, that by God's grace we enjoy the effects thereof. For this light is of the Treasure of God (saith Eldras): And those which inhabit the Heavens, do only know the Essence thereof. Nihil ignotum in cælis, nihil novum in terra: Nothing unknown in Heavens, nothing perfectly known on Earth. Res vere sunt in mundo invisibiles, in mundo visibiles umbra rerum: Things themselves are in the invisible World; in the world visible, but their shadows. Surely, if this Light be not spiritual, yet it approacheth nearest unto spirituality; and if it have any corporality, then of all other the most subtle and pure; for howsoever, it is of all things seen, the most beautiful, and of the sweetest motion, of all other the most necessary and beneficial. For it ministereth unto men, and other creatures, all celestial influences; it dissipateth those dark thoughts and sorrows, which the darkness both begetteth and maintaineth; it discovereth unto us the glorious works of God, and carrieth up with an Angelical swiftness, our eyes unto Heaven, that by the light thereof, our minds being informed of this visible marvels, may continually travel to surmount these perceived Heavens, and to find out their omnipotent Cause and Creator. *Cognitio non quiescit in rebus creatis: Our knowledge doth not quiet it self in things created. Et ipsa hoc facit, ut cætera mundi membra digna sunt laudibus, cum suam bonitatem & decorem omnibus communicet: It is the Light (saith Saint Ambrose) that maketh the other parts of the world so worthy of praise, seeing that it self communicateth its goodness and beauty unto all. Of which, Ovid out of Orpheus:*

*Ille ego sum, cui longum metior annum,
Omnia qui video, per quem videt omnia mundus,
Mundi oculus.*

The world discerns it self, while I the World behold,
By me the longest years, and other times are told,
I the Worlds eye.

Lastly, If we may behold in any creature, any one spark of that eternal fire, or any far-off dawning of Gods glorious brightness, the same in the beauty, motion, and virtue of this Light, may be perceived. Therefore was God called Lux ipsa; and the Light, by Hermes, named Lux sancta; and Christ our Saviour said to be that Light which lighteth every man that cometh into the world. Yet in respect of Gods incomprehensible sublimity, and purity, this is also true, that He is neither a mind, nor a Spirit of the nature of other Spirits; nor a light, such as can be discerned. *Dens profectus non mens est, as verus ut si mens causa est; nec spiritus, sed causa quæ spiritus excitat; nec lumen, sed causa quæ lumen existit: God (saith Hermes in Poemandra) certainly is not a mind, but the cause that the mind hath his being; nor spirit, but the cause by which every spirit is; nor light, but the cause by which the light existeth.*

So then the Mist and Chaos being first created, void, dark, and unformed, was by the operative Spirit of God, pierced and quickened; and the Waters, having now received Spirit and motion, relieved their thinner parts into Ayr, which God illuminated: the Earth also by being contiguous, and mixt with waters (participating the same Divine virtue) brought forth for the bud of the herb that feedeth feed, &c. And for a mean and organ; by which this seed of Light to be might be continued, God appointed the Light to be united, and gave it also motion and heat, which heat caused a continuance of those several species, which the Earth (being made fruitful by the Spirit) produced, and with motion begat the time and times succeeding.

§. VIII.

Of the Firmament, and of the waters above the Firmament; and whether there be any Crystalline Heaven, or any Primum mobile.

After that the Spirit of God had moved upon the waters, and light was created, God said, Let there be a Firmament in the midst of the waters, and let it separate the waters from the waters: that is, those waters which by refraction and evaporation were ascended, and those of the Earth and Sea.

But these waters, separate above this Extension, which the Latine Translation calleth firmamentum, or expansion (for so Vasubius, Paganus, and Justin turn it) are not the Crystalline Heavens created in the imaginations of men; which opinion Basilus Magnus calleth a childish supposition, making in the same place many learned arguments against this fancy. For the waters above the firmament, are the waters in the Ayr above us, where the same is more solid and condense, which God separated from the neather waters by a firmament, that is, by an extended distance and vast space: the words Raquia (which Montanus writeth Rakighe) and Shamajim, being indifferently taken for the Heaven and for Ayr, and more properly for the Ayr and Æther, than for the Heavens, as the best Hebræicks understand them, Quo suprema ætremis ab infimis crassis diducta, interseclaque diftarent, for that whereby the supreme and thin bodies were placed in distance, being severed and cut off from low and gross matters; and the waters above the firmament, expressed in the word Majim, are in that tongue taken properly for the waters above the Ayr, or in the uppermost Region of the same.

And that the word Heaven is used for the Air, the Scriptures every where witness; as in the bleedings of Joseph, and in the 104. Psalm: * By these Springs shall the fount of the Heaven dwell; and upon Sodom and Gomorrah it rained brimstone and fire out of the Heaven; and in Isaac's blessing to Jacob; God gave thee the river of the dew of Heaven; and in Deuteronomy the 17. But the land whither you go to possess it, it is a land that drinketh water of the rains of Heaven: And in Job, Who hath ingendered the frost of Heaven? And in Saint Matthew, Behold the Founts of Heaven, for they flow not. So as in all the Scriptures of the Old Testament throughout, is the word Heaven very oft used for Air, and taken also hyperbolically for any great Height, as, Let us build us a Tower, whose top may reach to Heaven, &c. And in this very place Basil avoucheth, that this appellation of Heaven for the Firmament, is but by way of similitude: His own words be these: *Ex vocatur Deus firmamentum Cæli. Hoc appellatur aliis quidem proprie accommodatur, hinc autem vocatur ad similitudinem: And God called the firmament Heaven: This appellation (saith Basil) is properly applied to another (that is, to the Starry Heaven) but to this (that is, to the Firmament dividing the waters) it is applied by similitude. And if there were no other proof, that by the Firmament was meant the Air, and not the Heavens; the words of Moses in the eighth Verse, conferred with the same word Firmament in the twentieth Verse, make it manifest: For in the eighth Verse it is written, that God called the Firmament, which divided waters from waters, Heaven; and in the twentieth Verse he calleth the Firmament of Heaven, Air. In these words, And let the Fowl fly upon earth in the open Firmament of Heaven. And what use there should be of this Ice, or Crystalline, or watery Heaven, I conceive not, except it be to moderate and temper the heat, which the Primum mobile would otherwise gather and increase: though in very truth, instead of this help, it would add an unmeasurable greatness of Circle, whereby the swiftness of that first Moveable would exceed all possibility of belief. Sed nemo tenetur ad impossibilia; but no man ought to be held to impossibilities; and Faith it self (which surmounteth the height of all humane reason) hath for a forcible conductor the Word of Truth, which also may be called Lumen omnis rationis & intellectus; the light of all reason and understanding. Now that this supposed first Moveable, turneth it self so many hundred thousand Miles in an instant (seeing the Scriptures teach it not) let those that can believe mens imagination, apprehend it, for I cannot. But of these many Heavens, let the Reader that desireth satisfaction, search* Oromius; and of this watery Heaven, Basilus Magnus, in his Hexæm. fol. 40, 41, &c. and Martin Bernadus, in his second Book and sixth Chapter. For my self, I am persuaded, that the waters called, The waters above the Heavens; are but the Clouds and waters engendered in the uppermost Air.

A Conclusion, repeating the sum of the work in the Creation, which are reduced to three heads: The Creation of matter, The Forming of it, The Finishing of it.

To conclude, it may be gathered out of the first Chapter of Genesis, that this was the order of the most wise God in the beginning, and when there was no other Nature, or Being, but God's incomprehensible Eternity. First, he created the matter of all things; and in the first three days he distinguished, and gave to every nature his proper form; the form of levity to that which ascended; to that which descended, the form of gravity: for he separated light from darkness, divided waters from waters, and gathered the waters under the Firmament into one place. In the last three days, God adorned, beautified, and replenished the World: he set in the Firmament of Heaven, the Sun, Moon, and Stars; filled the Earth with Beasts, the Air with Fowl, and the Sea with Fish, giving to all that have life a power generative, thereby to continue their Species, and kinds; to Creatures vegetative and growing, their Seeds in themselves; for he created all things, that they might have their being; and the generations of the world are preferred.

That Nature, is no Principium per se; nor Form, the giver of Being; and of our ignorance how second cause should have any proportion with their effects.

And for this working-power, which we call Nature, the beginning of motion and rest, according to Aristotle; the same is nothing else, but the strength and faculty, which God hath infused into every Creature, having no other self-ability, than a Clock, after it is wound up by a man's hand, hath. Those therefore that attribute unto this faculty, any first or sole power, have therein no other understanding, than such a one hath, who looking into the Stern of a Ship, and finding it guided by the Helm and Rudder, doth ascribe some absolute virtue to the piece of wood, without all consideration of the hand that guides it, or of the judgment, which also directeth and commandeth that hand: forgetting in this and in all else, that by the virtue of the first act, all Agents work whatsoever they work: Virtute primi actus, agentis omnia quicquid agunt: For as the mind of man seeth by the Organ of the eye, heareth by the ears, and maketh choice by the will: and therefore we attribute fight to the eye, and hearing to the ears, &c. and yet it is the mind only, that giveth ability, life, and motion to all these his Instruments and Organs; so God worketh by Angels, by the Sun, by the Stars, by Nature or infused properties, and by men as by several Organs, several effects; all second causes whatsoever, being but instruments, conduits, and pipes, which carry and disperse what they have received from the head and fountain of the Universal. For as it is Gods infinite power, and every-where-preference (compelling, embracing, and piercing all things) that giveth to the Sun power to draw up vapours, to be made clouds; clouds to contain rain, and rain to fall: so all second and instrumental causes together with Nature men, but an idle voice, whereby we express fancies; how comes it then, that so many worthy and wise men depend upon so many unworthy and empty-headed fools? That riches and honour are given to external men, and without kernel; and so many learned, virtuous, and valiant men wear out their lives in poor and dejected estates? In a word, there is no other inferior, or apparent cause, beside the partiality of man's affection, both the fashioning of our selves according to the nature of the times wherein we live: For whatsoever is most able, and best sufficient to discern, and hath wishal an honest and openhearted loving truth; if Princes, or those that govern, endure no other discourse than their own flatteries: then, I say, such a one, whose virtue and courage forbideth him to be base and a dissembler, shall evermore hang under the wheel; which kind of deferring well and receiving ill, we always fairly charge Fortune withal. For whatsoever shall tell any great Man or Magistrate, that he is not just; the General of an Army, that he is not valiant; and great Ladies that they are not fair; shall never be made a Counsellor, a Captain, or a Courtier. Neither is it sufficient to be wife with a wife Prince, valiant with a valiant, and just with him that is just, for such a one hath no estate in his prosperity; but he must qualify himself with the tyde of the time, and alter form and condition, as the Estate or the Estate's Master chageth: Otherwise how were it possible, that the most base men, and separate from all imitable qualities, could so often attain to honour and riches; but by such an obsequious slavish course? These men having nothing else to value themselves by, but a counterfeit kind of wondering at other men, and by making them believe that all their vices are virtues, and all their dusty actions cristalline, have yet in all Ages prospered equally with the most virtuous, if not exceeded them. For, according to Memander, Omnes insipientes, arrogantis & plausibus capiunt: Every fool is won with his own pride, and others flatterings applauds: So as whoever will live altogether out of himself, and study other mens humours, and observe them, shall never be unfortunate; and on the contrary, that man which prizeth truth and virtue (except the season wherein he liveth be all of these, and of all sorts of goodness, fruitful) shall never prosper.

per by the possession or profession thereof. It is also a token of a wordly wife man, not to war or contend in vain against the nature of times wherein he liveth: for such a one is often the author of his own misery; but he that were to follow the advice, which the Pope gave the Bishop of that Age, out of Ovid, while the Arian Heretic raged:

Dum furor in cursu est, currenti cede furori.

Ovid. Met. lib. 1.

While fury gallops on the way,
Let no man furie's gallop stay.

And if Cicero (than whom that world begat not a man of more reputed judgment) had followed the counsel of his Brother Quintus, Potiusse integro cadavere sepeliri: in laqueo suo mori, potiusse integro cadavere sepeliri: He might then have died the death of nature, and been with an unruined and undiscovered body buried; For, as Petrarch is in the same place noteth, Quid stultum quoniam desperantem, (presertim de effluvio) liliis perperis implicari? What more foolish than for him that despairs (especially of the effluvio) to be entangled with endless contentions? Whofoever therefore will bet for him Madame's two marks to shoot at (to wit) Riches, and Glory, must let on and take off a back of Iron to a weak wooden Bow, that it may fit both the strong and the feeble; for as he nift desired to add sails to rowing Vessels, did either to proportion them as being fastened aloft, and towards the head of his Mast, he might abide all winds and storms, or else he sometime or other perished by his own invention: so that man which prizeth virtue for it self, and cannot endure to hoist and strike his sails, as the divers natures of calms and storms require, must cut his sails and his cloth of mean length and breadth, and content himself with a slow and sure navigation, (to wit) a mean and free estate. But of this dispute of Fortune, and the rest, or whatsoever Lords or Gods, imaginary powers, or causes, the wit (or rather foolishness) of man hath found out: Let us resolve with Saint Paul, who hath taught us, that there is but one God, the Father, of whom are all things, and we in him; and one Lord Iesus Christ, by whom are all things, and we by him; there are diversities of operations, but God is the same which worketh all in all.

CHAP. II.

Of Man's estate in his first Creation, and of God's rest.

S. I.

Of the Image of God, according to which Man was first created.

Gen. 1. 26.
THe creation of all other Creatures being finished, the Heavens adorned, and the Earth replenished, God said, Let us make man in our own Image, according to our likeness. Man is the last and most admirable of God's works to us known: *Legens mirabilem hominem, Man is the greatest wonder (which Plato out of Mercurius: Nature ardentissima artificem, The artificial work of the most ardent or fire-like nature (as saith Zoroaster) though the same be meant, not for any excellency external, but in respect of his internal form, both in the Nature, Qualities, and other Attributes thereof: in nature, because it hath an essence, immortal, and spiritual; in qualities, because the same was by God created holy and righteous in truth; in other attributes, because man was made Lord of the World, and of the Creatures therein.*

Sententia his animal, mentisq; capacis alie, Deceat addere, & quod dominari in cetera possit: Naturus homo est.

More holy than the rest, and understanding more,
A living creature wants, to rule all made before.
So man began to be.

Of this Image and Similitude of God, there is much dispute among the Fathers, Schoolmen, & late Writers: Some of the Fathers conceive, that man was made after the Image of God, in respect chiefly of Empire and Dominion; as S. Chrysostom, Ambrose, and some others; which S. Ambrose denieth to the woman in his words, Ubi fuit Deus natus: ubi non fuit homo sensus; & quomodo ex Deo non omnia, ita ex uno homine non omnia esset super faciem totius terre: non igitur, sensum fecit, qui unitatis eius habere imaginem; That as God is one

ent, one man might be made by him, and that in what manner all things are of one God, likewise of one man the whole kind should be upon the face of the whole earth: Therefore he being one, made one, that should have the Image of his unity. But whereas it is gathered out of the following words of the same Verse, that man was after the Image of God in respect of rule and power; it is written Dominamus in plurali numero; and let them rule over the fish in the Sea, &c. Others therefore cannot the woman be excluded. Others conceive, that Man is said to be after the Image of God in respect of his immortal soul only: because as God is invisible, so the soul of man is invisible; as God is immortal and incorporeal, so is the soul of Man immortal and incorporeal; and as there is but one God which governeth the World, so but one soul which governeth the body of man; and as God is wholly in every part of the world, so is the soul of man wholly in every part of the body: *Anima est tota in toto, & tota in qualibet parte: The soul is wholly in the whole body, and wholly in every part thereof, according to *Aristotle; though Chalcidius, and other learned men deny that Doctrine; which that it is otherwise than potentially true, all the Antiochians in the World shall never prove. These and the like arguments do the Jews make (saith Tertullian) and these resemblances, between the infinite God, and the finite Man.

The School-men resemble the Mind or Soul of Man to God, in this respect especially; because that as in the Mind there are three distinct powers, or faculties (to wit) Memory, Understanding, and Will; and yet all these being of real differences, are but one Mind: so in God there are three distinct persons, the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, and yet but one God. They also make the Image and Similitude divers; add again, they distinguish between Imaginem Dei, and Imaginem Dei; and spin into small threads with subtle distinctions, many times the plainness and fulfille of the Scriptures: their wis being like that strong water, that eateth thorough and dissolveth the purest Gold. Victorinus also maketh the Image of God to be substantial, but not the similitude: Sed in substantia nostra qualitates declarationum: A word declaring quality in the substance. Out of which words, and that which followeth, it is inferred, that as the Image and Similitude do greatly differ, so the sinful soul doth not therefore leave to be the Image of God; but it hath not his Similitude, except it be holy and righteous. S. Augustine also against Adversus Manicheos affirmeth, that by sin, the perfection of this Image is lost in man; and in his Retractions maintaineth the same opinion, and also affirmeth that the Similitude is more largely taken, than the Image.

But howsoever the School-men and others distinguish, or whatsoever the Fathers conceive; sure I am, that S. Paul maketh the same sense of the Image, which Victorinus doth of the similitude, who saith: As we have borne the Image of the earthly, so shall we bear the Image of the heavenly; and it cannot be gathered out of the Scripture, that the words Image and Similitude were used but in one sense, and in this place the better to express each other; whatsoever Lombard hath said to the contrary. For God knows, what a multitude of meanings the wit of man imagineth to himself in the Scriptures, which neither Moses, the Prophet, or Apollonius, ever conceived. Now as S. Paul useth the word (Image) for both: so S. James useth the word (Similitude) for both, in these words: Therewith blest we God even the Father, and therewith curse we Men, which are made after the similitude of God. Howsoever therefore S. Augustine seemeth, out of a kind of elegance in writing, to make some difference: as where he writeth, Conferimus imaginem in eterni-

rate, similitudinem in eternum inveniri; we confess that this Image is found in eternity, but his similitude in manners; that is in the spiritual dispositions and qualities of the mind; yet thus he elsewhere speaketh plainly: Quasi vero possit esse imago aliqua, in qua similitudo non sit: si enim omnino similitudo non est, procul dubio nec imago est: As if (saith he) there could be any image, where the similitude is not: no, out of doubt, where there is no likeness, there is no image. The very words of the Text make this most manifest, as, Let us make man in our image, according to our likeness; which is, Let us make man in our image, that he may be like us; and in the next Verse following, God himself maketh it plain; for there he useth the word (Image) only as thus: God created the man in his image, in the image of God created he him. And to take away all dispute or ambiguity, in the first Verse of the fifth Chapter, the word (Similitude) is used again by it self, In the day that God created Adam, in the likeness of God made he him. And this similitude S. Paul, Calist. the third, calleth the Image; Put on (saith he) the new man which is renewed in knowledge after the image of him that created him. And in Syriac it is written, He made them according to his image. Now if we may believe S. Paul before Peter Lombard and other School-men, then it is as manifest as words can make it, that the image and similitude is but the same; for S. Paul useth both the words directly in one fence, For they turned the glory of the incorruptible God, to the

Rom. 1. 23.

similitude of the image of a corruptible man. Zanchius laboureth to prove, that Man was formed 2 Cor. 8. 6. after the image of God, both in body and mind: Nulla op. di. pars in homine, quae non fuerit huiusmodi imaginis participans: No part in a man (saith he) which was not participating God's image; for God said, Let us make man according to our own image. But the soul alone is not man, but the Hypostasis or whole man compounded of body and soul. The body of man (saith he) is the image of the world, and called therefore Microcosmus; but the idea, and exemplar of the world was first in God, so that man, according to his body, must needs be the image of God. Against which opinion of this learned man, his own objection seemeth to me sufficient, where he allegeth that it may be said, that Moses spake by the figure Synecdoche, As when a man is called a mortal man, yet is not the whole man mortal, but the body only: so when God said, Let us make man after our image, he meant the soul of man, and not the body of earth and dust: *Maledictus qui Deitatem ad hominis lineamenta refert (saith S. Augustine:) Cursed is he that referreth the Deity of God to the lineaments of man's body: Deus enim non est humane forme participans, neque corpus humane divine (saith Philos;) God is not partaker of humane form, nor humane body of the form divine*. The Hebrew word for image, is Selem, which signifieth a shadow or obscure resemblance: Is imagine petra factus homo; Man possess a way in a shadow: Let us then know and consider, that God, who is eternal and infinite, hath not any bodily shape or composition; for it is both against his Nature and his Word; an error of the Anthropomorphite, against the very essence and Majesty of God.

Surely Cicero, who was but a Heathen, had yet a more divine understanding than these grose Heretics: Ad similitudinem Dei proprius accedebat humana virtus, quam figura: The virtue which is in man (saith he) came nearer the similitude of God than the figure. For God is a spiritual substance, invisible, and most simple; God is a just God, God is Merciful, God is Charity it self, and in a word Goodness it self, and none else simply good. And thus much it hath pleased God himself to teach us, and to make us know of himself. What then can be the shadow of such a substance, the image of such a nature, or wherein can man be said to resemble his unexcogitable power and perfectness perfectest? Certainly, not in Dominion, for the Devil is said to be the Prince of this World, and the Kingdom of Christ was not thereof. Neither be-true and perfect Image of his Father. Neither because man hath an immortal soul, therein the calculation of Memory, Understanding, and Will; for the Devils are also immortal, and participate those faculties, being called Demour, because scienter of knowledge and subtilty: Neither because we are reasonable creatures, by which we are distinguished from beasts:

For who have rebelled against God? Who have made gods of the vilest beasts, of Serpents, of Cats, of Owls, yea, even of shameful parts, of lusts and pleasures, yet reasonable? Yet do I not condemn the opinion of S. Chrysostom and Ambrose, as touching Dominion, but that, in respect thereof, man was in some sort after the image of God, if we take Dominion, such as it ought to be, that is, accompanied with Justice and Piety; for God did not only make man a Ruler and Governour over the Fishes of the Sea, a Ruler and Governour (or of the Air) and over the Beasts of the Field; But God gave unto man a dominion over men, he appointed Kings to govern them, and Judges to judge them in equity. Neither do I exclude Reason, as it is the ability of Understanding.
For I do not conceive, that Irenaeus did therefore call Man, the image of God, because he was animal ration-abile, nor only; but that he understood it better, with Sybillæ, Imago mea est homo, rationem habens; Man that is endued with right reason / sicula ressembl-ant (that is) by right reason to know and confess God his Creator, and the fame God to serve, love, and obey: and therefore S. Augustine (who here calleth nearer the Truth) Feeli Deus benigne ad imaginem et similitudinem suam in mente; God made man in respect of the intellectu after his own image and similitude;
And Reyniers, Homo, quod habet mentem, scilicet est ad imaginem Dei; Man was made after the image of God, in mind, or, in that he hath a mind.

and eternal light illighted. And this Mens, others call Animam animæ. The soul of the soul; or, with S. Augustine, the eye of the soul, or receptacle of Sapience and divine Knowledge, Quæ animam sapientia tanquam ducentur sequitur. Which follows after the love of sapience as her guide (faith Philos) between which and reason; between which and the mind, called anima; and between which and that power which the Latines call animus, there is this difference: Reason, is that faculty by which we live, and discourse; Animus, by which we live. Hereof it is said, Animas corpus animæ, id est, vivificat; or, The soul is that which doth animate the body; that is, gives it life: for death is the separation of body and soul: and the same strength (faith Philos) which God the great Director hath in the World, the same hath this Animæ, or mind, or, soul in Man. Animus, is that, by which we will and make election; and to this Esprit agreeeth, Perspicacem animæ Mens, or divine understanding; Perspicacem animæ partem. The preceiving part of the mind, or, The light by which the soul discerneth: Dormientium mens, non animæ; Sopitis; & in sleep it is this (mens), or, understanding; la mens that sleep it is this (mens), or, understanding, and not the mind or soul, which refrigit, underling which time it is but habitual in wile men, and in mad mens (mens) is extinguished, and not the soul; for mad men do live, though distracted.

Therefore this word being used oft for the Soul giving life, is attributed abusively to mad men, when we say that they are of a distracted mind, in stead of a broken understanding; which word (Mind) we use also for Opinion, as, I am of this mind, or, that mind: and sometimes for mens conditions or virtues, as, He is of an honest mind, or, a man of a just mind: sometimes for Affection, as, I do this for my mind's sake: and Aristotle sometimes useth this word (Mens) for the phantasie, which is the strength of the imagination: sometimes for the knowledge of principles, which we have without discourse: oftentimes for Spirits, Angels, and Intelligences: but as it is used in the proper signification, including both the understanding agree and possible, it is described to be, A pure, simple, substantial act, not depending upon matter, but having relation to that which is intelligible, as to his first object: or more at large, thus, A part or parcel of the soul, whereby it doth understand, not depending upon matter, nor needing any organ, free from passion coming from without, and apt to be diversified, as externally from that which is mortal. Hereof expresseth Mercurius; Animæ est imago mentis, mens imago Dei. Dens mens præfens mens, anima corpori: The Soul (meaning that which is anima, anima corpori) is the image of this understanding; or Mens; and this (Mens) or understanding is the image of God. And this (Mens) or understanding, this Soul is Prefens or Ruler over this understanding, this Soul is Prefens or Ruler over the body, understanding over the soul, and this Soul over the body.

This division and distinction out of the Platonick; and Peripateticke, I leave to the Reader to judge of. That Mens humana hath no need of any organ, Marfilus Ficinus in his ninth Book of the Souls Immortality, laboureth to prove. Zanchius doth not differ from Ficinus in words; for (faith he) Ad facultatem intellectum exercendam, non eget Mens organo; tanquam intellectus, per quod intelligit, in quantumque ejus objecto in quod intuetur, & ex quo intelluctum concipiat. Hæc autem objectum sunt phantasmata, seu verum à sensibus perceptum simulachra ad phantasmata proleata: To exercise the faculty of understanding, the mind of man (faith he) needs not an instrument, as a mean; by which it may understand: but it needs not an object, whereto to look, and whence to conceive the act of understanding. This object are the phantasms, or carried to the phantasie. But in effect, his conclusion seemeth to carry a contrary sense, when he maketh the Phantasie, in representing the object to the understanding, to be a corporal Organum; neither can it be understood to be an Organum of any thing, but of the understanding. And he addeth, that the resemblance of things in mans imagination, are to be his understanding and mind, as colours are to the sight; whence it is to followeth, that imagination or phantasy is self is to the faculty of understanding, as the eye is to the faculty of seeing; and as this is an Organum, so that. Of the question, How the mind in all her actions maketh use of the body, and hath communion with the body, I refer the Reader to a most grave and learned Diviner, I refer the Reader to M. D. Billon, late Bishop of Winchester, unto his Book of Jacob. Howsoever the Truth be determined, we must conclude, that it is neither in respect of reason alone, by which we discourse, nor in respect of the mind it self, by which we live, nor in respect of our souls simply, by which we are immortal, that we are made after the Image of God. But most mainly may we resemble our selves to God in memory, and in respect of that pure faculty, which is never separated from the contemplation and love of God. Yet this is not all; for Saint Bernard maketh a true difference between the nature and faculties of the Mind of our souls, and between the infusion of qualities, endowments and gifts of grace, wherewith it is adorned and enriched, which, being added to the nature, effect, and faculties, maketh it altogether to be after the Image of God: quia sua membris are these, Nos propterea Imago Dei est, quia sua membris Mens, Iteque iudicij et dilecti (which also was the opinion of St. Augustine), Id est quia potest membris, intelligere, ac diligere cum a quo fita est, (that is) The Mind (or Mens) was not therefore the Image of God, because it remembereth, understandeth, and loveth it self; but because it can remember, understand, and love God, who created it. And that this Image may be deformed and made unprofitable, hear Ezkiel, Homo uid Imaginem et Similitudinem Dei factus est Peccatorum vero Imaginis huius probitudo inveni deformatus, et intus in re reddidit, dum animam corruptam inconspicibilem affudit inmersit: Man was made after the Image and Similitude of God, but Sin had deformed the beauty of this Image, and made it unprofitable, by drawing our minds into corrupt and unprofitable blood-thirsty path is not, for God is Charity and Mercy it self; Falldown, cunning, practice, and ambition, are properties of Satan; and therefore cannot dwell in one soul, together with God: and to be thort, 2 cor. 6. there is no likelihood between pure light and black darkness, between beauty and deformity, or between righteousness and reprobation. And though Nature, according to common understanding, have made us capable by the power of reason, and apt enough to receive this Image of God's goodness, which the sensual souls of Beasts cannot perceive; yet were that aptitude natural more inclinable to follow and embrace the false and durefils pleasures of this Sragy-play World, than to become the shadow of God by walking after him, had not the exceeding workmanship of God's Willdom, and the liberality of His Mercy, formed eyes to our souls, as to our bodies, which, piercing through the impurity of our flesh, behold the highest Heaven; and thence bring knowledge and Object to the Mind and Soul, to contemplate the ever-during Glory, and term-les Joy, prepared for those which retain the Image and Similitude of their Creator, preserving undeknd and unrent the garment of the new man, which, after the Image of God, is created in Righteousness, and Holiness, as Iohn 8, Paul. Now whereas it is thought by some of the Fathers, as by S. Augustine, with whom S. Ambrose joyneth, that S. Ambrose by fin, the perfection of the Image is lost, and not the Image it self: both opinions by this distinction may be well reconciled (to wit) that the Image of God, in man, may be taken two wayes; for, either it is considered according to natural gifts, and consisteth therein; namely, to have a reasonable and understanding nature, &c. and in this sense, the Image of God is more lost by fin than the very reasonable or understanding nature, &c. is lost, (for in doth not abolish and take away these natural gifts:) or; the Image of God is considered, according to supernatural gifts, namely, of divine Grace and heavenly Glory, which is indeed the perfection and accomplishment of the natural Image; and this manner of linitude and Image of God is wholly blotted out, and destroyed by Sin.

Job 10. 21. Job, that we might go the way from whence we shall not re-
 Job 17. 13. turn, and that our bed is made ready for us in the dark;

Ecc. 12. 14. And then, I say, looking over late into the bottom of our conscience (which Pleasure and Ambition had locked up from us all our lives,) we behold therein the fearful Images of our actions past, and withal this terrible Inscription: That God will bring every work into judgment, that man hath done under the Sun.

But what examples have ever moved us? what persuasions reformed us? or what threatenings made us afraid? we behold other mens Tragedies played before us, we hear what is promised and threatened: but the World's bright glory hath put out the eyes of our minds, and thence betraying lights, (with which we only feed) do neither look up towards term-less joys, nor down towards endless sorrows, till we neither know, nor can look for any thing else at the Worlds hands. Of which excellently Marius Victor:

*Nil hostes, nil dira famas, nil denique morbi
 Egerunt, juvenes, qui mox famas, illicque periculi.
 Tentati: nihil meliores reddimus unquam,
 Sub vitis nullo caluparnum sine manentes.*

Diseases, famine, enemies, in us no change have wrought,
 What or if we were, we are; still in the same snare caught:
 No time can our corrupted manners mend;
 In Vice we dwell, in Sin that hath no end.

But let us not flatter our immortal Souls herein; for to neglect God all our lives, and know that we neglect him; to offend God voluntarily, and know that we offend him, calling our hopes on the Peace, which we trust to make at parting, is no other then a rebellious presumption, and (that which is the worst of all) even a contemptuous laughing to scorn, and deriding of God, his Laws and Precepts. Fructus sperans qui sic de misericordia Dei sibi blandiuntur; They hope in vain, sith Bernard, which in this sort flatter themselves with Gods mercy.

§. IV.

Of the Spirit of Life, which God breathed into man in his creation.

IN this frame and carcass God breathed the breath of life; and the man was a living Soul: (that is) God gave a body of Earth and of corruptible matter, a Soul spiritual and incorruptible; not that God had any such bodily instruments as men use, but God breathed the Spirit of Life and Immortality into man, as he breatheth his grace daily into such as love and fear him. The Spirit of God (saith Eliphaz in Job) hath made me, and the breath of the Almighty hath given me life: In qua sententia (saith Rabanus) vixit et post-

*peris sensus carnis, se foris potentes Dnum, vel manibus corporis, se limo formisse corpus humanum, vel facibus aut labiis suis inspirasse in sacrum formatum, ut vivere possit & spiritum vite habere: Nam & Prophetia canit, Manus tue fecerunt me, &c. tropica hac locutione magis quam propria, (id est, iuxta consuetudinem, quod solent homines operari) loquutus est: In which sentence (saith he) the beggariness of carnal sense is to be avoided, but perhaps we should think, either that God with bodily hands made mans body of slime, or breathed with jaws or lips upon his face (being formed) that he might live, and have the Spirit of life: for the Prophet also when he saith, Thy hands have made me, spake this Tropically, rather then properly (that is) according to the custom which men use in working. Quantum est periculi his, qui Scripturas sensu corpore legunt? In what danger are they that read the Scriptures in a carnal sense? For this breath was infused into man, both life and Soul, and therefore this (Soul) the Philosophers call Animam, quæ vivificat corpus, & animat; Which doth animate and give life to the body. The inspiration of the Almighty giveth understanding, saith Job; and this spirit, which God breathed into man, which is the reasonable soul of man, returneth again to God that gave it, as the body returneth unto the Earth, out of which it was taken; according to Ecclesiastes: And dust shall return to the Earth, Ecc. 12. out of which it was taken, and the spirit shall return to God, that gave it. Neither is this word (Spirit) usually otherwise taken in the Scriptures, then for the Soul; as when Stephen cried unto God: Domine, respice spiritum meum; Lord, Jesus receive my spirit: and in S. Johns, And Jesus bowed his head and gave up the Ghost, or Spirit; (which was) that his life and soul left his body dead. And that the immortal Soul of man differeth from the souls of beasts, the manner of creation maketh it manifest: for it is written, Let the waters bring forth in abundance every creeping thing, and the Earth bring forth the living thing according to his kind, the beast of the Earth, &c. But of man it is written, Let us make man in our own Image, &c. and further, that the Lord breathed in his face the breath of life. Wherefore, Gen. 2. 7. as from the Water and Earth were those creatures brought forth, and thence received life, so shall they again be dissolved into the same first matter, whence they were taken: but the life of breath everlasting, which God breathed into Man, shall, according to Ecclesiastes, return again to God that gave it.*

§. V.

That man is (as it were) a little World: with a digression touching our mortality.

MAN, thus compounded and formed by God, was an abstract or model, or brief Story in the Universal: in whom God concluded the Creation, and work of the World, and whom he made the last, and most excellent of his Creatures, being internally endued with a divine understanding, by which he might contemplate, and serve his Creator, after whose Image he was formed, and endued with the powers and faculties of Reason and other abilities, that thereby also he might govern and rule the World, and all other Gods Creatures therein. And whereas God created three sorts of living natures, (to wit) Angelical, Rational, and Brutal; giving to Angels an intellectual, and to Beasts a sensual nature, he vouchsafed unto Man, both the intellectual of Angels, the sensitive of Beasts, and the proper rational belonging unto man: and therefore (saith Gregory Nazianzen) Homo est utriusque nature vinculum, Man is the bond and chain which stric together both Natures: and because in the little World, frame of man's body there is a representation of the Universal, and (by allusion) a kind of participation of all the parts there, therefore was man called Microcosmus, or the little World. Dem igitur hominem factum, velut atomum quendam mundum, in brevi magnam, et in exiguo totum, in tenui statum; God therefore placed in the Earth the man whom he had made, as it were another little World: the great and large World in the small and little World: for out of the Earth and Dust, was formed the flesh of man, and therefore heavy and lumpish: the bones of his body we may compare to the hard Rocks and Stones, and therefore strong and durable; of which Ovid:

Quid. Mt. Inde genus durum sumus, experientique laborum, I. 1. Et documenta damus: quæ finis origine nati:

From thence our Kind hard-hearted is,
 enduring pain and care,
 Approving, that our bodies of a stony nature are.

His blood, which disperseth it self by the branches of veins through all the body, may be resembled to those waters, which are carried by Brooks and Rivers over all the earth; his breath to the Air, his natural heat to the insolved warmth which the Earth hath in it self, which, stirred up by the heat of the Sun, assisteth Nature in the speedier procreation of those varieties, which the Earth bringeth forth; Our radical Moisture, Oyl, or Balsamum (whereon the natural heat feedeth and is maintained) is resembled to the fat and fertility of the Earth; the hairs of mans body, which adorns or overlathows it, to the grass, which covereth the upper face and Skin of the Earth; our generative power, to Nature, which produceth all things; our determinations, to the light, wandering, and unstable clouds, carried every where with uncertain winds; our eyes to the light of the Sun and Moon; and the beauty of our youth, to the flowers of the Spring; which, either in a very short time, or with the Sun's heat, dry up and wither away, or the fierce puffs of wind blow them from the stalks; the thoughts of our mind; to the motion of Angels; and our pure understanding (formerly called Mens, and that which always looketh upwards) to those intellectual Natures, which are always present with God; and lastly, our immortal souls (while they are righteous) are by God himself beautified with the title of his own Image and Similitude. And although, in respect of God, there is no man just, or good, or righteous (for, In Angelis depræbensa est iustitia, Bebold, He found folly in his Angels, saith Job;) yet, with such a kind of difference, as there is between the substance and the shadow, there may be found a goodness in men: which God being pleased to accept, hath therefore called Man, the Image and Similitude of his own Righteousness. In this also is the little World of man compared, and made more like the Universal (man being the measure of all things. Homo est mensura omnium rerum, saith Aristotle and Pythagoras) that the four Complexions resemble the four Elements, and the seven Ages of man the seven Planets; Whereof, our infancy is compared to the Moon, in which we seem only to live and grow, as Plants; the second Age to Mars, wherein we are taught and instructed; our third Age to Venus, the fourth to the days of Love, Desire, and Vanity; the fourth to the Sun, the strong, flourishing, and beautiful age of mans life; the fifth to Mars, in which we seek honour and Victory, and in which our thoughts travel to ambitious ends; the sixth Age is ascribed to Ju- pter, in which we begin to take account of our times, judge of our selves, and grow to the perfection of our understanding: the last and seventh, to Saturn, wherein our days are sad, and over-cast, and in which we find by dear and lamentable experience, and by the loss which can never be repaired, that of all our vain passions and affections past, the sorrow only abideth: Our attendants are sicknesses, and variable infirmities, and by how much the more we are accompanied with plenty, by so much the more greedily is our end desired, whom when Time hath made unforcible to others, we become a burthen to our selves: being of no other use, then to hold the riches we have from our Successors. In this time it is, when (as aforesaid) we, for the most part, and never before, prepare for our eternal habitation, which we pass on unto with many sighs, groans, and sad thoughts, and in the end, by the workmanship of death, finish the sorrowful business of a wretched life; towards which we always travel both sleeping and waking: neither have those beloved companions of honour and riches any power at all to hold us any one day, by the glorious promise of entertainments; but by what crooked path soever we walk, the same leadeth on directly to the house of death, whose doors lie open at all hours, and to all persons. For this side of mans life, after it once turneth and declineth, ever runneth with a perpetual Ebb and falling Stream, but never floweth again: our Leaf once fallen; springeth no more; we neither doth the Sun or the Summer adorn us again, with the garments of new Leaves and Flowers.

*Redditur arboribus flores reuertentibus ætas,
 Ergo non homini, quod fuit ætæ, redit.*

To which I give this fence.

The Plants and Trees made poor and old
 By Winter envious,
 The Spring-time bounteous
 Covers again from shame and cold:
 But never man repair'd again
 His youth and beauty lost,
 Though Art, and care, and cost,
 Do promise Nature's help in vain.

And of which,

CATULLUS, EPIGRAM. 53.

*Sæles occidere & redire possunt:
 Nobis enim semel occidit brevis lux,
 Nox est perpetua una dormienda.*

The Sun may set and rise:
 But we contrariwise
 Sleep after our short light
 Once everlasting night.

For if there were any baying place, or rest, in the course or race of man's life, then, according to the doctrine of the Academick, the same might also perpetually be maintained; but as there is a continuance of motion in natural living things, and as the lap and joyce, wherein the life of Plants is preferred, doth evermore ascend or descend; so is it with the life of man, which is always either increasing toward ripeness and perfection, or declining and decreasing toward rottenness and dissolution.

§. VI.

§. VI.

Of the free power, which man had in his first Creation, to dispose of himself.

THESE be the mysteries which our first Parents brought on all Mankind, unto whom God in his Creation gave a free and unconstrained will, and on whom he bestowed the liberal choice of all things, with one only Prohibition, to try his gratitude and obedience. God set before him, a mortal and immortal Life, a natural celestial and terrene, and (indeed) God gave man to himself, to be his own Guide, his own Workman, and his own Painter, that he might frame or describe unto himself what he pleased, and make election of his own form. God made man in the beginning, (saith Siracides) and left him in the hands of his own counsel. Such was the liberality of God, and man's felicity: whereas Beasts, and all other Creatures reasonless, brought with them into the World (saith Lucilius), and that even when they first fell from the bodies of their Dams, the Nature, which they could not change; and the supernal Spirits or Angels were from the beginning, or soon after, of that condition, in which they remain in perpetual eternity. But (as aforesaid) God gave unto man all kind of Seeds and Grafts of life (to wit) the vegetative life of Plants, the sensual of Beasts, the rational of Man, and the intellectual of Angels; whereof of which forever he took pleasure to plant and cultivate, the same should futrely grow in him, and bring forth fruit, agreeable to his own choice and plantation. This freedom of the first man Adam, and our first Father, was enigmatically described by Alepleus Atbeniensis (saith Mirandula) in the person and Fable of Proteus, who was said, as often as he pleased, to change his shape. To the same end were all those celebrated Metamorphoses among the Pythagoreans, and ancient Poets, wherein it was fained, That men were transformed into divers shapes of beasts, thereby to shew the change of mens conditions, from Reason to Brutality, from Virtue to Vice, from Meekness to Cruelty, and from Justice to Oppression. For by the lively Image of other creatures did those divines represent the variable passions, and affections of mortal men; as by Serpents were signified Deceivers; by Lions, Oppressors and Cruel men; by Swine, Men given over to lust and sensuality; by Wolves, ravening, and greedy men; which also S. Matthew Mat. 23. 15. telleth to false Prophets, which come to you in sheeps clothing, but inwardly they are ravening Wolves: by the Images of itones and Rocks, foolish and ignorant Men; by Vipers, ungrateful Men: of which S. John Baptist Mat. 23. 15. O ye generation of Vipers, &c.

§. VII.

Of God's ceasing to create any more: and of the cause thereof, because the Universal created was exceeding good.

IN this work of Man, God finished the Creation; not that God laboured as a man, and therefore rested: for God commanded, and it was finished, Cui voluisse est fecisse; With whom, so will is to make, saith Beda. Neither did God rest, that he left the World made, and the Creatures therein to themselves: for My Father worketh to this day (saith Christ), and I work; but God rested (that is) he created no new Species or kinds of Creatures, but (as aforesaid) gave unto man a power generative, and so to the rest of living Creatures, to Plants and Flowers, their seeds in themselves; and commanded Man to multiply and fill the Earth, and the Earth and Sea to bring forth Creatures according to their several kinds: all which being finished, God saw that his Works were good; not that he foreknew not, and comprehended not, the beginning and end before they were; for God made every Plant of the field before it was in the Earth; but he gave to all things which he had created the name of Good, thereby to teach men, that from so good a God there was nothing made, but that which was perfect good, and from whose full purity and from so excellent a cause there could proceed no impure or imperfect effect. For man having a free will and liberal choice, purchased by disobedience his own death and mortality; and for the cruelty of man's heart, was the Earth afterward cursed, and all Creatures of the first Age destroyed, but the righteous man Noah and his Family, with those Creatures which the Ark contained, reserved by God to replenish the Earth.

CHAP. III.

Of the place of Paradise.

§. I.

That the Seat of Paradise is greatly mistaken: and that it is no marvel that men should erre.

CONCERNING the first Habitation of man, we read, that the Lord God planted a Garden Eastward in Eden, and there he put the man whom he made, Gen. 2. 6. Of this feat and place of Paradise, all Ages have held dispute; and the Opinions and Judgments have been in effect, as divers, among those that have written upon this part of Genesis, as upon any one place therein, seeming most obscure: Some there are, that have conceived the being of the terrestrial Paradise, without all regard of the World's Geography, and without any respect of the East and West, or any consideration of the place where Moses wrote, and from whence he directed (by the quarters of the Heavens) the way how to find out and judge, in what Region of the World this Garden was by God planted, wherein he was exceeding respectue and precise. Others, bybging themselves ignorant in the Hebrew, followed the first Interpretation; or, trusting to their own judgments, understood one place for another; and one Error is so fruitful, as it begetteth a thousand Children, if the licentiousness thereof be not timely restrained. And thirdly, those Writers which gave themselves to follow and imitate others, were in all things to observe Sectators of those Masters, whom they admired and believed in, as they thought it safer to condemn their own understanding, then to examine theirs. For (saith Vadianus in his Epistle of Paradise) Magnos errores, magnorum virorum auctoritate perfusi, transmissimus: We pass over many gross errors, by the authority of great men led and persuaded. And it is true, that many of the Fathers were far wide from the understanding of this place. I speak it not, that I myself dare presume to censure them, for I reverence both their Learning and their Piety, and yet not bound to follow them any further, than they are guided ded by truth: for they were men; Et humani est errare. And to the end that no man should be proud of himself; GOD hath distributed unto men such a proportion of Knowledge, as the wisest may behold in themselves their own weakness: Nulli usquam dedit omnia Deus; God never gave the knowledge of all things to any one. Saint Paul confessed that he knew not, whether he were taken up into the third Heaven in the flesh, or out of the flesh; and Christ himself acknowledged thus much, That neither Men, nor Angels knew of the latter day; and therefore, feeling knowledge is infinite, it is God (according to S. Jude) who is only wise. Sapientia ubi invenitur, (saith Jude) But where is wisdom found? and where is the place of understanding? Man knoweth not the price thereof, for it is not found in the Laud of the living. And therefore seeing God found folly in his Angels, mens judgments (which inhabit in houses of Clay) cannot be without their mistakings: and so the Fathers, and other learned men, excusable in particular, especially in those whereupon our salvation depended not.

§. II.

A recital of strange Opinions touching Paradise.

NOW touching Paradise, first it is to be enquired, Whether there were a Paradise, or no? or whether Moses description were altogether mythical, and allegorical? as Origen, Philo, Fran. Georgius, with others, have affirmed; and that under the names of those four Rivers Pison, Gehon, Hiddekel, and Perath, the Tree of Life, and the Tree of Knowledge, there were delivered unto us other mysteries and significations; as, that by the four Rivers, were meant the four Cardinal Virtues, Justice, Temperance, Fortitude, and Prudence; or (by other) Oyl, Wine, Milk, and Honey. This Allegorical understanding of Paradise by Origen divulged, was again by Franciscus Georgius received (saith Sixtus Senensis;) whose frivolous imaginations Siculus himself doth fully and learnedly answer, in the 34. Annotation of his Fifth Book, fol. 338. the last Edition.

S. Ambrose also leaned wholly to the Allegorical construction, and set Paradise in the third Heaven, and in the virtues of the mind, & in uigro principali, which is, as I conceive it, in mente, or in our Souls: to the particulars whereof he alludeth in this fort. By the place or Garden of Paradise, was meant the Soul or Mind; by Adam, Mens, or, Understanding; by Eve, the Sense; by the Serpent, Delectation; by the Tree of good and evil, Sapience; and by the reit of the Trees, the virtues of the mind, or in the mind planted, or from thence springing. Notwithstanding all which, upon the first of the Corinth. c. 6. he in direct words alloweth both of a celestial and terrestrial Paradise; the one into which S. Paul was wrapt the other, into which Adam was put by God. Aug. Chrysostomus was of opinion, that a Paradise had been; but that there was not now any mark thereof on the Earth: the same being not only defaced, but withal the places now not so much as existing. To which Luther seemeth to adhere.

The Manichees also understood, that by Paradise was meant the whole Earth: To which opinion, Valdianus inclineth, as I conceive his words, in two several places. First, upon this; Fill the Earth, Gen. 1. 10. of which he gives this judgment. Hec ipso etiam quod dicit, Replete terram, dominavit antiveris animantibus, subjicite terram, clarissime docet, totam terram extantem, & omnigenis (us tum erat) fructibus constare, sedem & bntum illum Adæ, & posteritatis future fuisse: These words (saith he) in which God said, Bring forth fruit and multiply, and fill the earth, and subdue it, and rule over every creature, do clearly shew, that the Univer- sal earth, set or filled with all sorts of fruits (as then it was), was the garden and seat of Adam, and of his future posterity. And afterward he acknowledgeth the place, out of the Acts, Cap. 17. *Apollolus ex uno jano pagine omne genus humanum idem fadum docet, ut habitantem super universum faciem terra: ita igitur terra Paradysus ille erat; The Apostle (saith he) teacheth, that God hath made of one blood all mankind, to dwell over all the face of the earth: and therefore all the earth (saith he) was that Paradise. Which conjectures I will answer in order. Gorgius Beatus differeth not much from this Opinion, but yet he acknowledgeth that Adam was first planted by God in one certain place, and peculiar Garden: which place Gorgius findeth near the River of Acesius, in the Confinnes of *India.

Aerullian, Bonaventura, and Durandus, make Paradysum under the Equinoctial; and Pollitius, quite contrary, under the North-pole: the Chaldeans also for the most part, and all their Sectators, followed the opinion of Origen; or rather Origen theirs; who would either make Paradise a figure, or Sacrament only, or else would have it seated out of this sensible world, or raised into some high and remote Region of the Air. Strabus, and Rabanus, were both sick of this vanity, with Origen, and Philo: So was our Venerable Beda, ed. in and Peter Comestor, and Moses Barcepha the Syrian, Gen. translated by Mafius. But as Hippolytus says of Phil. Pet. Comest. Judeus, that he wondered, Quomodo genio offatus, l. 1. cap. 3. rebat cum Angelis he was blown up into this errors: lo can di 2. p. 2.

I but greatly marvel at the learned men, who so greedily and blindly wandered; seeing Moses, and after him the Prophets, do so plainly describe this place, by the Region in which it was planted, by the Kingdoms and Provinces bordering it, by the Rivers which watered it, and by the Points of the Compass upon which it lay, in respect of Judea, or Canaan.

Novianus also upon Beda, De natura rerum, believeth that all the Earth was then for Paradise; and not any one place. For the whole Earth (saith he) hath the same beauty ascribed to Paradise. He addeth, That the Ocean was that Fountain from whence the four Rivers, Pison, Gehon, Tigris, and Euphrates, had their beginning; for he could not think it possible, that these Rivers of Ganger, Nilus, Tigris, and Euphrates, (whereof the one ran through India, the other through Egypt, and the other through Mesopotamia and Armenia) could rise out of one Fountain, were it not out of the Fountain of the Ocean.

§. III.

That there was a true local Paradise Eastward in the Country of Eden.

TO the first therefore, that such a place there was upon the Earth, the words of Moses make it manifest, where it is written, And the Lord God planted a Garden Eastward in Eden, and there he put the Man whom he had made: and howsoever the vulgar Translation, called Jerom's Translation, hath converted this place thus, Plantaverit Dominus Deus Paradysum colopasis a principio; The Lord God planted a Paradise of pleasure from the beginning; putting the word (pleasure) for Eden, and (from the beginning) for Eastward: it is manifest, that in this place Eden is the proper name of a Region. For, what sense hath this Translation (saith our Hopkins, in his Treatise of Paradise) that he planted a Garden in Pleasure, or, that a River went out of pleasure to water the Garden? But the Seventy Interpreters call it Paradysum Edenis, The Paradise of Eden; and so doth the Chaldean Paraphrast truly take it for the proper name of a Place, and for a Noun appellative; which Region, in respect of the fertility of

Secondly, if the birth and works, and death of our Saviour, were said to have been in some such Country, of which no man ever heard tell, and that his Miracles had been performed in the Air, or no place certainly known: I assure my self, that the Christian Religion would have taken but a slender root in the minds of men: for times and places are approved witnesses of worldly actions.

Thirdly, if we should rely, or give place to the judgment of some Writers upon this place of Genesis, (though otherwise for their doctrine in general, they are worthy of honour and reverence) I say that there is no Fable among the Grecians or Egyptians more ridiculous: for who would believe that there were a piece of the World so set by it self, and separated, as to hang in the Air under the circle of the Moon? or who so doltish to conceive, that from thence the four Rivers of Ganges, Nilus, Euphrates, and Tygris, should fall down, and run under all the Ocean, and rise up again in this habitable world, and in those places where they are now found? which left any man think that I enforce, or strain to the worth, these are Peter Comestor's own words. Eft autem locum amantissimum, longo terra & maris tractu a nostra habitabili Zona secretum, addo elevatum, ut usque ad lunarem globum attingat, &c. (that is) It is a most pleasant place, severed from our habitable Zone, by a long tract of Land and Sea, elevated so, that it reacheth to the globe of the Moon.

Barc. converted by Masius.

And Moses Barcephas upon this place writeth in this manner: *Deinde hoc quoque responsum volumus, Paradisum multo sublimiore posuimus regione, a quo hae nostrae exierunt, quae fieri ut illuc per precipitum delabantur sicut tanto cum impetu quantum verbis exprime non possit: quod impetu impulsuque fluvii Oceano rados raptim, unde rursus profusum continuant in hoc a nobis tanto orbe: which thus he saith: Furthermore (saith he) we give this for an answer, that Paradise is set in a Region far raised above this part which we inhabit; whereby it comes to pass, that from thence these Rivers fall down with such a head-long violence, as words cannot express: and with that force so impelled and swift, they are carried under the deep Ocean Sea and do again rise and buoy up in this our habitable World: and to this he addeth the opinion of Ephraim, which is this: Ephraim dicit, Paradisum ambire terram, atque ultra Oceanum ita posuim esse, ut totam terrarum orbem ab omni circumdaret Regione, non aliter atque Luna orbis Lunam cingit: (which is, That Paradise doth compass or embrace the whole earth, and is so set beyond the Ocean, as it encirclet the whole Orbe of the Earth on every side, as the Orbe of the Moon doth embrace the Moon. To the end therefore that their ridiculous explications and Opinions do not bring question unto Truth it self, or make the same subject to doubts or disputes, it is necessary to discover the true place of Paradise, which God in his wisdom appointed in the very Navel of this our World, and (as Melastibon says) in parte Terrae meliore, in the best part thereof, that from thence, as from a Center, the Universal might be niled with people and planted; and by knowing this place, we shall the better judge of the beginning of Nations, and of the Worlds inhabitation: for near unto this did the Sons of Noah build their dwellings after the Flood, into all other remote Regions and Countreys. And if it be a generous desire in men, to know from whence their own fore-fathers have come, and out of what Regions and Nations; it cannot be displacing to understand the place of our first Ancestor, from whence all the streams and branches of Mankind have followed and been deduced. If then it do appear by the former, that such a place there was as Paradise, and that the knowledge of this place cannot be unprofitable, it followeth in order to examine several Opinions before remembered, by the Truth it self; and to see how they agree with the sense of the Scripture,* and with common Reason; and afterward to prove directly, and to delineate the Region in which God first planted this delightful Garden.

S. V.

That the Flood hath not utterly defaced the marks of Paradise, nor caused Hills in the Earth.

And first, whereas it is supposed by Aug. Chyamenis, that the Flood hath altered, deformed, or rather annihilated this place, in such sort, as no man can find any mark or memory thereof (of which opinion there were others also, ascribing to the Flood the cause of those high Mountains, which are found on all the Earth over, with many other strange effects:) for mine own opinion, I think neither the one, nor the other to be true. For although I cannot deny, but that the face of Paradise was after the Flood withered, and grown old, in respect of the first beauty (for both the ages of men, and the nature of all things Time hath changed;) yet if there had been no sign of any such place, or if the soil and feat had not remained, then would not Moses, who wrote of Paradise about 80 years after the Flood, have described it so particularly, and the Prophets long after Moses, would not have made so often mention thereof. And though the very Garden it self were not then to be found, but that the Flood, and other accidents of time made it one common field and pasture with the Land of Eden, yet the place is still the same, and the Rivers still remain the same Rivers. By two of which (never doubted of) to wit, Tygris, and Euphrates, we are free to find in what longitude Paradise lay; and learning out one of these Rivers, which afterward doth divide it self into four branches, we are sure that the partition is at the very border of the Garden it self.

For it is written, that out of Eden went a River Gen. 2. 10 to water the Garden, and from thence it was divided, and became into four heads: Now, whether the word in the Latine Translation (Iude) from thence, be referred to Eden it self, or to Paradise; yet the division, and branching of those Rivers, must be in the North, or South side of the very Garden (if the Rivers run as they do, North and South) and therefore these Rivers yet remaining, and Eden manifestly known, there could be no such decaying by the Flood, as is supposed. Furthermore, as there is no likelihood, that the place could be so altered, as future ages knew it not, so is there no probability that either these Rivers were turned out of their courses, or new Rivers created by the Flood which were not, or that the Flood (as asaford) by a violent motion, when it began to decrease, was the cause of high Hills, or deep Valleys. For what defect of waters could there be in a Spherical and round body, wherein there is not high nor low? seeing that all violent force of waters is either by the strength of wind, by defect from a higher to a lower, or by the Ebb or Flood of the Sea. But that there was any wind (whereby the Seas are moit enrag'd) it appeareth not, rather the contrary is probable: for it is written, Therefore God made a wind to pass upon the Earth, and the waters ceased. So as it appeareth not, that, until the waters sank, there was any wind at all, but that God afterward, out of his goodness, caused the wind to blow, to dry up the abundant flume and mud of the Earth, and make the Land more firm, and to cleanse the Air of thick vapours, and unwholesome mists: and this we know by experience, that all downright rains do evermore disperse the violence of outrageous winds, and beat down, and level the swelling and mountainous billows of the Sea: for any Ebbs and Floods there could be none, when the waters were equal equal, and of one height over all the face of the Earth, and when there were no Indraughts, Bays, or Galls, to receive a Flood, or any defcent, or violent falling of waters in the round form of the Earth and Waters, as asaford: and therefore it seemeth most agreeable to reason, that the Waters rather stood in a quiet calm; than that they moved with any raging or overbearing violence. And for a more direct proof that the Flood made no such destroying alteration, Jofeph avoweth that one of those pillars erected by Seib, the third from Adam, was to be seen in his days; which pillars were set up above 1426 years before the Flood, counting Seib to be an hundred years old at the Erection of them; and Jofeph himself to have lived forty or fifty years after Christ: of whom, although there be no cause to believe all that he wrote, yet that which he avouched of his own time, cannot (without great derogation) be called in question. And therefore it may be possible, that some foundation or ruine thereof might then be seen. Now, that such pillars were raised by Seib, all Antiquity hath avowed. It is also written that Benigius (to whom, although I give little credit, yet I cannot condemn him in all) that the City of Enoch, built by Cain about the mountains of Libanus, was not defaced by length of time: yes, the ruins thereof, Antius (who commented upon that invented fragment of faith, were to be seen in his days, who lived in the Reign of Ferdinand and Isabella of Castile. And if these his words be not true, then was he exceeding impudent: for, speaking of this City of Enoch, he concludeth in this sort: *Cujus maxima & ingenua monumenta fundamenta videntur, et vocatur ab incolis regimini, Civitas Cain, ut nostri mercatores, & peregrini referunt. The foundation of which huge mass is now to be seen, and the place is called by the people of that Region, the City of Cain, as both our Strangers and Merchants report.* It is also avowed by Pomponius Mela (to whom I give more credit in these things) that the City of Typpa was built before the Flood, over which Cepha was King: whose name, with his Brother Phineus, together with the grounds and principles of their Religions, was found graven upon certain Altars of stone. And it is not impossible, that the ruins of this other City, called Enoch by Antius, might be seen, though founded in the first age: but it could not be of the first City of the world, built by Cain; the place rather than the time denying it.

Gen. 4. 17.

And to prove directly that the Flood was not the cause of mountains, but that there were mountains from the Creation, it is written, that the waters of the Flood were bound by fifteen Cubits the highest Mountain. And Mafius Damascenus, speaking of the Flood, writeth in this manner: Eft supra Minyadum excelsum Mons in Armenia (qui Baris appellatur) in quo conjungentes multus, sermo est, Diluvii tempore liberatus. And upon Minyad there is an high Mountain in Armenia (called Baris) unto which it is said, that many fled in the time of the Deluge, and that they saved themselves thereon. Now, though it is contrary to Gods Word, that any more were saved than eight persons (which Mafius doth not avouch, but by report) yet it is a testimony, that such Mountains were before the Flood, which were afterward, and ever since, known by the same names; and on which Mountains it is generally received, that the Ark rested: but untruly, as I shall prove hereafter. And again it appeareth, that the Mount Sion (though by another name) was known before the Flood; on which the Thaluditis report, that many Giants lived themselves also; but, as Antius saith, without all Authority, either divine or humane.

Lastly, it appeareth that the Flood did not so turn upside down the face of the earth, as thereby it was made past knowledge, after the waters were decreafed, by this, that when Noah sent out the Dove the second time, he returned with an Olive leaf in her mouth, which he had plucked, and which (until the Trees were discovered) the found not: for otherwise the might have found them floating on the water; a manifest proof, that the Trees were not torn up by the roots, nor swam upon the waters, for it is written: folium, Olive raptum, or decerpum, a leaf plucked, (which is) to take from a Tree, or to tear off. By this it is apparent, (there being nothing written to the contrary) that the Flood made no such alteration, as was supposed, but that the place of Paradise might be seen to succeeding Ages, especially unto Moses, by whom it pleased God to teach the truth of the Worlds Creation, and unto the Prophets which succeeded him: both which I take for my warrant, and to guide me in this Discovery.

S. V. I.

That Paradise was not the whole Earth, as some have thought: making the Ocean to be the fountain of those four Rivers.

His conceit of Aug. Chyamenis being answered, who only giveth his opinion for reason, I will in a few words examine that of the Manichees, of Nicodemus, Vadimon, Goripus, Beemus, and all those that understood, that by Paradise was meant the whole Earth. But in this I shall not trouble the Reader with many words, because by those places of Scripture formerly remembered, this Universality will appear altogether improper. The places which Vadimon alledgeth, Bring forth fruit and multi- ply, Fill the Earth, and subdue it. Rule over every Creature, &c. with this of the Apis, *And hath made of one blood all mankind, to dwell on all the face of the Earth, do no way prove such a generality: for the World was made for man, of which he was Lord and Governour, and all things therein were ordained of God for his use. Now, although all men were of one and the same fountain of blood originally; and Adam's Posterity inhabited in process of time over all the face of the Earth: yet it disproveth in nothing the particular Garden, assigned to Adam, to dress and cultivate, in which he lived in so blessed an estate before his transgression. For if there had been no other choice, but that Adam had been left to the Universal; Moses would not then have said, Eastward in Eden, seeing the World hath not East nor West but respectively. And to what end had the Angel of God been set to keep the East-side, and entrance into to Paradise after Adam's expulsion, if the Universal had been Paradise? for then mult Adam have been chased all out of the World. For if all the Earth were Paradise, that place can receive no better construction than this, That Adam was driven out of the World into the World, and out of Paradise into Paradise, except we should believe with Metedorus, that there were infinite Worlds. Which to deny, he thinks all one, as to affirm, That in so large a field, as the Universal, there should grow but one Thistle. Nicodemus upon Beda, seemeth to be led by this, that it was impossible for those three Rivers, Ganges, Nilus, and Euphrates, (which water three portions of the World so far distant) to rise out of one Fountain, except the Ocean be taken for the Well, and the World for the Garden.*

And it is true, that those four Rivers, being so understood, there could be no conjecture more probable; but it shall plainly appear, that Pison was falsely taken for Ganges, and Gebon falsely for Nilus, although Ganges be a River by Hirva in India, and Nilus run through Ethiopia. The Seventy write Chus for Ethiopia, and thereby the errors of the Manichees, and and the mistakings of Noisimage, Groopie, and Vadimianus, with others, are made manifest. Yet was their conjecture far more probable, than that of Ephrem, Cyriacus, and Abraham. That Paradise was seated far beyond the Ocean Sea, and that Adam waded through it, and at last came toward the Country in which he was created, and was buried at Mount Calvary in Hierusalem. And certainly, though all those of the first Age were of great stature, and so continued many years after the Flood, yet Adam's shin-bones must have contained a thousand fathoms, and much more, if he had footed the Ocean; but this opinion is so ridiculous, as it needs no argument to disprove it.

§. VII.

Of their opinion which make Paradise as high as the Moon: and of others which make it higher than the middle Region of the Air.

THirdly, whereas Beda saith, and as the School-men affirm, Paradise to be a place altogether removed from the knowledge of men, (locus de cognitione hominum remotissimus) and Barbech conceived, that Paradise was far in the East; but mounted above the Ocean, and all the Earth, and near the Orbe of the Moon (which opinion, though the School-men charge Beda withall, yet Pererius lays it off from Beda, upon Sirabus, and his Master Rabanus) and whereas Kuperus, in his Geography of Paradise, doth not much differ from the rest, but finds it seated next or nearest Heaven; It may seem, that all these borrowed this doctrine out of Plato, and Plato out of Socrates; but neither of them (as I conceive) well understood; who (undoubtedly) took this place for Heaven it self, into which the Souls of the blessed were carried after death.

Diag. Jell. Sec.

Jap. Mart. ad. Gen. Aug.

True it is, that these Philosophers darst not fear of the Aetereages (in this, and many other divine apprehensions) set down what they believed in plain terms, especially Plato: though Socrates in the end suffered death for acknowledging one only powerful God; and therefore did the Devil himself do him that right, as by an Oracle, to pronounce him the wisest man. Justine Martyr affirmeth, that Plato had read the Scriptures; and S. Augustine gave this judgement of him, as his opinion, that (few things changed) he might be counted a Christian. And it seemeth to me, that both Tertullian and Ensebius conceive, that Socrates, by that place aforesaid, meant the celestial Paradise, and not this of Eden. Solinus, I grant, reporteth, that there is a place exceeding delightful, and healthful, upon the top of Mount Atlas (called Acrabon) which being above all Clouds of Rain, or other inconvenience, are called Machobis (by reason of their so many years) are called Machobis (that is) Long-lived. A further Argument is used, for proof of the height of this place, because therein was Enoch preserved from the violence of the Flood: approved by Isidore and others, in which place also Tertullian conceived, that the blessed Souls were preferred till the last Judgment: which Irenaeus and Justin Martyr also believe. But this opinion was of all Catholic Divines reproved, and in the Florentine Council damned; in which Saint Augustine more modestly gave this judgment: Sicut certum est, Enoch & Elias, nunc vivere: ita ubi nunc sunt, ut in Paradiso alibi, incertum est; (that is) As it is certain that Enoch and Elias do now live; so where they live, in Paradise, or else where, it is uncertain. But Barbech gives a third cause, though of all other the weakest. For (saith he) it was necessary that Paradise should be set at such a distance and height, because the four Rivers (had they not fallen to precipitate) could not have had sufficient force to have thrust themselves under the great Ocean; and afterward have forced their passage through the Earth, and have risen again in the far distant Regions of India, Egypt, and Armenia.

These strange fancies and dreams have been answered by divers learned men long since, and lately by Hopkins, and Pererius, writing upon this subject: of whose arguments I will repeat the few: (for to use long discourse against those things, which are already against Scripture and Reason, might rightly be judged a vanity in the Answerer, not much inferior to that of the Inventor.)

It is first therefore alledged, that such a place cannot be commodious to live in: for being set so near the Moon, it had been too near the Sun, and other heavenly bodies. Secondly, because it must have been too joynt a Neighbour to the Element of fire. Thirdly, because the Air in that Region is so violently removed, and carried about with such swift winds, as nothing in that place can consist or have abiding. Fourthly, because the space between the Earth and the Moon (according to Ptolemy and Alfraganus) is seventeen times the Diameter of the Earth, which makes in a gross account about one hundred and twenty thousand miles. Hereupon it must follow, that Paradise, being raised to this height, must have the compass of the whole Earth for a Basis and foundation. But had it been so raised, it could hardly be hidden from the knowledge, or eyes of men, seeing it would deprive us of the Sun's light all the fore-part of the day, being seated in the East, as they suppose. Now, to fortify the former opinions, Tostatus addeth this, that those people which dwell near those falls of waters, are deaf from their infancy, like those that dwell near the Catadupa, or over-falls of Nilus. But this I hold as feigned. For I have seen in the Indies, far greater water-falls, than those of Nilus, and yet the people dwelling near them are not deaf at all. Tostatus (better to strengthen himself) citeth Basil and Ambrusio together: to which Pererius, Sed ego haec apud Basilium & Ambrusium in eorum scriptis, quae nunc extant, nullum me legere memini: But I do not remember (saith he) that I ever read those things either in Basil or Ambrusio.

But for the bodies of Enoch and Elias, God hath disposed of them according to his Wisdom. Their taking up might be into the celestial Paradise, for ought we know. For although flesh and blood, subjected to corruption, cannot inherit the Kingdom of Heaven, and the seed must rot in the ground before it grow, yet we shall not all die (saith Saint Paul) but all shall be changed: which change in Enoch and Elias, was cast to him that is Almighty. But for the rest, the Scriptures are manifest, that by the Flood all perished on the Earth, saving eight persons: and therefore in the terrestrial Paradise they could not be.

For Tostatus his own opinion, who feared not altogether so high as the rest, but believed that Paradise was raised above the middle Region of the Air, and twenty cubits above all Mountains, that the Flood did not therefore reach it (which Scotus and other latter School-men also believe; for, say they, there were no sinners in Paradise, and therefore no cause to overwhelm it:) this is also contrary to the express letter of the Scripture, which directly, and without admitting of any diffinition, teacheth us, that the waters over-flooded all the mountains under heaven. And were it otherwise, then might we as well give credit to Mafius Damascenus, and the Thalmodists, who affirm, that there were of the Giants that saved themselves on the Mountain Ararat, and on Sion. But to help this, Scotus being (as the rest of the School-men are) full of diffinition, saith; That the the Waters stood at Paradise, as they did in the Red Sea, and as Jordan; and as the Flood was not natural, so was Paradise saved by miracle. And Thomas Aquinas qualifyeth this high conceit with this supposition, That it was not believed, that Paradise was so seated as Beda and others seem to affirm in words, but by Ephraim and comparatively, for the delicacy and beauty so resembled. But this I dare avow of all those School-men, that though they were exceeding witty, yet they better teach all their followers to shift, than to resolve, by their diffinitions. Wherefore not to stay long in answering this opinion of Tostatus, I confess that it is written, that the Mountains of Olympus, Athos, and Atilas, over-reach and surmount all Winds and Clouds, and that (notwithstanding) there is found on the heads of the Hills both Springs and Fruits; and the Pagan Priests, sacrificing on these Mountain-tops, do not find the Albes (remaining of their sacrifices) blown thence, nor theae wash off by Rains, when they return: yet experience hath relieved us, that these reports are fabulous; and Pliny himself (who was not sparing in the report of wonders) avoweth the contrary. But were it granted, yet the height of these Mountains is far under the supposed place of Paradise; and on these self Hills the Air is so thin (saith S. Augustine, whom herein I mistrust) that it is not sufficient to bear up the Body of a Bird, having therein no feeling of her Wings, for any feasible refinance of Air to mount her self by.

§. VIII.

Of their opinion that seat Paradise under the Aequinoctial: and of the pleasant habitation under those Climates.

THose which come nearer unto reason find Paradise under the Aequinoctial Line, as Tertullian, Basiliensis, and Durandus; judging, that there would be found most pleasure, and the greatest fertility of Soil: but against it Thomas Aquinas objecteth the diffemperate heat, which he supposeth to be in all places so directly under the Sun; but this is (nunc causa pro causa) for although Paradise could not be under the Line, because Eden is far from it, in which Paradise was; and because there is no part of Euphrates, Tigris, or Ganges under it, (Ganges being one of the four Rivers, as they suppose) yet this conceit of diffemper, (being but an old opinion) is found to be very untrue, though for the conjecture not to be condemned, considering the age when those Fathers wrote, grounded chiefly on this: that whereas it appeared, that every Country, as it lay by degrees nearer the Tropick, and so toward the Aequinoctial, did so much the more exceed in heat; it was therefore a reasonable conjecture, that those Countries which were situated directly under it, were of a diffemper uninhabitable: but it seemeth that Tertullian conceived better, and so did Avicenna, for they both thought them habitable enough; and though (perchance) in those days it might be thought a fantastical opinion (as all are which go against the vulgar) yet we now find, that if there be any place upon the earth of that nature, beauty, and delight, that Paradise had, the same must be found within that supposed uninhabitable burnt Zone, or within the Tropicks, and nearest to the Line it self. For hereof Experience hath informed reason, and Time hath made those things apparent, which were hidden, and could not by any contemplation be discovered. Indeed it hath so pleased God to provide for all living Creatures, wherewith he hath filled the World, that such inconveniences which we contemplate a far off, are found by trial and the witnesses of Mens travels, to be so qualified, as there is no portion of the Earth made in vain, or as a fruitless lump to fashion out the rest. For God himself (saith Isaiah) that formed the earth and made it, he that prepared it, he created it as in vain, he formed it to be inhabited. Now we find that these hottest Regions of the World seated under the Aequinoctial Line, or near it, are so refreshed with a daily gale of Eastern Wind (which the Spaniards call the Brisa, that doth evermore blow strongest in the heat of the day, as the down-right Beams of the Sun cannot so much master it, that there is any inconvenience or diffemperate heat found thereby. Secondly, the nights are so cold, fresh and equal, by reason of the entire interposition of the Earth, as (for those places which my self have seen, near the Line and under it) I know no other part of the World of better, or equal temper, only there are some tracts, which by accident of high Mountains are barred from this Air and fresh wind, and some few sandy parts: without Trees, which are not therefore so well inhabited as the rest; and such difference of Soils we find also in all other parts of the World: but (for the greatest part) those Regions have so many goodly Rivers, Fountains and little Brooks, abundance of high Cedars, and other stately Trees casting shade, so many forts of delicate Fruits, ever bearing, and at all times beautified with Blossom and Fruit, both green and ripe, as it may of all other parts be best compared to the Paradise of Eden: the Boughs and Branches are never undolched and left naked, their Sap creepeth not under Ground into the Root, fearing the injury of the frost: neither doth Pomona at any times despite her withered Husband Verumnus, in his Winter quarters and old age. Therefore are these Countries called Terra vitae, Vitae Countries: for nature being liberal to all without labour, necessity imposing no industry or travel, idleness bringeth forth no other Fruits than vain thoughts, and licentious pleasures. So that to conclude this part, Tertullian and those of his opinion were not deceived in the nature of the place: but Aquinas, who miliked this opinion, and followed a worse. And (to say the truth) all the School-men were gross in this particular.

Of the change of the names of places: and that before that Eden in Coele Syria, there is a Country in Babylon, once of this name, as is proved out of Isaiah 37. and Ezekiel 27.

THEse opinions answered, and the Region of Eden not found in any of those imaginary Worlds, nor under Terrida Zona; it followeth that now we discover and find out the seat thereof, for it was Paradise by God planted. The difficulty of which search resteth chiefly in this, That as all Nations have often changed names with their Masters; so are most of these places, by Moses remembered, forgotten by those names of all Historians and Geographers as well Ancient as Modern.

Besides, we find that the Affryans, Babelomans, Medes and Perfians, (Cyrus only and few other excepted) fought to extinguish the Ethiops. The Grecians hated both their Nation and their Religion; and the Romans despised once to remember them in any of their Stories. And as those three Monarchies succeeded each other: so did they transform the names of all those principal places and Cities in the East: and after them, the Turk hath fought (what he could) to extinguish in all things, the ancient memory of those people; which he hath subjected and interhalled.

Now besides those notable marks, Euphrates and Tigris, the better to find the way which leadeth to the Country of Eden, we are to take for guides these two considerations (to wit) That it lay Eastward from Canaan and Judea; and that it was of all other the most beautiful and fertile. First then in respect of situation, the next Country to Judea Eastward was Arabia Petraea; but in this Region was Mofes himself when he wrote: and the next unto it Eastward also was Arabia the Deferta, both which in respect of the infertility could not be Eden, neither have any of the Arabians any such Rivers, as are exprest to run out of it: So as it followeth of necessity, that Eden must be Eastward, and beyond both Arabia Petraea, and Deferta. But because Eden is by Mofes named by it self, and by the fertility, and the Rivers only described, we must seek it in other Scriptures, and where it is by the additions of the neighbouring Nations better described. In the Prophet Isaiah I find it coupled and accompanied with other adjacent Countries, in these words spoken in the person of Senacherib by Rabshakeh. How the Gods of the Nations delivered them, whence my Fathers have destroyed, as Golan and Haran and Refph, and the children of Eden, which were as Tisbath and in Ezekiel, where he prophesieth against the Tyrrians: They of Haran and Canneh, and Eden, the Merchants of Sheba, Alfur, and Chilmad, were thy Merchants, &c.

But to avoid confusion, we must understand that there were two Edens, one of which the Prophet Amos remembereth, where he divideth Syria into three Provinces, whereof, the first he maketh Syria Damascene, or Decapitanian: the second part is that Valley called Amos, otherwise Corvallis, or the Tract of Canneh, where Affria is joyned to Arabia the Deferta, and where Ptolomy placeth the City of Aueria: and the third is known by the name of Domus Edenie, or Calefrya, otherwise Vallis cava, or the hollow Valley, because the Mountains of Libanus and Amilibanus, take all the length of it on both sides, and border it: for Cale in Greek is Cava in Latin. But this is not that Eden, which we seek: neither doth this Province lie East from Canaan, but North, and so joyneth unto it, as it could not be unknown to the Hebrews. Yet, because there is a little City therein called Paradise, the Tews believed this Calefrya to be the fame which Mofes describeth. For the same cause doth Hopkins in his Treatise of Paradise reprehend Beraludis, in that he confoundeth this Eden, with the other Eden of Paradise: though to give Beraludis his right, I conceive that he led the way to Hopkins, and to all other later Writers, saying, that he failed in distinguishing these two Regions, both called Eden: and that he altogether misunderstood two of the four Rivers (to wit) Pison and Gihon, as shall appear hereafter. Now to find out Eden, which (as Mofes teacheth us) lay Eastward from the Deferta, where he wrote after he had passed the red Sea; we must consider, where those other Countries are found, which the Prophet Isaiah and Ezekiel joyneth with it. For (saith Isaiah) Golan, Haran, and Refph, and the children of Eden, which were as Tisbath. Also Ezekiel joyneth Haran with Eden, who, together with those of Sheba, Alfur, and Chilmad, were the Merchants that traded with the City of Tyre, which was then (saith Ezekiel) the Mart of the people for many Isles. And it hath ever been the custom, that the Perfians conveyed their Merchandise to Babylon, and to those Cities upon Euphrates, and Tigris, and from thence transported them unto Syria, now Soria, and to the Port of the Mediterranean Sea: as in ancient times to the City of Tyre, afterward to Tripoly, and now to Alleppe, from whence they imbark them at the Port of Alexandretta, in the Bay of Iffcus, now Lazazco. Ezekiel in the description of the magnificence of Tyre, and of the exceeding trade that it had with all the Nations of the East, as the only Mart-town of that part of the World, reciteth both the people, with whom they had commerce, and also what Commodities every Country yielded: and having counted the several People and Countries, he addeth the particular trade, which each of them exercised. They were thy Merchants (saith the Prophet) in all sorts of things, in garments of blue silk, and of bordered works, fine linen, coral and pearl: and afterwards (speaking of the Merchants of Sheba and Ramoth, and in what kinds they traded, he hath these words. The Merchants of Sheba and Ramoth were thy Merchants, they occupied in thy fairs, with the chief of all fairs, and with all precious stones and gold. Now these be indeed the riches which Perfia and Arabia Felix yield: and because Sheba and Ramoth are those parts of Arabia, which border the Sea, called the Perfian Gulf, therefore did those Nations both vent such Spice, sweet Gums, and Pearls, as their own Countries yielded, and (withal) having trade with their Neighbours of India, had from them also all sorts of Spices, and plenty of Gold. The better to convey these Commodities to that great Mart of Tyre, the Shebas or Arabians entered by the mouth of Tygris, and from the City of Teredon (built or enlarged by Nabuchodonosor, now called Balfara) thence sent up all these rich Merchandises by Boat to Babylon, from whence by the body of Euphrates, as far as it bended Westward, and afterward by a branch thereof, which reacheth within three days journey of Alleppe, and then over Land they pass to Tyre, as they did afterward to Tripoly (formerly Hieropolis) and thence to Alexandretta, as aforesaid. Now the Merchants of Canneh, which Ezekiel joyneth with Eden, inhabited far up the River, and received this trade from Arabia and India, besides those proper Commodities which themselves had, and which they received out of Perfia, which bordered them. S. Hierome understandeth by Canneh, Selenicia, which is seated upon Euphrates, where it breaketh into four heads, and which took that name from Selenicus, who made thereof a magnificent City. Hieronymus thinks it to be Ctesiphon, but Ctesiphon is seated down low upon Tygris, and Canneh cannot be on that side, I mean on the East-side of Tygris, for then were it out of the Valley of Shinar. Pliny placeth the Schenis upon Euphrates, where the course of the border of Arabia the Deferta, and where the River of Euphrates reflecteth from the Defert of Palmyra: for these people of Canneh (afterward Schenia) inhabited both borders of Euphrates, stretching themselves from their own City of Canneh in Shinar Westward along the banks of Euphrates, as far as the City of Tisbath, where Ptolomy appointed the Fords of Euphrates: which also agreeeth with the description of the Schenia by Strabo, whose words are these: Mercatoribus ex Syria Seleucia & Babyloniam civibus iter est per Scheniam. The Merchants which travel from Syria to Selenicia and Babyloniam take their way by the Schenites. Therefore those which take Canneh for Charran do much mistake it. For Charran, to which Abraham came from Ur in Chaldea (called by God) standeth also in Mesopotamia, not upon Euphrates it self, but upon the River of Chaboras, which falleth into Euphrates: and the Merchants of Charran are distinctly named with those of Canneh in Ezekiel (as they of Haran, and Canneh, and Eden, the Merchants of Sheba, Alfur, and Chilmad were thy Merchants. Wherefore Charran which is sometime called Charrs, and Haran, and Aran, is but the same Charran of Mesopotamia; and when it is written Aran, then it is taken for the Region of Mesopotamia: or Aran fluviorum, the Greek word (of Mesopotamia) importing a Country between two Rivers: for Mefor in Greek, is medius in Latin, and Potamus, fluvius. And when it is written Haran or Aran, it is then taken for the City it self, which Abraham came from Ur (as aforesaid.) For Strabo in the description of Arabia giveth that tract of Land from the borders of Calafrya, to the edge of Mesopotamia, to the Schenites, who also inhabited on both sides of Euphrates; and were in Ages accounted of these Arabians which inhabit Babylon, and the North part of the Deferts, stretching themselves toward the inhabited solitude of Palmyra, which lieth between Syria, and Arabia the Deferta. So as these of Canneh lay in the very high-way from Babylon to Tyre, and were neighbours (indifferently) to Charran, and to Eden: and therefore they are by the Prophet Ezekiel coupled together. They of Haran, and Canneh, and Eden, &c. But S. Hierome made a good interpretation of Canneh, or Chalne, by Selenicia: for Selenicia was anciently called Chalane (witness Apian) and so Rabanus Maurus calleth it in his Commentaries upon Genesis: the name by time and mixture of Languages being changed from Chalne, or Canneh, to Chalane: of which name there are two other Cities, standing in Triangle with Selenicia, and almost the next unto it (as) Tisbe and Canne, the one a little to the West of Selenicia, and the other opposite unto it: where these Rivers of Tygris and Euphrates are ready to joyn. Therefore, which of these the ancient Canne was (being all three within the bound of the Valley Shinar) it is uncertain: but it is a note as well of the importance of the place, as of the certain seat thereof, that so many other Cities did retain a part of the name in so many Ages after. Neither is it unlikely, that these additions of Tisbe and Man to the word Canne, were but to make difference between the East and the West, or the greater and the less Canne, or between Canne the old and the new: which additions to distinguish Cities by, are ordinary in all the Regions of the World.

Judg. 1.

Act. 7. 2.

Lucas. 1. 1.

Gen. 22. 12.

Now of the other City joyned with Eden, as Haran, or Charran, Saint Hierome on the Judges speaketh thereof in these words: Cumque revertentur, percutiamus ad Charran, una est in medio itinere contra Nimroem, undecimo die: When they returned, they came to Charran (which is the mid-way against Nimrod) the eleventh day.

This City is by the Martyr Stephen, named Charran (speaking to the High-Priest:) Le Men, Brethren, and Fathers, hearken: the God of glory appeared to our Father Abraham, while he was in Mesopotamia, before he dwelt in Charran. But the seat of this City is not doubted of: for it is not only remembered in many Scriptures, but exceeding famous for the death and overthrow of Craffus the Roman, who for his insatiable greediness, was called Gargus avaritia; the Gulf of Aueria. Whereof Lucan:

Affricis Latro maculavit sanguine Carras.

With Roman blood thy Affryan Carre he did fill.

But this City Canne, or Chalne, is made manifest by Mofes himself, where it is written of Nimrod: And the beginning of his Kingdoms was Babel, and Erech, and Acad, and Chalne, in the Land of Sinar, or Shinar: where Mofes sheweth the first compilation of the Babylonian Empire, and what Cities and People were subject unto Nimrod; all which lay in the said Valley of Shinar, or near it; and this Valley of Shinar is that Tract afterward called Babylonia and Chaldea, into which also Eden stretcheth it self, Chaldea, Babylonia, Sinar, Edem sunt (saith Comfitor.) Three names of one Country: Which Region of Babylonia, took name of the Tower Babel, and the Tower of the confusion of Tongues. And that Shinar was Babylonia, it is proved in the eleventh Chapter of Genesis, in these words. And as they went from the East, they found a Plain in the Land of Shinar, and there they abode: in which Plain Babylon was built (as Joseph aforesaid.)

Now Shinar being Babylonia, and Canneh, in the first beginning of Nimrod's greatness, and before he had subdued any strange, or far-off Nations, being one part of his Dominion, and also named by Mofes to be in Shinar, it proveth that Canneh joyneth to Babylonia; which also Ezekiel coupleth with Eden, and (further) affirmeth that those of Eden were also the Merchants which traded with the Tyrrians: and Isaiah in the threats of Senacherib against Jerusalem (with other Nations that Senacherib vaunted that his Father had destroyed) nameth the Children of Eden, which were at Tisbath. But before I conclude where Eden it self lieth, it is necessary to describe those other Countries which Ezekiel joyneth therewith, in the places before remembered, as, those of Sheba and Ramoth. It is written in Genesis thus: Moreover the Sons of Ham were Cush, &c. And the Sons of Cush were Seba, and Havila, and Sabah, and Ramoth, &c. And the Sons of Ramoth were Sheba, &c. And anon after, Cush begat Nimrod: so as Sheba was the grand-child of Cush, and Nimrod the Son of Cush, whose elder brother was Sebah: though some there are that conceive to the contrary, that Nimrod was the elder in valour and understanding, though not in time and precedence of birth: who inhabited that part in Shinar, where Babel was built, afterwards Babylonia. His brother Ramoth or Regna took that part adjoining to Shinar, toward the Sea side and Perfian Gulf (called afterwards Ramoth and Sheba, by the Father, and his Sons, which possessed it.) For (saith Ezekiel) the Merchants of Ramoth and Sheba were thy Merchants, they occupied in thy fairs with the chief of all Spices and all precious Stones, and Gold. So as Sheba was that Tract of Country, which pareth Arabia Deferta from Arabia Felix, and which joyneth to the Sea, where Tygris and Euphrates fall out, and render themselves to the Ocean. This part and confining Country, Strabo calleth Catabria, where the best Myrrh and Frankincense is gathered: which People have an interchange or trade with Eden, lying on the East-side of the Perfian Gulf. By this it appears who were the Merchants of Tyre, for Gold, Spices, and precious Stones: of which they had not only plenty of their own, but were also furnished from that part of India (called Elava, according to Strabo) for exchange of their Aromatics, and other proper commodities. For, as Strabo reporteth out of Egypt these, In Perfice ora initio Insula est, in qua multi & pretiosi vintur signatur: in alia vero clari & perulici Lappi. Erafthones (saith Strabo) affirmeth, that, In the beginning of the Perfian Gulf, there is an Island, in which there are many precious Pearls bred: and in other very clear and shining Stones. Now, the difference between Sheba the Son of Ramoth, and Seba the Son of Cush, is in this, That Seba is written with the Hebrew (Samed,) and Sheba with (Schin:) but whatsoever the difference may be in the Hebrew Orthography, their Countries and Habitations are diverse. For Seba is that which bordereth the Perfian Sea, and Saba (whence the Queen of Saba) neighboured the Red-Sea; and so that place of the 72 Psalms expounded Rege Arabum & Sabae, hath in the Hebrew this sense, Rege Sheba & Sabae.

The Shebas, Ezekiel nameth together with the Edenites, because they inhabited upon the Out-let of the same River, upon which the Edenites were seated: and so those of Seba, towards the Sea-coast and upon it, past up the Country, by Tygris and Euphrates, being being joyned in one main stream, and so through the Region of Eden, which Tygris boundeth, thereby the better to convey their merchandise toward Tyre. And as the Cities of Charraz, and Chamuel, border Eden on the West and North-west: so doth Sheba on the South, and Chimad on the North-east: Chimad being a Region of the higher Media, as appeareth in the Chaldean Paraphrast, which Country, by the Geographers is called Comitena, (L) placed by exchange for (R) which change the Hebrews also often use.

Thus much of those Countries which border Eden, and who altogether traded with the Tyrians: of which, the chief were the Edemites, inhabiting Tellassar: for these Senacherib vaunted, that his Fathers had destroyed; and this place of Tellassar lay most convenient, both to receive the Trade from Sheba and Arabia, and also to convey it over into Syria, and to Tyris. Now, to make these things the more plain, we must remember, that before the death of Senacherib, many parts of the Babylonian Empire fell from his obedience, and after his death these Monarchies were utterly destroyed.

For it appeareth both in Ezay the 37. and in the second of Kings, by the threats of Rabshake, the while the Army of Affria lay before Jerusalem, that the Cities of Golan, Elraz, Riseph, and the Edemites at Tellassar, had refuted the Affrians: though by them (in a fort) mastered and recovered. Have the Gods of the Nations delivered them whom my Fathers have destroyed as Golan, and Elraz, Riseph, and the children of Eden, which were at Tellassar? But it appeared manifestly after Senacherib's death, that these Nations formerly contending, were then freed from the others subjection: for Ezar-Haddon held Affria, and Meredach Baladan, Babylonia. And after that the Army of Senacherib, commanded by Rabshake which lay before Jerusalem (Hezekias then reigning), while Senacherib was in Egypt, was by the Angel of God destroyed: the King of Babel sent to Hezekias, both to congratulate the recovery of his health, and his victory obtained over the Affrians. After which overthrow, Senacherib himself was slain by his own sons in the Temple of his Idols, Ezar-Haddon succeeding him in Affria. To the Babylonian Ambassadors sent by Meredach, Hezekias shewed all his Treasures as well proper as consecrate, which invited the Kings of Babylon afterward to undertake their conquest and subversion. So as, the supulsion of war increasing between Babylon and Affria, the Edemites which inhabited the borders of Shinar towards the North, and towards Affria, were employed to bear off the incursions of the Affrians; and their Garrison-place was at Tellassar: and the very word (Tellassar) faith Jehus, signifying as much as a Bulwark against the Affrians. This place Hieroglomitans takes for Rekem, others for Seleucia: but this Tellassar is the same, which Am. Marcellinus in the History of Julian (whom he followed in the enterprise of Perfus) calleth Thibinis: in stead of Tellassar, who describeth the exceeding strength thereof in his 24. Book: It is seated in an Island of Euphrates upon a steep and unfaultable Rock, in so much as the Emperor Julian durst not attempt it; and therefore it was a convenient place for a Garrison against the Affrians, being also a passage out of Mesopotamia into Babylonia, and in which the Edemites of the Country adjoining were ledged to defend the same. This place Ptolemy calleth Terridata, having Riseph (which he calleth Riseph) on the left hand; and Camech, (which he calleth Thibie-Came) on the right hand; not far from whence, is also found the City of Mann-Came, upon Tygris; and all these feated together, as Ezay and Ezechiel have fortified them. But the understanding of these places is the more difficult, because Affria (which the Chaldeans call Assuria), and Mesopotamia, were so often confounded: the one taken for the other by interchanging of Dominions.

Affria & Mesopotamia in Babylonia names transferred (faith Abeger) Affria and Mesopotamia took the name of Babylonia. Lastly, It appeareth by those adjacent Regions by the Prophets named, in what part of the World Eden is seated, as, by Charran or Harar in Mesopotamia: also by Camech and Riseph, according to the opinion of Vatablus, who in these words translateth this place: Plantaveras nasam JETHROAN Draw down in Eden, all Oriente; The Lord God planted a Garden in Eden Eastward: that is (faith he in his Annotations) Tullius nescit arbitror in Eden, Regione Orientali, in finibus Arabie & Mesopotamie; He commanded Trees to grow in Eden, an Eastern Region in the borders of Arabia and Mesopotamia.

Of divers other testimonies of the Land of Eden, and that this is the Eden of Paradise.

AND for a more particular pointing out of this Eden, it seems by the two Epistles of the Nestorian Christians, that inhabit Mesopotamia: which Epistles in the year 1552. they sent to the Pope about the confirming of their Patriarch, and Andreas Masius hath published them, translated out of Syriac into Latin. By these Epistles (I say) it seems we may have some farther light for the proof of that, which we have said about the Region of Eden in those parts. For in them both, there is mention of the Island of Eden in the River Tygris, or at least, Tyris in both these Epistles is called the River of Eden. This Island, as Masius in his Preface to these Epistles faith, is commonly called Gozaria (as it were, The Island, by an eminency.) It hath (faith he) ten miles in circuit, and was sometimes walled round about, which name of the Island Eden may (doublet) remain to this day; though in the rest of the Region so-called, this name be swallowed up with the fame of those flourishing Kingdoms of Mesopotamia, Affria, Babylonia, and Chaldea. This Island of Eden hath up the River, and not far beyond it, the City of Hafan-Cepha, otherwise Fortis Petra: below it, it hath Mofal or Mofel, from which (as in that which followeth it shall appear out of Masius) it is not above twelve miles distant. Neither is it to trouble us, that Mofal or Mofel by Marius Niger is remembered among the Cities higher up Tygris, in these words, Justa autem Tygrin, Civitates sunt Dorbeta prope Turorum montem, que nunc Mesfeldicitur: magna sane, &c. (that is) By Tygris are these Cities, Dorbeta near unto mount Taurus (which is now called Mofel) which is a great one, &c. This opinion of Niger, displacing Mofel, and making it to be Dorbeta, (I say) needs not here to trouble us: seeing for this matter, the testimony of Masius, informed by the Christians that dwell there (the Seat of whose Patriarch it is) ought to be of credit, avowing that this Mofal (or Mofel) is in the Confines of Mesopotamia and Affria, seated upon Tygris, and in the neighbourhood of Nineve; and that it is the famous Seleucia Parthorum. The Nestorian Christians in their former Epistle, call it Assur in these words: Ex omnibus civitatibus & pagis que sunt cum Civitate Mofel (hoc est) Assur, in vicina Nineve; Of all the Cities and Towns which are about the City of Mofal (that is) Assur in the neighbourhood of Nineve. As also Niger acknowledgeth Ctesiphon a City thereabout to be called Assur, (which is the same as Assur, after the Dial of those Nations, which change Sh into T.) Neither is it much that he should mistake Ctesiphon, (which is not far off Seleucia) for Seleucia, to be Assur. By this then we may come somewhat near the end of our purpose. For the Isle of Eden, which lieth in the braid of Tygris, Tygris, is but twelve miles from Mofal and that ancient City, which Ptolemy and Tacitus call Ninus, and the Scriptures Tygris; Phisphras, and Simeon Stylites, Nisula, and John Lam, Mofal, others Mofel (though it be not the same with Mofal) is set but a little higher upon the same River of Tygris, near Mofal to that we are like to find this Isle of Eden hereabout. For the same Andreas Masius, which placeth it above Mofal, maketh it to be below Hafan-Cepha, which is upon the same River of Tygris.

The other difficulty is this, that some perhaps may think, that the words of the Nestorian in both their Epistles, speak not of any Isle in Tygris, called the Isle of Eden, but of an Isle in Tygris, a River of Eden. But this sense of their words in my opinion seemeth the more improbable. And yet, if this were the meaning here, we have a testimony from the Learned of those parts, that not only Euphrates, but also Tygris was a River of Eden, and that the name of Eden in those parts is not yet quite worn out, though the Region hath been subject to the same change, that all other Kingdoms of the world have been, and hath by conquest and corruption of other Languages, received new and differing names. For the South part of Eden, which stretcheth over Euphrates, was after the Flood called Shinar, and then, of the Tower of Babel, Babylonia, and the North part of Eden is that Tract of Mesopotamia, Affria, and Armenia, which imbraceth both the banks of Tygris between Mount Taurus, and Seleucia. And of this Region of Eden that ancient Archeus maketh mention, (not that latter Archeus, Disciple of Galileus, otherwise by Pharaz and Athenus called Jiri, who lived in Egypt in the Reign of Philadelphus; but another of a far higher and remote time) the same being made Laine out of the Greek by Saint Hierom. And though by corruption of the ancient Copie it be written, in Archeus, Adonis for Edenis; yet Adonis being a River of Phoenicia, cannot be understood to be the Region named by Archeus. For Archeus makes it a Country, and not a River, and joyneth it with Mesopotamia and Armenia, calling the land of Chus Archeus, after the Archeus, and Sepragunt. And lastly, the River which watereth the Regions (faith Archeus) falleth into the Gulf of Perfa: which River he called Armodius for Tygris; Tygris being but a name imposed for the swiftness thereof. And out of Armenia, both Tygris and Euphrates have their original: for out of Eden came a River, or Rivers, to water the Garden, both which Rivers (to wit) Tygris and Euphrates, come out of Armenia, and both of them travest Mesopotamia, Regions first of all known by the name of Eden, for their beauty and fertility. And it is very probable, that Eden contained also some part of Armenia; and the excellent fertility thereof in divers places is not unworthy the name of Eden. For in some part thereof (faith Strabo) the leaves are always green, and therefore therein a perpetual Spring. Also Strabo, de Archiebus, mentioneth the City of Adana upon Euphrates: and the name of Eden was in use in Amas's time, though he spake not of Eden in the East, but of Eden in Celo-Syria. But to the end I may not burden the Readers patience with too long a Discourse, it may suffice to know, that Euphrates and Tygris (once joyed together, and afterward separate) are two of those four heads, into which these Rivers which are said to water the Garden of Paradise, were divided: whose courses being known, Eden (out of which they are said to come) cannot be unknown. Now that Hiddikel and Perath, were Tygris and Euphrates, it is agreed by all: for the Seventy and all others convert Perath by Euphrates: & Hiddikel, Tygris omnes exponunt; And all men understand Hiddikel by Tygris (faith Vatablus). And because that which I have said of the Isle of Eden shall not be subject to the censure of self-invention, I have here-under set down the words out of the two general Epistles of the Nestorian, as Masius (ad verbum) hath converted them into Latin. The occasion of those Letters or Supplications to the Pope, were, That the Nestorian Christians, which inhabit Mesopotamia, Affria, Perfa, Babylonia, and have to this day (at least in Queen Mary's time they had fifteen Churches in one City called Seleucia Parthorum, by Mofel upon the River of Tygris; having no sufficient authority to choose themselves a Patriarch (which cannot be done without four or three Metropolitan Bishops at the least) sent to the Bishop of Rome, in the year of Christ 1552. (as afore-said) a Petition to obtain allowance unto such an Election, as themselves had made: having three hundred years before that, upon the like debt, sent one Marius thither to be confirmed; and in this negotiation they made known to the Bishop of Rome the state of the Christian Church in those parts: for, upon the death of their Patriarch (who of a covetous desire to enrich himself, had forbidden to institute Metropolitan Bishops, when the places fell void) they all assembled themselves together to consult of the Church-government. And because all the Patriarchs for an hundred years had been of one House and Family to the prejudice of the Church, and that there yet remained one Bishop of the same Stock and Kindred, who aspired to the same dignity which his Predecessors had held, the rest of the professors refused to allow him. Upon which occasion, and for the choice of a Government more sufficient, the Teachers in all the Churches assembled themselves. The words of the general Epistle to the Pope are these, about the middle of the said Epistle: Veneris nos acceptissimus, nos prolatissimus ipsum; sed subis convenimus ex omnibus locis Orientalibus, & ex omnibus Civitatibus & pagis que sunt circum civitatem Mofel (hoc est) Assur in vicina Nineve, ex Babylonia, ex Charran, ex Archiebus, ex Isphal que est in medio Tygris, fluminis Eden, &c. i. e. But we did neither accept of this man, neither pronounced him: but suddenly we assembled our selves out of all parts of the East, and out of all the Cities and Villages which are about Mofel (or Assur) neighboring upon Nineve; and out of Babylonia, Carra, Archiebus, and out of the Island which lieth in the middle of Tygris, a River, of Eden, or rather out of the Isle of Eden, which lieth in the River Tygris. And in a second Epistle at the same time sent, they used these words: Nos superius apud nos Metropolitanis, quorum est ordinare Catholicum: sed soli pauci Episcopi, Episcopus Archiebus, Episcopus Salmastis, Episcopus Adarbigem; ex de viginti convenimus in Isphal, que est intra Tygrin flumen, Eden scilicet compatiens iater nos, &c. (which is) Neither are there remaining among us any Metropolitan Bishops, to whom it belongs to ordain a Patriarch, but only a few Bishops, as the Bishop of Archiebus, the Bishop of Salmastis, and the Bishop of Adarbigem: but lo, we assembled presently in the Island of Eden, which is in Tygris, and agreed between our selves, &c.

Now this Island of Eden, Masius describeth with other places; which being well conceived, the Nestorian Epistles, and the State of the Church may be in those parts (faith he) the better understood. And after he hath distinguished the four sorts of Christians in those parts of the World, and in the South part of Affria, which he calleth Nestorian, Jacobites, Maronites, and Coptes, he goeth on in these words: Mox, auditis illius morte, contrivisse aliebus tumultuarius in illam quam modo dixi Tygrin Isphal, que duodecim circiter possunt militibus stipari Mofal posui, decem fere milibus passuum suo ambitu continet, muris undique cincta, & a paucis alibi quam Christi Christians hominibus habuissint which is, Now bearing of the death of the Patriarch, (as those that came to Rome reported) they ran tumultuously together into that Island of Tygris or Eden before spoken of, which Island is situated about twelve miles above Mosul, containing very near ten miles in compass, and every where inhabited with a small, inhabited by few other men than Christians. And afterward, he maketh a recapitulation of the Christian Churches; among the rest he addeth the Isle of Eden by the name of Geferia, Insula Tygris, sive Geferia. Furthermore, describing the City of Habban-Cephra, or Fortis Petra, he placeth it supra predictam Tygris, Insulam, rapi aspectu impeditam; Above the afore-said Island of Tygris, being situated on a steep Rock. Of this Island of Geferia, Androm Thevet maketh mention in his tenth Book of his general Cosmography, in these words: Geferia on Geseff est au milieu de la Riviere du Tigre, & pense que c'est une terre des plus fertiles de toute l'Asie. Geferia or Geseff is in the middle of Tygris, the Isle the most fertile of all Asia.

By this we see that the ancient name of Eden liveth, and that of Eden which lyeth Eastward from Arabia Petraea, and the Desert where Moser wrote, and that Eden which bordereth Carraa according to Eusebius, and that Eden which is seated according to the Assertion of the said Prophet, and joined with those Nations of Reseph, Carnab, and Charran, and the rest which traded with the Tyrians, and is found at this day in the parting of the two Regions of Affrica, and Babylonia, where the Edenites in Thelassar were garrisoned to resist the Affricans, whose displacement Seneca-ber vaunted of (as above written) and lastly, the same Eden, which embraceth Tygris, and looketh on Euphrates, two of the known Rivers of those four, which are by all men ascribed to Paradise.

§. XI.

Of the difficulty in the Text, which seemeth to make the four Rivers to rise from one stream.

BUT it may be objected, that it is written in the Text, That a River went out of Eden, and not Rivers in the plural: which scruple Matthew Beroaldus hath thus answered in his Chronologie: The Latine Translation, faith he, hath these words: Et fluvius egrediebatur de loco voluptatis ad irrigandum Paradisum, qui inde dividebatur in quatuor capita: Que verba melius consentiunt cum rei narratione, & ejusdem explanatione, si ita reddatur: Et fluvius erat egrediens ex Edene (hoc est) fluvius procedebat ex Edene regione ad irrigandum pomarium; & inde dividebatur, & erat in quatuor capita: which is, And a River went out of the place of pleasure to water Paradise, and thence was divided into four heads: Which words (faith Beroaldus) do better agree with the narration and explication of the place, if they be thus translated: And a River was going forth of Eden (that is) Rivers went forth, and ran out of the Region of Eden to water the Orchard; and from thence it was divided, and they became four heads. The Tygrine differs from the Vulgar or Latine; for it converts it thus, Et fluvius egrediebatur de deliciis: And a River went out of pleasure, in stead of Eden; and the Latine addeth the word locus, or place. Et fluvius egrediebatur de loco voluptatis: And a River went out of the place of pleasure: and so the word (place) may rightly be referred to Eden, which was (of all other) a Region most delightful and fertile; and so also the word (inde) and thence, was divided, hath reference to the Country of Eden, and not to the Garden itself.

And for the word (River) for Rivers, it is usual among the Hebrews: for it is written: Let the Earth bud forth the bud of the Herb that seedeth Seed, the fruit- ful Tree, &c. Here the Hebrew useth the Singular for the Plural, Herb and Tree, for Herbs and Trees; and again, We eat of the fruit of the Tree, in stead of (Trees): And thirdly, The man and his wife hid themselves from the presence of God; In media ligni Paradisi. In the middle of the tree of the Garden, for (Trees). And of this opinion is David Kimchi and Fabstius, who upon this place of Genesis say, that the Hebrews do often put the Singular for the Plural, as illud, for numquamque illorum, and he giveth an instance in this question it self, as A River (for Rivers) went out of Eden.

And this answer out of divers of the Learned, may, not without good reason, be given to the objection. That Moser speaketh but of one River, from which the heads should divide themselves. Howbeit I deny not, but with as good (and perhaps better) reason, we may expound the four heads, to be four notable passages into famous Countries, and so we may take the word (River) Verbe the Tenth for one River, (to wit) Euphrates, as this name comprehendeth all the branches thereof. For this River (after he is past the place, where we suppose Paradise to have been) divides it self, and ere long yieldeth four notable passages into several Countries, though not all the way down stream (for this is no where in the Text) where it is noted, that following the River downward; there is conveyance into the Countries named in the Text, though part of the way to one of the Counties (to wit, to Affrica) were up Tygris.

To this end the Text speaking of Hiddkel, as it riseth from the River of Eden, doth not say, it compasseth or walleth the whole Region of Affrica (as it had used this phrase of Pison and Gehon) but that it runneth towards Affrica. The first branch Pison, is Nabar-malcha (by interpretation) Basilus, or flumen regium, which runneth into Tygris under Aparnia; whence riseth the name of Pasi-Tygris, as it were Pisi-Tygris. This leadeth to the Land of Havila or Susiana. The second branch Gehon, is that which in Historians is Nabarsares or Narragas; for Nabar-ragas: both which names signifie flumen derivatum (a River derived,) also Acracanna, quasi Rausius, by reason of the Froggie Fens which it maketh: this Gehon leadeth to the first seat of Chus, about the borders of Chaldea and Arabia, and it is lost at length in the Lakes of Chaldea. The third branch Hiddkel, may be expounded the upper stream of Pison, or Basilus, which runneth into Hiddkel, properly so called (that is, into Tygris) above Seleucia, where it sheweth a passage up Tygris into Affrica: where, because at length it is called Hiddkel or Tygris, having before no known proper name, the Text in this place calleth it Hiddkel from the beginning. The fourth Perath, or Euphrates, so called per excellentiam, being of the body of the River Euphrates, which runneth through Babylon and Ortis. But be it a River or Rivers, that come out of Eden, seeing that Tygris and Euphrates are noted in the Text, there can be no doubt, but that Paradise was not far from these Rivers: for that Perath in Moser is Euphrates, there can be no question; and (indeed) as plain it is that Hiddkel is Tygris. For Hiddkel goeth (faith Moser Eastward towards Affir, as we find, that Tygris is the River of Affrica proprie dicta, whose chief City was Ninurub, as in Genesis the tenth it is written: That out of that Land (to wit) Babylonia, Ninurub went into Affir, and builded Ninurub, which was the chief City of Affrica.

And as for the kind of speech here used in the Text, speaking of four heads; though the heads of Rivers be (properly) their Fountains, yet here are they to be understood, to be spoken of the beginning of their division from the first stream. Caput aqua (faith

(faith Quintus Curtius) illud est, unde aqua nascitur; sex fons nascitur fons; si ex flumine, vel ex lacu prima nascitur, &c. If the beginning of the Water be out of a Fountain, then is the Fountain taken for the Head: if out of a Lake, then the Lake; and if from a main River any branch be separate and divided, then where that branch doth first bound it self with new Banks, there is that part of the River, where the branch forsaketh the main Stream, called the Head of the River.

§. XII.

Of the strange fertility and happiness of the Babylonian Soil, as it is certain that Eden was such.

IT may also be demanded, whether this Region of Eden, by us described, be of such fertility and beauty; as Eden the seat of Paradise was: which if it be denied, then must we also consider, that there was no part of the Earth, that retained that fertility and pleasure, that it had before the Curse: neither can we ascribe the same fruitfulness to any part of the Earth, not the same venue to any Flax thereon growing, that they had before time the Flood; and therefore this Region of Eden may be supposed no such flourishing Country, as it was when it was first created in his perfection. Yet this I find written of it: First in Herodotus, who was an eye-witness, and speaketh of the very place it self, for the life of Eden be twelve Miles or thereabout from Ninurub, and so from Mosul. Ex Euphrate exiens in Tigrim, alterum flumen, juxta quod Oris Ninus sita erat, Hec regio, omnium qua nos vidimus, optima est, &c. Where Euphrates runneth out into Tygris, not far from the place where Ninus is seated; This Region, of all that we have seen, is most excellent. And he addeth afterward, Cereus autem fructu procedendo adeo ferax est, ut nunquam non feru decuma reddat, &c. (that is) It is so fruitful in bringing forth Corn, that it yieldeth two hundred fold: the Leaves of Wheat and Barley being almost four fingers broad: As for the height of Millet and Sefam, they are even in length like unto Trees, which although I know to be true, yet I forbear to speak hereof, well knowing, that those things which are reported of this fruitfulness, will seem very incredible to those, which never were in the Country of Babylon. They have commonly in all the Country Palm-trees growing of their own accord, the most of them bearing Fruit: out of which they make both Meats, and Wine, and Honey, ordering them as the Fig-trees. Thus far Herodotus.

To this Palm-tree, so much admired in the East-India, Sirabo and Niger add a fourth excellency, which is, that it yieldeth Bread; Ex quibus panem, & mel, & vinum, & acetum conficiunt; of which the People make Bread, Wine, Honey, and Vinegar. But Athenius the Eremita findeth a fifth Commodity, not inferior to any of those four, which is, that from this self-same Tree there is drawn a kind of fine Flax, of which People make their Garments, and with which in East-India they prepare the Cordage for their Ships; and that this is true, Athenius in the life of Athenius the Eremita confesseth, saying, Tha be recitavit a Garment made thereof from the Eremita himself, which he brought with him out of this Region. So therefore those Trees, which the East-Indies so highly esteem and so much admire (as indeed the Earth yieldeth no Plant comparable to this) those Trees (I say) are in this upper Babylon, or Region of Eden, as common as any Trees of the Field. Sunt etiam (faith Sirabo) passim per omnem regionem Palmae sua sponte nascentes. There are of Palms over all the whole Region, growing of their own accord. Of this place Quintus Curtius maketh this report, Eunius a parte Lova, Arabia adram fertilitate nobilis, regio compassis interfert inter Tigrim & Euphratem, jactans tam ubere & pingui solo, ut a passu repellit pecora distantur, ne satietas peramas, (that is) As you travel on the left hand of Arabia (famous for plenty of sweet Odors) there lieth a Champaign Country placed between Tygris and Euphrates, and so fruitful and fat a Soil, that they are said to drive their Cattle from the Pasture, lest they should perish by satiety. Bi in anno legetes Babyloniam fecit. The Babylonians cut their Corn twice a year (faith Niger). And as Countries generally are more fruitful to the Southward, than in the North: parts: so we may judge the excellency of this by that report which Sirabo maketh of the South part of Armenia, which is the North border of Eden, or a part thereof; his words be these in the Latin, Tota enim hec regio frugibus & arboribus abundans manjuctis, utemque semper virentibus: This Region aboundeth with pleasant Fruits, and Trees always green: which winneth a perpetual Spring, not found elsewhere but in the Indies only, by reason of the Suns neighbourhood, the life and stirrer up of nature in a perpetual activity. In brief so great is the fertility of the Ground, that the People are constrained to twice to mow down their Corn-fields, and a third time to eat them up with Sheep: which husbandry the Spaniards wanting in the Valley of Mexico, for the first forty years, could not make out kind of Wheat bear Seed, but it grew up as high as the Trees, and was fruitless. Besides, those Fields are altogether without Weeds (faith Pliny) who addeth this singularity to that Soil, That the second year of the very Stubble (or rather falling down of the Seed, again) yieldeth them a harvest of Corn without any further labour: his words are these, Ubertatis tanta sunt, ut sequenti anno sponte restitubili faceret.

Plin. nat. hist. l. 18. c. 17.

§. XIII.

Of the River Pison, and the Land of Havilah.

AFTER the discovery of Eden, and the testimony of the fertility thereof, it resteth to prove that Pison and Gehon are branches of Tygris, and Euphrates. For that the knowledge and certainty of these two Rivers should trouble so many wise Men, it is strange to me, seeing necessity is self (Tygris and Euphrates being known) findeth them out: for Euphrates or Tygris, or both be that River or Rivers of Eden, which water Paradise, which River or Rivers Moser winneth afterward; divided into four heads, whereof the one is called Pison, the other Gehon, &c. Could there be a stranger fancy in the World, than when we find both these (namely) Tygris and Euphrates in Affrica and Mesopotamia, to seek the other two in India and Egypt, making the one Ganges, and the other Nilus? Two Rivers as far distant, as any of fame known or discovered in the World: the Scriptures making it to plain, that these Rivers were divided into four branches; and with the Scriptures, Nature, Reason and Experience bearing witness. There is no error, which hath not some slippery and bad foundation, or some appearance of probability resembling truth, which when Men (who study to be singular) find out, (straining reason according to their fancies) they then publish to the World matter of contention, and jangling: not doubting but in the variable deformity of Mens minds to find some partakers or sectators, the better by their help to nurse and cherish such weak Babes, as their own inventions have begotten.

But

But this mistaking (and first for the River of Pifon) seemeth to have grown out of the not distinguishing of that Region in India, called Havilah, from Havilah, which adjoineth to Babylonia, afterwards known by the name of Sufiana. For Havilah upon Tigris took name from Havilah the Son of Cush; and Havilah in India from Havilah the Son of Jethan, the one remembered by Moses in the description of Paradise, the other where Moses setteth down the generation of Noah and his Sons after the Flood. For the Sons of Cush were Seba, Havilah, Sabrah, and Raamah; and the Sons of Jethan were Ophir, and Havilah, &c. of which latter (to wit) of Ophir, (whence Salomon had Gold) and Havilah adjoining had their names. Now because Ganges is a great and a famous River of the East India, and Havilah a Country of the same, and is situated upon Ganges, hence it came that Ganges was taken for Pifon, which River is said by Moses to water the Land of Havilah. Or perhaps it was supposed that those four Rivers, named by Moses, must of necessity be four of the greatest in the World; whence (supposing that Ganges was next great and famous River after Tigris and Euphrates, they chose out this River to make one of the four. And yet certainly there is another River, whom in these respects they should rather have chosen than Ganges: for the River Indus on this side India, for beauty, for nearness, and for ability, giveth no way place to Ganges; but exceedeth it in all. And how can any reasonable Man conceive, that Ganges can be one of the four heads: seeing Indus cometh between it and Tigris; and between Tigris and Indus is all that large Empire of Persia, consisting of many Kingdoms. And again, farther toward the East, and beyond Indus, are all those ample Dominions of India intra Ganges, which lie between those two proud Rivers of Indus and Ganges, now called the Kingdom of Mogor. So as if Indus be not accounted for any of the four, because it is removed from Tigris by all the breadth of Persia, then how much less Ganges, which falleth into the Ocean, little less than forty degrees to the Eastward of Indus? Surely whosoever readeth the Story of Alexander shall find, that there is no River in Asia, that can exceed Indus. For Hydaspis was of that breadth and depth, as Alexander thereon in great Gallies transported himself and the greatest part of his Army, and in failing down that branch of Indus, found it so large and deep, and by reason thereof to great a billow, as it endangered his whole Fleet, which was ready to be swallowed up therein: Hydaspis (as aforesaid) being but one of many branches of Indus, comparable to it, and as great as it, having beside this, the Rivers of Coas, of Sinathus, Acetius, Adri, (otherwise Hircus) Hippalus, and Zaradus, all which make but one Indus, and by it are swallowed up with all their Children and Companions, which being all incorporate and made one Stream, it crosseth athwart Asia, and then at Cambaya velleth the Ocean Sea.

But because Pifon, which compasseth Havilah, as also Gehon, which watereth Cush, must somewhere be joyed with the rest in one body, or at least be found to proceed out of the same Country of Eden, out of which the other two heads do proceed, out of doubt they cannot either the one or the other, be Ganges, or Nilus: for Nilus riseth in the uttermost of the South, and runneth Northward into the Mediterranean Sea; and the River Ganges riseth out of the Mountain Imaus, or (as others will have it) Caucasus, which divides the Northern Scythia from India, and runneth from North to South into the Indian Ocean. And as for Parath and Hiddekel (that is, Euphrates and Tigris) the one of them is begotten in Armenia, near Georgiana or Iberia, the other not far off in the same Armenia, by the Gordian Mountains, so as Ganges who only travellet in her own India, and Nilus through Asiatica and Aegypt, never saw the Land of Eden, or joyed themselves in one Channel, either with themselves, or with either of the others, and therefore could not at any time from thence be separated, or divided into four heads or branches, according to Moses.

Therefore the River Pifon, which enricheth Havilah, is the same which by joining it self with Tigris, was therefore called Pif-tigris, or Pif-tigris of Pifon and Tigris, which River watereth that Havilah, which Havilah the Son of Cush gave name unto, and not Havilah of India, so called by Havilah the Son of Jethan, who inhabited with his Brother Ophir in the East. And this Havilah of the Cushites hath also Gold, Beldium, and the Oxnyx Stone. This Beldium is a Tree, of the bigness of an Olive, whereof Arabia hath great plenty, which yieldeth a certain gumme, sweet to smell to, but bitter in taste, called also Beldium. The Hebrews take the Load-stone for Beldium. Bernaldus affirmeth, that Beld in Hebrew signifieth Pearl: so doth Eugubius; and Hieronymus calls it Olivaster: be it what it will, a Tree bearing Gumme, or Pearl: Havilah, or Sufiana, hath plenty of both. Now this Country of Sufiana or Havilah stretcheth it self toward the North, as far as the Altars of Hercules, and from thence embraceth all that Tract of Land Southward, as far as the Perfian Gulf, on the East side thereof: from which East side had the Sabeans (which traded with the City of Tyre, according to Ezekiel) their great plenty of Gold; which Sirabo also witnesseth, as was shewed before.

The Greeks had a conceit, that Pifon was Danubius, the Rabins take it for Nilus, Aven-Ezra (saith Hephias) out of Rebbi Sadaia translateth Pifon into Nilus, but Nilus findeth the same impossibility that Ganges doth: and Danubius hath the Sea of Hellepont and all Asia the less, between it and Tigris. Now Pifon which runneth through Havilah or Sufiana, doth to this day retain some sign of this name; for where it and Tigris embrace each other under the City of Amamia, there do they agree of a joint and compounded name, and are called Pif-tigris. And it is strange unto me, that from so great Antiquity there should be found remaining any resembling sound of the first name: for Babylon it self, which dwelleth so near these Rivers, is by some Writers known by the name of Bandas, as, by Posellus, by Cassellius, of Baldace: by Baris, of Bagdad; and of Boghedra, by Andrew Tener; and yet all those that have lately seen it, call it Bagdet. To this River of Pifon, Ptolemy indeed, with many others, give the name of Basillus, or Regius; and Gehon they term Mehar-jares and Masius, and Basar-jares. So is Euphrates, near the Spring and Fountain, by Sirabo and Pliny called Pix-jares: by Junius, Puck-perath, out of the Hebrew, (that is) The profusion, or coming forth of Euphrates: where it breaketh through the Mountain Taurus, it takes the name of Omyra. Plutarch calls it Medus and Zaranda: the Hebrew Parath, (saith Dr. Montanus) Pagninus, Parath: Josephus, Phorab: Eusebius, Zozimus: Amianus, Claudianus: Gisflanus and Colmatius term it Cobar: which Ezekiel calleth Chebar; but this is but a branch of Euphrates. The Affrians know it by the name of Amalebar, or Nabor Malcha: but now commonly it is called Fra.

The

The same confusion of names hath Tigris, as, Digitis, and Digitah, Sellax, and Sollax: of the Hebrews it was called Hiddekel: now of the Inhabitants Tiger.

But Mercer upon Genesis conceiveth rightly of these Rivers: for Euphrates and Tigris (saith he) stream into four branches, two of which keep their ancient names, and the other two are called Pifon and Gehon. The reason why these two Rivers joined in one (below Amamia) lose their names, and are called Pif-tigris, and the memory names of Euphrates extinguished, is, because the best part of Euphrates running through the Channel of Gehon, sinketh into the Lakes of Cheladan, not far from Ur, the City of Abraham, and fall not intirely into the Perfian Sea, as Tigris accompanied with Pifon doth.

This error, that Pifon was Ganges, was first broached by Japhys, (whose Fields though they be fertile, yet are they exceeding full of Weeds) and other Men (who take his authority to be sufficient in matter of description, whereupon depended no other important consequence) were not curious in the examination thereof. For Epiphanius, Augustine, and Hierome, take this for current; whereof it followed, that as Pifon was transported into the East India, to find out Havilah: so was Gehon drawn into Africa, to compass Aethiopia. But if Havilah, whereof Moses speaketh in the description of Paradise, be found to be a Region, adjoining to Babylon on the one side, and Cush (which is fallily interpreted Aethiopia) fastened to it on the other side, we shall not need then to work wonders (that is) to impose upon Men the transportation of Rivers, from one end of the World to the other, which (among other uses) were made to transport Men. Now it was in the valley of Shinar, where Cush the Son of Ham first fate down with his Sons, Seba, Havilah, Sabrah, Raamah, Nimrod, &c. and of Havilah, the Son of Cush, did that Region take name, which Pifon compasseth; and the Land (called Cush) which Gehon watereth, took name of Cush himself. For as the Sons of Jethan, Ophir, and Havilah, seated themselves as near together as they could in India, so did the Sons of Cush in Shinar or Babylonia, where Nimrod built Babel: for Havilah or Charivil was first Chusia of Cush; then Chusis, Susis, and Sufiana.

From this Havilah unto the Deserts of Sur, did the Israelites and Amalekites possess all the interjacent Countries: for Saul smote the Amalekites from Havilah to Sur: which Sur the Chaldaean Paraphrast converteth Hagra, and Hagra bordereth the red Sea; but this was not mean Indus, for Saul upon the red Sea, to Havilah in the East India; for Saul was no such Traveller or Conqueror, and therefore Havilah must be found nearer home, where the Sons of Ismael inhabited, and which Country Saul walked of: for Amalek and the Amalekites possess that neck of Country, between the Perfian Sea, and the red Sea; Havilah being the extreme of the one towards the East, and Sur of the other, towards Aegypt and the West, leaving that great body of Arabia Felix towards the South; and they spread themselves with the Madianites and Edumians, from the East part, or back side of the Holy Land, to the banks of Euphrates, comprising the best parts of Arabia Petrea, and Deserta.

§. XIV.

Of the River Gehon and the Land of Cush: and of the ill translating of the Aethiopia for Cush. 2 Chron. 21. 16.

NOW, as Havilah in the East India drew Pifon far out of his way thither, so I say did Cush (being by the Seventy translated Aethiopia) force Gehon into Africa. For Cush being taken for Aethiopia by the Greeks, whom the Latins followed, Gehon consequently was effectuated for Nilus. But Aethiopia are, as much, as black or burnt Faces, whose proper Country is called Thebaides, lying to the Southward of all Aegypt. And although there be many other Regions of Aethiopia, and far South in Africa, yet those of Thebaides are those so often remembered in the Egyptian Stories, and out of which Nation they had many times their Kings of Aegypt: all which Aethiopia are very near, or else directly under the Equinoctial line, which is very far from that Land inhabited by the Chusites; who are neither black of colour, nor in any fort neighbouring Terride Zona. But this Translation of the Septuagint, Pererius doth qualify in this manner. There are (saith he) two Aethiopia's, the East, and the West: and this division he indeth in Sirabo, out of Homer. Now because there is no colour to make Chusis Aethiopia in Africa, Pererius will make Chusis and the Land of the Chusites (which is Arabia Petrea, and a part of Arabia the happy, with the Region of Madian) to be the East Aethiopia.

Now if it be granted, that Cush and the Land of the Chusites, be that Tract from Sur to Havilah, according to the Scriptures: Habituavit Ismael ab Hae Gen. 25. 18. vilah usque Sur, quae respicit Aegyptum introituum Affricae: Ismael dwelt from Havilah into Sur, that is towards Aegypt, as thou goest toward Affrica; The same sufficeth to prove that Gehon cannot be Nilus, but a River which watereth India, and not Aethiopia. But this place of Scripture Habituavit Ismael, &c. hath this sense. Ismael dwelt from Havilah, which is the way of Affrica, or the Country bordering Affrica; and Sur, which lieth toward Aegypt, which is as much to say, as, The issues of Ismael (whereof there were twelve Princes) whom God had promised to make a great people, inhabited all those Regions between the border of Aegypt and Affrica. And that they were (according to the Word of God) so increased and multiplied, it well appeared, when Zoarab the Chusites, which others call Tharabath, brought an Army of ten hundred thousand against Asa King of Juda. Which Army came not out of Aethiopia beyond Aegypt; for that had been a strange progress for such a multitude, as ten hundred thousand, having fo mighty a King as the King of Aegypt, between Palastina and Aethiopia. But these were the Chusites, Amalekites, Madianites, Ismaelites, and Arabians. For it is written, that after Asa (strengthened by God) had defeated this world of an Army, he in following his victory took some of the Cities of King Zoarab round about, as Gerar. Now that Gerar is a City of the *Aethiopia*ns, it cannot be suspected: for these be the words of the Scripture disproving Gen. 10. 11. And Abraham departed thence toward the South Country, and dwelt between Cadath and Sur, and journeyed in Gerar: Now Sur is that part, upon which Moses and the Israelites first set their Feet after they passed the red Sea, where the Amalekites in Rephidim set on them, supposing that they had been weary, and unable to resist. Again, in the Story of Isaac it is written, Wherefore Isaac went to Abi- Gen. 27. 8. elech

Gen. 26. 1. melech, and the Philistines unto Gerar: and I am sure Abimelech and the Philistines were no Ethiopiens. And lastly, Moses himself, where he describeth the Bounds of the Canaanites way from Sydon, as thus cometh to Gerar: for Sydon was the Frontier of Canaan towards the North, and Gerar by Gaza towards the South. But indeed, howsoever Perrus doth with an honest excuse false his Translation of Chus for Ethiopia, yet it appeareth plainly, that the Septuagint, and Josephus did altogether misunderstand this place. And first, for Homers East and West Ethiopia, they are both found elsewhere. For Pliny in his fifth Book and eighth Chapter, citeth Homers for an Author, of these two Ethiopia's. But the East Ethiopia is that which compasseth Nilus to the South of Egypt, and is the South border thereof; now a part of the Empire of the Athiopes, under Ptolemy; And the West Ethiopia is that which joyneth it self with the River Niger, which we call Senega and Gambra: for thereabouts are these Ethiopiens, called Perotti, Darantes, with divers other names, which Pliny numbeth. But all these are in Africa, and beyond the Deserts thereof, faith Pliny out of Homers, Aegyptus, and Juba, which Regions indeed (I mean that of Niger, and that of Ptolemy John, and the Troglodytes) lie due East and West. But as for Chus, and the Region of the Ismaelites, &c. they are extended directly North from that Ethiopia, which is beyond Egypt. Now, that Josephus was exceeding gross herein, it appeareth by that fiction, which he hath of Moses when he served Pharaoh, in the Wars against the Ethiopiens: for in that (to make Chus, Ethiopia), he transporteth Madian by miracle over the Red Sea, and beyond all shewed more at large in the Chapter of the Worlds Plantation. Again, that Gehon was improperly translated Nilus, Perrus confessed, and layeth it rather to the corruption of the Greek copy, than otherwise. And whereas the Septuagint have converted this place of c. 2. v. 18. the Prophet Jeremie. And what hast thou now to do in the way of Egypt, to drink the water of Nilus? Quid vis in via Egypti, ut bibas aquam Gehon? to this faith Perrus, profecto Hebraice ibi non est vox Gehon, sed Sichor, quae significat nigrum & turbidum; Truly (faith Perrus) the word Gehon in this place, is not found in the Hebrew, but Sichor, which signifieth black and troubled water.

Furthermore, this is a manifest and unanswerable argument, that Chus was ill taken for Ethiopia. Moses married the Daughter of Jethro, Prince and Priest of Madian, whom both the Greek and Latin call a Madianite, and not Ethiopiens, as (with Josephus) the Geneva converts it, though it help it a little with a marginal note. Now it is without dispute, that Zipporah was of the Country of Madian, which is that part of Arabia Petraea, bordering the Red Sea; for it is written in the second of Exodus, that Moses fled from Pharaoh, into the land of Madian, and sat down by a Well, &c. and again, in the third of Exodus; When Moses kept the sheep of Jethro his Father-in-law, Priest of Madian, &c. Indeed, the three four Nations are every where mixt in the Scriptures, because they dwell confusely together (to wit) the Madianites, the Ismaelites, the Amalekites, and the Chusites, which were all in one general word, Arabians, and in the Scriptures sometimes called by one of those names, and sometimes by another, as in Gen. 27. v. 25. 27. & 28. that Joseph was sold to the Ismaelites; and in the same chapter, v. 36. it is written, that the Madianites sold Joseph to Potiphar, Pharaohs Steward. The Genevians, in a marginal note (to avoid this confounding of the Nations) say, that Moses wrote according to their opinion, who took the Madianites and Ismaelites to be all one. But Moses wrote not after any Mans opinion, he wrote the truth, and these were all Arabians, and he in this very place it appeareth by their Merchandise, which they brought with them, when they bought Joseph: for their Camels were laden with Spices, and Balm, and Myrrh, which are the trades of Arabia Gen. 37. 25. Salix, from whence chiefly, and from the East India, all the World is served with Myrrh and Frankincense; and their Spices they received from the East side of the Arabian Gulf, as afore said. And in the 39. Chapter it is said: That Potiphar v. 1. bought Joseph of the Ismaelites, which the Chaldeans bought Joseph in the same place calleth Arabs. Paraphrasis in the same place manifest, it is written Now, to make this the more manifest, it is written in the 6. of Judges. That when Israel had sown, then came up the Madianites, and the Amalekites, v. 3. and they of the East, were Arabians of the Desert; v. 33 where before in the buying of Joseph, the Madianites and the Ismaelites were confounded, here the Madianites only are named, as comprehending c. 7. both Nations; and in the eighth Chapter, v. 24. these Nations are all called Ismaelites; and neither Madianites nor Amalekites. As when Gedon desired, that every Man would give him the golden Earrings, which they had taken, after the Victory against Zabab and Zalmuna, Kings of Arabia, amounting to 17000 Shekles of Gold, it is written: For they had golden ear-rings, because they were v. 8. Ismaelites. And these Ismaelites were a great and valiant Nation, and ever in action of War. Ms. n. ejus contra omnes, & manus omnium contra eum; His hand (faith God of Israel) shall be against all Men, and every mans hand against him. Of these Ismaelites came the Mahometan Arabians, though some Writers think Mahomet to be of the Schemite. And these Ismaelites, which inhabit chiefly in Adar, and the Deserts of Sur and Pharan (faith Josephus) use Poison upon their Arrows, as the Indians do. Towards the South-east are the Madianites, and Chusites; and beyond them, towards the Deserts of Arabia, the Amalekites; and all are one Nation, and all Arabians.

Lastly, the ill Translation of Ethiopia for Chus, is, among other places, made most apparent, in the second of Chronicles, in these words: So the Lord stirred up against Jehoram, the Spirit of the Philistines, and the Arabians, which confine the Ethiopiens; so Jeremie reads it; the Geneva Translation hath it, which were besides the Philistines. Now, how far it is off between the Philistines, and the Negros or the Ethiopiens, every Man that looketh in a Map, may judge. For the Philistines and Arabians, do mix and joyn with the Land of the Chusites, and are distant from Ethiopia about two and thirty, or three and thirty Degrees, and therefore not their next Neighbours; but all Egypt, and the Deserts of Sur, and Pharan: are between them. So as this place of the second of Chronicles, should have been translated in these words: So the Lord stirred up against Jehoram, the Spirits of the Philistines, and the Arabians, which confine and border upon the Chusites, who indeed are their next Neighbours. * Nulla superest dubitatio, quin Ethiopia in sacris & sanctis literis sit Arabia propria. There remaineth no doubt Egypt in (faith Seneca) but Ethiopia in the Scriptures, is Gen. c. 2. taken for that Country, which joyneth to Arabia.

Now may we think it is probable, or possible, that Moses could be ignorant of Nilus? No, he knew it, no living Man so well, and therefore would would never have named Gehon, for Nilus, or Nilus for Gehon. Surely if Moses had meant Nilus, when he named Gehon, he would have called the River (into which he was cast upon Reeds, and preserved by God, working compassion in the Daughter of Pharaoh) a River of Egypt, wherein he was born and bred, and wrought so many Miracles. Besides the River of Nilus is often named in the Scriptures, but never by the name of Gehon. And if Moses had told the Ismaelites, that Nilus had been a River of Paradise, they might justly have thought that he had desired them: for they had lived there all the days of their Lives and found no such Paradise at all, nor any memory, or speech thereof; except we shall believe the Paradise of Hesperides, where (faith Plinie) there was nothing found in his time, but wild Olives instead of Golden Apples. v. 4. 1. But Nilus is twice called Sichor, once in Egypt, and once in the Prophet Jeremie; and yet in those places it is not said to be a River of Ethiopia, but of Egypt. For in a word, the Ismaelites had never any communion or affairs with the Ethiopiens, nor any intelligence, or trade, beyond Egypt, to the South; but the enemies, which they had on the South, and East parts, were these Nations of the Chusites, Philistines, Ismaelites, Amalekites, and Madianites: who being often governed by many little Kings, or Regals, were distinguished in names, according to the Fathers and Heads of those Nations; but in one general name were all Arabians. On the North side of Canaan, they were afflicted with the Calephians, with the Mogogians, Tubathians, and others their adherents; and chiefly within themselves, the Nations, which remained of the ancient Canaanites, held the strongest Cities upon the Sea-coast (as Tyre, Sidon, Am, Tarsus, and many others); yea, Hierusalem itself was withheld from Israel (from the days of Moses even unto the time of David) by the Jehusites.

That which now remaineth of most difficulty is, that it doth not appear, that any part of Gehon watereth that part of Arabia: the fony, which the Chusites inhabited in the times of the Kings of Israel: and in this Desert it was that Maz. Broadus lost himself in seeking out Paradise: for he was driven (to my understanding) to create two Rivers, and call them Gehon, and Pison; to the end that the one might water Chus, and the other Havilah, for I find none such in Verum natura, as he hath described: by which Rivers he also includeth within Paradise, even Arabia the Desert.

And as he well proved that Pison was not Ganges, nor Gehon, Nilus: so here to find them else where it seemeth he knew not. Certainly this River of Gehon, which he maketh to fall into the Mediterranean at Gaza, and whose springs he findeth far East in Arabia, is but imaginary: for the Current by Gaza is but a small stream, rising between it and the Red Sea, whose head from Gaza it self is little more than twenty English Miles, as shall appear hereafter. But questionless, hence it comes that many were mistaken. They all considered of the habitations of the Chusites, as they were planted when the state of Israel stood, and when it flourished, being then their near Neighbours, and never looked back to the first seats and plantation of Chus. For after the Flood, Chus and his Children never rested, till they found the Valley of Shinar, in which, and near which himself with his Sons first inhabited. Havilah took the River-side of Tigris chiefly on the East, which after his own name he called Havilah, (now Susiana;) Ramath and Sheba farther down the River, in the entrance of Arabia Felix. Nimrod built himself in the belt of the Valley, where he built Babel, whereof that Region had afterwards the name of Babylonia. Chus himself, and his Brother Mezraim first kept upon Gehon, which falleth into the Lakes of Chaldea, and in process of time, and as their People increased, they drew themselves more Weltherly towards the Red or Arabian Sea: from whence Mezraim past over into Egypt, in which Traet the Chusites remained for many years after. Now because there could be no such River found in Arabia the fony, which they might entitle Gehon, they translated Chus Ethiopia, and Gehon, Nilus. And if we do examine this mistaking by example, we shall the better perceive it as it was. For let us suppose that Brute, or whoever else that first peopled this Iland, had arrived upon the River of Thames, and calling the Iland after his name Britannia, it might be said that Thames or Tems was a River that watered Britannia; and when afterwards in process of time, the same Brute had also discovered and conquered Scotland, which he also entituled by the same name of Britannia, after-ages might conclude that Scotland was no part thereof, because the River of Tems is not found therein. Or let us suppose that Europa, the Daughter of the King of Tyre in Phoenicia, gave the name to Europe, according to Hierodotus, and that the first discoverers thereof arrived in the mouth of some River in Thrace, which then watered as much of Europe, as he first discovered, shall we in like sort relieve, that France, Spain, and Italy, &c. are no parts of Europe, because that River is not found in them, or any of them? In like manner was it said by Moses in his description of Gehon, that it watered the whole Land of Chus; but not the whole Land which the Chusites should or might in future time conquer, people, and inhabit, seeing in after-ages they became Lords of many Nations, and they might (perchance) have been Masters in time, (as the Sassans which came out of that were) of a great part of the World. For (though the Babylonian Empire, which took beginning in Nimrod the Son of Chus, consisted at the first but of four Cities, (to wit) Babel, Erech, Accad, and Chalde, yet we find, that his Successors within a few years after commanded all the whole World in effect; and the fame of Babel consumed the memory of Chus. For of this Tower of Confusion did all that Land take the name of Babylonia; and the greatness of that Empire founded by Nimrod a younger Son, obscured the name and Nation of his Father Chus in those parts, until they crept farther off, and in places not yet entituled, and farther from the Babylonian Empire, where the Chusites retained their names, which also they fastned to the Soil and Territory by themselves afterwards inhabited and held. And we may not think that Chus or any of his could in haste creep through those desert Regions, which the length of 130 years after the Flood had (as it were) fortified with Thickets, and permitted every Bush and Briar, Reed and Tree to joyn themselves (as it were) into one main Body and Forest. For if we look with judgment and reason into the Worlds plantation, we shall find, that every Family sealed themselves as near together as possible they could; and though necessity enforced them, after they grew full of People, to spread themselves, and creep out of Shinar or Babylonia, yet did they it with this advice, as that they might at all times resort, and succour one another by River, the Fields being then (without all doubt) impassable. So Nimrod, who out of wit and strength usurped dominion over the rest, late down in the very consequence of all those Rivers, which watered Paradise: for thither it was to which the greatest Troops of Noahs Children repaired, and from the same place whence Mankind had his beginning, from thence had they again their increase. The First Father of men Adam, had therein his former habitation. The second Father of Mankind Noah, began from thence his dispersion.

Now as Nimrod the youngest, yet strongest, made his choice of Babel (as aforesaid) which both Tigris and Euphrates cleansed and enriched; so did Havilah place himself upon Pisgittis: Raamah and his Son Sheba farther down upon the same River, on the Sea-coast of Arabia: Chus himself upon Gehon, the fairest branch of Euphrates. And when they began to spread themselves farther off, yet they always fastened themselves to the Rivers sides: for Ninive, Chavran, Reseph, Cameth, Urin Chaldan, and the other first-peopled Cities were all founded upon these navigable Rivers, or their branches, by which the one might give succour and assistance to the other, as is already often remembered.

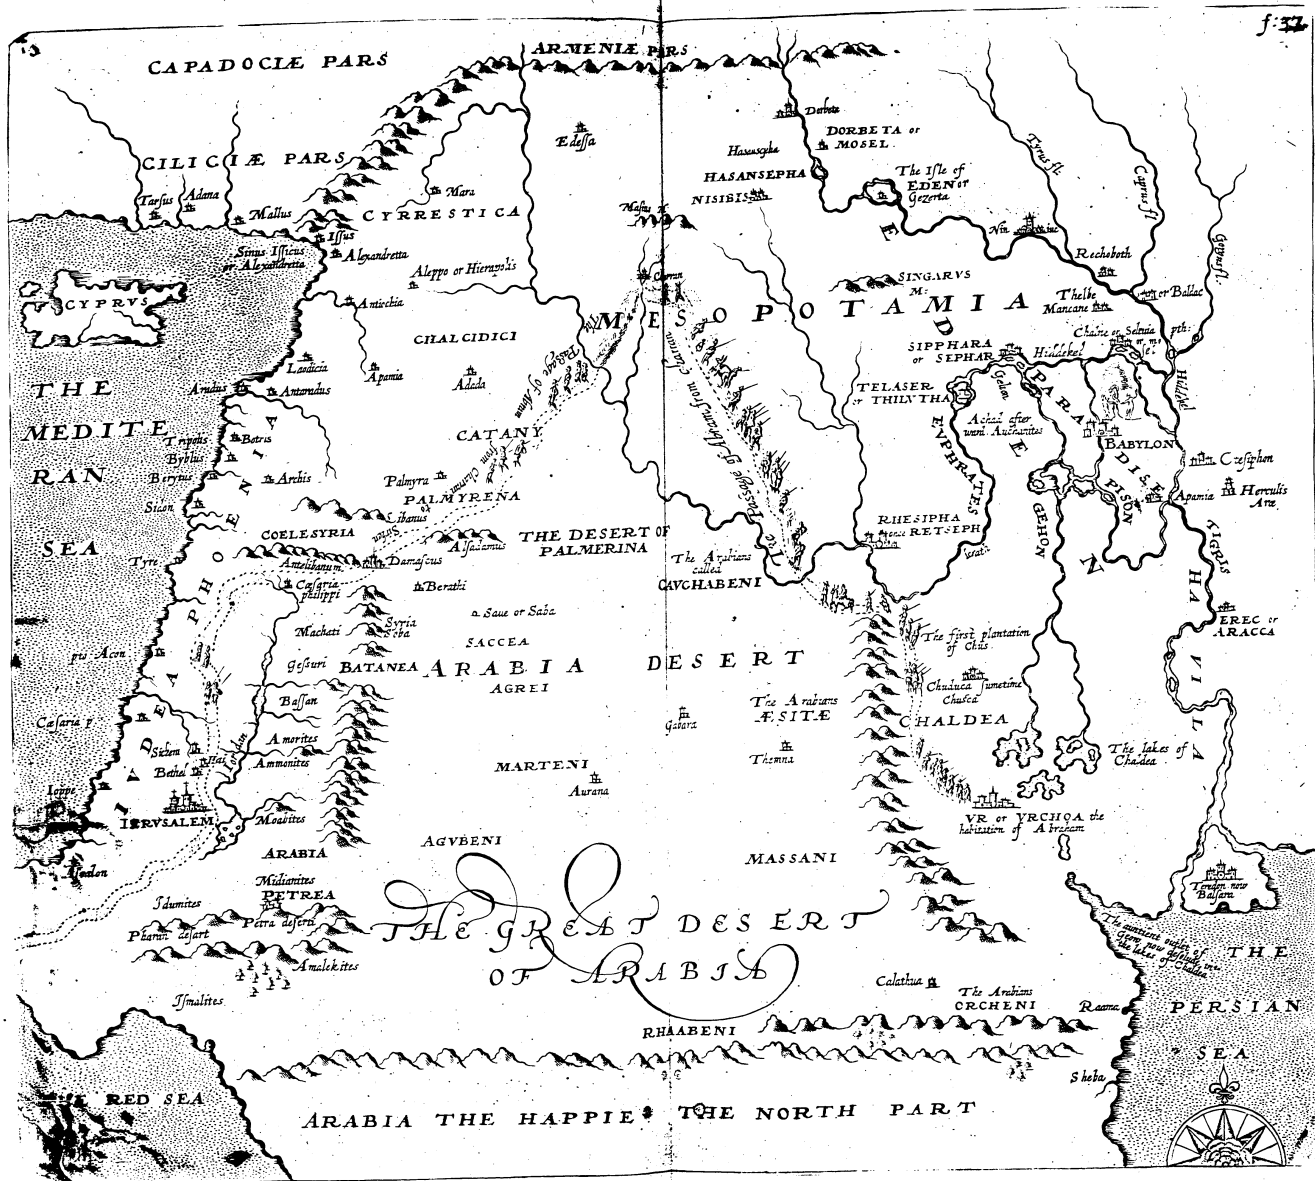

§. XV.

A Conclusion by way of repetition of some things spoken of before.

BUT now to conclude this dispute, it appeareth to me by the testimonies of the Scriptures, that Paradise was a place created by God, and a part of this our Earth and habitable World, seated in the lower part of the Region of Eden, afterwards called Ayam suviarum, or Mesopotamia, which taketh into it also a portion of Shinar and Armenia: this Region standing in the most excellent temper of all other, (to wit) 35 Degrees from the Equinoctial, and 55 from the North Pole: in which Climate the most excellent Wines, Fruits, Oyl, Grain of all sorts are to this day found in abundance. And there is nothing that better proveth the excellency of this said Soil and temper, than the abundant growing of the Palm-trees, without the care and labour of Man. For whereinsoever the Earth, Nature, and the Sun can most vaunt, that they have excelled, yet shall this Plant be the greatest wonder of all their works: this Tree alone giveth unto Man whatsoever his Life begetteth at Nature's hand. And though it may be said, that these Trees are found both in the East and West Indies, which Countries are also blessed with a perpetual Spring and Summer, yet lay down by those pleasures and benefits the fearful and dangerous Thunders and Lightnings, the horrible and frequent Earthquakes, the dangerous Diseases, the multitude of venomous Beasts and Worms, with other inconveniences, and then there will be found no comparison between the one and the other.

What other excellencies this Garden of Paradise had, before God, (for mays ingratitude and cruelty) cursed the Earth, we cannot judge; but I may safely think that by how much Adam exceeded all living Men in perfection, by being the immediate workmanship of God, by so much did that chosen and particular Garden exceed all parts of the universal World, in which God had planted (that is) made to grow the Trees, of Life, of Knowledge, Plants only proper, and becoming the Paradise, and Garden of so great a Lord.

The sum of all this is, That whereas the eyes of Men in this Scripture have been dim-lighted (some of them finding Paradise beyond our known World: some, above the middle Region of the Air: some, elevated near the Moon: others, as far South as the Line, or as far North, as the Pole, &c.) I hope that the Reader will be sufficiently satisfied, that these were but like Castles in the Air, and in mens fancies, vainly imagined. For it was Eastward in Eden (saith Moses) Eastward, in respect of Judea, that God planted this Garden, which Eden we find in the Prophets where it was; and whereof the name (in some part) remaineth to this day. A River went out of Eden to water this Garden, and from thence divided it self into four branches; and we find that both Tigris and Euphrates swimming through Eden do joyn in one, and afterward taking ways apart do water Chus and Havilah, according to Moses: the true seats of Chus and his Sons then being in the Valley of Shinar, in which Nimrod built Babel. That Pisgittis was Ganges, the Scripture, Reason, and Experience teach the contrary: for that which was never joyned cannot be divided. Ganges, which inhabiteth India, cannot be a branch of the Rivers of Eden; That Gehon was Nilus, the same distance maketh the same impossibility, and this River is a greater stranger to Tigris and Euphrates, than Ganges is: for although there are between Tigris and Ganges above four thousand Miles, yet they both rise in the same quarter of the World; but Nilus is begotten in the mountains of the Moon, almost as far off as the Cape of Good Hope, and falleth into the Mediterranean Sea: and Euphrates distilleth out of the Mountains of Armenia, and falleth into the Gulf of Perse: the one riseth in the South, and travaileth South: the other riseth in the North, and runneth South, threescore and three Degrees the one from the other. In this last following I have added a Geographical Description of this terrestrial Paradise, that the Reader may thereby the better conceive the preceding Discourse; and this is the reason I look for, that my labours may but receive an allowance suspended, until such time as this description of mine be reprinted by a better.

CHAP. IV.

Of the two chief Trees in the Garden of Paradise.

§. I.

That the Tree of Life was a material Tree: and in what sense it is to be taken, that Man by his eating the forbidden Fruit, is made subject to Death.

FOR eating the forbidden Fruit of the Tree of Knowledge was Adam driven out of Paradise, in exilium vite temporalis, into the banishment of temporal life, saith Beda. That these Trees of Life and Knowledge were material Trees (though Figures of the Law and of the Gospel) it is not doubted by the most religious and learned Writers: although the wits of men, which are so volatile, as nothing can fix them, and so slippery, as nothing can fasten them, have in this also delivered to the World an imaginary Doctrine.

The Tree of Life (say the Hebrews) hath a plural construction, and is to be understood, Lignum vitarum, The Tree of Lives, because the Fruit thereof had a property, to preserve both the growing, sensitive, and rational life of Man; and not only (but for Adam's transgression) had prolonged his own days, but also given a durable continuance to all Posterity; and that, so long, as a body compounded of Elements could last.

And although it is hard to think, that flesh and blood could be immortal, but that it must once perish and rot, by the unchanged Law of God imposed on his Creatures, Man (notwithstanding) should have enjoyed thereby a long, healthful, and ungrieved life: after which (according to the opinion of most Divines) he should have been translated, as Enoch was. And as before the Flood, the days of men had the long measure of eight hundred or nine hundred years; and soon after, the Flood of two hundred years and upwards even to five hundred: so if Adam had not disobeyed God's first and chief Commandment, the lives of Men on earth might have continued double, treble, or quadruple to any of the longest times of the first Age, as many learned Men have conceived. Chrysostom, Rupertus, Tostatus, and others were of belief, that (but for Adam's Fall and transgression) Adam and his Posterity had been immortal. But such is the infinite wisdom of God, as he foresaw that the Earth could not have contained mankind; or else, that Millions of Souls must have been ungenerated, and have had no being, if the first number, wherewith the Earth was replenished, had abode thereon for ever: and therefore that of Chrysostom must be understood of immortality of Bodies, which should have been translated and glorified.

But of what kind or Species this Tree of Life was, no man hath taken on him to teach: in which respect many have conceived, that the same was not material, but a mere Allegory, taking their strength out of Solomon, where Wisdom is compared to the Tree of Life, and from other places, where also Christ is called the Tree of Life, and out of the Apocalypsis, I will give to him that overcometh, to eat of the Tree of Life, which is in the Paradise of God. But to this place St. Augustine's answer may suffice, (which is) That the one doth not exclude the other, but that, as there was a terrestrial Paradise, so there was a celestial. For although Ager and Sara were Figures of the Old, and New Testament, yet to think that they were not Women, and the Maid and Wife of Abraham, were mere foolishness. And so in this place the sense of the Scripture is manifest. For God brought out of the Earth every Tree fair to sight, and sweet to taste; the tree also of life in the midst of the garden: which sheweth, that among the Trees, which the Earth by Gods commandment produced, the Tree of Life was one, and that the Fruit thereof was also to be eaten. The report of this Tree was also brought to the ancient Poets: for as from the indigested matter or Chaos, Hesiodus, Homer, Ovid, and others steal the invention of the created World; so from the Garden of Paradise, they took the Plat-form of the Orchard of Alecinous, and another of the Hesperides: and from the Tree of Life, their Nectar, and Ambrosia; for Nectar, according to Suidas, signifieth making young, and Ambrosia, immortality; and therefore said to be the meat and drink of the Gods.

§. II.

Of Becanus his opinion, that the Tree of Knowledge was Ficus Indica.

NOW for the Tree of Knowledge of Good and Evil, some Men have presumed farther, especially Goropius Becanus, who giveth himself the honour to have found out the kind of this Tree, which none of the Writers of former times could ever guess at, whereto Goropius much marvaileth. But as he had an inventive brain, so there never lived any Man, that believed better thereof, and of himself. Surely howsoever his opinion may be valued, yet he usurpeth the praise due to others, at least if the invention be at that price at which he setteth it. For Moses Bar-Cephas fastened on this conjecture above six hundred years before Becanus was born: and Bar-Cephas himself referreth the invention to an antiquity more remote, citing for his Author Philoxenus Maburgensis, and others, whose very words Goropius useth, both concerning the Tree, and the reasons wherewith he would induce other Men to that belief. For Moses Bar-Cephas in his Treatise of Paradise (the first Part and fol. 49.) saith, That the Tree of Knowledge was Ficus Indica, the Indian Fig-tree, of which the greatest plenty (saith Becanus) are found upon the banks of Acetes, one of the Rivers which falleth into Indus, where Alexander built his Fleet of Gallies-in, or near the Kingdom of Porus.

This Tree beareth a Fruit of the bigness of a Platanus great Pease, or (as Pliny, reporteth) somewhat bigger, and that it is a Tree sempervirens, always pluming itself; that it spreadeth itself so far abroad, as that a Troop of Horsemen may hide themselves under it. Sirabo saith, that it hath Branches bending downwards, and Leaves no less than a Shield. Aristobolus affirmeth that fifty Horsemen may shadow themselves under one of these Trees. Oncosorius raiseth this number to four hundred. This Tree (saith

(with Theophrastus) exceedeth all other in bigness, which also Pliny and Oenophrastus confirm: to the trunk of which these Authors give such a magnitude as I thame to repeat. But it may be, they all speak by an ill-understood report. For this Indian Fig-tree is not so rare a Plant, as Becanus conceiveth, who because he found it no where else, would needs draw the Garden of Paradise to the Tree, and let it by the River Acefont. But many parts of the World have them, and my self have been twenty thousand of them in one Valley, not far from Paria in America. They grow in moist Grounds, and in this manner. After they are first root up some twenty or thirty foot in length, (some more, some less, according to the Soil) they spread a very large top, having no Bough nor Twig in the trunk or stem: for from the utmost end of the head-branches there issueth out a gummy juice, which hangeth downward like a cord or lew; and within a few Months reacheth the ground; which in too sooner toucheth but it taketh Root, and then being filled both from the top-boughs, and from his own proper Root, this cord maketh it self a Tree exceeding haphily. From the utmost Boughs of these young Trees there fall again the like cords, which in one Year and less (in that World of a perpetual Spring) become also Trees of the bigness of the netherpart of a Lance, and as straight as Art or Nature can make any thing, calling such a shade, and making such a kind of Grove, as no other Tree in the World can do. Now one of these Trees considered with all his young ones may (indeed) shroud four hundred or four thousand Horsemen, if they please; for they cover whole Vallies of ground where these Trees grow near the Sea-bank, as they do by thousands in the inner part of Trinidad. The cords which fall down over the Banks into the Sea, shooting alway downward to find root under water, are in those Seas of the Indies, where Oysters breed, intangled in their beds, so as by pulling up one of these cords out of the Sea, I have seen five hundred Oysters hanging in a heap thereon; whereas the report came, that Oysters grew on Trees in India. But that they bear any such huge Leaves, or any such delicate Fruit, I could never find, and yet I have travelled a dozen miles, together under them. But to return to Goropius Becanus. This Tree (saith he) was good for meat and pleasing to the sight, as the Tree of Knowledge of Good and Evil is debriefed to be.

Secondly, this Tree having so huge a trunk (as the former Authors report, and Becanus believeth) it was in this Tree that Adam and Eve hid themselves from the presence of God, for no other Tree (saith he) could contain them. But first it is certain, that this Tree hath no extraordinary magnitude, as touching the trunk or stem, for among ten thousand of them it is hard to find any one bigger than the rest, and therefore all but of a mean size. Secondly, the words of Moses translated in medio ligni, are by all the Interpreters understood in the plural number, (that is) in the midst of the Trees. But his third argument

Gen. 3. 7. (or rather the argument of Moses Bar-Cephaz, word for word) is, that when Adam and Eve found themselves naked, they made them Breaches of Fig-leaves; which proveth (indeed) that either the Tree it self was a Fig-Tree, or that a Fig-Tree grew near it: because Adam being naked, would not run up and down the Garden to seek out Leaves to cover him, but found them in the place it self; and these Leaves of all other were most commodious, by reason of their largeness, which Pliny avoweth in these words; Latitudo foliorum Felis effigiem Amantia habet, The breadth of the Leaves hath the shape of an Amazonian Shield: which also Theophrast confirmeth; the form of which Targets Virgil toucheth:

Ducit Amazoniūd lunatis agmina pelvis Pemphileia furens.

Virgil
l. 4. 494

The Amazons with Crescent-formed Shield
Pemphileia leads into the Field.

Here Becanus desireth to be believed, or rather threateth us all that read him, to give credit to this his borrowed discovery, using this confident (or rather cholerick) speech. *Quis erit san impudenter oblitus, si hoc a nobis de finibus ex amicus fortissimus cum Mosis narratione comparat, audiat dicere aliam arborum inveniri posse, qua cum illa magis quadret: Who will be so impudently oblitus, if he compare these things which we have reported of this Fig-tree, and out of ancient Writers delivered, with the narration of Moses, as to dare to avow, that any other Tree can be found, which doth more properly answer, or agree therewith. But for my self, because I neither find this Tree, forcing in body, in largeness of Leaves, nor in Fruit to this report, I rather incline to the opinion of Philo: That the Earth never brought forth any of these Trees neither before nor after; but I leave every man to his own belief, for the matter is of no great weight as touching his kind: only thereby, and by the ease Commandment by God given to Adam, to forbear to feed thereon, it pleased God to make trial of his Obedience: *Prohibita, non propter aliud, quam ad commendandum purā ac simpliciter Obedientie bonum; Being forbidden, not for any other respect, than thereby to commend the goodness of pure and simple Obedience.

§. III.

Of Becanus his not unworthy allegorizing of the Story of his Ficus Indica.

BUT in this I must do Becanus right, that he hath very wittily allegorized this Tree, allowing his supposition of the Tree it self to be true. The effects whereof, because his Discourses are exceeding ample, I have gathered in the fewest words. As this Tree (saith he) so did Man, grow straight and upright towards God, until such time as he had transgressed and broken the Commandment of his Creator; and then like unto the boughs of this Tree, he began to bend downward, and stooped toward the Earth, which all the rest of Adam's Posterity after him have done, rooting themselves therein, and fastening themselves to this corrupt World. The exceeding unbraggingness of this Tree he compareth to the dark and shadowed life of Man, through which the Sun of Justice being not able to pierce, we have all remained in the shadow of death, till it pleased Christ to climb the Tree of the Cross for our enlightening and redemption. The little fruit which it beareth, and which is hard to find among so many large Leaves, may be compared (saith he) to the little Vertue, and unperceived Knowledge among so large Vanities, which obscure and shadow it over. And as this Fruit exceeding sweet, and delicate to the taste and palate; so are the delights and pleasures of the World, most pleasing while they dure. But as all those things which are most mellifluous, are soonest changed into choler and bitterness: so are our vanities and pleasures converted into the bitterest sorrows and repentances. That the Leaves are so exceeding large, the Fruit (for such Leaves) exceeding little; in this, by comparison we behold (saith he) the many cares cares and great labours of worldly Men, their sollicitude, their outward shews, and publick ostentation, their apparent pride and large vanities; and if we seek for the Fruit, which ought to be their virtuous and pious actions, we find it of the bigness of the smallest Pease; glory, to all the World apparent; goodness, to all the World invisible. And furthermore, as the Leaves, Body, and Boughs of this Tree, by so much exceed all other Plants, as the greatest Men of Power and worldly ability surpass the meanest: so is the little Fruit of such Men, and such Trees, rather fitting and becoming the unworthiest Shrub, and humblest Brier, or the poorest and basest Man, than such a flourishing fateliness and magnitude. Lastly, whereas Adam, after he had disobeyed God, and beheld his own nakedness and shame, fought for Leaves to cover himself withal, this may serve to put us in mind of his and our sins, as often as we put on our Garments, to cover and adorn our rotten and mortal Bodies: to pamper and maintain which we use so many uncharitable and cruel practices in this World.

§. IV.

Of the name of the Tree of Knowledge of Good and Evil: with some other notes touching the Story of Adam's sin.

NOW, as touching the sense of this Tree of Knowledge of Good and Evil, and what operation the Fruit thereof had, and as touching the property of the Tree it self, Moses Bar-Cephaz an ancient Syrian Doctor (translated by Masius) giveth this judgment, That the Fruit of this Tree had no such virtue or quality, as that by the tasting thereof, there was any such knowledge created in Adam, as if he had been ignorant before; but as Junius also noteth, Arbor scientie boni & mali (id est) experientia boni & mali ab evenit, The Tree of Knowledge of Good and Evil (that is) the experience of Good and Evil by the event. For thus much we may conceive, that Adam being made (according to the Hebrew Phrase) by the Workmanship of Gods own Hand, in greater perfection than ever any Man was produced by generation, being (as it were) the created Plant, out of whose seed all Men living have grown up; and having received immortality from the Breath or Spirit of God, he could not (for their respects) be ignorant, that the disobeying of Gods Commandment was the fearfullest evil, and the observation of his Precepts the happiest good. But as Men in perfect health do (notwithstanding) conceive, that sickness is grievous, and yet in no such degree of torment, as by the suffering and experience in themselves they afterwards witness: so was it with Adam, who could not be ignorant of the punishments, due to neglect and disobedience; and yet felt by the proof thereof in himself another error than he had forethought, or could imagine. For looking into the Glais of his own guilty Soul, he beheld therein the horror of Gods Judgments, so as he then knew, he feelingly knew, and had trial of the late good, which could not be prized, and of the new purchased evil, which could not be exprest. He then saw himself naked both in body and mind; that is, deprived of Gods Grace and former Felicity: and therefore was this Tree called the Tree of Knowledge, and not because the Fruit thereof had any such operation, by any self-quality or effect: for the same Phrase is used in many places of the Scriptures, and names are given to Signs and Sacraments, as to acts performed, and things done. In such sort as this Tree was called the Tree of Knowledge, because of the event (as is aforesaid) so was the Well of Contentment therefore called Efke, and the Well of Harred Sinath, because the Herdmen of Isaac and Gerar contended for them; and the heap of Stones, called the Heap of Wines, between Jacob and Laban, not that the Stones bare witness, but for a memory of the Covenant. So Jacob called the Houe of God Behel; and Hagar, the Well in the Desert, c. 16. 14. Provenit & videtur.

Num. 24. 19.
Gen. 26. 20, 21.

Gen. 31. 49.
Gen. 28. 19.

But Adam being both betrayed and mastered by his affections, ambitious of a farther knowledge than he had perceived in himself, and looking but slightly (as all his issues do) into the mileries and sorrows incident, and greatly affecting the supposed glory which he might obtain by tasting the Fruit forbidden, he was transported and blown forward by the gentle wind of pleasing persuasions unaware; his progression being strengthened by the subtle arguments of Sathan, who laboured to poyson Mankind in the very root, which he moistened with the liquor of the false ambition, by which himself perished for ever.

But what means did the Devil find out, or what instruments did his own subtlety present him, as first and aplest to work this mischief? even the unquiet vanity of the Woman; so as by Adam's hearkening to the voice of his Wife, contrary to the express commandment of the living God, Mankind by that her incantation became the subject of labour, sorrow, and death: the Woman being given to Man for a comforter and companion, but not for a Counsellor. But because thou hast obeyed the voice of thy Wife, &c. (saith God himself) Cursed is the earth for thy sake, in sorrow shalt thou eat of it all thy life. It is also to be noted, by whom the Woman was tempted; even by the most ugly and unworthy of all Beasts, unto whom the Devil entered and periwaded.

Gen. 3. 17.

Secondly, What was the motive of her disobedience: even a desire to know what was notwithstanding her knowledge, an affection which hath ever since remained in all the posterity of her Sex. Thirdly, what was it that moved the Man to yield to her persuasions? even the same cause which hath moved all Men since to the like consent, namely an unwillingness to grieve her and make her sad, lest she should pine and be overcome with sorrow. But if Adam in the state of perfection, and Salomon the Son of David, Gods chosen Servant, and himself a Man endued with the greatest Wisdom, did both of them disobey their Creator, by the persuasion and for the love they bare to a Woman, it is not so wonderful as lamentable, that other Men in succeeding ages have been allured to so many inconvenient and wicked practices by the persuasions of their Wives, or other beloved Darlings, who cover over and shadow many malicious purposes with a counterfeit passion of dissimulate sorrow and unquietness.

C H A P. V.

Of divers memorable things between the Fall of Adam, and the Flood of Noah.

§. I.

Of the cause and the revenge of Cain's sin: and of his going out from God.

THE same pride and ambition which began in Angels, and afterward possessed Adam, Cain also inherited: for Cain (envious of the acceptance of his Brothers Prayer and Sacrifice) slew him, making himself the first Man-slayer, and his Brother the first Martyr: the revenge of which unnatural Murder, although is pleased God to mitigate, when Cain cried out that his Punishment was greater than he could bear. For the same offence chiefly (where-with the Sons of Adam, as it were, urged and provoked God) he destroyed all mankind, but Noah and his Family: for it is written, The earth also was corrupt before God: for it is written, The earth was filled with violence: and anon after God himself made the cause known unto Noah, saying, An end of all flesh is come before me, for the earth is filled with cruelty through them, and behold, I will destroy them with the earth, or from the earth: Neither was this cruelty meant to have been in taking away the lives of Men only, but in all sorts of injustice and oppression. After this murder of Abel, Cain went out from the presence of the Lord, and dwelt in the land of Nod, towards the east-side of Eden: in which words, The going out of Cain from the presence of the Lord, is not to be understood after the literal sense; God being wholly in all parts of the World. Totus in celo, totus in terra, non alternis temporibus, sed urumque simul. God (saith S. Augustine) is wholly in Heaven, and wholly in Earth, not by interchanged times; but all at once; and that this is true, David witnesseth. If I be in heaven (saith David) thou art there, if in hell, thou art there also: but what is meant thereby? Exit à facie Dei (saith Chrysostom) Cain went out from the presence of the Lord, (that is) he was left of God, disfavoured and bereaved of his protection.

§. II.

Of Cain's dwelling in the Land of Nod: and of his City Enoch.

THIS word Nod or Naid S. Hierome and many others understand to signify wandering, or uncertain habitation: vexation or agitation, saith Junius; but the Seventy convert it otherwise, and take Nod for the proper name of a Country, and so doth Iosephus. But it seemeth to me, that Cain was rather a Vagabond or wanderer in his Cogitations, than any thing else, and that his Thoughts and Conscience had no quiet or rest, in regard of the murder committed, justly fearing (by his own words) the like violence: And whosoever findeth me (saith Cain) shall slay me. Now that Nod or Naid was a Region wherein Cain inhabited, appeareth by the word (dwelt) for dwelling signifieth an abiding: and we call those People Wanderers and Vagabonds that have no dwelling-place. And to make this dwelling and abiding more manifest, Moses teacheth in what part of the Earth this his habitation was, which he affirmeth towards the East side of Eden. Secondly, it is said by Moses, that after Cain departed from the preference or favour of God, he built a City, and called it by the name of his first-born, Enoch; which sheweth that he feared to wander, and rather sought to fortify himself against revenge. Oryllus saith, that Cain and Abel were Figures of Christ and of the Jews; and that as Cain, after that he had slain Abel unjustly, had thenceforth no certain abiding in the World: so the Jews, after they had Crucified the Son of God, became Runnegrates: and it is true, that the Jews had never since any certain Estate, Commonwealth, or Prince of their own upon the Earth. Now this Land of Nod, Junius taketh to be in Arabia Deserta, a Region of Nomades; but Arabia the Desert is not Eastward, or on the East part of Eden, neither are these Nomades any particular People or Nation. For all these, in what part of the World soever, which in old time lived by Pastorage, and fed (as we call it in Ireland) upon White-meat without Tilling of the Ground, are called by the Greeks Nomades, and by the Latins Pastores vagi, as the Northern Tartarians, the Germans, and Nomadians in Africa, the ancient Britains, and the Northern Irish: yea such were the Inhabitants of Italy it self, till such time as Italus (who gave them that Name) taught them the Husbandry of Tillage used at this day. But the Region Eastward from Eden is that part of Affrica, called by Ptoleme, Calecia, which also might be derived of Carena, the Country of Cain. And that Cain inhabited in those parts it may be gathered by the first possession of his Father Adam; for thus it is written, Gen. 2. Therefore the Lord God sent him forth from the Garden of Eden to till the earth whence he was taken: and in the Verse following: Thus he cast out man, &c. and at the east-side of the garden of Eden he let the Cherubim: which sheweth that the entry into Paradise was from the East, by which entrance Adam was cast out, and therefore inhabiting on that side of Paradise which was Eastward, according to the Text: Cain also in the same Region fought his dwelling-place. Now, if the word Nod or Naid do signify progreſſus, that is, a Fugitive, we can give no longer time to this uncertain habitation of Cain, than till he built the City of Enoch, the first of the World, which he included either for his own defence, or (as Iosephus writeth) to oppress others thereby. So as for mine own opinion I am resolved with the Septuaginta, that Nod was the proper name of a Region; and for the word [Vagabond] which Cain useth of himself, it seemeth by the perforce of the same Verse, that [Vagabond] is therein understood for such an one as travellet in fear of revengement: for whosoever findeth me (saith Cain) shall slay me; or else [Vagabond] is taken for a Man without protection, and cast out from the favour of God.

And because these Henochians, so called of the City Henoch, were the first Society and civil Assembly of all other, it is likely that the fame of these People (either for cruelty, strength, or other actions) lived in the memory of Noah and his Sons; so that after the Flood (as there were of all sorts of Natures, some virtuously, some impudently disposed, and every active mind setting before it whom to follow or imitate) those People, which delighted in Cruelty and Oppression, took on them their names whose natures they most liked and allowed; of whom these Henochians were not the least; and the place it self where Henoch stood before the Flood, and whereof the Monuments might remain (as the Pillars or the Foundation of Teppe did) gave occasion to the Planters of that place to call themselves by the same names: for of those Henochians there were many Nations in the Borders of Pontus, and Colchis in Iberia, Sagadiana, and Babrya, and of the same name many Mountains, as those which are otherwise called Coraxici. And seeing that it is hard to find out the truth of these things, which the most aged time hath covered over or defaced, we may (according to the counsel of Plato) exceedingly rejoyce, and therewith satisfy our selves, if of so great and almost worn-out Antiquity, if of the eldest peoples names and Nations there remain any print or footsteps to Posterity.

In * Pliny, P. Mela, Strabo, Valerius Flaccus, Lucan, Stephanus, we find those Henochians described, though diversly written, as in Pliny sometimes Henochi, in Mela Enochi, in Flaccus, Henochi, Henochi, all which inhabit upon the Sea in Lucan Enochi, all which inhabit upon the Sea in Enochius, but yet none of these are on the East side of Eden, or (according to Moses's words) Eastward from Eden. For Moses, in all places where he describeth any Region, was so exceeding precise with a borrow, or addition, at other times without borrowing, as Eastward or Southward, with a borrow, or addition, at other times without borrowing, as Eastward or Southward, towards the East or South. In the place of Genesis the eleventh he writeth the word [East] simply and directly. And as they went from the East, they found a Plain in the Land of Shinar, but in this of Cain he addeth the word [towards] as, in the Land of Nod towards the East side of Eden; which may be taken, as inclining some one point or two either to the North or to the South, of the East.

But as we may conjecture that these Nations took name of Henoch, the City of Cain, or of the Region wherein it stood, when the fame was re-peopled after the Flood: so it is probable that these Henochians of Colchis, and other parts adjoining, were not the first of that name, after the Sons of Noah began to fill the World again: because, had this Henoch the City of Cain stood in any of these parts, it had then been seated North, and not East or Eastward from Eden. But as Pliny findeth their habitation towards Pontus, so afterwards he goeth on Eastward, till he track them or trace them out to their original. For he calleth these of Colchis (now Mengrelia) Sanni Henochi; Ptolomy Zani; beyond which an hundred and fifty Mile Eastward he findeth another Nation of them about Iberia and Albania; and beyond these again he discovereth a third Nation, from whence all the rest took their beginning, which inhabited on the West side of the Mountains of Paropamisus, between them and the great River of Oxus, which bordereth Babrya on the North side; and these Henochians are due East from the Region of Eden, and Eastward from the very Garden it self.

And although we cannot be assured, that these Henochi took name from the memory of the City of Enoch directly, yet because they inhabited due East from Paradise, and afterwards spread themselves Westward (as all Noah's Sons did that came into Shinar) the conjecture is far more probable, than that of Amnius the Fryar, who lets Henoch in Phœnicia, quite contrary to Moses's word: Phœnicia from all parts of Eden being directly West.

And besides these several Nations of the Henochians, Stephanus findeth a Region called Henochia, and the same also in the East, with divers Mountains about Babrya and Sagadiana of the same name. Only the Grecians (according to their fabulous inventions of all things else) out of the word Henoch (which signifieth Carts or Coach-Men, make these Nations to have sprung from the Waggoners of Callos and Polax (to wit) Amphibius and Telchius, who attended them in the enterprise of Tesin into Colchis. And though I do not deny, but that Tesin with other Grecians ranged the coasts of Asia, the less, in an open Boat or kind of small Gallies, of whom I shall speak in his own time: yet no Man doubteth but that the Tale of the Golden Fleece was for the most part Poetical; and withal that in such an open Boat, which could hardly carry their own Rowers, being four and fifty, there was no place and less use of Coach-Horses or Waggoners.

§. III.

Of Moses his omitting sundry things concerning Cain's generation.

BUT of the remembrance and testimonies of the name of the City of Henoch in prophane story, thus much may suffice; Now it followeth to answer some few Objections against certain particulars in the fourth and fifth Chapter of Genesis: against which for the first it is demanded, How it was possible for Cain (having no other assistance than his Son Henoch) to perform such a Work as the Building of a City, seeing there is thereto required so many Hands, and to great a Mass of all Sorts of Materials? To which it is answered, that we are first to consider, That of Cain (because he was the Parent of an impious race) Moses useth no ample declaration; and so it best agreeth with his Divine Reason, seeing that he containeth the whole Story of the first Race, which waited by the least account 1656. Years in five short Chapters. Yet thus much may every Man borrow of his own weakest Reason. That seeing it pleased God to bestow on the first generations of Mens Lives, so long a measure, as 800. and 900. years, that in such a space Cain had not want of leisure and means to build many such Cities as Henoch, be the capacity answering to what other of the World soever: for in what Age of Cain's Life he built it, the Scriptures are silent: as of whole times, and the times of his illnes Moses had the least care. And as it was said of Cain, that his three Sons peopled all the World; but in both, the process of time required to be understood: which advice seeing Moses useth where the space less requireth it, as knowing that he writ the Scriptures to reasonable Men, we may easily understand, that such was his meaning also in all reports of like Nature. For in making but a difference between the Birth of Abel, and Oblation of Cain, he spake it in this sort, Eni autem post dies multos, or a fine diurnum (that is) in process of time it came to pass that Cain brought an oblation. And therefore it is in like sort to be understood of Cain, that many years fore-gone, and when his people were increased he built the City of Enoch or Henoch.

Chap. V.

And where it is written, as of Cain, that he built Enoch, so of Salomon, that he built the Temple of Hierusalem; yet it is well known of Salomon; that he employed in that work 150000. Labourers: for this Phrase or speech is common with our selves to say, The King invaded; when he caused an Invasion to be made: and he built, when he commanded such a Building. And therefore seeing we find, that Moses had no regard to the Ages, to the Birth, or to the Death of any of Cain's issues, it is not to be marvelled at, why he also passeth over in a word the building of Enoch, without addition of any circumstance: for of Cain, Moses writeth in this manner: Cain also knew his Wife, who conceived and bare Hethoch, and he built a City, and called the name of the City after the name of his Son Hethoch: And to Hethoch was born Irad, and Irad begat Mehusael, and Mehusael begat Methusael, and Methusael Lamech.

C. 6. v. 4. Now of Seth, Moser written for otherwise, and in this manner. Seth lived 107 Years, and begat Enoch, and Seth loved after he begat Enoch 807 Years, and begat Sons and Daughters: so as after the days of Seth were 912 Years, and he died: as for the Years and times of the wicked they were not numbered in libro viteminis, faith Cyril. But in Seth was the Church of God established, from whom Christ defended, as touching his Manhood: and therefore this way and work Moser walked in, and finished it with care, passing over the reprobate Generation (as afore said.) Of the line of Adam by Cain, Moser remembreth but eight Generations, reckoning Adam for one, and of the line of Adam by Seth ten, counting Adam also therein, as followeth:

¶ I. Adam.

- | | |
|----------------------------------|----------------|
| 2. Cain. | 2. Seth. |
| 3. Henoch. | 3. Enosh. |
| 4. Irad. | 4. Cainan. |
| 5. Mahusael. | 5. Mahaleel. |
| 6. Mathusael. | 6. Jared. |
| 7. Lamech, who by Ada had | 7. Henoch. |
| 8. Jubal and Tubal, and by Silla | 8. Mathusalem. |
| Tubalcain, and Norma. | 9. Lamech, and |
| | 10. Noah. |

These be the generations of Adam by Cain, which the Scriptures mention : but Tefelus giveth unto Lamech threefold and seventeen Sons and Daughters, by his two Wives Adah, and Silla: and to these three Sons of Lamech, Mofes ascribeth the invention of Pallorage, of Mufick, and the working in Metal; for it leemeth that Tubal first gathered together, and made familiar those Beasts which formerly were untamed, and brought them into Herds and Drowes : Tubal invented Mufick, and Tubalcain the working in Brass and Iron : the one being addicted to Husbandry, the other was Mechanical, the third given to idleness and pleasure. In whom began these three meaner degrees of Shepherds, Handy-crafts men, and Musicians. And in the illues of Sab began the Services of God, Divinity, Prophecy, and Astronomy : the Children of the one beheld the Heavens, the other the Earth.

6. EV.

Of the diversities in the Ages of the Patriarchs when they begat their Children.

A Sodom Scruple hath been made, How it came to pass that the Patriarchs begat their Children to so diverse ages, as Adam begat Set at seventy years, Methuselah and Enoch at threescore and five years, whereas Tared begat no way of his until he was 162. Years old: Methuselah begat at 187, Lamech at 182. and Noah at 500. Years. Now this difference hath been the more enforced, because it cannot be conjectured, that either Tared, Methuselah, or Lamech abstained from Marriage out of the religion of abstinence, seeing that Enoch, who was translated by God for his singular sanctities, begat Children before he was threescore and ten years old.

The apparent difference hereof ariseth in this, that Majesty did not number the Generations before the Flood precisely, according to the first-begotten and eldest Sons of the Patriarchs; but he drew down the line of Noab from Seth, and afterward from Noab to Abraham, by their true Ancestors whether they elder or younger as he found them: for it is likely that Hemuch was not the eldest of Tared, nor Lamech the first-born of Methusalem, nor Noab of Lamech; neither is there any thing known to the contrary, but that Noab might have had many Sons before Shem, Ham, and Tephir, though these three were only named, and surviving, and which by God were referred to be the Fathers of Mankind after the Flood; and therefore when we find Mahalehel to be begotten by Kenan at threecore and ten Years who was the first Son of Kenan, and then reckon that Methusalem began Lamech in the 137th Year of his life, the difference seemeth strange, where Lamech is taken for the eldest. But Majesty rejecteth all the other Sons of Methusalem but Lamech only, because he was the Father of Noab as a forefaid. Of this St. Augustine hath somewhat else in his 20. and 21. Chapters, De Civitate Dei.

But as Moses counted the Generations of the first age, and so to Abraham, and the Children of the promise after him; so doth St. Matthew recite the Genealogy of Christ, not by the eldest Sons, but from those whom God had chosen and blessed, without respect of the first-born, who have hereby the prerogative in Estates, worldly and transitory only; and therefore the Evangelist nameth Jesse, and not Jehoiachin, though Jehoiachin were first in time: so doth he take Jacob the younger, and not Elsau the elder; neither is Christ derived from any of the three eldest Ziurachi, Reuben, Simeon, or Levi, but from Juda a fourth Brother, and so from David a younger Son of Jehoiachin; and lastly we find, that the Kingdom in self of Juda was not given to the Heir in nature, but to the Heir of Grace, namely Salomon.

§. V.

Of the long Lives of the Patriarchs : and some of late memory.

THe third Objection is, that the great difference of Years between those of the first age, whereof some of them had well near seen a thousand Years, makes it disputable, whether the account of times were of the same measure as in after-ages, seeing that soon after the Flood Men lived not a third part of that time, and in succeeding ages and to this day not the tenth.

Plin. l. 7.
c. 48.

They that have heretofore referred that those Years were but Lunar Years, (to wit) of a Month or thereabouts, or Egyptian Years, are easily confuted: For whereas Senh begat Enph in the Year of his Life 109, if those Years be taken but for Months, then had Senh lived but eight Years and four Months, then had Enph been but eight Months and one Month when he begat Enph: and if the figure of Enph have the same allowance, when he begat Kenan, then could Enph at that time have been but six Years and forty eight weeks old; and so it may be gathered of the rest; excepting only Adam, who was created perfect in his kind, as were the Trees in their kind, bearing Fruit and Seed. But this were two ridiculous to imagine. For to give an ability of generation at 6. 7. or 8. Years, agreeth with the short lives of the Pigmies, and not with the Constitutions of our first Fathers, who being descended from Adam, the Workman of Gods Hands, and begotten and born in the first Youth of the World, had length of Days and ability of Body agreeable. Again, if we allow this idle conceit of the Lunar Years, then there would follow this extremity, that those which lived longest, and upwards of nine hundred Years, had by that account but the time of fourscore and ten and odd Years, which were not only less by far than the Patriarchs lived after the Flood, but short of many Mens lives in this decrepit Age of the World, wherein many exceed fourscore, and some, a hundred Years. Further (if need be) to disprove this reckoning, whereas it is written Gen. 25. That Abraham died in a good Age, an Old Man, and of great Years; all which (if the former account were of Lunar Years) makes but seventeen and an half of our Years.

And Man seek for a cause of this long life in Nature, then is it reasonable, that the first Man, created in highest perfection, should also beget Children of equal strength or little differing;
 For of the first and purest Seed there must of necessity spring up the fairest and fruitfuller Plants. Secondly, the Earth it self was then much less corrupt, which yielded her increase, and brought forth Fruit and food for Man, without any such mixture of harmful quality, as since that time the curse of God for the cruelty of Mans Heart brought on it and mankind: Neither had the waters of the Flood infused such an impurity, as thereby the Natural and powerful operation of all Plants, Herbs, and Fruits upon the Earth received a qualification and a harmful change. And as all things under the Sun have one time of strength, and then Age and Weakness, a Youth and Senility, and then Age and Deformity: so time it self (under that decay and wither) hath whole winters, and such a long and lively Ver-tue of Nature worn out, that little Vertue of Nature in Man, and Beasts, and Plants, yea the Heavens themselves being of a moist pure and cleansed mater shall wax old as a Garment; and then much more the Power generative in inferior Creatures, who by the ordinance of God receive operative Vertue from the superiour.

But besides the Old Age of the World, how far doth our Education and implicitly of living differ from that old time? the tender bringing up of Children, first fed and nourished with the Milk of a strange Dog; an unnatural curiosity having taught all Women (but the Beggar) to find out Nurfes, which necessity only ought to commend unto them: The hasty Marriages in tender Years, wherein, Nature being but yet green and growing, we went from her root, and replant her Branches, while shepher self hath not yet any Root sufficient to maintain her own top; and such half-side Seeds (for the most part) in their growing-up wither in the Bud, and wax old even in their Infancy: But above all things the exceeding Luxurionfnefs of this gluttonous Age, wherein we prels Nature with overweighty Burdens, and finding her ftrength defective, we take the work out of her Hands, and commit it to the artificial help of ftrong Waters, hot Spices, and provoking Sawces; of which Luxurionfnefs hath thefe elegant Verfes:

—O prodiga vera

Luxuriet, nunquam parvo contenta paratu:
Et quæstorum terra pelagq; Ciborum
Ambitiosa fames, & lauta gloria mense,
Disce quam parvo liceat producere vitam:
Et quantum Natura petat.
Non auro myrrhæque bitum: sed gurgite paræ
Pisa redit: satis est populis fluviusq; Ceresq;

O waffull Riot, never well content
With low-priz'd fare; hunger ambitious
Of cates by Land and Sea far fetcht and sent:
Vain glory of a Table sumptuous;
Learn with how little Life may be preserved.
In Gold and Myrrh they need not to carouse,
But with the Brook the peoples thirst is served:
Who fed with Bread and Water are not served.

The Ægyptians affirm, that the longest time of Mans life is a hundred Years, because the Heart in a perfect Body waxeth and growth to strength fifty Years, and afterwards by the same degree decayeth and withereth. Epigenet findeth in his Philosophy, that the Life of Man may reach to the period of an hundred and twenty Years, and Berghus to a hundred and seventeen Years. These opinions Pliny repeateth and reproveh, producing many examples to the contrary. In the last taxation, number and review of the eight Regnum of Italy, there were found in the Roll (saith Pliny) four and fifty persons of an hundred Years of Age: seven and fifty of an hundred and ten; two of an hundred and five and twenty; four, of an hundred and thirty; as many that were a hundred and five and thirty, or a hundred and seven and thirty Years old; and last of all, three Men of an hundred and forty; and this search was made in the times of Vespasian the Father and the Son.

The simple diet and temperate life of the Ejlaans gave them long account of many Years: fo did it to the Secretaries of Egyptian Ceremonies, to the Peris, Magicians and Indian Brachmans. The Greeks are full of Humor, that Nefor lived three Ages, and Tarfirus fix, Sigilla three hundred Years, Eudymon of the left Ale, little lefs is Alfo of Malimolia of Xumidia lived very long, and Dando of Ibyria. Among the Kings of Aradua many lived three hundred Years (saith Ephorus) Hellenicus affirmeth of the Epietans, that fome of them live full two hundred Years: and fo doth Diadorus Siculus of the Egyptians; and that thefe reports are not fabulous; Josephus bringeth many witnefs with himfelf, as Marethos, Berofus, Molochus, Ejlaus, Hieronymus Egyptinus, Hecataeus, Ephorus, and others. And Antonieus Fume an Hiftorian of good reputation reporteth, that in the Year 1570. there was an Indian prefented to Solyman, General of the Turki Army, who had out-lived three hundred Years. I my felf knew the old Countefs of Defmond of Inchiquin in Mufcovy who lived in the Year 1589. and many Years fince, who was married in Edmore the Fourth's time, and held her joyour from all the Earls of Defmond fince then; and that this is true, all the Noblemen and Gentlemen of Mufcovy can witnefs. Srovæzus Cigæna, out of Torquemada Maffius, and the like Authors, telleth of fome that have not only far exceeded the Term prescribed by Epigenes; but been repaired from the withered estate of decrepit Age to fresh Youth. But for length of Life, if we note but the difference between the Physician lived, it may easily prove unto us what Reeds we are in respect of those Cedars of the first Age. For Galen did ordinarily let Blood fix pound weight, whereas we (for the most part) stop at six ounces. But to conclude this part, there are three things (not counting Constellations) which are the natural causes of a long and healthful Life; (to wit) strong Parents, a pure and thin Air, and temperate use of Diet, Pleasure, and Rest: for those which are built of rotten Timber, or mouldering Stone, cannot stand long upright, on Air we feed always and in every instant, and on Meats but at times: and yet the heavy load of abundance, wherewith we oppress and overcharge Nature, maketh her to sink unawares in the mid-way; and therefore with a good Constitution, a pure Air, and a temperate use of those things which Nature wanteth, are the only Friends and Companions of a long Life.

§. VI.

Of the Patriarchs delivering their Knowledge by Tradition: and that Enoch writ before the Flood.

A fourth Scruple hath been made, How the certain Knowledge of the Creation came to Moses, seeing there was no Story thereof written, and if any such had been, yet it is conceived, that all memory of Antiquity perished in the universal flood.

But if we consider the curiosity and policy of elder Ages, we shall find that knowledge was the greatest Treasure that men sought for, and which they also covered and hid from the vulgar sort, as Jewels of inestimable price, fearing the irreverent construction of the ignorant and irreligious: so as whatsoever was attained unto concerning God, and his working in Nature, the same was not left to publick dispute, but delivered over by Heart and Tradition from wife Men to Posterity equally zealous. Ex animo in animam sine literis, medio intercedente verbo; From mind to mind without Letters, by way of tradition or word of mouth. And it was thought by Eldras, Origen, and Hilarius, (as Mirandula conceiveth) that Moses did not only upon the Mount receive the Law from God, but withal

Secretiorum & verum legis enarrationem, a more secret and true explanation of the Law, which (saith he) out of the fame Authors, he delivered by mouth to Joshua, and Joshua to the Elders: For to teach these mysteries, which he called secretiora, to the rude multitude, were no other quam dare sanctum canibus, & inter porcos spargere margaritas, than to give holy things to Dogs, and to cast pearls before swine. In succeeding times this Understanding and Wisdom began to be written in Ciphers, and Characters, and Letters bearing the form of Beasts, Birds, and other Creatures; and to be taught only to such, as served in their Temples, and to their Kings and Priests. Of the first the Cabala of the Jews was an Imitation: the invention of the other is ascribed to Zoroaster, Mercurius, Cadmus, and others; but finally.

This Cabala importeth a Law received by Tradition and unwritten. Cabala in Hebrew is receptum in Latine, and a receiving in English. And this Custom was also held by the Druids and Bards of our ancient Britains, and of later times by the Irish. Chorici called Rymers. If then such as would learn wisdom in the use of Reason, will not acknowledge, that the Story of the Creation or beginning of all things was written by Inspiration, the holy Ghost guiding the hand of Moses; yet it is manifest, that the knowledge thereof might by Tradition (then used) be delivered unto him by a more certain presumption, than any or all the Testimonies which prophane Antiquity had preserved and left to their Successors: which their wife Men (as they seem them) did lay up and defend from the injury of the time and other hazards. For, leaving to remember that Adam instructed Seth, and Seth his Children and Successors, which cannot be doubted of, it is manifest, that Methusalem lived together with Adam himself Two hundred forty and three years, and Noah with Methusalem no less than Five hundred years: and before Noah died Abraham was fifty and eight years old; from whence this Knowledge by an eadie and ordinary way, might come to Isaac, and so to Moses.

But besides this Tradition, it is questionable, that the use of Letters was found out in the very infancy of the world, proved by those Prophecies written on Pillars of Stone and Brick by Enoch: of which Josephus affirmeth, that one of them remained even in his time, (meaning belike some ruine or foundation thereof) which Pillars by others are ascribed to Seth. But of these Prophecies of Enoch Saint Jude testifieth; and some part of his Books (which contained the course of the Stars, their names and motions) were afterward found in Arabia felix in the Dominion of the Queen of Saba: (saith Origen) of which Tertullian affirmeth that he had seen and read some whole Pages. It is not therefore strange, that Moses came to the knowledge of the Creation and story of the first Age, seeing he might receive it both by Tradition and Letters, had not the Spirit of God instructed and inspired him as it did: which also his many and strange Miracles (performed before he wrote the Scriptures) make more manifest.

Now for the Books of Enoch, howsoever some men make question of them, sure I am that Tertullian, Origen, Augustine, Beda, Procopius, Gazens, (with others) cite them in their Writings: although Medius, for an Argument to prove them unwritten Traditions, alledgeth that Pope Gelasius amongst the other Apocryphal Scriptures (which he rejecteth) named not these of Enoch; but that whatsoever was remembered out of them, the same was delivered by Tradition from the Jews. But I rather think with Pererius that such a Book there was, and that the same was corrupted after the death of the Apostles, and many things added thereunto by Hereticks, who took occasion upon the Antiquity thereof, and out of that place of Michael contending with the Devil about the Body of Moses, to frame and add the greatest Arguments against their own. One of the greatest Arguments against these Books, is that neither Philo, nor Josephus (the most diligent searchers of Antiquity) make mention thereof. But against it I will let this Opinion of St. Augustine, Scriptis quidem novissima divina Enoch illum septimum ab Adam negare non possumus: Tunc Enoch the seventh from Adam did write divers divine things: we cannot deny. Now his Writings which came afterwards to light, were suspected because of the Antiquity, and of fables of Giants supposed to be begotten of Angels, and others; and by so much the more, because no such Book was found among those Canonical Scriptures, kept by the diligence of the Hebrew Priests in Armario Judaico (saith Tertullian *) who yet affirmeth that this this Book might be preserved by Noah. Surely that Enoch wrote the Prophecies remembered by Jude, no man can deny; how they were delivered to posterity I know not, whether by the Jews Cabala, or by what other means, the same is but man's conjecture. And (certainly) by the knowledge ascribed to Noah of the motions of the Heavens, and of the natures and dispositions of the Stars; and afterwards to some of his Sons, to Zoroaster, and then to Abraham, it is very probable that Noah had seen and might preserve this Book. For it is not likely, that so exquisite knowledge therein (as these men had) was suddenly invented and found out, but left by Seth to Enoch, and by Enoch to Noah, as hath been said before. And therefore if Letters and Arts were known from the time of Seth to Enoch, and that Noah lived with Methusalem, who lived with Adam, and Abraham lived with Noah: it is not strange (I say) to conceive how Moses came to the knowledge of the first Age, be it by Letters, or by Cabala and Tradition, had the undoubted Word of God need of any other proof than Self-authority.

§. VII.

Of the Men of Renown before the Flood.

NOW let us consider the Relation of Moses, who nameth seven descents of Cain's Children, and of Adam by Seth ten: Seth being given by God in stead of Abel; and of Seth was Enosh begotten, in whole time men began to profess Religion, and to offer Sacrifice in publick. For although Adam instructed his Children in the knowledge of God their Creator, as appeared by the Sacrifice offered by Cain and Abel; yet it seemeth that after the birth of Enosh men began publicly to call on the Name of the Lord, that is, they served and praised God by Communion and in publick manner, or calling upon the Name of the Lord, and thereby were the Sons of God or the godly distinguished from the wicked. From the birth of Enosh the Son of Seth, to the time of Henoch the Son of Tared, there is nothing remembered by Moses, but their own births, the births of their Sons, the length of their Lives, and Deaths. But of Henoch it is written, that he walked with God, and he was no more seen: for God took him away. By that, that he walked with God, was meant, that he was a just and upright man, and that he feared, loved, and obeyed God. For the same phrase Moses useth of Noah, Noah was a just and upright man in his time, and Noah walked with God. The Seventy convert it, Enoch placuit Deo: Henoch pleased God. And although Athen-Ezra and others understand this place, Enoch placuit Deo [scilicet, mortuus est, God took him away (that is) he died, which (indeed) agreeth both with the phrase of the Scripture, and with our manner of speech unto this day, to say, God took him away, when he died; yet the difference which Moses maketh between the Piety of Henoch and the rest of the Patriarchs, and by omitting the word [death] which he useth to all else, makes it manifest, that Henoch was not dissolved as the rest. For to all the rest of the Patriarchs, Moses useth these words, And he died; but of Henoch he spake otherwise, saying only, he was missing, or he was not seen. Et non inveniebatur (saith the Epistle to the Hebrews) quia Deus eum transiit; And he was not found, for the Lord took him away. In the same place it is expressly added, that he saw not death.

But whether this taking away of Enoch were not with the same kind of changing, which Saint Paul promifeth when he saith, that when the end shall come, we shall not all die; but all shall be changed; I leave it to the learned Divines.

After Henoch, Moses passeth over to Methusalem and Lamech remembering (as of the rest) the times of their Birth and Death: saying that Lamech prophesied of his Son Noah, saying, This same shall comfort us concerning our Works, and sorrow of our Hands; as touching the Earth which the Lord hath cursed. Of Noah, Moses writeth more amply, than of any of the rest of Adam's Children by Seth, being the last of the ten Generations of the first Age, whom God (with his Family) preserved, because he was an upright Man in his time; and feared God.

But of the War, Peace, Government, and Policy of these strong and mighty Men, so able both in Body and Wit, there is no memory remaining: whole Stories if they had been preserved, and what else was then performed in that newness of the World, there could nothing of more delight have been left to Posterity. For the exceeding long Lives of Men (who to their strength of Body and natural Wits had the experience added of 800. and 900. years) how much of necessity must the same add of Wisdom and Undertakings? Likely it is, that their Works excelled all whatsoever can be told of after-times, especially in respect of this old Age of the World, when we no sooner begin to know, but we begin to die; according to Apocryphus, Vita brevis, Ars longa, Tempus precipue, (which is) Life is short, Art is long, and Time is heading. And that those people of the first Age performed many things worthy admiration, it may be gathered out of these words of Moses, These were mighty men, which in old time were men of renown. But these Men of Renown (whom the Scripture afterwards calleth Giants, both for strength of Body and cruelty of Mind) trusted so much to their own Abilities; as they forgot altogether the Piety of Seth, and the ways wherein Henoch walked: for all the imaginations of their hearts were evil, only evil, and continually evil. And this Wickedness was not only found in the lilles of Cain, but it was then universal, when the Children and Sons of God (or of the godly) were corrupted and misled by their idolatrous Wives, the Daughters of Cain, or of those other Men loving themselves and the World only.

That these Sons of God were Angels, which be- ing taken with the Beauty of Women accompanied them and begat Giants, some of the Fathers supposed, namely Lactantius and Eusebius misled by Josephus: of whom I cannot doubt, but that they afterward changed their former Opinions. And of this mistaking many Writers have taken great advantage, and have troubled themselves with large Answers and very needles: the Question being uncapable of dispute, especially since St. Chrysostome and St. Augustine have answered it largely long ago. For, that good and godly Men were honoured with the Title of God's Children, it doth every where appear in the Scripture; and on the contrary, to think that Angels, who (as Christ witnesseth) beheld the face of God, (that is) always attend his Commandments, should after a separation from the rest which fell with Lucifer, forsake the glorious presence of their Creator, and become Incubi, or Succubi, contrary both to Nature and Grace, were more than madnes to imagin.

§. VIII.

You fear to eat the Flesh of Swine, I find it sweet.
You worship Dogs, to beat them I think meet,
When they my store devour.

And in this manner Juvenal:

Sat. 15.
2. 9.

*Porcum aut capre nefas violare aut frangere morsu:
O Juncas quibus, quibus hoc nascuntur in hortu Nominata?*

The Egyptians think it fit to root up, or to bite Their Leeks or Onions, which they serve with holy rite:

O happy Nations, which of their own sowing
Have store of Gods in every Garden growing.

§ IV.

That from the Reliques of Ancient Records among the Egyptians and others, the first Idols and Fables were invented: and that the first Jupiter was Cain, Vulcan, Tubalcain, &c.

BUT in so great a confusion of Vanities, where among the Heathens themselves there is no agreement or certainty, it was hard to find out from what example the beginnings of their Inventions were borrowed, or after what ancient Pattern they erected their buildings, were it not certain, that the Egyptians had knowledge of the first Age, and of whatsoever was done therein: partly from some Inscriptions upon Stone or Metal remaining after the Flood; and partly from Mazraam the Son of Cham, who had learnt the same of Cham and the Cham of his Father Noah. For all that the Egyptians write of their ancient Kings and date of Times cannot be feigned. And though other Nations after them had by imitation their Jupiters also, their Saturns, Vulcans, and Mercuries, with the rest which S. Augustine out of Varro, Diadorus Sicu
many Prophane Historians; Cicero, Diadorus Sicu lus, Arnobius, and many more have observed, to wit the Phœnicians; Phrygians, Carians, Greeks, and other Nations; yet was Cain the Son of Adam or Nathan; as (some very learned Men conceive) and Adam reputed for the first and ancient Jupiter; and Adam for the first Saturn: of Cities; and the first City invented the founding of Cities; and the first City of the World was built by Cain, which he called Enoch, of whom were the Enochs before remembered. And so much may be gathered out of Plato in Protagoras, which also Higium in his 275. Chapter confirmeth. For besides that, many Cities were founded by diverse Men, Tanen primam latissimam a prima & antiquissimam Jove adificatam; ut the first and largest was built by the first and most ancient Jupi- ter, seated in the East parts, or in India, according to that of Moses: And Cain dwelt towards the East to that of Adam, &c. where also the Enochs were side of Eden, &c. where also the Enochs were found after the Flood. And therefore was Jupiter by the Athenians called Polem, a Founder of Cities, (by Phormion and Pausanias) and that to Jupiter of Heracles there were in many places Altars and Temples erected. And that there were Cities built before the Flood. Plato also witnesseth, as may be gathered in this his affirming, that soon after Mankind began to increase, they built many Cities; which as his meaning he delivereth in plain terms, in his third Book of Laws: for he saith, that Cities were built an exceeding space of time before the Destruction by the great Flood.

This first Jupiter, of the Ethiicks was then the same Cain, the Son of Adam, who marrying his own Sister (as also Jupiter is said to have done) inhabited the East, where Stephanus de Urbibus placeth the City Henochia. And besides this City built Henoch, Philo Judæus conceiveth that Cain built six others, as Maich, Jared, Tche, Tefas, Sale, and Ge- bat: but where Philo had this I know not. Now as Cain was the first Jupiter, and from whom also the Ethiicks had the invention of Sacrifice: so were Tubal, Tubal and Tubalcain (Inventors of Paltorrage, Smiths-craft, and Mufick) the same, which were called by the ancient Prophane writers Mer- curius, Vulcan and Apollō; and as there is a likelihood of name between the name of Noema or Nae- math, the Sister of Tubalcain, to signify Venus, or beautiful Vulpius, or pleasure; as the Wife of Vul- cain is said to be Venus, the Lady of Pleasure and Beauty. And as Adam was the ancient and first Sa- turn, Cain the eldest Jupiter, Eoa Rhea, and Noema or Nae-math the first Venus: so did the Fable of the dividing of the World between the three Brethren the Sons of Saturn arise, from the true Story of the dividing of the Earth between the three Brethren the Sons of Noah: so also was the Fiction of those Golden Apples kept by a Dragon taken from the Serpent, which tempted Eve: so was Paradise it self transported out of Asia into Africa, and made the Garden of the Hesperides: the Prophecies, that Cain should break the Serpents Head, and conquer the power of Hell, occasioned the Fables of Heracles killing the Serpent of Hesperides, and descending into Hell, and captivating Caribæus: so out of the taking up of Henoch by God was borrowed the conversion of their Heracles (the Inventors of Religion and such Arts as the life of Man had profit by) into Scars and Heavenly Signs, and (withal) that leaving of the World, and Ascension of Afræa; of which Ovid,

Ovid. l. 1.
4. 17.

Ultima calescit terras Afræa reliquit.

Afræa last of Heavenly Wights the Earth did leave.

For although thereby the Ethiicks would understand Justice it self to have failed, as it is a virtue abstract, and may be considered without a Person; yet as it is usual among the ancient Poets to describe Vertues and Vices by the Persons of Men and Women, as Desire by Cupid, Valour by Mars, and Piety of Men by like Vertues and Vices; and therefore by Justice and Afræa, Enoch: the Justice and Piety of Enoch being in the same manner expressed, as that of Noah was by Moses, for Noah was said to be a just Man; and Noah walked with God, and of Enoch it is written, that he walked with God, and he was no more seen: for God took him away.

From this Story also of the first Age, and from that part where Moses remembereth the Giants begotten by the wicked (whom Moses calleth mighty Men, and Men of Renown) did they tell those wonderous great acts of their ancient Kings, and powerful Giants; and again their War undertaken against the Gods, from the building of the Tower of Babel by the Giant Nimrod, as S. Augustine ter-meth him. Which War of their Giants Cornelius Sextus thus describeth:

*Tenaxire (nefas) olim detrudere mundo Sydera, capivique Jovis transferre Gigantes:
Imperium, & viles leges imponere calo.*

The Giants did advance their wicked hand Against the Stars, to thrust them headlong down

And robbing Jove of his Imperial Crown,
On conquered Heavens to lay their proud Command.

Whereby was meant that Nimrod purposed to raise the Building of Babel to that height, as God neither by drawing Waters from the Deep, nor by any conjunction of the Stars, should bury them under the moisture of a second Flood, but that by this Building (if they had been herein victorious) they would have given the Law to Heaven it self.
Also the making of Leagues, Peace and Covenants among Heathen Nations and Kings, confirmed by Sacrifice, whereof Virgil both in the eighth and twelfth of his Æneids hath a touch, was as it seemeth borrowed from Moses, Exod. 24. Who when he read the Book of the Covenant sprinkled the People with Blood.

We find also many Remembrances of Seth, the paternal Ancestor of Henoch and Noah: for Ame- nophis, the same King of Egypt, which reigned at such time as Moses carried thence the Children of Israel, (as of late some learned Men mistaking his time supposed) called his Son and Successor Seth, of Seth, and of the same Seth (as many Men of good judgment have granted) were the Princes of Thrace called Sambes, whereof there were many very famous. But heretofore we saw that the Egyptians worshipped Seth, as their most ancient Parent, and of the first Tradition: in honour of whom they called a principal Province Sethiæica. We also find in Bithynia the City of Sethia, and others of the same Name elsewhere. And sure from the Egyptians did the Græcians borrow this kind of Theology, though they seemed to acknowledge any Antiquity preceding their own; and that they might not seem to learn elsewhere, they gave the same Names to their own Idols which the Egyptians did to theirs.

§ V.

Of the three chieft Jupiters; and the strange Story of the third.

BUT of all those Armies of Jupiters remembered by the Ancients, Cæsar waketh but three, because those were of most Fame: which other Wri- ters have also done, who fought out, and laboured in their Originals.

The first was Jupiter, the Son of Æther and Diæa, so called, because the one had reference to his celestiall conditions (for Æther is as much as shining or pure Fire) the other discovered his natural Vertues, which days and times make more perfect, and are the witnesses of Mens actions.

The second was said to be the Son of Calvus or Heaven, for the same former respect; and this Jupiter was an Arcadian, and King of Athen.

The third, of whom all the Græcians Fables were devised, was of Greece (now Conditio) the Son of Saturn and Ops. The Name derived from the Latin is taken of Jovis Pater, from the Greek word
Zens, it signifieth Life, but somewhat brained,

Bocæus in his Genealogy of the Gods conceiveth, that his Name was borrowed from Jupiter the Planet; but whether that Star had such a Name, before the fame was given to Men, I know not.
Jupiter is hot and moist, temperate, modest, honest, adventurous, liberal, merciful, loving, and faithful, (that is) giving these Inclinations. And therefore those ancient Kings beautified with these Conditions, might be called there after Jupiters; but howsoever they were, or were not, with those Vertues enriched, yet, by imitation, all Kings in the eldest times assumed those Titles and Surnames: great Princes affecting as high Titles of Honour and Reputation in the World, (how-soever deserved) as the worthiest, that ever were acquired by their well-deservings. Jovis omnes Reges vocantur antiqui; The Ancients called all Kings Jupiters; as Titæus in his Varia Historia confirmeth: Reges olim Jovis vocantur
omnes: In old time all Nations called their Kings Jupiters. But where this last and most remembered Jupiter was born it is uncertain. Some there are that make him of Gret: others, that he was but foster child by his Mother Ops or Opis, to Natohis Uncle: because it was conditioned between Saturn and Titan, that Saturn being a younger Brother, and reigning (for his own Life) by Titan's permission, he should put to death all his male Children, lest the Titans might be interrupted by any of them in their Succession; which Agreement because Saturn performed in his first-born, it is feigned that Saturn devoured his own Children: Herof Lycaëron, thus turned into Latin;

*Haud sic pinguis,
Crudus Iphicetrum quod sic ipse filius.*

Saturn to be the fatter is not known;
By being the Grave and Burial of his own.

This composition between Titan and Saturn;
Sibylla also witnesseth in thele,

Conceptis verbis; Titan jurare coegit Saturnum, de se natum ne matris illum, Quo possim regnare semel post fata Nepotes.

Things thus agreed: Titan made Saturn swear,
No Son to nourish; which by reigning might Usurp the Right of Titan's lawful Heir.

But Ops, the Mother of Jupiter, being delivered at once both of Jupiter and Titan, conveyed Jupiter (first called Lycaëron) into Gret, as he did afterwards his two Brothers, Nepewes and Plu- to: where he was brought up in Conditio, the chief City of that Island, by Crisis the King, or by the Cæcetes, a People and Nation therof.

Others challenge him to be of Thrace, and a Thracian: others call him an Arcadian: others make him of Æthiopia. The like Contentions is found among the Greeks touching his Education and first Forbearing: Some affirm, that he was fed by Hoof-bees: in Remembrance whereof he changed their black Coats and Skins into yellow; a Reward well fitting such a God: others, that he was nourished by Bears: others, by Goats; and of all these the idle Greeks have many pretty Tales. But in the end when Titan had knowledge, that Saturn had broken his Faith, he set on him, and took him and his Wife Prisoners, whom Jupiter again rescued and delivered.

But lastly, the Father and the Son equally ambitious, the one doubted the other. Saturn being the less powerful fled into Italy, and left his Kingdoms in Greece to his Son. And although this Prince at the first purchased great Honor, and for his many Vertues the Name of Jupiter was given him; yet, after he was once fettered and became potent, he gave himself over wholly to Paleardize and Adultery, without all respect of Honour, Law, or Religion. And it is reported by such, as do ascribe the Actions of many to one Jupiter, that not therewith satisfied, he was afterwards known to offend in the Sin of Sodomy with Ganymede and others; and did not only begin with Incest, marrying his own Sister Juno, but he ravished, betrayed, stole away, and took by strong hand all the beautiful Women born in his time, within the Limits of his own Kingdoms, or bordering them. Among whom these hereafter written were of greatest Fame, Niohe, Laodamia, and Alcmene the Wife of Amphitryon, by whom he had Peleus, Sarpidon, Argus, and Hercules: by Tegyus he had Tegyus, of whom the Mountain Tegyus took Name, with another Son called Saturn, of whom Savona: by Antiope he had Amphion and Zetus: by Leda, Caster & Pollex, Helen & Cythemestra: by Danae Perseus: by Jordan Daedalus: by Charme (the daughter of Endelus) Brismariti: by Progenia he had Abdulus the Father of Endymion; and by Io (the Daughter of Inachus) Epaphus, the Founder of Memphis in Egypt: which Epaphus married Libya, of whom that Country took Name, for so the Greeks afterward called Africa. He ravished Agnes, the Daughter of Alopus, and carried her into the Island Oenopia or Oenotria, afterward called Agina, on whom he begat Acacus: by Torabias he had Archeblaus and Carbun: by Ora Calaxus he had also Dardanus by Elitira, who built Dardanium, afterward him and Troy. He begat the Brothers Talici, on Thalia, and on Garamantis Elharba. He had besides these (if they be not their chief God) Phileus and Pilemus, Inventors of Bakers Craft; and I know not how many more; but I know well that he could not be Father to all these, who were born in Ages so far differing. And of these his several Ravishments, Betrayings, stealing away of Mens Wives, Daughters, and Sons, buying of Virgins, and the like, came in all those ancient Fables of his Transformations into flowers of Gold, Eagles, Bulls, Birds, and Beasts, and of him, and by him (in effect) all that Rabble of Grecian Forgeries. And yet did not the Greeks and Romans fear to entitle this Monster, Optimus Maximus, though Cicero in his second Book de natura Deorum affirm, that he deserved nothing less. And in his Oration pro domina sua reproareth Clodius for his Incest, by the Name of Jupiter. His Burial was in Cree. (saith Lucian) Jupiter non solum natus est & sepulchrum Jovis testatur, sed etiam sepulchrum ejus ostendunt. The Cretians or Candians do not only avow that Jupiter was born and buried among them, but they shew his Grave and Sepulchre: which Epiphanius also confirmeth, for in his time there remained the Monuments of his Tomb in the Mountain Tajus. This Callimachus in his Hymns also witnesseth, but as offended thereat, saith thus:

The Cretians ever Lyars were; they care not what they say:

For they a Tomb have built for thee, O King, that liv'st alway.

Diodorus Siculus tells by way of Report from the Libyan Fables, confirmed (as he saith) by some Greek Writers, that the Original of these Gods was from the Western parts of Africa, for there among the Almida reigned one Craneus (which significth Heaven) called so for his great skill in Astronomy, and for his knowledge, and benefits to the People, honoured by them as a God after his death. He had by many Wives, forty five Sons; but by his principal Wife Tera he had seventeen Sons and two Daughters, all which were called after their Mothers Name the Titanes. Of Tita likewise it is said, that she for her goodness was Canonized as a Goddess, being dead, and called the Earth, as her Husband was stiled Heaven. But of all the Children of Tera, her Daughter Baia (which Name soundeth as Queen in English, she is by the Latine Translator of Diodorus called Regina) excelling the rest as far in Vertue as in Years, was by general consent of her Brethren, and of the People, appointed to rule as Queen after her Fathers death, being as yet a Virgin. She took to Husband her Brother Hyperion, to whom she bare a Son and a Daughter, called Sun and Moon. The beauty and towardsness of these Children moved her Brethren to envy, and bred in them a fear of being excluded from the Succession: wherefore they took the Boy and drowned him in the River Eridanus, now called Pae. The Iols of this Child caused his Sister to break her own Neck; and the Iols of both her Children made the Mother to play many mad Pranks, dancing with Cymbals, after a wild fashion, in sight of all the People, before whom she is said to have vanished away. Ere she died, her Son (as the Fable hath it) signified unto her in a Dream, that he should be the providence of God should become immortal, that also the Sun and Moon should be called by their Names, and that their Death should be revenged upon the Murderers. According to which it is said, that the People did so call those two Planets, and withal held her self as a Goddess, and termed her the great Mother, which Name they had formerly given to her, for her Motherly care in cherishing her Brethren whilst they were young. Hyperion and his Race being extinguished, the other Sons of Craneus divided the Kingdom. Of these Atlas and Saturn were chief. Atlas reigned over the Countries lying about the Mountains, which afterward bare his Name; a just and wise Prince, deeply skilful in Astronomy, and for Invention of the Sphere said to have imported Heaven. He had many Sons; but the principal of them called Hegeus, being of his Fathers qualities and studies, was said to have been carried away by the Wind, from the top of an high Hill in the midst of his Contemplations, and his Name is honour of him, imposed by the People upon the Morning Star. The seven Daughters of Atlas were also said to have been excellent Ladies, who accompanying such as came to be Deified, or Registered among the Worthies, brought forth Children, answerable in quality to those that begat them. Of these it is held, that the seven Stars called Pleiades took Name. Saturn the Brother of Atlas reigned in Sicilia, part of Africa and Italy. Jupiter another of the Sons of Craneus, reigned in Cree; who had ten Sons which he called Cretes; he called that Island after his Wives Name Tera, in which Iste he died, and was buried. But this Jupiter must not have been that great one, but Uncle to the great Jupiter, if these Fables of the Libyans were true. Saturn (as these Libyans tell the Tale) was a great Tyrant, and fortified strong places, the better to keep his people in subjection. His Sister Rhea was married married to Hammon, who reigned in some part of Africa. Hammon loving others as well as his Wife, or better, got a Daughter, called Minerva, near to the River Tricon, who thereupon was called Triconia. He also begat on Amalthea a Son called Bacchus, whom he cauled secretly for fear of his life to be brought up at Nysa, an Island in the River Tricon, under the tuition of his Daughter Minerva, and certain Nymphs. To Amalthea he gave in reward a goodly Country, that lay on the Sea coast, bending in form of a Horn, whence grew the tale of Amalthea's plentiful Horn, famous among the Poets. When Rhea heard these news, she fled from her Husband to her Brother Saturn, who not only entertained her as a Sister, but took her to Wife, and at her instigation made War upon Hammon, vanquished him by assistance of the Titanes, and made him fly into Cree. The Cretes, Jupiter's Children before-mentioned, held the Island at that time; which was new named Cree by Hammon, after the name of Creta the Kings Daughter, whom he took to Wife, and had with her (Women as may seem being very gracious in those times) the Kingdom. Bacchus was grown a proper young Man, had found out the making of Wine, the art of planting Trees, and many things else commodious for Mankind, before the flight of his Mother in Law. Now therefore hearing report of all that had happened, and that Saturn was coming against him with the Titanes, he levied an Army, to which the Amazons living not far from Nysa, added great Forces, in love of Minerva, who was entered into their profession. So Bacchus leading the Men, and Minerva the Women, they set forward against Saturn, met him, overthrew him, and taking many of the Titanes Prisoners, returned to Nysa, where pardoning the Prisoners, he prepared for a second expedition. In the second expedition he behaved himself so well, that he won the love of all the People by whom he passed; inasmuch that partly for good affection to him, partly in hatred of Saturn's rigorous Government, he was greatly strengthened, and the Enemy as much enfeebled by daily revols. Coming to the City of Hammon, he won a Battel of Saturn, before the very Walls. After which Saturn with his Wife Rhea fled by night, setting the Town on fire to despight Bacchus. But they were caught in their flight, pardoned by Bacchus, and kindly entreated. Saturn had a young Son by Rhea, called Jupiter. This Child Bacchus took with him in a great expedition that he made into the East Countries; and coming into Egypt, he left this Jupiter, being then a Boy, Governor of the Country; but appointed unto him as an Over-seeer, one Olympus, of whom Jupiter grew to be called Olympus. Whilst Bacchus traveled through all Nations, as far as into India, doing good in all places, and teaching many things profitable to the life of Man; the Titanes had found out his Father Hammon in Cree, and began to War upon him. But Bacchus returned out of India; with whom Jupiter from Egypt, and his Sister Minerva, together with the rest that afterwards were held as Gods, joyning all their Forces, went into Cree, overthrew the Titanes, chased them, took, and slew them, and freed the World of them all. After all this, when Hammon and Bacchus were dead, they were deified; and the great Jupiter the son of Saturn succeeding them, reigned Lord above over all the World, having none of the Titanes left alive, nor any other to disturb him. Between this tale of the Libyan Gods, and the Egyptian Fables of Osiris, there is a rude resemblance, that may cause them both to be taken for the crooked Images of some one true History. For the expeditions of Osiris, and of Bacchus; the Wars of the Giants in the one story, of the Titanes in the other; the Kingdom of Egypt given by Hercules Lybicus to Orus, by Bacchus to Jupiter, the Rarities of Ipsi, and the Cymbals of Baia, with many petty circumstances, nearly enough resemble each other, howsoever not alike fitted to the right Persons. Sanchoniato (as Eusebius cites him) would have all these to be Phanicians, and is earnest in saying, that it is a true story, and no Allegory. Yet he makes it seem the more Allegorical, by giving to Orus or Heaven for Daughters, Fate and Beauty, and the like, with addition of much fabulous matter, omitted by Diodorus, though Diodorus have enough. To the Genealogy he adds Elum or the Sun, as Father of Orus; and among the Children of Orus, Iapetus, Basilus, and Dagon, (whom Diodorus doth not mention by their names) giving wishal to Orus the proper name of Terrenus or Indigena, and of Ilus to Saturn, but omitting Jupiter of Cree. The Pedigree of them is this.

Now besides these former testimonies, that all the learned Men of ancient times were not so stupid and ignorant, as the Egyptians, Gracians, and other Nations by them infected were, I will only repeat two or three other opinions, and leave the Reader to those large and learned Collections of Justin Martyr, Clement, Lactantius, Eusebius, Eufronius, Peuce, Pelliss, Dantes, and others. For Clement the Stoick, being demanded of what nature God was, described him by these Attributes and Properties. Bonus, justus, sanctus, scilicet possident, utilis, speciosus, optimus, severus, liber, semper commodus, tutus, gloriosus, charitas, &c. Good, just, holy, possessing himself, profitable, beautiful, best, severe, free, always doing good, safe without fear, glorious, and self-charity. Epicharmus affirmed, that God who beheld all things, and pierced every nature, was only and every where powerful: agreeing with Democritus. Rex omnium ipse solus, He is the only King of all kings; and with Pindarus the Poet; *Dis unus, Pater, creator summus, aique optimus artifex, qui progressus singulis diversos secundum merita prebet, One God, the Father, the most high Creator, and best Artificer, who giveth to every thing divers proceedings according to their deserts. This God (saith Anstethen) cannot be resembled to any thing, and therefore not elsewhere known, Nisi in patria illa perenni, cuius imaginem nullam habet, Save only in that everlasting Country, whose Image thou hast none at all. Hercof also Xenophanes Colophonius. Unus Deus inter Deos & homines maximus, nec corpore, nec mente mortalibus similis, There is one God among Gods and Men most powerful, neither corporally, nor mentally like unto mortals: and Xenophon, Deus qui omnia quærit, & omnia quiescere facit, magnus potentissimus, quod omnibus pater: quod autem forma sit, nemini pater, nisi ipse sit, qui luce sua omnia perstruat, God who seeketh all things, and setteth all things at rest, is great and mighty, as is manifest to all: but of what form he is, it is manifest to none, save only to himself, who illumineth all things with his own light. Finally, Plato saith, Totius rerum nature causa, & ratio, & origo Deus, summus animi genitor, æternus animarum sollicitator, assiduum mundi sui opifex, sine propagatione genitor, neque loco, neque tempore ullo comprehensus, æque paucis cogitabilis, nemini effabilis, God is the cause, ground, and original of the whole nature of things, the most high Father of the Soul, the eternal preserver of living Creatures, the continual framer of his World, a begetter without any propagation, comprehended neither in any place, nor time; therefore few can conceive him in thought, none can express what he is. Therefore was it said by S. Hierome, Si enim cunctos Philosophorum revolvatis libros, necesse est ut in ea reperias aliquam partem vestrum Dei, ut apud Platonem, fabricatorem mundi, Deum: apud Zenonem Stoicorum Principem, inferos & immortales animas, &c. If thou consider all the Books of the Philosophers, thou canst not but find in them some part of the Vessels of God, as in Plato, God the Creator of the World: in Zeno Prince of the Stoicks, Hell and immortal Souls, &c. And this is certain, that if we look into the wisdom of all Ages, we shall find that there never was Man of solid Understanding or excellent Judgment: never any Man whose Mind the art of Education hath not benuded; whose Eyes a foolish Superstition hath not afterward blinded; whose apprehensions are fober, and by a pensive inspection advised; but that he hath found by an unresistible necessity, one True God, and everlasting Being, all for ever causing, and all for ever sustaining; who no Man among the Heathen hath with more reverence acknowledged, or more learnedly expressed, than that Egyptian Hermes, howsoever it failed afterward in his Posterity: all being at length* by devilish policy of the Egyptian Priests purposely obscured; who invented new Gods, and those innumerable, best forcing (as the Devil perwaded them) with vulgar capacities, and fitteth to keep in awe and order their common People.

§. VIII.

That Heathenism and Judaism, after many wounds were at length about the same time under Julian miraculously confounded.

BUT all these are again vanished: for the inventions of mortal Men are as less mortal than themselves. The Fire, which the Chaldeans worshipped for a God, is crept into every Mans Chimney, which the lack of fowel flarveth, Water quencheth, and want of Air suffoceth: Jupiter is no more vested with Jupiter's jealousies; Death hath perwaded him to Chastity, and her to Patience; and that Time which hath devoured it self, hath also eaten up both the Bodies and Images of Stone and durable Marble. The Houses and sumptuous Buildings erected to Baal, can no where be found upon the Earth; nor any Monument of that glorious Temple consecrated to Diana. There are none now in Phœnicia, that lament the death of Adonis; nor any in Lybia, Creta, Thracia, or elsewhere, that can ask counsel or help from Jupiter. The great God Pan hath broken his Pipes; Apollo's Priests are become speechless; and the Trade of Riddles in Oracles, with the Devils telling Mens Fortunes therein, is taken up by counterfeit Egyptians, and cozening Astrologers.

But it was long ere the Devil gave way to these his overthrows and dishonours: for after the Temple of Apollo at Delphos (one of his chief Mansions) was many times robbed, burnt, and destroyed; yet by his diligence the fame was often enriched, repaired, and re-edified again, till by the Hand of God himself it received the last and utter subversion. For it was first robbed of all the Idols and Ornaments therein by the Eubœan Pirates: Secondly, by the Phœgians utterly sack: Thirdly, by Pyrrhus the Son of Achilles: Fourthly, by the Army of Xerxes: Fifthly, by the Captains of the Phœnicians: Sixthly, by Nero, who carried thence five hundred brazen Images: all which were new made, and therein again set up at the common charge. But whatsoever was gathered between the time of Nero and Constantine, the Christian Army made spoil of, defacing as much as the time permitted them; notwithstanding all this it was again gloriously rebuilt, and reformed till such time as Julian the Apostate felt thither to know the success of his Parthian enterprise, at which time it was utterly burnt and consumed with fire from Heaven; and the Image of Apollo himself, and all the rest of the Idols therein molten down and lost in the Earth.

The like success had the Jews in the same Julian's time, when by his permission they assembled themselves to rebuild the Temple of Hierusalem: for while they were buied to lay the Foundations, their Buildings were overthrown by an Earthquake, and many thousands of the Jews were overwhelmed with the ruins, and others slain, and scattered by Tempest and Thunder: though An. MDC. Marcellinus report it more favourably for the Jews, ascribing this to the Nature of that Element. For, saith he, Alipius and the Ruler of the Province of Judea, being by Julian buied in the reedifying of this this Temple, flaming balls of fire issuing near the Foundation, and oft consuming the Workmen, made the Enterprise frustrate.

Of the last refuges of the Devil to maintain his Kingdom.

NOW the Devil, because he cannot play upon the open Stage of this World (as in those days) and being still as industrious as ever, finds it more for his advantage to creep into the minds of Men; and inhabiting in the Temples of their hearts, works them to a more effectual adoration of himself than ever. For whereas he first taught them to sacrifice to Monsters, to dead Stones cut into Faces of Beasts, Birds, and other mixt Natures; he now sets before them the high and shining Image of glory, the all-commanding Image of bright God. He tells them that Truth is the Goddess of Dangers and Oppressions; that Chastity is the Enemy of Nature: and lastly, that as all Verne (in general) is without taste: so Pleasure fatisfies and delighteth every Sense; for true Wisdom (saith he) is exercised in nothing else, than in the obtaining of Power to oppress, and of Riches to maintain plentifully our worldly delights. And if this Arch-palician find in his Pupils any remorse, any fear or feeling of Gods future Judgment, he perwades them that God hath to great need of Mens Souls, that he will accept them at any time, and upon any conditions: interrupting by his vigilant endeavours all offer of timefall return towards God, by laying those great blocks of ragged Poverty, and despicable Contempt in the narrow passage leading to his Divine Presence. But as the Mind of Man hath two Ports, the one always frequented by the entrance of manifold Vanties; the other desolate and overgrown with Grafts, by which enter our Charitable Thoughts and Divine Contemplations: so hath that of Death a double and twofold opening: worldly Misery passing by the one, worldly Prosperity by the other: at the entrance of the one we find our sufferings and patience to attend us: (all which have gone before us to prepare our joys) at the other our Cruelties, Covetousness, Licentiousness, Injustice, and Oppressions (the Harbingers of most fearful and terrible sorrow) staying for us. And as the Devil our most industrious Enemy was ever most diligent: so he is now more laborious than ever: the long Day of Mankind drawing fast towards an Evening, and the Worlds Tragedy and Time near at an end.

CHAP. VII.

Of Noah's Flood.

§. I.

Of God's fore-warning: and some human Testimonies: and some doubting touching the truth of Noah's Flood.

OF this Destruction is pleased God to give warning unto Noah: who (saith Josphus) fearing to perish among the self-seekers amon suis, in aliena regionem migravit: He departed with his Children, and travelled into another Region. And of these Giants, from whom Noah withdrew himself, Berjus writeth in this manner: That they exceeded in all sorts of inhuman and unnatural wickedness, and that they were contemptors of Religions & Decorum: contemptors of Religion and of the Gods: among which mighty Men (saith Berjus) unus erat qui Decorum venerantior, & prudentior cunctis, &c. huic nomen erat Noah. There was one more wise and reverentior the Gods than the rest, whose name was Noah: who with his three Sons Sem, Japheth, and Cham, and with their Wives, and the Wife of Noah (namely Tiza the great, Pandora, Noela, and Noela) preferred themselves in the Ark. This Ark God commanded Noah to prepare: And God said unto Noah, make thee an Ark of pine-trees: thou shalt make cubits in the Ark, and shalt pitch it within, and without pitch. For God made Noah to know that an end of all Flesh was at hand, and that the Graves of the rebellious and cruel Generations were already fissioned in the Clouds, which soon after should swallow up and cover all living Creatures, which breathed in the Air: Noah and his Family excepted.

But this universal Grave of Waters, and general Deluge hath not been received by all: for Divine Testimonies do not perwade all natural Men to those things, to which their own Reason cannot reach: dum involuta in obscuris veritate latent; whilst the truth lieth wrapped up in obscurity. Many there are who have disputed against the Universality of this overflowing, and have judged that this Flood of Noah fell but on some particular Places and Kingdoms: moved so to think, because in elder Ages there have been many other Floods (as they suppose) of that nature. Hercof Nicolaus Damascenus writeth in this manner, as his words are cited by Josphus, *Est super Maryadam excessus mons in Armenia, qui Baris appellatur, in quo multo confusio: semper effe deluvii tempore liberatus, & quendam simul an Arca decessum in hunc vertice habisse, lignorumque reliquias cuncto tempore conservatas, qui fortasse sit fuit, ad quo etiam Moses Judæorum Legislator scribit: thus far this Author. There is (saith he) above Maryada (or the Country of Marya) an exceeding high Mountain in Armenia, called Baris: on which it is reported, that many having fled thither, were saved in the time of the Deluge: and that one was carried in an Ark, and rested upon the top of the Mountain, whereon there remained a long time after certain pieces thereof; and this might be the same, of which Moses the Law-giver of the Jews maketh mention. And of this opinion were the Thalmdists (saith Anthon) that many Giants saved themselves upon Mount Sion.*

But Berjus (who after Moses was one of the most ancient, howsoever he have been since deformed and corrupted) doth in the substance of all agree with Moses as touching the general Flood, taking from thence the beginning of his History in these words: Ante aquarum cladem famolam, quæ

H

fol. 94.

Puerum finds the word [Paradisi] to have no affinity with the Greek, but thinks it derived from the Hebrew word Nahab, which signifieth Angustari or Divination: or from Har or Parai, as in his Chapter of Oracles in the Leaf before cited.

Ephra. in Anac.

Joseph calls the Ark Machina, by the general name of a huge Frame: and Epiphanius out of the Hebrew Aron; but herein lieth the difference between Aron and Thebes, that Aron signifieth properly the Ark of the Sanctuary, but Thebes such a Vessel as swimmeth, and beareth it self upon the Waters.

Gen. 6. 4.

Lastly, this Ark of Noah differed from the fashion of a Ship in this, That it had a Cover and Roof, with a Cleft in the midst thereof, and the Sides declining like the Roof of an House, to the end, both to cast off the Waters, and that thereunder Noah himself and his Children might shelter, and separate themselves from the noyسمen of the many Beasts, which filled the other Rooms and Parts of the Ark.

Of what Wood the Ark was built it is uncertain. The Hebrew word Gopher once and in this place only used is diversely understood; and though the matter be of little importance, yet this difference there is, That the Genevra Translation calls it Pine-tree, the Rabbinæ Cypres, the Seventy square Timber, the Latin smooth Timber. Others will have it Cypres-trees, as dedicated to the Dead, because Cypres is worn at Funerals. But out of doubt it the word Gopher signifie any special kind of Timber, Noah obeyed the Voice of God therein; if not, he was not then curious as touching the kind or nature of the Wood, having the Promise of God, and his Grace and Mercy for his defence.

V. 18.
Psal. l. 16.
Eccl. 40.

For with Noah God promised to establish his covenant. Play affirmeth, That in Egypt it was the use to build Ships of Cedar, which the Worms eat not; and he avoweth that he saw in Utica, in the Temple of Apollon, Cedar Beams, laid in the time of the Foundation of the City, and that they were still found in his time, which was above 1883. Years after: proving thereby, that this kind of Wood was not subject to putrifying or moulding in a very long time. But in that it is easy to cut, light to carry, and of a sweet favour, lasting also better than any other Wood, and because near the place where the Ark rested, there are found great fots of these Cedar-trees, as also in all the Mountains of the East, besides those of Libanus, it is probable enough that the Ark might be of that Wood: which hath besides the other Commodities the greatest length of Timber, and therefore fittest to build Ships withal. Perrineus conceiveth that the Ark had divers fots of Timber, and that the Bottom had of one sort, the Deck and Partition of another; all which may be true or false, if Gopher may be taken for Timber in general. True it is, that Cedar will serve for all parts of a Ship, as well for the Body, as for Masts and Yards. But Noah had most respect to the direction received from God: to the length, breadth, and height, and to the partitions of the Ark; and to pitch it, and to divide it into Cabins, thereby to sever the clean Beasts from the unclean, and to preserve their several fots of Food; and that it might be capable of all kind of living Creatures, according to the Numbers by God appointed. All which when Noah had gathered together, he cast his confidence wholly on God, who by his Angels steered this Ship without a Rudder, and directed it without the help of a Compass or the North-star. The Pitch which Noah used, is by some supposed to have been a kind of Bitumen, whereof there is great quantity about the Valley of Sodom and Go-

Perrineus.

morra, now the dead Sea or Asphaltus: and in the Region of Babylon, and in the West India, and herein it exceedeth other Pitch, that it melts not with the Sun, but by the Fire only, after the manner of hard Wax.

That the Ark was of sufficient capacity.

THE Ark according to Gods Commandment had of length three hundred Cubits, fifty of breadth, and thirty deep or high: by which proportion it had fix parts of length to one of breadth, and ten times in length to one of depth; of which S. Augustine, Proculadado figura est peregrina. De Civit. nautis in hoc seculo Civitatis Dei, (hoc est) Eccliesie. Dei, l. 19. que fit salua per lignum, in quo pendit Mediator Dei. et hominum, homo Christus Jesus: nam & mensura ipse longitudo, altitudo, latitudoque epus significat corpus humanum, in cujus veritate ad homines pronuntiatus est venturus, & venit, &c. Without doubt (saith he) it is a Figure of the City of God, travelling in this World as a stranger (that is) of the Church, saved by the Tree whereupon the Mediator between God and Man, the Man Jesus Christ did hang: for even the very measure of the length, height, and breadth, answereth the shape of Mani Body, in the truth whereof the coming of Christ was fore-told and performed.

By what kind of Cubit the Ark was measured, it hath been a disputed Question among the Fathers, and others; and the differences are in effect these: The first kind of Cubit (called the Common) containeth one Foot and a half, measured from the sharp of the Elbow to the point of the middle Finger. The second (the Palm Cubit) which taketh one handfull more than the common. The third is called Regius Cubitus, or the Persian Cubit, which exceedeth the common Cubit three Inches. The fourth is the Sacred Cubit, which containeth the common or vulgar Cubit double, wanting but a quarter or fourth part. Lastly there is a fifth Cubit, called Geometrical, which containeth six common Cubits. But of all these fots, which were commonly measured by the vulgar Cubit, the alteration and diminution of Mens Statuta, the alteration made the difference. For as there is now a less proportion of Bodies: so is the common Cubit, from the sharp of the Elbow to the point of the middle Finger, of less length than it was in elder times.

S. Augustine considering the many fots of Beasts and Birds which the Ark held, with their Food and Water, was sometimes of opinion, that the Ark had proportion after the Geometrical Cubit, which containeth almost fix of the common. For measuring the Ark by the vulgar Cubit did not exceed the capacity of that Vessel built by Hiero of Syracuse, or the Ship of Prolemy Philopater. But S. Augustine (who at the first was led by Origen) charged his Judgment as touching the Geometrical Cubit; and found upon better consideration, that there needed not so huge a Body to preserve all fots of Creatures by God appointed to be reserved. For it was not needful to take any kinds of Fishes into the Ark, because they were kept living (saith S. Augustine) in their own Element. Non fuit necesse conservare in Arca qua possent in aquis vivere; non salum merfa sicut pisces, verum supernatantes, sicut multa alie. It was not needful to conserve those Creatures in the Ark, which could live in the Waters; and not only Fishes, which can live under Water, but also those Fowls which sit and swim on them: And again, Terra non aqua, maledicta, quia Adam non non hujus, sed illius fructum vestitum comedit. It was the Earth, and not the Waters, which God cursed: for of the forbidden Fruits of the Earth, and not of the Sea, Adam eat; so 25 S. Augustine gathereth hereupon, (as aforesaid) that so huge a Frame needed not.

And if we look with the Eyes of Judgment hereunto, we shall find nothing monstrous therein; although the imaginations of Men, who (for the most part) have more of mischief and of ignorance, than of any reverend reason, find many impossibilities in this Work of God. But it is manifest, and undoubtedly true, that many of the Species, which now seem differing and of several kinds, were not then in verum natura. For those Beasts which are of mixt natures, either they were not in that Age, or else it was not needful to preserve them: seeing they might be generated again by others, as the Mules, the Hyzards, and the like: the one begotten by Alies and Mares, the other by Foxes and Wolves. And whereas by discovery of strange Lands, wherein there are found divers Beasts and Birds differing in Colour or Stature from those of these Northern parts, it may be supposed by a superficial consideration, that all those which wear Red and Pyed Skins, or Feathers, are differing from those that are left painted, and were plain Ruffet or Black: they are much mistaken that so think. And for my own Opinion I find no difference, but only in Magnitude, between the Cat of Europe, and the Ounce of India; and even those Dogs which are become wild in Hispagnia, with which the Spaniards used to devour the naked Indians, are now changed to Wolves, and begin to destroy the breed of their Cattle, and do also oftentimes tear asunder their own Children. The common Crow and Rook of India is full of red Feathers in the drow'd and low Islands of Caribana; and the Black-bird and Thrush hath his Feathers mixt with Black and Carnation, in the North parts of Virginia. The Dog Fish of England is the Shark of the South Ocean: For if Colour or Magnitude made a difference of Species, then were the Negro's, which we call the Black moors, non animalia rationalia, not Men, but some kind of strange Beasts: and so the Giants of the South America should be of another kind, than the People of this part of the World. We also see it daily that the Natures of Fruits are changed by transplantation, some to better, some to worse, especially with the change of Climate. Grapes may be made good Fruit by often Grafting, and the best Mellons will change in a Year or two to common Cucumbers by being set in a barren Soil: Therefore taking the kinds precisely of all Creatures, as they were by God created, or out of the Earth by his Ordinance produced: The Ark, after the measure of the common Cubit was sufficiently capacious to contain of all, according to the number by God appointed: For if we add but half a Foot of measure to the common Cubit, which had a Foot and a half of Giantly Stature (and less allowance we cannot give to the difference between them and us) then did the Ark contain 600 Foot in length, and 100 Foot in breadth, and 60 Foot deep.

But first of all to make it manifest, that the Geometrical Cubit is not used in the Scripture, the Stature of the Giants therein named may suffice. For if the Bed of Oz King of Bajan had been nine Geometrical Cubits long, it had taken 54 Cubits of the common, which make 8 Cubits: and Goliath, who had the length of 6 Cubits and a handfull, (which makes nine Foot and a handfull, a proportion credible) if these Cubits had been Geometrical, they had been 54 Foot in height and upwards, which were monstrous and most incredible: for (according to this proportion) had the Head of Goliath been nine Foot long, and far weightier and bigger than David's Body, who carried it away.

Again if the Geometrical Cubit had been used for a measure in the Scripture, as many Commenters have observed, then had the Altar (appointed to contain five Cubits of length, five of breadth and three of height) have reached the length of 27 Foot upright, and so much their Priests have ascended by Steps or Ladders to have performed their Sacrifices thereon, which was contrary to Gods Commandment given in these words: Thui Ezed. Thui not go up with steps unto mine altar, that thy flame be not discovered thereon; and therefore was the Altar but three common Cubits high which make four Foot, that their Priests standing thereby might execute their office: Wherefore I may conclude, that the Cubit mentioned in the Scriptures was not the Geometrical, but the ordinary Cubit of one Foot and a half, according to the Measure of Giantly Stature; which Measure (doubles) might give much the more capacity to the Ark, although it be also probable, that as the Men were, so were the Horses whereon they rode, and all other Creatures of a correspondent size. And yet (as I take it) though by this means there were not any whit the more room in the Ark, it were not hard to conceive, how all the distinct Species of Animals, whose Lives cannot be preserved in the Waters, might according to their present quantities be contained in a Vessel of those Dimensions which the Ark had; allowing to the Cubit one Foot and a half of our now usual Measure: whence it followeth of necessity, that those large Bodies which were in the days of Noah might have room sufficient in the Ark, which was measured by a Cubit of length proportionable.

How the appointed number of Creatures, to be saved (that is) seven of the clean, two of the unclean (with necessary Food) might have place in the Ark, Barns hath very learnedly declared: the brief sum of whole Discourse to that purpose is this: The length of the Ark was three hundred Cubits, which multiplied by the breadth, namely fifty Cubits, and the Product by the height of thirty Cubits, increaseth the whole Concavity to have been 450000. Now whereas the Posts, Walls, and other Partitions of Lodgings may seem to have taken up a great part of the hollow: the height of the Roof which (the Perpendicular being one Cubit) contained 7500 cubical Cubes, was a sufficient recompence: (if therefore in a Ship of such greatness we seek room for 89 distinct Species of Beasts, or (lest any should be omitted) for 100 several kinds, we shall easily find place both for them, and for the Birds, which in biggness are no way answerable to them, and for Meat to sustain them all. For there are three fots of Beasts, whose Bodies are of a quantity best known; the Beef, the Sheep, and the Wolf: to which the rest may be reduced, by laying, (according to Aristotle) that one Elephant is answerable to four Bees, one Lyon to two Wolves, and so of the rest. Of Beasts, some feed on Vegetables, others on Fleish. There are one and thirty kinds of the greater sort, feeding on Vegetables: of which number, only three are clean, according to the Law of Moses, whereof seven of a kind entered into the Ark, namely three couples for Breed, and one odd one for Sacrifice: the other eight and twenty kinds were taken by two of each kind, so that in all there were in the Ark one and twenty great Beasts clean, and six and fifty unclean, estimable for largeness as 91 Bees; yet for a supplement (left perhaps perhaps any Species be omitted) let them be valued, as 120 Bees. Of the latter sort, feeding on Vegetables, were in the Ark six and twenty kinds, estimable with good allowance for supply, as four-score Sheep. Of those which devour Flesh were two and thirty kinds, answerable to three-score and four Wolves. All these 280 Beasts might be kept in one Story or Room of the Ark in the several Cabins; their Meat in a second; the Birds and their Provision in a third, with place to spare for Noah and his Family, and all their necessities.

§. X.

That the Ark rested upon part of the Hill Taurus (or Caucasus) between the East Indies, and Scythia.

†. I.

A Preterition of some Questions left material: with a Note of the use of this Question, to find out the Metropolis of Nations.

WHAT time Noah took to build the Ark, I leave to others to dispute; but he received the Commandment from God 100 Years before the Waters fell: and had therefore choice of time and leisure sufficient. As for the number of Decks and Partitions, which Origen divides into four, S. Augustine into three, I will not trouble the Reader with the controversy: or whether those Creatures which sometimes rest on the Land, or other times in the Waters, as the Crocodiles (now called Aligators) the Sea-Cows or Sea-Horses, were kept in the Ark, or no, I think it a needless curiosity; and yet to this faith Pererius, and others before him, that a Fish-Pool might be made as well within the Ark, as in Hiero his Ship of Syracuse. Lastly, to confider or labour to disprove the foolery of the Hebrews, who suppose that the Ark was lightened by a Carbuncle, or had Windows of Crystal to receive in Light, and keep out Water, were but to revive the buried Vanities of former times. But that which I seek most to satisfy my self and others in, is in what part of the World the Ark rested after the Flood: because the true understanding of some of these places (as the Seat of the Terrestrial Paradise, and the resting of the Ark) do only and truly teach the Worlds Plantation, and the beginning of Nations, before and after the Flood; and all Story, as well general as particular, thereby may be the better understood.

†. II.

A Proposal of the common Opinion, that the Ark rested upon some of the Hills of Armenia.

AND first, for the true place where the Ark rested after the Flood, and from what part of the World the Children of Noah travelled to their first Settlement and Plantation, I am resolved (without any presumption) that therein the most Writers were utterly mistaken. And I am not led so to think out of my humour or newness of opinion, or singularity; but do herein ground my self on the Original and first Truth, which is the Word of God, and after that upon Reason, and the most probable circumstances thereon depending. For whereas it is written, that the Ark stayed Gn. 8. 4. upon one of the mountains of Ararat, which the Chaldean Paraphrast hath converted Kardu, meaning the Hills Gardai or Gardies in Armenia the greater: (as the words Gardai and Kardu seem to be one and the same) of which Opinion also the most of our Interpreters are; I find neither Scripture nor Reason which teacheth any such thing: (to wit) that it rested on that part of Ararat, which is in the greater Armenia. Nicolaus Damascenus calls this Mountain of Ararat, Bari, being the same which the Chaldean nameth Kardu, to which Mountain the Frier Amnius (citing this place out of Tophius) makes him find another adjoining, called Orcia, and to say that the Ark (of which Moses the Law-giver of the Hebrews wrote) did first take ground on this Orcia. But I do not find any such Mountain in being, as this Orcia; neither is there any mention of it in the place of Tophius. Strabo remembereth a Promontory in Armenia Felix, of that name, and Ptolemy finds a Mart-Town so called in the same, which Ptolemy calls Orcia, Pinetus Aegle, and Niger Zidon. But this Orcia of Damascenus, or rather of Amnius, seemeth to be one and a part of the Armenian Mountains. Berosus calleth those Mountains of Armenia Cordias, and Curtius Cordai: Ptolemy Gordai and Gordies: of which the Country next adjoining is by this Nicolaus Damascenus called Nyniada, perhaps (as Becanus conjectures) for Myliada, or rather Minni: which word is used for Armenia Minor. And the very word of Armenia, Aras: as if we should say Minni of Syria, for which Armenia also was a part of Syria, they will needeth. Epiphanius placeth the Cordai about these Mountains, whom others call Gordies or Gordies. The Mountains are feated a part from all other to the North of that Ledge of Mountains called Taurus, or Niphates in the Plains of Armenia the great, near the Lake Thapsius: whence the River of Tigris floweth in 75 Degrees of Longitude, and 41 and 42 Degrees of Latitude. One of the Mountains Gordies (that which surmounteth the rest) Epiphanius calls Lubar, which in the Armenian signifieth a place of descent: but this out of Tophius; which name (saith Junius) was of the event, because of Noah's coming down with his Children. But this also I take to be a supposed event; seeing any Hill, from whence on every side we must descend, may thus be called: as Junius corrects the place in Tophius Armenia (Kubari). That the place is to be read, he conjectureth, because Tophius, l. 1. c. 4. says, the place is called Armenia (as it were the descent or coming down) and Epiphanius, l. 1. c. 1. calls it Aloes: which word in the Armenian and Egyptian Tongue signifieth descent, of Lubar, which is to descend; whence also Lubar is a Synagogue, because it was commonly built on some high place: whereof also the Latin Delubrum may seem to be derived; and Alt. 6. 9. they that belonged to the Synagogue of the Egyptians are called Libertini, for Lubar Tem. Yet this Opinion hath been embraced from Age to Age: receiving a habit of strength by time, and allowance without any farther examination; although the name of Lubar might otherwise rightly be given, especially to that Mountain, by reason that the passage was more fair, up and down unto it, than to any of the rest adjoining.

†. III.

The first Argument against the common Opinion. They that say: is build Babel, would have come faster, had they come from so near a place as Armenia.

BUT there are many Arguments to persuade me, that the Ark of Noah did not rest itself in any part of Armenia, and that the Mountain Ararat was not Bari, nor any one of the Gordies Mountains.

For first, it is agreed by all which follow Berosus, that it was in the 130. Year, or in the Year 131. after the Flood, when Nimrod came into the Valley of Shinar, which Valley was afterward called Babylonia, Cush, and Chaldea. If then the Ark had first found Land in Armenia, it is very incredible, that the Children of Noah which came into that Valley could have spent so many Years in so short a passage: seeing the Region of Mesopotamia was only interjacent, which might by easy Journeys have been past over in 20. days; and to halten and help which Passage the Navigable River of Tygris offered it self, which is every where transpassable by Boats of great burden: so as where the Defeat on the one side refitted their Expedition, the River on the contrary side served to advance it; the River rising out of the same Ledge of Mountains, or at the Foot of them, where the Ark of Noah was first supposed to settle it self; Then, if the Nations which followed Nimrod still doubted the surprise of a second Flood (according to the Opinions of the ancient Hebrews) it foundeth ill to the Ear of Reason, that they would have spent many Years in that low and overflowen Valley of Mesopotamia, so called of the many Rivers which intermix in it: for the Effects witnessed their Afflictions, compels it: for the Effects witnessed their Afflictions, and the Works, which they undertook, their Unbelief; being no sooner arrived in Shinar, their Unbelief; being no sooner arrived in Shinar, they began to provide themselves of a Defence (by erecting Babel) against any future or feared Inundation. Now at Babel it was that Nimrod began his Kingdom, the first known City of the World founded after the Flood, about 131. Years, or (as others suppose) ten Years later: though (for my self) I rather think, that they undertook that Work in two respects, first, to make themselves famous, To get us a Name (saith the Text): Secondly, thereby to usurp Dominion over the rest.

†. IV.

The second Argument, That the Eastern People were most ancient in Popularity, and in all Humane Glory.

FOR a second Argument: The Civility, Magnificence and multitude of People (wherein the East parts of the World first abounded) hath more weight than any thing which hath been, or can be said for Armenia, and for Noah's taking Land there. And that this is true, the use of Printing and Artillery (among many other things which the East had) may easily persuade us, that those Sun-rising Nations were the most ancient. The certainty of this Report, that the East Indians (time out of mind) have had Guns and Ordnance of Battery, confirmed by the Portugals and others, makes us now to understand, That the place of Philoftratus in Asia Apollonia Tianah, l. 2. c. 14. is no Fable, though express'd in fabulous words: when he saith, that the wise Men which dwell between Typhis and Bat-Ganges, use not themselves to go forth into Bat-Ganges: that they but drive away their Enemies with Thunders and Lightning: thus from Typhis. By which words there is to be seen, that Typhis the Egyptian and Chabris, saying their Forces were defeated there; and that this Shinar, they drive away his Golden Shield. For the Invention of Letters was ignorantly ascribed to Cadmus; because he brought them first into Greece: of which the People (then rude and Savage) had reason to give him the Honour, from whom they received the Benefit. But it is true, that Letters are no less ancient than Sirib or Hemah were: for they are said to have written on Pillars of Stone (as before remembered) long before the Flood. But from the Eastern World it was that John Coltenberg a German, brought the Device of Printing: by whom Comrad being instructed, brought the Practice thereof to Rome: and after that, Michael Grefen a Frenchman bettered both the Letters and Invention. And notwithstanding that this Mystery was then supposed to be but newly born, the Chinese had Letters long before either the Egyptians or Phoenicians; and also the Art of Printing; when as the Greeks had neither any civil Knowledge, or any Letters among them.

And that this is true, both the Portugals and Spaniards have witnessed, who about an hundred Years since discovered those Kingdoms, and do now enjoy their rich Trades therein: for the Chinese account all other Nations but Salvages in respect of themselves.

And to add strength to this Argument, the Conquest and Story of Alex. Macedon may justly be called to witness, who found more Cities and Sumptruous in that little Kingdom of Persia, which lay by side to the East India, than in all his other Travels and Undertakings. For in Alexander's time Learning and Greatness had not travelled so far to the West as Rome: Alexander esteeming of Italy but as a barbarous Country, and of Rome as of a Village. But it was Babylon that stood in his Eye, and the Fame of the East pierced his Ears. And if we look as far as the Sun-rising, and hear Paulus Venetus what he reporteth of the uttermost Angle and Island thereof, we shall find that those Nations have sent out, and not received, less Knowledge, and not borrowed it from the West. For the farther East (to this day) the more civil, the farther West the more salvage. And of the life of Japan (now Zipangari) Venetus maketh this Report. Incola religiosus, literis, & sapientia sunt aditissimi, & veritatis indagatores accurati, nihil illis frequentius orationis, quam (more nostro) facris in delubris exercens: summi consensum Principum, summi Deum adorant. The Islanders are exceedingly addicted to Religion, Letters, and Philosophy: and most diligent searchers out of Truth: there is nothing among them more frequent than Prayer, which they use in their Churches, after the manner of Christians. They acknowledge one King, and worship one God. The Antiquity, Magnificence, Civility, Riches, sumptuous Buildings, and Policy in Government, is reported to be such by those who have been employed into those parts; as it seemeth to exceed (in those formerly named, and divers other particulars) all other Kingdoms of the World.

†. V.

The third Argument, From the wonderful Resilience which Semiramis found in the East Indies.

BUT for a third Argument, and also of a treble strength to the rest, I lay the Invasion of Semiramis before the indifferent and advised Reader: who may consider in what Age she lived, and how soon soon after the World new birth the gathered her Army (as Diodorus Siculus out of Cassius reporteth) of more than three Millions to invade India, to which he adjoyneth also 500000, Horse, and 100000. Waggons: whereof if we believe but a third part, it shall suffice to prove that India was the first planted and peopled Country after the Flood. Now as touching the time wherein the lived: All Historians consent, that she was the Wife of Nimrod; and the most approved Writers agree, that Nimrod was the Son of Belus, and Belus of Nimrod, that Nimrod was the Son of Cush, Cush of Cham, and Cham of Noah. And at such time as Nimrod came into Shinar, he was then a great Nation, as by the building of the City and Tower of Babel may appear; and being then so multiplied and increased, the two Defecats call between Nimrod and Semiramis, brought forth in that time those multitudes, whereof her Army was composed. Let us then see with whom the encountered in that War with this her powerful Army: even with her own, conducted by Staurabates King of India beyond India; of whose multitudes this is the Witness of Diodorus Siculus. Staurabates, quis majoribus quam que erat Semiramis capitis. Staurabates gathering together greater Troops than those of Semiramis. If then these numbers of Indians had been increased but by a Colony sent out from Shinar, (and that also after Babel was built, which no doubt took some time in the performance) this increase in the East, and this Army of Staurabates must have been made of Stone, or somewhat else by Miracle. For as the Numbers which Semiramis gathered might easily grow up in that time, from to great a Troop as Nimrod brought with him into Babylonia (as shall be demonstrated hereafter in the Story of Israhel) so could not any such time, by any multiplication natural, produce so many Bodies of Men, as were in the Indian Army victorious over Semiramis; if the Colonies sent thither had been so late as Babel overturned, and the confusion of Languages. For if we allow 65 Years time after the Flood, before Nimrod was born: of which 30 Years to Cush ere he begat Seba, after whom he had Ham, Sabirah, Rasmah, and Sabtecha: and then 30 Years to Rasmah, ere he begat Sheba and Dedan, both which were born before Nimrod: and five Years to his five elder Brothers, which make 65. and then twice 30 Years for two Generations more, as for Nimrod, Sheba and Dedan with others, to beget their Sons, and that a third Generation might grow up, which makes in all 125 Years, there will then remain six Years to have been spent in travelling from the East, ere they arrived in Shinar in the Year after the Flood 131. And so the followers of Nimrod might be of sufficient multitude. But as for those which make him to have arrived at Shinar in the Year 101: and the Confusion to have been at Peleg's Birth, these Men do all by Miracle: they beget whole Nations without the help of Time, and build Nimrod's Tower in the Air; and not on those low marshy Grounds (which require found Foundations) in the Plains of Shinar. For except that huge Tower were built in a Day, there could be no confusion in that Year 101. or at Peleg's Birth. And therefore it is far more probable, that Nimrod usurped Regal Authority in the 131. Year after the Flood, (according to Berosus) and that the Work of Babel lasted forty Years (according to Glycas) hominibus in ea perficienda totis 40. annis incessant laborantibus: Men labouring in vain 40. Years to finish it. By which Account it falls out, that it was 170 Years after the Flood, ere a Colony were sent into East India; which granted (the one being the main Body, and the other but a Troop taken thence) it can hardly be believed, that Staurabates could have exceeded Semiramis in Numbers: who being then Empress of all that part of the World, gathered the most of Nations into one Body.

† VI.

The fourth Argument from divers Considerations in the Person of Noah.

Fourthly, it is no way probable, that Noah, who had lived therein the long time of 600. Years, was all that space 130. Years after the Flood without any certain Habitation: No, it will fall out, and better agree with Reason, that Nimrod was but the Conductor of those People, by Noah defined and appointed to fill and inhabit that middle part of the Earth and the Western World; (which Travels Noah put over to young and able Bodies) and that Noah himself then covered with many Years planted himself in the same place which God had assigned him: which was where he first came down out of the Ark from the Waters: For it is written, that after Noah came down out of the Ark he planted a Vineyard, and became a Husbandman: whole Babylonia was to dress and manure the Earth, and not to range over so many parts of the World, as from Armenia into Arabia Felix, where he should (if the Tradition be found) have left certain Colonies: thence into Africa towards Triton; then into Spain, where they say he settled other Companies; and built Cities after the Names of Noah and Negla his Sons Wives: from thence into Italy, where they say he found his Son Cham the Saturn of Egypt, who had corrupted the People and Subjects of Gomer in his absence: with whom Noah (as they make the Story) had patience for three Years; but then finding no amendment, they say, he banished him out of Italy. These be but the Fancies of Berosus Antiquus, a plain imitation of the Grecian Fables. For let every reasonable Man conceive, what it was to travel far in such a Forest as the World was, when after so great a rotting of the Earth by the Flood the same lay waste and over-grown for 130. or 140. Years, and wherein there could hardly be found either Path or Passage through which Men were able to creep, for Woods, Busses and Briars that in those Years were grown up.

And there are so many Reasons, proving that Noah never came into the Valley of Shinar, as we need not suspect his Passage into Italy or Spain: For Noah, who was Father of all those Nations, a Man revered both for his Authority, Knowledge, Experience and Piety, would never have permitted his Children and Lises to have undertaken that unbelieving presumptuous Work of Babel. Rather by his Presence and prevalent Perfections he would have bound their hands from so vain Labours, and by the Authority which he received even from God himself, he would have held them in that awful subjection, as whatsoever they had vainly conceived or feared, yet they durst not have disobeyed the personal Commandment of him, who in the beginning had a kind of Regal Authority over his Children and People. Certainly, Noah knew right well, that the former destruction of Mankind was by themselves purchased through Cruelty and Disobedience; and that to distrust God, and to raise up Building against his Almighty Power, was as much as in their lay, a provocation of God to lay on them the same, if not a more sharp affliction.

affliction. Wherefore, there is no probability, that ever he came so far. With as Poliphilus, but rather, that he kept those numbers which came into Shinar (being the greatest Part of the World to plant) under Nimrod, or those upon whom he usurped. Nimrod and Calpini take the Testimony of Melchior Bishop of Tyre for current, that there were three Leaders of the People after their entrance (to wit) Nimrod, Saphene, and Tollan: of which Nimrod commanded the issues of Cham, Tollan of Sem, and Saphene of Japhet. This Opinion cannot judge of, although I will not doubt, but that so great a Work as the Worlds Plantation, could not be effected without order and conduction.

Of the Sons of Sem: Tollan, Havilah, and Ophir, are especially noted to have dwelt in the East India. The rest of Sem's issues had also the Regions of Persia and the other adjoining to India, and held also a part of Chaldaea for a time: for Abraham inhabited Urr, till he was thence called by God; and whether they were of the Sons of Tollan, or of all the rest a certain number (Cham and his issue only excepted) that Noah kept with himself, it cannot be known. Of which Plantation I shall speak at large in the Chapter following.

Now another reason which moves me to believe, that Noah stayed in the East far away from all those that came into Shinar, is that Moses doth not in any word make mention of Noah in all the story of the Hebrews; or among any of those Nations which contended with them. And Noah, being the Father of all Mankind, and the chosen servant of God, was too principal a person, to be either forgotten or neglected, had he not (in respect of his Age and wearisome experience of the World) withdrawn himself, and retired apiece with his best beloved giving himself to the service and contemplation of God and Heavenly things, after he had directed his Children to their destined portions. For he landed in a warm and fertile soil, where he planted his Vineyard, and dress the Earth; after which, and his thanks-giving to God by sacrifice; he is not remembered in the Scriptures, because he was so far away from those Nations of which Moses wrote: which were the Hebrews chiefly, and their Enemies and Borderers.

† VII.

Of the senseless Opinion of Annius the Commentator upon Berosus: that the Ark rested upon Montes Calpini in Armenia, and yet upon Gordiz, which are three hundred Miles distant also in Armenia, and yet in Syria.

It remaineth now that we examine the Arguments and authorities of Frier Annius, who in his Commentaries upon Berosus, and others, laboureth marvelously to prove, that the Ark of Noah rested upon the Armenian Mountains called Calpini; which Mountains separate Armenia from the upper Media, and do equally belong to both. And because all his Authors speak of the Mountains Gordiz, he hath no other shift to unite these Opinions, but by uniting those far distant Mountains together. To effect which he hath found no other invention, than to charge those Men with error which have carefully overseen, printed, and published Ptolemy's Geography, in which they are altogether delivered: for that last edition of Mercator's, sets these Hills five Degrees (which makes three hundred English Miles) atunder. And certainly, if we look into those more ancient Copies of Ptolemy and others, we shall find nothing in them to help Annius withal: for in those the Mountains Calpini stand seven Degrees to the East of the Gordiz, which make 120 Miles. And for those Authors by whose Authority Annius strengtheneth himself, Diodorus whom he so much followeth, giveth this judgement upon them in the like dispute. Aberrant vero omnes, non neglegentia, sed reprobis suis ignorantia. They have all erred (saith he) not through negligence, but through ignorance of the situation of Kingdoms. But for an induction, to prove that the Ark of Noah stood on the Mountains of Armenia, he beginneth with the antiquity of the Scythians; and to prove the same he citeth Marcus Terentius Caro, who avoweth that 250. years before Nimrod, the Earth was overflowed with Waters, & in Syria Saga renatum Cato de mortale genus, and that in Syria Saga the stock of mortal Men was renewed. The same Author also teacheth that the Umbri before remembered (who were so called, because saved from Deucalion's flood) were the Sons of the Galli, a Nation of the Scythians. Ex his vestigia Janum cum Dyrum & Gallis Progenitoribus Umbrosum: From these Scythians, he saith, that Janus came with Dyrum and with the Galli the Progenitors of the Umbri: And again, Equidem principibus originis semper Scythia tribuimus, Certainly, the prime antiquity of off-spring is, always given to the Scythians. And herein truly I agree with Annius, that those Regions called Syria, and now Tartaria, and by some Writers Sarmatia, Asiatica, were among the first peopled: and they held the greatest part of Asia under tribute till Nimrod's time. Also Pliny calleth the Umbri which long time inhabited Italy, Gent antiquissima, a quibus omnes Nationes, who descended of these Scythians: Now that which Annius laboureth, is to prove that these ancient Scythians (meaning the Nephews of Noah) did first inhabit that Region of the Mountains, on which the Ark rested; and confessing that this great ship was grounded in Armenia, taketh Name of the Mountain Ararat, near the River of Araxes. And because his Author Cato helpeth him in part (to wit, That in Syria Mankind was restored after the great Flood, 250 Years before Nimrod) and in part utterly destroyeth his conceit of Armenia, by adding the word Saga, as in Syria Saga renatum mortale genus, in Syria Saga Mankind was restored; he therefore in the Proem of his Commentary upon Berosus, leaveth out the addition of Saga altogether in the repetition of Cato his words, and writes, hominibus in Syria saluatis. For Syria Saga or Saca is undoubtedly under the Mountains of Paropamisus, on which, or near which it is most probable that the Ark first took ground; and from thence East parts (according to Israhel) Moses came all those Companies which erected the Tower of Babel in Shinar or Babylonia.

But now the best Authority which Annius hath, is out of Diodorus: where he hath read, that the Scythians were originally Armenians, taking name as Syria Rege eorum, from Scythia their King. But (in a word) we may see his vanity, or rather (indeed) his falsehood in citing this place. For Diodorus, a most approved and diligent Author, beginneth in that place with these words. Falsum lanis Scythia, The Scythians false; and his Interpreter in this Table of that Work giveth this Title to that very Chapter. Scythiarum origo & successus, fabula: The original and success of the Scythians, a fable. And (indeed) there needs no great disproof thereof, since Ptolemy doth directly delineate Syria Saga, or Saca, and sets them in 130 Degrees of Longitude: and the Persians (saith Hecataeus)

...datus) call all the Seythians Sace, which Pithy con-firmeth: for in respect that the Sace (saith Pithy) L. 6. c. 17. are the next Seythians to the Perfians, therefore they give all the rest that Name. Now that any Nation in Armenia can neighbour the Perfians, there is no Man believeth. But this supposed Seythia Araxes in Armenia lyeth in 88 Degrees of Longitude (that is 42 Degrees distant from the Sace) and the Country about Araxes Ptolomy calleth Colchene and Sedone- sene and Sacapene, without any mention of Seythi- ans: and yet all those which are or were reputed Seythian, either within Immus or without, of the number of 100 several Nations are by Ptolomy precisely set down.

But to come to those later Authors, whereof some have written, others have seen a great Part of those North-East Regions, and searched their Antiquities with great diligence: First, Marius Niger boundeth Scythia within Imau, in this manner: (for Scythia without these Mountains is also beyond our Po' pole.) Scythia intra imau montem ea est, que proprio vocabulo Gallia hoc tempore dicitur: ab Occasu armatae Africae: ab Oriente Imau monte: à Septentrione terra incognita: à Meridie Sacae, Sogdiani, Margiani, quae ipsa Oxæ amnis in Hyrcanum mare exeat; & parce ipsius maris hinc usque ad Euxinum effluunt: Scythia without these Mountains is that part of the World which in their own speech is at this time called Scythia, and the same is boundeth in by the Imau Mountains, (or of Asia) on the West; Sacæ by Sarmatia Africa, (or of Africa) on the East; Imau Mountains on the North by unknown Lands: on the South by the Sacæ (which are the Sacæ) the Sogdiani, and the Margiani, to the Mouth of Oxus, falling into the Hyrcan Sea, and by the Mouth of the same Sea as far as the Mouth of Rha.

Now if Niger sets all Sarmatia Asiatica, to the West of Scythia, then Sarmacia (que magna Latine regio est; & qua innumeræ Nationes confluxerunt) Asiæ is a great Regio, comprehending innumerable Nations, (also Niger) much of it being between Scythia and Armenia, dth offensively warrant us that Armenia can be no part of Scythia; and to make it more plain, he differeth Sarmatia is left from any part of Armenia, by the Regions of Columbia, Thracia, Albania, which he leaveth on the right Hand of sarmatia, and yet makes Sarmatia but two West bound of Scythia.

And for Paulus Venetus, he hath not a word of Armenia among the Tartarorum, or Scythian Nations; neither doth his fellow Friar Joſeph Plancarius (cited by Venetus in his deſcription of Scythia) make any mention of Armenia; neither doth Haydrusus an Armenian born, of the blood of thoſe Kings. (though afterward a Monk) yet acknowledge himſelf for a Tartarian, or of the Scythian races gathered: though he write many ſtory of a large, denominated by Nicolaus Scalmus, and (by the commandment of Pope Clement the Fifth) in the Year 1307 publiſhed.

Neither does Muthias at Micbon (a Canon of Cracovia in Polonia) a Sarmatian born, and that travelled a great part of Sarmatia Africa, find America any way within the compals of Tartaria, Scythia, or Sarmatia; and yet no Man (whose travels are extant) hath observed so much of those Regions as he hath done: proving and disproving many things, heretofore subject to dispute. And among others he berueth that ancient and received opinion, That out of the Mountains Rhiphaei and Hyperborei in Scythia, spring the Rivers of Tanaïs or Don, Volga or Edel; proving by an answerable experience, that there are no fountains in verum natura; and (indeed) that the Heads and Fountains of those famous Rivers are now by the Trade of Melcovia known to every Merchant, and that they arise out of Lakes, low woody, and marlly Grounds. The River of Tanais or Dan, ariseth to the South of the City of Tula, some twenty English Miles, out of a Lake called Janawolow in the great Wood Oghienitzki or Tepphanowits. Volga, which Prokopy calls Rhe, and the Tartars call Edel, riseth out of a Lake called Fronow, in the great Wood Podkorski: from which Lake the two other famous Rivers flow of Europe, the Don and the Volga. The River of the European Sarmatia. In Sarmatia of Europe are the Regions of Rutilians, Lithuanians, Mucovians, and those adjoining, bounded on the West by the River of Vistla, the name perchance misprinted Vistula for Vijula, a River which parts Germany and Sarmatia: and for the East Border he nameth Tanais or Dan. Sarmatia Aplica he cutteth from Europe by the fame River of Tanais, and the Caspian Sea, to withhold it from stretching farther East: this Asiatic Sarmatia being part of that Scythia which the Prokopy calleth Scythia intra Imum montem, Scyth is within the Mountain Imans. And the fame Mathias Baruch former affirms, that the Scythians (which the Frier Amius would make Armenians) came not into Sarmatia Aplica it self above three hundred and a few odd years before his own time: these be his words. Conflat eam esse gentem novam, & adventivam partibus orientis, (partibus orientis) paucis plus obsequiis, (paucis plus obsequiis) tracens amnis asia Sea ma i m (scilicet) ius. I am inclined to think that he, speaking of the Scythian Nation, meant that it is a late-planted Nation, come from the Coast of the East; ius whence they entered into Asia. Sea new signifies a little more than three hundred Years; ius i.e. ius (indeed) before that time the Guthi or Pandei inhabited armenia Armenia. And this M. thus lived in the Year 1515. and this his description of armenia was painted at Augusta in the Year 1506 as Bucholzerus in his Choro-graphia witnesseth. Now these cythians (faith he) came from the East; for, in the East it was that the rkof Noab resided; and the Scythe Sea were those People which lived at the North Foot of those Mountains of Taurus or Ararat, where they encounter or begin to mix themselves with the great Imani. And were there no other testimony than the general description of the Earth now extant, and the witness of Ptolemy, it is plain, that between all parts of Armenia and Scybia, there are not only those three Regions of Colchis, Iberia, and Albania; but the Caspian Sea: on the East foot of which Sea, but not on the West, or on that part which any way toucheth Armenia, there are (indeed) a Nation of Scythians (called Araxes) between Taurus and Taurus; but what are these Scythians to any Araxes, or Scythia Araxes which Armenia placeth in armenia, more than the Scythians of Europe?

The fifth Argument, The Vine must grow natural near the place where the Ark rested.

TO this if we add the consideration of this part of the Text, Tha: Nsah planted a Vine yard, we shall find that the Fruit of the Vine of Raisin did not grow naturally in that part of Armenia, where this resting of the Art was supposed to be for if the Vine was a stranger in Italy and France and brought from other Countries thither, it is not probable that it grew naturally in Armenia, being a far colder Country For Tyrrhenus first brought Vines into France, and Saturnus into Latium: y^e at such time as Brennus and the Gauls invaded Italy there were few or no Vines in France. For (saith Plutarch in the life of Camillus) the Gauls remained between the Pyrenæi and the Alpi, near unto the Senones, where they continued a long time, until they drank Wine, which was first brought them out of Italy; and after they tasted thereof they hasted to inhabit that Country, which brought forth such pleasant Fruit: so as it appeared, that the Plant of the Vine was not natural in France, but from Italy brought thither; as by Strabo from elsewhere into Italy.

Now it is manifest that Noah travelled not to seek out the Vine. For the Plantation there 'of is remembered, before there was any counsel how to dispose of the World among his Children : and the first thing he did was to till the Ground, and to plant a Vineyard, after his Sacrifice and thanks-giving to God; and wheresoever the Vine was sowed, there did the Vine grow naturally. From whence it doth now appear that he travelled far: for the Scriptures teach us, that he was a Husband-man, and not a Wanderer.

Answer to an Objection out of the words of the Text
The Lord scattered them from thence upon the face of the whole Earth.

And that all the Children of Noah came together into Shinar, it doth not appear, saying that it may be inferred out of these words [from thence] because it is written: So the Lord scattered them from thence upon all the Earth; which hath no other sense, but that the Lord scattered the people that dwelt there, and the Tower which they had builded (to wit) Tower that built this Tower: for those were from thence dispersed into all the Regions of the North and South, and to the Westward. And by these words of Sibylla (as they are converted) it seemeth that all came not together in Shinar, for they have this limitation: Quidam eorum (some edificaverunt altissimam, quasi per eam celum efficerent); Certain of them built a most high Tower, if they meant thereby to have builded the Heaven.

†. X.

An answer to the Objection from the name of Ararat, taken for Armenia: and the height of Hills there.

But before I conclude this part, it is necessary to see and consider, what part of Scripture, and what Reason may be found out to make it true or probable, that the Ark of Noah was taken by the waters on the Mountains of Armenia. For the Text hath only these words: The Ark came on (or upon) the Mountains of Ararat or Armenia: the marginal note of the Geneva, the Chaldee Paraphrast call it Kardu; of which the highest is the Name of Lubar. Idit Epiphanius. Now Ararat (which the Spiragiden do not convert all, but keep the same word) is taken to be the Mountain of Armenia, because Armenia it had anciently that name: so as first out of the north and secondly out of the height (which they suppose exceed all other) is the opinion taken, That the Ark first came thereon.

But these Suppositions have no foundation, neither is Ararat alone, neither any part, or any of those Mountains of stature to many other Mountains of the World.

yet it does not follow, that the Ark itself, on the highly difficult Mountain of Ararat, was left on; for the Plate of Ararat was discovered, before Noah came out of the Ark. Now if there were any agreement among Writers of this Ararat; and that they did not differ altogether therein, we might give more credit to the conceit. For in the books of the Sibylls, it is written, that the Mountains of Ararat are in Phrygia, upon which it was suppos'd that the Ark floated after the Flood. And the better to particularize the place and fear of the Mountains, and to prove them in Phrygia, and not Armenia, they are placed where the City of Calene was afterward built. Likewise in the famous description the maketh mention of Marjyas, a River which runneth through Part of Phrygia; and afterward joyneth it self with the River Mäander which is far from the Gordian Mountains in Armenia. We may also find a great milti-tude in Jofephus, (though out of Berosus, who is in effect the Father of this opinion) that Josephus lets Ararat between Armenia and Parthia, toward Adiabene, and affirmeth withal, that in the Province of Coron by others Karac, and Arnos, is called by reason that the Nar or from thence no defecent, nor ill-taste, the people vaunt that they had the best of water, re-ceiv'd from pieces of Naxos. But Parthia toucheth no where upon Armenia, for Armenia bordered Adiabene, the Province of Alyria: so that all Armenia was a part of Alyria is between Parthia and Armenia. Now whereas the discovery of the Mountains Gordius was first borrowed out of Berosus by Jofephus; yet the Text which Jofephus citeth out of Berosus, differs far from the words of that Berosus, which wandereth up and down in these days, fet out by Aquinas. For Berosus citeth by Jofephus hath these words: *Fertur et naviga-bujus pars in Armenia, apud montem Cordiarum super quos vice Amalei loci bujus homines sui Silem (which is) It is reported also that a part of his Ship yet remaining in Armenia upon the Cordian Mountains; and that divers do scape from it in Bitumen or Pitch, and carrying it with them, it is itself instead of an Amulet. But Ammii his Edition of the fragment of Berosus useful these words.
 Nave abat aquis in Gordia Montis vertice quovis, capi-aduc dicunt aliqui pars esse, et homines ex illa bitumen tollere quo maxime utuntur ad expiationem: For the whole Ark being lifted up by the Waters, refled on part of the Gordian Mountains, of which it is reported that some parts remain, and that men do carry of the Bitumen to purge by Sacrifice thereby. So as these two Texts (besides the difference of words, the name is diversly written). The Ancient Bero- writes Cordias with a c, as the Fragment Cordi- with a G: z which is the Bitumen is used a Prefervative against Poylon or Inchantment the other in Sacrifice; And if it be said that they agree in the general, yet it is reported by neither of them, of certain knowledge, nor from a approved Author: for one of them useth a and feritur [the other dicunt] the one that is is reported: the other, that it is said; and both by Hearsay, and therefore of no authority nor credit. For common bruit is so infamous an Histori-as wise men neither report after it, nor give credto any thing they receive from it.*

Furthermore, these Mountains which Armeny calls Gordisei, are not those Mountains which he himself giveth to Armenia, but he calleth Mountains of Armenia Moscovici. These be his o words : Montes Armenia nominantur ii, qui Mosce appellantur, qui protendantur usq ad superjacentem par

Parti

Pontus Cappadocum; & mons qui Paryardes dicitur: The Mountains of Armenia are they which are called Mofchici, which stretch along to the higher part of Pontus of the Cappadocians: also the hill which is called Paryardes; which Mountains Pliny calleth Paryardes; and both which lie to the North of Gordias or Baris, in 43. and 44. and a half; and the Gordian Mountains in 39. and a half: from the Northernmost of which did the Georgians take their names, who were first Gordians and then Georgians, who amidst all the strength of the greatest Infidels of Persia and Turkey, do still remain Christians. Concerning the other suppositions, that the Mountains of Gordias, otherwith Baris Kardu or Labar, (which Pliny calleth Tyrgidian) are the highest of the World, the same is absolutely false.

† XI.

Of Caucasus, and divers far higher hills than the Armenian.

For the best Cosmographers with others, that have seen the Mountains of Armenia, find them far inferior, and under-let to divers other Mountains even in that part of the World, and elsewhere: as the Mountain Aibor between Macedonia and Thracia, which Pliny calls Olympus, now called Lucas, (saith Casalsus) is far surpassing any Mountain that ever hath been seen in Armenia: for it calleth shade three hundred Furlongs; which is seven and thirty Miles and upwards: of which Plutarch. Athos admirat laeva Lemnia bovis, Athos shadoweth the Cow of Lemnos. Also the Mount of Olympus in Thessalia, is said to be of that height, as neither the Winds, Clouds, or rain overtop it. Again, the Mountain of Amandus in Mysia, not far from Ida, whence the River Scamandrus floweth, which runneth through Troy, is also of a far more admiration than any in Armenia, and may be seen from Constantinople. There are also in Mauritania near the Sea, the famous Mountains of Atlas, of which Herodotus. Extat in hoc mari Mons, cui nomen Atlas, ita sublimis effunditur, ut ad illius verticem oculi mortalium pervenire non possint: Upon this Coast there is a Mountain called Atlas, whose height is said to be such as the eye of no mortal man can discern the top thereof. And if we may believe Aristotle, then are all these inferior to Caucasus, which he maketh the most notorious both for breadth and height. Caucasus Mons omnium maximus, qui sitivum ad erum sunt, acmine atque latitudine, cuius iuga a Sole radiantur usque ad continem ab ortu: & sternum ab occasu. Caucasus (saith Aristotle) is the greatest Mountain both for breadth and height of all those in the North-east, whose tops are lighted by the Sun-beams, usque ad continem (which is, saith Macrobius) between the first crowing after Midnight and the break of Day: Others affirm that the top of this Mountain holds the Sun-beams when it is dark in the Valley; but I cannot believe either: for the highest Mountain of the World known, is that of Teneriff in the Canaria: which although it hath nothing to the Westward of it for 1000. Leagues together but the Ocean Sea, yet doth it not enjoy the Suns company at any such late hours. Besides, these Mountains which Aristotle calleth Caucasus, are those which separate Colchis from Iberia; though (indeed) Caucasus doth divide both Colchis, Iberia, and Libania, from Sarmatia: for he acknowledgeth that the River of Phasis riseth in the same Mountain, which himself calleth Caucasus, and that Phasis springeth from those hills which funder Colchis from Iberia, falling afterward into Euxinus: which River (it is manifest) yieldeth it self to the Sea two Degrees to the North of Trapezus (now Trapezunda) howsoever Mercator bring it from Paryardes.

† XII.

Of divers incongruities, if in this Story we should take Ararat for Armenia.

So as it doth first appear, that there is no certainty what Mountain Ararat was: for the books of the Sibyls set it in Phrygia; and Baris in Armenia: and as for Berosus's authority, those men have great want of proofs that borrow from thence.

Secondly, that Baris was the highest hill, and therefore most likely that the Ark grounded thereon, the assertion and supposition have equal credit: for there are many hills which exceed all those of Armenia; and if they did not, yet it doth not follow (as is before written) that the Ark should sit on the highest.

Thirdly, it cannot be proved that there is any such Hill in Armenia, or in verum natura, as Baris: for Baris (saith Hierome) signifieth high Towers: and so may all high hills be called indifferently; and therefore we may better give the name of Baris to the hills of Caucasus (out of which Indus riseth) than to any hills of Armenia. For those of Caucasus in the East, are undoubtedly the highest of Asia.

Fourthly, the Authors themselves do not agree in what Region the Mountains Gordias stand: for Pliny distinguisheth the Mountains of Armenia from the Gordian, and calleth those of Armenia Mofchici and Paryardes, as afore said. Now Paryardes is seated near the middle of Armenia, out of which on the West-side riseth Euphrates, and out of the East-side Araxes: and the Mountains Mofchici are those hills which disjoin Colchis, Iberia, and Libania (now the Country of the Georgians) from Armenia.

† XIII.

Of the contrary situation of Armenia to the place noted in the Text: and that it is no marvel that the same ledge of hills running from Armenia to India, should keep the same name all along: and even in India be called Ararat.

Lastly, we must blow up this Mountain Ararat: it self, or else we must dig it down, and carry it out of Armenia; or find it elsewhere, and in a warmer Country, and (with all) set it East from Shinar: or else we shall wound the truth it self with the weapons of our own vain imaginations.

Therefore to make the mistaking open to every eye, we must understand that Ararat (named by Moses) is not any one Hill, lo called, no more than any one Hill among those Mountains which divide Italy from France, is called the Alps: or any one among those which part France from Spain is the Pyrenian; but as these being continuations of the Pyrenian; as in divers Countries: so many Hills keep one name in divers Countries: for all that long ledge of Mountains, which Pliny calleth by one name Taurus, and Pliny both Taurus, Niphates, Caucasus, Coronus, Saripsis, until they encounter and cross the Mountains of the great Immau, are of one general name, and are called the Mountains.

Pliny it is his definition of Lycia, l. 5. c. 27.

Mountains of Ararat or Armenia, because from thence or thereabouts they seem to arise. So all these Mountains of Hyrcania, Armenia, Coronus, Capis, Mofchici, Amasani, Hemochi, Scythici, (thus diversly called by Pliny and others) Pliny calleth by one name Caucasus, lying between the Seas Caspian and Euxinus: as all those Mountains which cut afunder Armenia, even from the new Kingdom of Graxado, to the Stright of Magellan, are by one name called Andes. And as these Mountains of Ararat run East and West: so do those marvellous Mountains of Immau stretch themselves North and South: and being of like extent, well near, are called by the name of Immau, and Moses Pliny calleth these former Hills Taurus, and Moses the Hills of Ararat. The reason of several names given by Pliny was thereby the better to distinguish the great Regions and Kingdoms, which these great Mountains bound and disfigure; as Armenia, Melopotamia, Assyria, Media, Susiana, Persia, Parthia, Carmania, Aria, Bactriana, Bactria, Sogdiana, and Paropamisus: having all these Kingdoms either on the North or South-side of them. For all the Mountains of Asia (both the less and the greater) have three general names, (to wit) Taurus, Immau, and Caucasus; and they receive other Titles, as they sever and divide particular Places and Regions. For these Mountains which funder Cilicia from the rest of Asia the less on the North-side, are called Taurus; and those Mountains which part it from Carmania (a Province of Syria) are called Amanus: the Mountains called Taurus running East and West, as Immau doth North and South. Through Tauru to the River of Euphrates forceth her passage, leaving the name of Amanus to the Mountains on her West-bank; and on her East-side the Mountains are sometimes known by the name of Taurus, (as in Pliny's three Tables of Asia) and sometimes Niphates: (as in the fourth) retaining that uncertain appellation so long as they bound Armenia from Melopotamia: and after the River of Tigris cutteth them afunder, they then take the name of Niphates altogether, until they separate Assyria and Media; but then they call themselves Costrus, though between the upper and nether Media, they do not appear, but altogether discontinue. For at Mazada in Media, they are not found, but run through the Eastern Media by pieces: in the middle of which Region they call themselves Orontes, and towards the East-part Coronus; out of the Southern-part whereof the River of Bagyrus riseth, which divideth the ancient Persia from Carmania; and then continuing their course Eastward by the name of Coronus, they give to the Persians and Hyrcanians their proper Countries. This done, they change themselves into the Mountains of Saripsis, out of which riseth the River Margus, afterward yielding her self to Oxus: (now Asia) and drawing now near their ways end, they first make themselves the South border of Bactria, and are then honoured with the Title of Paropamisus, and lastly of Caucasus, even where the famous River of Indus with his principal Companions Hydaspes and Zerandrus spring forth, and take beginning. And here do these Mountains build themselves exceeding high, to equal the strong Hills called Immau, of Scythia, which encounter each other in 35, 36, and 37 Degrees of Latitude, and in 140 of Longitude, of the which the West-parts are now called Delamager, and the rest Nigracus; and these Mountains in this place only are properly called Caucasus (saith Pliny) that is, between Paropamisus and Immau: and improperly, between the two Seas of Caspian and Persia.

† XIV.

Of the best Vine naturally growing on the South-side of the Mountains Caucasus, and toward the East Indies: and of other excellencies of the Soil.

NOW in this part of the World it is, where the Mountain and River Janus, and the Mountain Nyseus (so called of Bacchus Nyseus or Nax) are found: and on these highest Mountains of that part of the World did Coropis Becanus conceive that the Ark of Noah grounded after the Flood: of all his conjectures the most probable, and by best reason approved. In his Indoprobica he hath many good Arguments, though mixt with other fantastical Opinions of this subject. And as the same Becanus also noteth; that as in this part of the World are found the best Vines: so it is as true, that in the same Line, and in 34, 35, and 36 Degrees of Septentrional Latitude are the most delicate Wines of the World, namely, in Judea, Candia, and other parts of Greece: and likewise in this Region of Margiana, and under these Mountains; Strabo affirmeth that the most excellent Vines of the World are found; the clusters of Grapes containing two Cubits of length: and it is the more probable, because this place agreeth in Climate with that part of Palestine, where the Searchers of the Land by Moses direction found Bunches of equal bigness at Eshcol.

Nam. 13. 24

The fruitfulness of this place (to wit) on the South bottom of these Hills, Currius witteetheth. For in Margiana, near the Mountain of Meros, did Alexander feast himself and his Army ten days together, finding therein the most delicate Wine of all other.

† XV.

The Conclusion, with a brief repeating of divers chief Points.

AND therefore to conclude this Opinion of Ararat, it is true, that those Mountains do also traverse Armenia: yea, and Armenia it self sometime is known by the name of Ararat. But as Pliny giveth to this Ledge of high Hills, even from Cilicia to Paropamisus and Caucasus, the name of Taurus: and as the Hills of France and Germany are called the Alps: and all between France and Spain the Pyrenies: and in America the continuation of Hills for 3000 Miles together, the Andes: so was Ararat the general name which Moses gave them; the diversity of Appellations no otherwise growing, than by their dividing and bordering divers Regions and divers Countries. For in the like case do we call the Sea, which entrench by Gibraltar, the Mediterranean and inland Sea; and yet where it waltheth the Coasts of Caribage, and over again it is called Tyrrhenum: between Italy and Greece, Ionian: from Venice to Durazzo Adriaticum: between Athens and Asia Aegaeum: between Sefus and Abydos Hellespont: and afterward Pontus, Propontis, and Bosporus. And as in these, so is the Ocean to the North-east part of Scotland called Ducale-domyum: and on this side, the Brittan Sea: to the East, the Germane and Ballick, and then the Frozen.

For a final end of this Question we must appeal to that Judge which cannot err, even to the word of Truth, which in this place is to be taken and followed according to the plain sense: seeing it can admit neither distinction, nor other construction than the words bear literally, because they are used to the very same plain purpose of a description, and the making of a true and precise difference of places. Surely where the sense is plain, (and being so understood, it bringeth with it no subsequent inconvenience or contrariety) we ought to be wary, how we fancy to our selves any new or strange expolition; and (withal) to resolve our selves, that every word (as aforesaid) hath his weight in Gods Book. And therefore we must respect and reverence the Testimonies of the Scriptures throughout, in such sort as S. Augustine hath taught us touching the Gospel of Christ Jesus (which is) Neque aliter accipias, quod (narrantibus discipulis Christi) in Evangelio legitur, quam si ipsam manum Dei, quam in proprio corpore gestabat, conspexeris. That no Man otherwise take or understand that which he readeth in the Gospel, (the Disciples of Christ having written it) than if he had seen the very Hand of the Lord, which he bare in his own Body, setting it down.

Gen. 2. 11. The words then of Moses which end this dispute are these: And as they went from the East they found a plain in the land of Shinar, and there they abode,

Gen. 2. 12. which proveth without controversy, that Nimrod and all with him came from the East into Shinar; and therefore the Ark of Noah rested and took Land to the Eastward thereof. For we must remember, that in all places whereof Moses maketh a difference of Countries, he always precisely nameth toward what Quarters of the World the same were seated: as where he teacheth the Plantation of Josiah, he nameth Sephar, a Mount in the East: where he remembreth Cain's departure from the presence of God, he addeth: And

Gen. 4. 16. Cain dwelt in the land of Nod towards the East-side of Eden: And when he describeth the Tents and Habitations of Abraham after he departed from

Gen. 12. 8. Sechem, he useth these words: Afterwards removing thence into a mountain Eastward from Bethel, he pitched his Tents: having Bethel on the West-side, and Hai on the East: and afterward in the ninth Verse of the same Chapter it is written:

Ex. 38. 5. And Abraham went forth journeying towards the South: also when Ezekiel prophesied of Gog and Magog, he sheweth that these Nations of Togarma were of the North Quarters: and of the Queen of Saba it is written, That she came from the South to visit

Math. 2. 42. Salomon: And the Magi (or wise men) came out of the East to offer presents unto Christ. And that all Regions, and these travels were precisely set down upon the points of the Compas and Quarters of the World, it is most manifest: for Eden was due East from Judea, Saba South from Jerusalem; and the way from Bethel to Egypt directly South; and the Caldeyrians, the Tubians and Magezians inhabited the Regions directly North from Palastina: and so of the rest.

But Armenia answereth not to this description of Shinar by Moses. For to come out of Armenia, and to arrive in that Valley of Babylonia, is not a journeying from the East, nor so near unto the East as the North: for Armenia is to the West of the North it self; and we must not say of Moses (whose Hands the Holy Ghost directed) that he erred into caelo, and that he knew not East from West. For the Body of Armenia standeth in forty three Degrees Septentrional, and the North-part thereof in forty five; and those Gordian Mountains, whereon it was supposed that the Ark rested, stand in forty one. But Babylonia, and the Valley of Shinar are situated in thirty five, and for the Longitude (which maketh the difference between East and West) the Gordian Mountains stand in 75 Degrees, and the Valley of Shinar in 79 and 80. And therefore Armenia lieth from Shinar North-west, ninety five Degrees from the East; and if Armenia had been but North, yet it had differed from the East one whole quarter of the Compas. But Gregory and Hieronymus warn us, In scripturis ne minima differentia amittenda sit: nam singuli sermones, syllaba, apostrophus & puncta in divina Scriptura plena sunt sensibus. In the Scriptures the least difference may not be omitted: for every Speech, Syllable, Note, or Accent, and Point in Divine Scriptures are replenished with their meanings. And therefore seeing Moses teacheth us that the Children of Noah came from the East, we may not believe Writers (of little Authority) who also speak by hearsay and by report, Ut fertur, & no dicunt, as Berosus and Nicolaus Damascenus, determining herein without any examination of the Text, at all adventure. But this is infallibly true, that Shinar lieth West from the place where the Ark of Noah rested after the Flood; and therefore it first found Ground in the East, from whence came the first knowledge of all things. The East parts were first Civil, which had Noah himself for an Instructor: and directly East from Shinar in the same Degree of 35 are the greatest Grapes and the best Wine. The great Armies also, which overtopped in number those Millions of Semiramis, prove that those parts were first planted: And whereas the other Opinion hath neither Scripture nor Reason sufficient: for my self, I build on his words who in plain terms hath told us, that the Sons of Noah came out of the East into Shinar, and there they abode. And therefore did the Ark rest on those Eastern Mountains, called by one general name Taurus, and by Moses the Mountains of Ararat, and not on those Mountains of the North-west, as Berosus first feigned, whom most part of the Writers have followed therein. It was, I say, in the plentiful warm East where Noah rested, where he planted the Vine, where he tilled the Ground, and lived thereon. Placuit vero Noacho agricultura studium, in qua tractanda ipse omnium peritissimus esse dicitur: ob eamque rem sua ipsius lingua (Id est Adamath) (hoc est) telluris vir appellatur celebratusque est. The Study of Husbandry pleased Noah (saith the excellent learned Man Arian Montanus) in the knowledge and order of which it is said, that Noah excelled all Men: and therefore was he called in his own Language, a Man exercised in the Earth. Which also sheweth that he was no wanderer: and that he troubled not himself with the contentions, beginning again in the World, and among Men, but staid in his destined places, and in that part of the World, where he was first delivered out of the Prison of the Ark, whereto God had committed him to preserve him and Mankind.

C H A P. VIII.

Of the first Planting of Nations after the Flood; and of the Sons of Noah, Shem, Ham, and Japhet, by whom the Earth was re-peopled.

§. I.

Whether Shem and Ham were elder than Japhet.

OF these Sons of Noah, which was the eldest, there is a Question made. S. Augustine esteemed Shem for the eldest, Ham for the second, and Japhet for the youngest: and herein the Opinions of Writers are divers. But this we find every where in the Scriptures, and especially in Moses, that there was never any respect given to the eldest in Years, but in Vertue, as by the examples of Henech, Abraham, Jacob, and David, is made manifest. In a few words, this is the ground of the Controversie: The Latin Translation, and so the Geneva, hath converted this Scripture of Genesis the 10. v. 21. in these words: Unto Shem also the Father of all the Sons of Heber, and elder Brother of Japhet, were children born. But Junius agreeing with the Septuagint, placeth the same words in this manner: To Shem also the Father of all the Sons of Heber, and Brother of Japhet, the eldest Son were children born. So the transposition of the word [elder] made this difference. For if the word [elder] had followed after Japhet, as it is in the vulgar translation placed before it, then had it been as plain for Japhet, as it is by these Translations for Shem. Now (the matter being otherwise indifferent) seeing Gods Blessings are not tied to first and last in Blood, but to the eldest in Piety, yet the Arguments are stronger for Japhet than for Shem. And where the Scriptures are plainly understood without any danger or inconvenience, it seemeth strange why any Man of Judgment should make valuation of conjectural Arguments, or Mens Opinions. For it appeareth that Noah in the five hundredth Year of his Life, begat the first of his three Sons, Shem, Ham, and Japhet: and in the six hundredth Year (to wit) the hundredth Year following, came the general Flood; two Years after which Shem begat Arphaxad, which was in the Year 602. of Noah's Life, and in the Year of Shem's Life one hundred: so as Shem was but 100 Years old, two Years after the Flood: and Noah begat his first-born being 500 Years old; and therefore, were Shem the elder, he had then been a hundred Years old at the Flood, and in the six hundredth Year of Noah's Life, and not two Years after. Which seeing the Scripture before remembered hath denied him, and that it is also written: Then Noah awoke from his wine, and knew what his younger son had done unto him (to wit) Ham; of necessity the first place doth belong to Japhet. This younger son so converted by the vulgar and Geneva, Junius turns it Filius minimus, his youngest Son; but S. Chrysostom takes it otherwise, and finds Cham to be the middle or second Brother, and Japhet the youngest Son of all: which Cham for his disobedience and the contempt of his Father, (whose nakedness he derided) was disinherited, and lost the preeminency of his Birth, as Esaie and Reuben did. Perrinus conceiveth that Ham was called the younger in respect of Shem the eldest; but avoweth withal, that the Hebrew hath not that precise difference of younger and youngest, because it wanteth the comparative Degree. It is true that Shem himself was always named in the first place; yet whereas in the first Verse of the tenth Chapter of Genesis, Shem is accounted before Japhet: in the second Verse Moses leaveth to begin with the Issue by Shem, and reciteth the Children of Japhet first. So the first place was given to Shem for his Election and Benediction, and for this weighty respect, that the Hebrew Nation, Abraham, the Prophets, David, and Christ our Saviour were descended of him. And therefore, whether we shall follow the Vulgar, Paginus, and the Geneva, who agree in this Conversion, Shem frater Japhet major; or with the Septuagint, Junius, and Tremellius, Shem frater Japhet major; or with Perrinus, Shem frater Japhet ille major: inferring that Shem was the great and famous Brother of Japhet, let the Reader judge. But for ought that I have seen to the contrary, it appeareth to me that Japhet was the eldest. For where Perrinus qualifieth the strength of the former Argument, that Shem's age at the time of the Flood did not agree with his elderhip (with a supposition that the Scriptures took no account of smaller numbers) I do not find in the Scriptures any such neglect at all: for it is written, that Shem was an hundred years old, and begat Arphaxad two years after the flood; and again in the 12th Verse, So Shela lived after he begat Ebor, four hundred and three years, &c. So as the number of two Years, of three Years, of five Years, and afterward of two Years were always precisely accounted.

§. II.

Of divers things that in all Reason are to be presumed, touching the first Planting of the World, as that all Histories must yield to Moses: that the World was not planted all at once, nor without great direction: and that the known great Lords of the first Ages were of the Issue of Ham.

BUT let us go unto the Worlds Plantation after the Flood, which being rightly understood, we shall find that many Nations have suppled or feigned themselves those Ancestors and Fathers, which never saw or approached the Bonds of their Countries, and of whom they are by no way or branch descended. For it is plain in the Scriptures how the Sons and Issues of Noah were distributed, and what Regions were first planted by them, from whence by degrees the rest of the World was also peopled. And if any Prophane Author may receive allowance herein, the same must be with this caution, That they take their beginning where the Scriptures are. For so far as the Story of Nations is therein handled, we must know that both the Truth and Antiquity of the Books of God find no Companions equal, either in Age or Authority. All Record, Memory, and Testimony of Antiquity whatsoever, which hath come to the knowledge of Men, the fame hath been borrowed thence, and therefore later than it, as all careful observers of time have noted: among which this writeth Ephraim in the Prose of his Chronology. Moses is found more ancient than all those whom the Grecians make most ancient, as Homer, Hesiod, and the Trojan War; and far before Hercules, Musaeus, Linus, Chiron, Orpheus, Callio, Pollux, Ascalaphus, Bacchus, Mercurius, and Apollo, the rest of the Gods of the Nations; their Ceremonies, or Holy Rites, or Prophecies; and before all the dead of Jupiter, whom the Greeks have seated in the top and highest Towers of their Divinity.

Cicero de nat. Dierum, l. 3.

For of the three Jupiters remembered by Cicero, the ancientest was the Son of Aether, whose three Sons begotten on Proserpina, were born at Athenis, of which Cecrops was the first King; and in the end of Cecrops time did Moses bring the Children of Israel out of Aegypt. Educius Moses populum Regis ex Aegyptio novissimo tempore Cecrops Atheniensis Regis; Moses brought the Children of Israel out of Aegypt, in the last days of Cecrops King of the Athenians, faith Strabo; and yet was not Cecrops the Founder of the City itself, but Theseus long after him. But because the truth hereof is diversely proved, and by many learned Authors, I will not cut afunder the purpose in hand by alleging many Authorities, in a needless question, but leave it to the proper place.

The Sons of Japhet were	{	Gomer.	{	The Sons of Gomer were	{	Ashkenaz. Ephath. Togorma.
				The Sons of	{	Elipha. Tarfhis. Kuim Dadanim.

First, we are to consider that the World after the Flood was not planted by Imagination, neither had the Children of Noah Wings, to fly from Shinar to the uttermost border of Europe, Africa, and Asia in haste, but that these Children were directed by a wise Father, who knew those parts of the World before the Flood, to which he disposed his Children after it, and sent them not as Discoverers, or at all adventure, but assigned and allotted to every Son and their Illes, their proper Parts. And not to hearken to fabulous Authors, who have no other end than to flatter Princes (as Virgil did Augustus in the fiction of Aeneas) or else to glorify their own Nations; Let us build herein upon the Scriptures themselves, and after them upon Reason and Nature. First, therefore we must call to mind and consider, what manner of Face the Earth every where had in the 130. Year after the great Inundation, and by comparing those fruitless Valleys with our own barren and cold ground, inform our selves thereby, what wonderful Defarts, what impassable fastnesses of Woods, Reeds, Bryars and rotten Grafs, what Lakes, and standing Pools, and what Marshes, Fens, and Bogs, all the Face of the Earth (excepting the Mountains) was pestered withal. For if in this our Climate (where the dead and destroying Winter depresseth all vegetative and growing Nature, for one half of the Year in effect) yet in twenty or thirty Years these our Grounds would all overgrow and be covered (according to the nature thereof) either with Woods or with other offensive Thickets and Buhments: much more did all sorts of Plants, Reeds, and Trees, prosper in the most fruitful Vallies, and in the Climate of a long and warm Summer, and having withal the start of 130. Years, to raise themselves without contrivance.

This being considered, it will appear, that all these People which came into Shinar, and over whom Nimrod either by order or strength took the Dominion, did after the confusion of languages, and at such time as they grew to be a mighty People disperse themselves into the Regions adjoining to the said Valley of Shinar, which contained the best part of Mesopotamia, Babylonia and Chaldea, and from the Borders thereof in time they were propagated: some of them towards the South, others towards the West and North. And although there were allotted to Shem many Regions, both East and West from Shinar, with the Dominion of Palestina, which the Canaanites first possessed; yet could he not enjoy the Lot of his inheritance on the fuddain, but by time and Degrees. For we find, that Abraham the true Inceffor of Shem dwelt in Chaldea at Ur; and from thence (called by God) hereafter at Charran in Mesopotamia: from whence after the Death of Thare he travelled to Sichem in Palestina; and yet there had passed between Shem and Abraham (reckoning neither of themselves) seven descents, before Abraham moved out of Chaldea: where, and in Babylonia, all those People by Nimrod commanded inhabited for many Years, and whence Nimrod went out into Assyria, and founded Nineveh. Indeed the great Masters of Nations, (as far as we can know) were, in that Age of the Illes of Ham; the blessing of God given by Noah to Shem and Japhet taking less effect, until divers Years were consumed; and until the time arrived, which by the wisdom of God was appointed. For of Chus, Mizraim, and Canaan came the People, and Princes, which held the great Kingdoms of Babylonia, Syria, and Aegypt for many descents together.

Of the Illes of the Gentiles in Japhet's portion: of Berofus his too speedy leaving Gomer the Son of Japhet in Italy; and another of Japhet's Sons Tubal in Spain: and of the Antiquity of longinque Navigation.

TO begin therefore (where Moses beginneth) with the Sons of Japheth, among whom the Illes of the Gentiles were divided: which division, as well to Japhet's Sons as to the rest which came into birth (as if the division were made at Phaet's birth) in the Year of the World 1357. or 1738. and (by that account) in the Year after the Flood one hundred and one, of which question elsewhere.

The habitations proper to the Sons of Japhet were the Illes of the Gentiles, which include all Europe with all the Illes adjoining, and compassing it about: Europe being also taken for an Island, both in respect that the Sea Hellespont and Aegeum, Bosphorus and Euxinus cut it off from the great Continent of Asia, as also because Europe it self is (in effect) surrounded with Water, having that it is fastened to Asia by the North; for it hath those Seas before named to the East, the Mediterran to the South and South-West, the Ocean to the West, and British, Germane and Baltick Sea, with that of Glaciale to the North North-East, and North-West. Besides, it hath about it all the Cyclades or Illes lying between Greece and the lesser Asia, and the Illes of Rhodes, Cyprus, Cret or Candia, Sicilia, Cerfeia, Sardinia, Malta, the Illes of Brittain and Zeland, with their young ones adjacent.

This

This partition and portion of Japhet, with the part which he held in Asia, and the North, which was also very great; and whereto that blessing of God by Noah. Dilecti Dei Japheth, Let God spread abroad (or increase the Posterity of) Japheth, and let him dwell in the Tentis of Shem. For though Japhet here useth the word [allicius] and not dilectus; and the Gentius persuade; yet the Septuagint have dilated or amplified; and such was the blessing given to our Fathers, which God promised to Abraham and his seed for ever. And the dwelling in the Tents or Tabernacles of Shem was a Blessing by God to the Posterity of Japheth: noting not only an enlargement of Territories; but that thereby they should be made participant of God's Church. But to come to Japhet's Sons, of whom Gomer is the eldest. This Gomer (if we may believe Berosus and Amnius, whose Authority the greatest number of all our late Writers have followed) did in the tenth Year of Nimrod's Reign depart from Babylonia, and planted Italy: which also Faustulus confirmeth in these words, Anno decimo Nimrod's, &c. In the tenth Year of Nimrod's Reign, Gomer called Gallus planted a Colony in that Land afterwards called Italy: and in the twelfth Year of the same Nimrod's reign Tubal planted himself in Asturia in Spain (now called Biscay) which was in the 140. and in the 142. Years after the Flood, according to Berosus. For before the confusion of Tongues the Children of Noah did not separate themselves, at least so many of them as came with Nimrod into Shinar. Let us therefore consider with Reason, what time the building such a City and Tower required, where there was no prepared matter, nor any ready means to perform such a work as Nimrod had erected (and as Faustulus himself out of his Author Berosus witnesseth, ad altitudinem & magnitudinem montium, to the height and magnitude of the Mountains. Sure that both this City and Tower were almost builded the Scriptures witness. But the Lord came down to see the City and Tower, which the Sons of Men builded. Let us then but allot a time sufficient for the making of Brick to such a work, of the greatest height (and therefore of circuit and foundation answerable) that ever was. For where the universal Flood covered the highest Mountains fifteen Cubits; Let us build us a City and a Tower (saith Nimrod) whose top may reach unto the Heaven: meaning, that they would raise their work above fifteen Cubits higher than the highest Mountain, otherwise they could not assure themselves from the fear of a second Inundation: a great part whereof was finished before it fell, and before they left the Work. They also began this building upon a ground, the most oppressed with waters of all the World: as by the great ruin which these waters forcibly overbearing and overflowing, made in the time of the succeeding Emperours, is made manifest, approved also by the Prophet Jeremy, speaking of Babylon in these Words: Thou that dwellest upon many waters. It cannot be doubted but that there needed a substantial Foundation, for so high a raised Building on a marshy Ground: and to which Glycas upon Gensis giveth forty Years. For it seemeth, that the Tower was near finished when God overthrew it: it being afterward written, So the Lord scattered them from thence upon all the Earth, and they left to build the City. Out of which place it may be gathered (because the Tower is not then named) that they very near had performed the Work of their supposed defence, which was the Tower: and that afterward they went on with the City adjoining, wherein they inhabited. It is also to be noted that till such time as this Confusion seized them (whereupon the Tower was thrown down) the Nations did not disperse themselves; for from thence the Lord scattered them upon all the Earth, (that was) when they perceived not one another's speech. Now to think that this work in the newness of the World (wanting all Instruments and Materials) could be performed in ten Years; and that Tubal and Gomer in the same Year could creep through 3000. Miles of Defart, with Women, Children, and Cattle: let those light believers, that neither they themselves to the Scripture, nor to Reason, approve it, for I do not. And if the Ark of Noah was 120. Years in building, or but near such a time, (and then) when the World had stood 1556. Years, it were more foolishest and maddest itself, to think that such a work as this could be performed in ten; when the Flood was from the Flood to the arrival at Babel, and beginning of this Building there; had but 131. Years; and whereof they had spent some part in travelling from the East. Again, if all Asia set to their helping Hands in the building of the Temple of Diana, and yet they consumed in that work 400. Years (or but half that time) and in such an Age as when the World flourished in all sorts of Artificers, and with abundant plenty of Materials and Carriages: This work of the Tower of Babel could hardly (with all the former wants supposed) be erected in those few Years remembered. And for conclusion, let all Men of judgement weigh with themselves how impossible it was for a Nation or Family of Men, with their Wives and Children, and Cattle, to travel 3000. Miles through Woods, Bogs, and Defarts, without any Guide or Conductor; and we shall find it rather a Work of 100. Years than of 100. Days. For in the West-Indies of which the Spaniards have the experience, in those places where they found neither Path nor Guide, they have not entered the Country ten Miles in ten Years. And if Nimrod's People spent many Years by the account before remembered in passing from the East-India or the higher part thereof, which standeth in 115. Degrees of Longitude, until they came into Shinar, which lyeth in 79. Degrees (the distance between those places containing 36. Degrees, which make 720. Leagues, which is 2160. Miles) and did all the way keep the Mountains and hard ground; then the difference between Babylon and Biscay is much more: for the Body of Biscay lyeth in ten Degrees, and Babylon or Shinar, (as aforesaid) in 79. to the length of way from Shinar to Assyria, or Biscay is 69. Degrees, which make 1380. Leagues, or of Miles 4140. And therefore if Nimrod took divers Years to find Shinar, which was but 2160. Miles: or (supposing that the Ark rested in Armenia) little above 400 Miles: there is no cause to the contrary, but to allow as many Years to Gomer and Tubal to travel 3000 Miles to Countries less known unto them by far; than the Land of Shinar was unto Nimrod. For Paradise was known to Noah before the Flood: and so was the Region of Eden by Moses afterward remembered; but what he understood of most part of the World else it is unknown. And therefore did Amnius ill advise himself to plant Gomer in Italy, and Tubal in Spain, in the tenth and twelfth of Nimrod's Reign: Shall the Earth be brought forth in one Day, or shall a Nation be born at once? But it may be objected, that the Sons of Japhet might come by Sea, and so save this great Travail through Defarts by Land. But we never read of any Navigation in those Days, nor long after. Surely he that knoweth what it is to imbarque to great a People as we may justly suppose those Conductors carried

Gen. 9. 27.

Fast. Crenel.

Gen. 11. 11.

the Idol of the Mermaid Atergatis, or Atergitis, according to Pliny, which the Greeks call Derecto.

If then we confer the words of Ezekiel in the third Verse of the thirty eighth Chapter, and behold he joyneth together Gog, Mefech, and Tubal: and withal remember that Herapulus was the City of Magog, which also is seated directly North from Tubal: with whom also Ezekiel completh Gomer, and all his Bands of the North Quarters; we may (as I conceive) safely conclude, that these followers and Vallads of Gog (which were Northern Nations in respect of Tubal) were not the Gomerians of France, nor the Tubalines of Spain, but a People of the latter Asia, and Cathysia: and therefore that the Opinions of Berosus, Josephus, and whoever else hath followed them therein are to be rejected. But if Josephus refer himself to later times, and think that some Colony of the Tubalines might from Iberia and Asia pass into Spain (to wit from that piece of Land between Colechia (or Mengyria) and Albania: (most part possessed by the Georgians) then is his Judgment of better allowance. For without any repugnancy of Opinions, it may be granted, that in process of time these People might from their first Habitation pass into the Countries near the Euxine Sea, and from thence in after Ages into Spain.

Josephus makes mention of the Iberi, saying, that they were anciently called Tubolus, as of Tubal; from whence (saith Iustine) they passed into Spain to search out the Mines of that Region: having belike understood that it was a Southerly Country and mountainous. For it seemeth that the Tubalines called Chalybes lived altogether by the exchange of Iron, and other Metals, as Apollonius witnesseth in these following Verses, telling how the Argonauts did visit them.

*Hæc gens tellurem rigido non vertit aratro,
Sed ferræ venas scindit sub montibus ævis:
Merchibus hæc vivunt, quæ vitæ alimenta ministrant.*

The Chalybes plough not their barren Soil,
But undermine high Hills for Iron Veins:
Changing the purchase of their endless toil
For Merchandise, which their poor Lives sustains.

But it is more probable, that Spain was first Peopled by the Africans, who had ever since an affection to return thither, and to repopulate it anew. This appeared by the Carthaginians of old, who were easily drawn to pass over the Straights into that Country; and after by the Moors who held Granada, and the South parts eight hundred Years, till the time of Ferdinand and Isabel. And either of these Opinions are more probable, than that in the twelfth Year of Nimrod's Reign, Tubal pass into Spain, and therein built S. Vadal: a poor Town, and poor Device, God knows. Certain it is that we must find Mefech or Mefech, and Tubal Neighbours, and Gomer and Togorma not far off, or else we shall wrong Ezekiel: for he called Gog the Leader or Prince of Mefech and Tubal, and maketh Gomer and Togorma their Affiliants. And that Mefech inhabited Asia, Famulus (though he followed Berosus) confesseth, for these be his words. Mefacus, qui à Mese Mefech, præfatus Mefech ad Audula monte usque ad Ponticam regionem posuit: hæc regio postea Cappadocia dicta est, in qua vult Mazaca, &c. hæc est terra Magog principalis: Mefacus, whom Moses calleth Mefech, placed the ancient Medians from the Mount Audulas, unto the Coast of Pontus. This Region was afterward called Cappadocia, in which is the Town Mazaca, &c. this is the principal Country of Magog. Add this doth Amnius also avow, and yet forgets that Gog was Prince both of Mefech and Tubal: and therefore, that the one was a Nation of Spaniards, the other of Cappadocians, is very ridiculous; Spain lying directly West, and North from Tubal. Also Ezekiel in the 27 Chapter, where he prophesieth of the destruction of Tyre, nameth Mefech and Tubal jointly. And for a final Proof, that these Nations were of a Northern Neighbour Land (how far soever stretched) Ezekiel in the 38 Chapter makes them all Horsemen. Thou, and much People with thee, all shall ride upon Horses, even a great multitude and a mighty. Then if any Man believe that these Troops came out of Spain over the Pyrenes, and first passed over a part of France, Italy, Hungary, and Sarmatia, and embarked again about the Hellespont, or else compassed all Pontus Euxinus, to come into the lesser Asia, which is half the length or compass of the then known World, he may be called a strong Believer, but he shall never be justified thereby. But on the contrary it is known, that Selenicus was a Province neighbouring Paphlagonia or Tudaea, and that Herapulus (or Magog) joyned unto it: whose Princes commanded all Syria, and Asia the less, (namely the Selenicus), and held it, till Scipio Asiaticus overthrew Antiochus the great: after which they yet possessed Syria till the time of Antiochus: and whether Helech be in Cappadocia, or under Iberia, yet is it of the Tubalines, and one and the same Dominion.

Of Gomer the like may be said. First he feared himself with Togorma, not far from Magog and Tubal, in the Borders of Syria and Cilicia. Afterward he proceeded further into Asia the less; and in long track of time his valiant issue filled all Germany, reigned long in France and Britain, and possessed the utmost Borders of the Earth, accomplishing (as Amelambus well notes) the signification of their Parents Name, which is Utmost Bordering. But when these Borderers wanted further place, whereinto they might congregate their swelling Multitudes, that were bounded in by the great Ocean, then did they return upon the Nations, occupying the Countries, through which they had formerly passed, oppressing first their Neighbours, afterwards the People more remote. Hereupon it was (as the worthy Restorer of our Antiquities, Mr. William Camden hath noted) that they were called Cimbri, which in their old Language doth signify Robbers; Necessity forcing them to spoil their Neighbours, to whom in their Original they were as near joyned, as afterwards in the Seas which they possessed. For that the warlike Nations of Germany were in elder Ages accustomed to be beaten by the Gauls, the Authority of Cæsar affirming it, is proof sufficient. But in times following they purified richer Conquests, and more ease though further distant, by which (to omit their other Enterprises not here to be spoken of) they were drawn at length into Asia the less, and occupied those Parts, which had formerly been held by their Progenitors. I say not that they claimed those Lands as theirs by Descent; for likely it is, that they knew little of their own Pedigree. Neither can any Man therefore deny, that they were of old seated in Asia, because in later Ages they returned thither; unless he will think, that all those Nations which from far Parts have invaded and conquered the Land of Shinar, may by that Argument be proved not to have issued from thence at the first.

Now concerning Samoth (for his excellent Wisdom firmaned Di) whom Amnius makes the Brother of Gomer and Tubal (which Brother Moses never heard of, who spake his knowledge of Japhet's Sons) they must find him in some old Poet: for Famulus a great Berosian confesseth: Quis hic Samothis fuerit incertum est: Vbi hic Samothis was is is uncertain; neither is their any proof that he was that same Di, whom Cæsar saith the Gauls suppose to be their Ancestor; yea and Vigier confesseth with Famulus: Mai on ne sçait qui il étoit: No Man knows who he was.

§. V.

Against the fabulous Fictions his Fiction. That the Italian Janus was Noah.

BUT before I go on with Noah his Sons, I think it necessary to disprove the Fiction which Amnius hath of Noah himself: an invention (indeed) very ridiculous, though warranted (as he hath wrested) by those Authors of whom himself hath commented: as the fragment of Berosus, Fabius Pictor, Cato, Lavinus and others. For Amnius seeks to persuade us, that Noah (firmaned Janus) was the same which founded Genoa, with other Cities in Italy, wherein he lived 92 Years. This to disprove, by Moses's silence, is a sufficient Argument to me, if there were nothing else to disprove. For if he vouchsafed to remember the building of Babel, Erec, Achad, Chalce and Nimrod by Nimrod, Noah was a Man of too great mark to be forgotten, with all the acts he did in 92 Years. But it were a needless labour for me to disprove the Authority of that Berosus, on whom Amnius ground, seeing so many learned Men have so demonstratively proved that fragment to be counterfeit. Besides that, Tatianus the Affrian in his Oration against the Greeks avoweth, that the ancient and true Berosus wrote only three Books, dedicated to Antiochus the successor of Selenicus Nicanor: But Amnius hath devised five Books, wherewith he honoureth Berosus. And whereas Berosus handled only the estate of the Chaldeans and Affrians, Amnius hath filled this fragment with the business of all the World. And if we may believe Eusebius better than Amnius, then all the Kings of the Latins (before Æneas) continued but 150 Years: whereas no Man hath doubted, but that from Noah to Æneas's arrival into Italy there pass 1226 (after the least rate of the Hebrew account) and (after Columas) 1291.

For Janus (who was the first of their Kings) lived at once with Ruth, who married Boaz, in the World Year (as some reckon) 2717, after the Flood 1064, and Noah died 350 Years after the Flood: and so there pass between Janus of Italy and Noah firmaned Janus 704 Years. For Satanus succeeded Janus, Pleus after Satanus, Famulus after Pleus, and Latinius followed Famulus: which Latinius lived at once with Tatianus the 27th King of Affrica: with Palagius of Peloponnesus: with Demophon of Athenz; and Sampson Judge of Israel. Now all these five Kings of the Latins having consumed but one hundred and fifty Years; and the last of them in the time of Sampson: then reckoning upwards for one hundred and fifty Year, and it reacheth Ruth, with whom Janus lived.

True it is, that the Greeks had their Janus; but this was not Noah: so had they Ion the Son of Xuthus, the Son of Dencalion, from whom they draw the Iones, who were indeed the Children of Janus, the fourth Son of Japhet. For the vulgar Translation (where the Hebrew word is Janan) writes Greece, and the Sepmagine Hellas; which is the same. So had they Medus the Son of Madet, whom they make the Parent of the Meds, though they were defended of a far more ancient Father (to wit) Madai the third Son of Japhet.

Lastly we see by a true experience, that the British Language hath remained among us above 2000 Years, and the English Speech ever since the Invasion of the Angles: and the same continuance have all Nations observed among themselves, though with some corruption and alteration. Therefore, it is strange if either Noah (by them called Janus) had left in Italy his Grand-child Gomer after him, or Tubal in Spain, that no plain resemblance of the Hebrew, Syrian, or Syrian (which no time could have quite extinguished) should have been found in the Languages of those Countries. For which reasons we doubt not but these personal Plantations of Janus, Gomer, Tubal, &c. in Italy, Spain, or France, are merely fabulous. Let the Italians therefore content themselves with the same Greecian Janus, which commanded them and planted them, and who preceded the Fall of Troy but 150 Years, (saith Eusebius) which was in the time of Latinius the fifth King: which also S. Augustine and Justine confirm: and this agreeth with Reason, Time, and Possibility. And if this be not sufficient to disprove this vanity, I may out of themselves add thus much: That whereas some of them make Vesta (others Camelena) the Wife of this Janus, who instituted the holy Fire of the Vestal Virgins in Rome (the Latins and Romans taking from Janus all their idolatrous and heathenish Ceremonies) there is no Man so impious, as to believe that Noah himself, (who is said by Moses to have walked with God, to be a just Man, and whom God of all Mankind made choice of) could be either ignorant of the True and only God, or so wicked and ungrateful, to set up or devise any Heathen Salvage, or Idolatrous Adoration, or have instituted any Ceremony, contrary to that which he knew best pleasing to God himself.

§. VI.

That Gomer also and his Son Togorma of the Posterity of Japhet were first seated about Asia the less: and that from thence they spread Westward into Europe: and Northward into Sarmatia.

TO turn now to the Sons of Noah, and the Nations Plantation after the Flood: therein I observe, that as both reason and necessity taught them; so, when they multiplied to great numbers, and dispersed themselves into the near Countries bordering to their first habitations, and from thence sent forth Colonies elsewhere, it was in such a manner as that they might repair to each other, and keep intelligence by River: because the Land was yet desart and overgrown with Woods, Reeds, Bogs, and rotten Marishes. As when Nimrod seated in Babylonia, Chus took the South-part of Chaldea, down the River of Gehon, by which he might pass to and fro from Babylon to his own Plantation: those also, which were of the race of Shem, inhabiting at Ur or Orchoa near the Lakes of Chaldea, might by the same River get up to Babylon, and receive succour from thence. All which Tract of Land upon Gehon Southward, Moses in the description of Paradise calleth the Land of Cush: because the Dominion and Empire was then in the hands of Nimrod a Cushite, by whom the Children of Shem (which came into that Valley and staid not in the East) were for a while oppressed, till God afterward by the Seed of Abraham made them his own Nation victorious. Havilah, the Brother of Nimrod, and Son of Cush, took both Banks of Tygris, especially on the East-side of the River: by which River his People might also pass to and fro to Babel.

The Imperial Seat of which Region of Havilah or Sufian, was anciently called Chusian, or Chusian, afterward Sufa. Cush himself took the Banks of Gihon, and planted those Countries Westward, and South-west towards Arabia the Stony, and the Defart, where Plutony placeth the City of Chus, first Chus.

Seba, and Sheba with the rest that planted Arabia Felix, had Tygris to convey them into the Persian Gulf, which walleth the Banks of Arabia Felix on the East-side: so as those Sons of Cush might take Land down the River as they pleased. Also the City of Nimrod was by Nimrod founded on the City of Nimrod: and from thence a Colony past to Chus, standing also upon a Navigable branch of Chus. In like manner did Yaphet's Sons settle themselves together, and took their Seats in Asia the less from whence they might indifferently stretch themselves Northward, and Westward, into the next parts of Europe, called the Isles of the Gentiles. And it seemeth very agreeable to reason, that both Gomer, Magog, and Tubal, late down first of all in that part of Syria, to the North of Palestina and Phoenicia: and from thence Gomer or his Children past on into Asia the less, as those of Magog and Tubal did; from whence the Tubalians spread themselves into Iberia: and the Magogians more Northerly into Sarmatia. The first Gomerians, and first Planters in Asia the less, held the Country of the Cymmerians (witness Heraclitus) the same Region which was afterward by the Gallo-greek called Galatia, to whom S. Paul wrote his Epistle, fo intituled. This Nation of the Cymmerians (whom the invincible Scythians afterwards dispersed, and forced from their first Plantations) gave names to divers places; as to the Mountains above Albania (called Cymmerini) and to the City of Cymmeris in Phrygia: also Bosphorus Cymmerius took Appellation from this Nation, in the outlet whereof was also a City of that name called Cymmerian: which Pliny saith (mistaking the place) had sometime the name of Carthagen; but Carthagen was a Town in Campania, so called of the unhealthy Waters, favouring of Brimstone: which Augustus caused to be cleansed by letting in the Water of the Lake Lavicus.

The Children of Tubal ranged as far as Iberia, to whom the Melchians were Neighbours, who then wrote Melch. The Prophet Ezekiel (coupling them together) calleth Gog the Prince of Melch and Tubal. For these Melch (which Pliny calleth Melch) inhabit Syria a Province of Armenia, directly South from the Mountains Melch, in the Valley between the Mountains Melch, and the Mountains Pariares: out of whose North-part springeth the River Phasis; from the East-part Araxes; and from the West Eufrates: the cities of this Melch are defended also the Melcovians (saith Melanchthon) and it may be, that in process of time some of them inhabited those Regions also: For Melch (saith Melanchthon) signifieth extends, enlarging or stretching forth. Togorma also at first did inhabit amongst his Parents and Kindred. The Togormians were also called Giblis, a People neighbouring the Sydianians in Gabala, a Tetrarchia of Phoenicia, the same which Pliny calleth Gaben: from whence Salomon had his most excellent Mafons, which hewed Stones for the Temple of Jerusalem. Thence the Togormians stretched into the less Armenia, whose Kings were hence called Togormans, and their Cities Togormaria: of which Cities Togorma subdued by Lucullus the Roman, built one. Hyperboreanians hath planted the Togormians in Barbary: forgetting the Prophecy of Ezekiel against the Tyrrians. They of the house of Togorma, brought to thy fairs horses, and borismen, and mules, which could not well be driven over the whole length of the Mediterranean Sea, but from the neighbour Countries by Land. But Togorma takes them for the Parents of the Phrygians; which I do not deny, but they might be in the ensuing Ages: and so might the Tubalians be of the Spaniards; but was from Iberia, and many hundred Years after the twelfth of Nimrod's Reign. The Yems conceive that the Turks came of those Togormians, because their Emperour is called Togor. The Chaldeans make them the Fathers of the Germani. But Laetius affirms, that the Turks descended of the Grim Tartar, which borders Moscovia. But for these subtilties it were infinite to examine them. One of the first and second Plantations, and of the first Nations after the Flood is the matter which I labour to discover; and therein to open the ignorance of some, and the corruption of other fabulous Writers. And this we must note, that those Grand-children of Noah which were of a more quiet spirit, (or perchance) of less understanding, and had not therefore the leading of Colonies sent out, their proper habitations can be hardly known: only their kealon hath taught us, that they dwelt among the rest, and were covered with the same of others, who took on them the Conduction and Dominion over the rest. From Medai the third Son of Yaphet, were the Medes. The Grecians bring them (as before) from Medus the Son of Medea.

Of Javan the fourth Son of Yaphet: and of Melch of Aram, and Melch of Japhet.

OF Javan the fourth Son of Yaphet came the Ionians, which were afterwards called the Greeks; and so the Latin and Greek Interpreters for Javan write Greece, as in Isaiah. Et mittam ex eis qui salvati fuerint ad gentes, in mare, in Italian, & Greciam: And I will send those that escape of them to Nations in the Sea, in Italy and in Greece. The Geneva here useth the word [Tartar] for Tartar, a City in Cilicia, though Tartar in many places be taken for the Sea. The Togormians and the Genevians use the names Tubal and Javan, and not Italy and Greece: keeping the same Hebrew words. Of these Ionians were the Athenians, though themselves dream that they were Argives, or Men without Ancestors, and growing (as it were) out of the Soil: it self: who abounding in People, sent Colonies into Asia the less, of whom came the Ionians of those parts. Others derive the Athenians from Ion the Son of Xuthus, the Son of Deucalion; but the Antiquity of Javan mars the Fallacy of that supposition: who so many Years preceded Xuthus, or Deucalion. Pausanias tells us that Xuthus stole out of Thessaly with all his Fathers Treasure, and his Brothers Portions, and arriving at Athena, he was graciously received by Erichon, who gave him his Daughters in Marriage; of whom he received two Sons, Ion, and Achaeus, the supposed Ancestors of the Athenians. For Africa was called Ionica (saith Plutarch in the Life of Thucydides) who, when he had joyed Megara to Athena, erected a Pillar in that Stoa: or Stoa, which extended Peloponnesus to the other part of Greece: witheth on that part which looketh towards the East, these these words. Non sunt Peloponnesus, aff. Ionia. These Countries are not Peloponnesus, but of Ionia; and on the other side which looketh towards the South and into Peloponnesus; this. These parts are Peloponnesus, and not Ionia.

Strabo out of Hecataeus affirmeth, that the Ionians came out of Asia into Greece, which is contrary to the former Opinion: That the Ionians of Greece transported certain Companies into Asia the less, and the Name of Ionians was thereby therein retained. And though Strabo knew no more thereof than he learned of the Greeks themselves, yet I find this Conjecture of Hecataeus reasonable enough. For though it were to him unknown, yet I am that Asia the less had People before Babylonia into Greece, that Javan did not file from Babylonia into Greece, but took Asia the less in his passage; and from thence past over the narrow way, leaving his own Name to some maritime Province on that side, as he did that part of Greece so called. But yet Strabo himself believed, that Ionia took the Name from Ion the Son of Xuthus: for so much he had learned from themselves; which was also the Opinion of Pausanias. True it is, that the Greeks in after-times cast themselves into that part of Asia the less, opposite unto them, which they held for divers Years. And howsoever the Greeks vaunt themselves to be the Fathers of Nations, and the most ancient; yet all approved Historians (not their own) deride and disprove their Pride, and Vanity therein. For this Dispute of Antiquity (among prophane Writers) rested between the Scythians and the Egyptians, as Justin out of Trogus, in the War between Vexoris of Egypt, and Tanis of Scythia, witnesseth: which preceded far the Reign of Nimrod, and was long before the Name of Greece was ever heard of. And it is also manifest, that in Cecrops's time the Greeks were all Salvages without Law or Religion, living like brute Beasts in all respects: and Cecrops (saith St. Augustine) lived together with Melch.

The sixth Son of Yaphet was Melch, whom the Septuagint call Melch: (a part of those Nations commanded by Gog the chief Prince of Melch and Tubal.) But this we must remember, that between Melch the Son of Aram, and Melch (or Melch) the Son of Yaphet, there is a little difference in the Name, and both by divers Interpreters diversly written. Montanus with the Vulgar writeth Melch, the Son of Aram Mel; the Geneva Melch; Junius Melch. But it may be gathered out of the 120 Psalm, that either Melch the People, or gave Name to that Province wherein David hid himself; or else (which may rather seem) that it took Name from Melch the Son of Aram. For David bewailing his Exile (while he lived among a barbarous and irreligious People) useth these words. Wo is me that I remain in Melch, and dwell in the Tent of Kedar: which Junius converteth thus. Heimichi quia peregrinus tam diu: habitio rangelam Scythia Kedarum. The Septuagint gives it this Sense. Wo is me because my Habitation (or Abode) is prolonged, who dwell with the Inhabitants of Kedar; with which this of the Latin agreeeth. Heu mihi, quia incolatus meus prolongatus est, habitavi cum habitantibus Kedar: The Chaldee agreeeth, and in these words, O me miserum, quia peregrinatus sum Aferis, habitavi cum tabernaculis Aferum: O wretch, that I am, for I have travelled among those of Afia: I have dwelt in the Tabernacle of the Arabians. But howsoever or which soever conversion be taken for the best, yet all make mention of Kedar: which is a Province of Arabia petraea; and the Chaldeans puteth Afia in stead of Melch; but the Hebrew is self both Melch. And if it be to be taken for a Nation, as it is most likely, because it answers to Kedar, the Name of a Nation) seeing Melch the Son of Aram, a Chaldee is called Melch. It is indifferent whether this Nation took Name from Melch or Melch, both bordering Judea, and like enough to be commanded by one Prince; for so Ezekiel makes Melch and Tubal. But as for those that take Melch out of the word Melch (given by the Septuagint), to be the Melcovians: sure they presume much upon the affinity of Names, as afore said. And I am that David never travelled far North; (for to him Mosovia was utterly unknown) but about the Border of Kedar (it may be) he was often in all the time of his persecution: the same being a City on the Mountains of Samir or Galaad. And yet Arias Montanus makes Melch the Father of the Melcovians: and herein also Melanchthon runs with the Tide of common Opinion, and lets Melch in Mosovia, though with some better advice of Judgment; as, first seated in Cappadocia, and from thence travelling Northward: expounding the places of the 120 Psalm, [His mihi quod exulo in Melch] to signify, genis ejus feriatum infirmum esse; that the Ferity of that Nation exceeded: which fierceness or brutality of the Melcovians, David never proved, or (perchance) never heard of. But the same Ferity or Cruelty which those Northern Melcovians had, may as well be ascribed to the Arabians and Kedar. For this Country took Name of Kedar the 120 Psalm, second Son of Yaphet, of whom a People of equal fierceness to any of the World were begotten, both in thole times and long after, even to this day, (if the Arabians, Ymaliates, and Saraceni may be accounted one People:) the same being foretold by the speech of the Angel to Maaz, Gen. 16. v. 12. And he shall be a wild man: his hand shall be against every man, and every man hand against him. Now Arabia the Defart (saith Pliny) confronteth the Arabians Cochles on the East, and the Cedraei Southward, both which joyn together upon the Nabathaei. So it appeareth (as before) that Melch, Tubal, Gomer, Togorma, and Magog, neighbouring Canaan and Israel, and that Kedar also did joyn to Melch: all which were Regions of Syria, or of Asia the less, commanded by the Successors of Salem, enemies of the Re-establishment of Israel and Juda. But as (I have already said) it might well be, that long after the first Plantation the issue of Melch (or Melch) might pass into Cappadocia, and thence into Hircania, and give Names, both to Mazaga in the one, and to the Mountains Melch in the other, and from thence might fend People more Northerly into Mosovia: and so to all Opinions favored. But all salvage Nations overgrown and uncultivated, do (for the most part) shew a late Plantation, even as Civilty, Letters, and magnificent Buildings, witness Antiquity.

Thus the seventh Son of Yaphet, which Montanus reckons among the Sons of Gomer, was the Father of the Thracians, as all Authors (worthy the examination) affirm. Josephus was the first that determined hereof: and because the Scriptures are altogether silent, what part of the World Tarat people, the Conjectures are indifferent, and give no ground at all of Dispute. It followeth now to speak of the Sons of Gomer, which were three:

Askenaz, Riphath,
and

in a far less Island (did of necessity send his People farther off; and keeping amongst the Coast, and finding Yafephus in the possession of Ethiopia, he called a little farther on the Westward, and planted in Ephraim. And though the City of Dadane was not then built, or (perchance) not so ancient as Dadane himself, yet his Posterity might give it that name in memory of their first Parent, as it happened all the World over. For names were given to Cities, Mountains, Rivers, and Provinces, after the names of Noah's Children, and Grand-Children; not in all places by themselves, but by their Successors many Years after: every of their Families being desirous to retain among them by those memories, out of what branch themselves were taken, and grafted elsewhere. And because great Kingdoms were often by new Conquerors newly named, and the greatest Cities often fired and demolished: therefore those that hoped better to perpetuate their memories, gave their own names, or the names of their Ancestors, to Mountains and Rivers, as to things (after their judgments) freest from any alteration.

Thus then did Javan settle himself and his Children, in the edge and frontier of Asia the less, towards the Sea-shore: and afterward in Greece, and the Islands and neighbour Provinces thereof, as Japhet their Father had done in the body of the lesser Asia, together with Javan's Brethren, Gomer, Magog, Madai, Tubal, Mefech, and the rest round about him. And in like sort did Chus (the Son of Cham) people Babylonia, Chaldea, and the borders thereof towards the West and Southwest: and the Sons of Chus (all but Nimrod, who held Babylonia it self) travelled Southward in Arabia Felix, and Southwestward into Arabia Petraea: the rest of his Children holding the Regions adjoining to Nimrod. Mizraim the Brother of Chus in like manner took the way of Egypt: and his Brother Canaan the Region of Palestina adjoining. The Sons of Canaan had their Portions in Canaan, of whom all those Nations came, which were afterward the Enemies both to the Hebrews, and to those of the Sons of Shem, which spread themselves towards the West, and the Borders of the Mediterranean Sea: of which I shall speak hereafter. But first of the Sons of Cham or Ham, which were four:

{ Chus, { Mizraim, { Phut, and { Canaan.

S. X.

That the seat of Chus the eldest Son of Ham was in Arabia, not in Ethiopia: and of strange Fables, and ill translations of Scripture, grounded upon the mistaking of this point.

†. I.

Of Josephus his Tale of an Ethiopian's Wife to Moses, grounded on the mistaking of the seat of Cush.

That Ham was the Father of the Egyptians, it is made manifest in many Scriptures, as in the 105. Psalm v. 51. Then Israel came to Egypt, and Jacob was a stranger in the Land of Ham: and in the 78. Psalm. He slew all the first-born in Egypt, even the beginning of their strength, in the Tabernacles of Ham. There is also found a great

City in Thebaida, called Cheramus; (as it were, the City of Ham) of which name Hierodotus also discovers an Island in the same Region. But because Chus is the eldest Son of Ham, it agreeth with order to speak first of him. Now though I have already in the description of Paradise handled this question, and (I hope) proved that Chus could not be Ethiopia: yet seeing it cometh now to his turn to speak for himself, I will add some farther proof to the former. For the manifestation hereof lets many things straight, which had otherwise very crooked constructions, and senseless interpretations. Surely, howsoever the Septuagint and Josephus have herein failed, yet it is manifest that Chus could not be Ethiopia, but Arabia: (to wit) both that Arabia called Petraea, and a part of Arabia the Happy and the Desert: which Regions Chus and the Chusites presently planted, after they left Babylonia to Nimrod, wherein they first fate down all together. And there is nothing which so well cleareth this controversy, as the true interpretation of the place, Num. 12. v. 1. where Moses his Wife is called a Chusite; together with some places which speak of Nabuchodonosor's conquests. For whereas Josephus and the Septuagint in the place, Num. 12. v. 1. as also elsewhere, understand Chus for Ethiopia, we must give credit to Moses himself herein; and then it will appear that Josephus was grossly mistaken, or vainly led by his own invention. For Josephus presuming that Cush was Ethiopia, and therefore that the Wife of Moses (which in Scripture Num. 12. v. 1. is called a Woman of Cush) was a Woman of the Land of Ethiopia, feigneth that Tharbis the Daughter of the King of Ethiopia, fell in love with the person and fame of Moses, while he besieged Saba her Fathers City; and to the end to obtain Moses for her Husband, she practised to betray both her Parents, Country, and Friends, with the City it self, and to deliver it into Moses's hands. The Tale (if it be worth the telling) lyeth thus in Josephus. After he had defied the strength of the Ethiopian City Meroe, which he faith at length Cambyses called so from the name of his Sister, (the old name being Saba) he goeth on in these words. He cum Moses desideraret uxorem optumam egredi ferret, hostis non audente manu conficeret, rale quiddam accidit. Erat Ethiopum regi filia, nomine Tharbis, &c. which Tale hath this sense in English. When Moses was grieved that his Army lay idle, because the Enemy besieged, durst not sally and come to handy strokes, there happened this accident in the mean while. The Ethiopian King had a Daughter called Tharbis, who at some assault given beheld the person of Moses, and withal admired his valor. And knowing that Moses had not only upheld and restored the falling estate of the Egyptians, but had also brought the conquering Ethiopians to the very brink of subversion: these things working in her thoughts, together with her own affection, which daily increased, she made means to send unto him by one of her trustiest Servants to offer her self unto him, and become his Wife; Which Moses on this condition entertained, that he should first deliver the City into his possession: wherunto she condescending, and Moses having taken oath to perform this contract, both the one and the other were instantly performed.

†. II.

A dispute against the Tale of Josephus.

This Tale (whereof Moses hath not a word) hath Josephus fashioned, and therein also utterly mistaken himself, in naming a City of Arabia, for a City of Ethiopia: as he names Ethiopia it self to have been the Country of Moses's Wife, when (indeed) it was Arabia. For Saba is not in Ethiopia, but in Arabia, as both Strabo and all other Geographers, Ancient and Modern, teach us, saying that the Sabaens are Arabians, and not Ethiopians; except Josephus can persuade us, that the Queen of Saba which came from the South to hear the Wisdom of Salomon, were a Negro, or Black-Moor. And though Damianus a Greek speaks of certain Letters to the King of Portugal from Prester John of the Abissines: wherein that Ethiopian King would persuade the Portugals that he was defended of the Queen of Saba, and of Salomon; yet it doth no where appear in the Scriptures, that Salomon had any Son by that great Princess: which had it been true, it is likely that when Sisach King of Egypt invaded Roboam, and sackt Hierusalem, his Brother (the Son of Saba and Salomon) who joined upon Egypt, would both have impeached that Enterprize, as also given Aid and Succour to Roboam against Jeroboam, who drew from him ten of the twelve Tribes to his own Obedience. Neither is it any thing against our Opinion of Moses's Wife, to have been an Arabian, that the Scriptures teach us, that Moses married the Daughter of Yethro Priest of Midian or Madian: which standing on the North Coast of the Red Sea, over against the Body of Egypt, and near Sidon Gaber, where Salomon provided his Fleet for India, in the Region of Edam, may well be reckoned as a part of Arabia, as the Red Sea is called Sin Arabicum. For Edom joyneth to the Tribe of Juda by the North, to Arabia Petraea by the East, to the Mediterranean by the West, and to the Red Sea by the South East. And if we mark the way which Moses took when he left Egypt, and conducted Israel thence, it will appear that he was no stranger in Arabia: in the border whereof, and in Arabia it self, he had formerly lived forty Years; where it seemeth, that besides his careful bringing up in Egypt, he was instructed by Yethro in the Egyptian Learning. For Josephus confesseth, and St. Stephen confirmeth, that he was learned in all the Wisdom of the Egyptians. But on the other side this Text makes much against Josephus, where it is written in Exodus the second, Therefore Moses fled from Pharaoh, and dwelt in the Land of Madian or Midian, and not in Ethiopia. And in the third Chapter it is as plain as words can express, in what Region Madian was, where it is written. When Moses kept the sheep of Yethro his Father-in-law, Priest of Madian, and drove the flock to the Desert, and came to the Mountain of God in Horeb. Now that Mount Horeb is not in Ethiopia, every Infant knoweth. And if we may believe Moses himself, then was not the Wife of Moses purchased in that manner which Josephus reporteth (which was for betraying her Country and Friends) neither had she the Name of Tharbis, but of Sippora, or Zippora: neither was she a Negro, but a Madianite. And as God worketh the greatest things by the simplest means: so it pleased him from a Shepherd to call Moses, and after him David, and by them to deliver his People first and last. For Moses sitting by a Well (as disconsolate and a Stranger) defended the Daughters of Reuel from the other Shepherds; and drew them Water to water their Sheep: upon which occasion (by God ordained) he was entertained; by Yethro's Wife Daughter he married; and not for any betraying of Towns or Countries.

From hence also came Yethro to Moses at Rephidim, not far from Idumea, and finding the insupportable Government of such a Multitude, he advised him to distribute this weighty charge; and to make Governours and Judges of every Tribe and Family. And if Yethro had been an Ethiopian; it had been a far progress for him to have passed through all Egypt with the Wife and Children of Moses, and to have found Moses in the border of Idumea: the Egyptians hating Moses and all that favoured him. But the passing of Moses through Arabia Petraea (which joyneth to Madian) proveth that Moses was well acquainted in those parts: in which the second time he wandered forty Years, and did by these late Travails of his seek to instruct the Children of Israel in the knowledge of one true God, before he brought them to the Land of plenty and rest. For he found them nourished up with the Milk of Idolatry, and obtinate in the Religion of the Heathen, and finding that those stiff Plants could not be bowed or declined, either by persuation or by miracle, he ware them out in the Deserts, as God directed, and grafted their Branches anew, that from thole he might receive Fruit, agreeable to his own desire, and Gods Commandments.

Lastly, this opinion of Josephus is condemned by Alexandrinus Chrysostomus, where also he reprehendeth Apollinaris, who avowed that Moses had married both Tharbis and Sippora: his own words have this beginning. Manus enim Apollinaris dicit necesse habuisse Moses &c. Apollinaris also lyeth in affirming that Moses had two Wives: and who dares not perceive these things (saith he) for it is manifest that the Wife of Moses was Zippora, Daughter to the Priest or Priesthood of Madian: and that Madian cannot be taken for Ethiopia beyond Egypt; being the same that joyneth to Arabia: so far Chrysostomus.

†. III.

Thus ill expounded for Ethiopia, Ezek. 29. 10.

NOW as Chus is by the Septuagint converted Ethiopia, and the Wife of Moses therefore called Ethiopia: so in the Conquest of Nabuchodonosor is Ethiopia written for Arabia. For by the words of Ezekiel it is manifest that Nabuchodonosor was never in Ethiopia. Rebeld (saith Ezekiel), speaking of the Person of this great Affryan I came upon thee and upon thy Rivers; and I will make the Land of Egypt utterly waste and desolate; from the Tower of Sevchen, even to the borders of the Black-Moors: which last words should have been thus converted: From the Tower of Sevchen to the borders of the Chusites or Arabians: between which two is situated all Egypt. For to say, from the borders of Sevchen to the Ethiopians, hath no sense at all. Sevchen it self being the border of Egypt, confronting and joining to Ethiopia, or the Land of the Black-Moors. So as if Nabuchodonosor's Conquest had been but between Sevchen and the border of Ethiopia, it were as much to say, and did express no other Victory than the Conquest of all that Land and Country, lying between Madagascar and Bruckingham, where both the Countries join together; or all the North parts of England, between Barnick and Scotland: for this hath the same sense with the

the former, if any Man fought to express by these two bounds, the Conquest of England: Barwick being the North border of England, as Sevenson or Syene is the South bound of Egypt: seated in Thebaida which toucheth Ethiopia. But by the words of Ezekiel it appeareth, that Nabuchodonosor never entered into any part of Ethiopia, although the Sepnagim, the Vulgar, the Geneva, and all other (in effect) have written Ethiopia for Chush.

†. IV.

Another place of Ezekiel, c. 30. v. 9. in like manner mistaken.

AND as the former, so is this place of Ezekiel mistaken, by being in this sort converted. In die illa egredietur nunciis à facie mea in rivierum ad contemendum Ethiopia confusam: Which place is thus turned in English by the Geneva: In that day shall there messengers go forth from me in ships to mark the careless Moors afraid. Now the Latin for [Ships] hath the Greek word Triremes which are Gallies of three Banks, and not Ships. But that in this place the Translation should have been (as in the former) amended by using the word Chush, or Arabia for Ethiopia or the Black-Moors, every Man may see which meanly understandeth the Geography of the World, knowing, that to pass out of Egypt into Ethiopia there need no Gallies nor Ships, no more than to pass out of Northampton into Leicestershire: Ethiopia being the contemperate Region with Egypt, and not divided so much as by a River. Therefore in this place of Ezekiel it was meant, that from Egypt Nabuchodonosor should send Gallies along the Coast of the red Sea, by which an Army might be transported into Arabia the Happy and the Stony (sparing the long wearish march over all Egypt and the Deserts of Pharan) which Army might thereby surprize them unawares in their security and confidence. For when Nabuchodonosor was at Sevenson within a Mile of Ethiopia, he needed neither Galley nor Ship to pass into it: being all one large and firm Land with Egypt, and no otherwise parted from it, than one Inland Shire is parted from another; and if he had a fancy to have rowed up the River but for pleasure, he could not have done it: for the fall of Nilus (tumbling over high and freety Mountains) called Caledupa Nilus were at hand.

Lastly, as I have already observed, the Sons of every Father feared themselves as near together as possibly they could, Gomer and his Sons in Asia the less; Javan and his Sons in Greece and the Islands adjoining; Shem in Persia and Eastward. So the Sons and Grand-children of Chush from the River of Gehon (their Fathers first Seat) inhabited upon the same, or upon some other contiguous unto it, as Nimrod and Havilah on the one side, and Saba, Sheba, and Sabtesha (with the rest) did on the other side. And to conclude in a word, the Hebrews had never any Acquaintance or Fellowship, any War, Treaty of Peace, or other Intelligence with the Ethiopian Black Moors, as is already remembered in the Chapter of Paradise.

†. V.

A place of Isaiah 18. v. 1. in like manner corrupted by taking Chush for Ethiopia.

AND as in these places before-remembered, so in divers other is the word Ethiopia put for Arabia or Chush, which puts the Story (where it is to understand) quite out of square; one Kingdom thereby being taken for another. For what sense hath this part of Scripture, Isaiah 18. Ve terra Cymbalum alarum qua est trans flumina Ethiopia; or according to the Sepnagim in these words. Ve terra narium alarum qua est trans flumina Ethiopia? Wo to the land shadowing with wings, which is beyond the Rivers of Ethiopia, sending Ambassadors by sea, even in vessels of reeds upon the waters. Ve terra narium ore: Wo to the Land of the shady Coast, faith Immo. The former Translators understand it in this sense. That the Waters are shadowed with the Sails, which are significantly called the Wings of the Ships; the other, that the Coast of the Sea was shadowed by the height of the Land.

But to the purpose: That this Land here spoken of by the Prophet Isaiah is Egypt no Interpreter hath doubted. For they were the Egyptians that sent this message to the Israelites which Isaiah repeath, and by the former Translation every Man may see the transposition of Kingdoms: for hereby by Egypt is transported unto the other side of Ethiopia, and Ethiopia set next unto Judea, when it is the Land of Chush and Arabia indeed that lieth between Judea and Egypt, and not Ethiopia, which is let alone asketh a material Question (ro wit) what Region that should be, of which the Prophet speaketh, and placeth it beyond the Rivers of Ethiopia: Nam de signa agi regione dici nequit; For it cannot be said that he treateth of an unknown Region. Now if Ethiopia it self be under the Equinoctial Line, with whom the Jews had never any acquaintance, why should any Man dream that they had knowledge of Nations far beyond it again, and beyond the Rivers of Ethiopia? except we shall implicitly think that the Prophet spake he knew not what, or used an impertinent Discourse of those Nations, which were not discovered in 2000 Years after, inhabiting as far South as the Cape of Good Hope, commonly known by the name of Bona Esperanza.

†. VI.

That upon the like mistaking, both Terrhaka in the Story of Senacherib, and Zera in the Story of Aia are unadvisedly made Ethiopians.

AND by this Translation is the Story of Senacherib utterly mistaken in the sequel of his retreat. For Senacherib was first expelled at Pelusium, at the very entrance of Egypt from Judea: when having certain knowledge that Thirrhakeh (which all the Interpreters call King of Ethiopia) was on the way to set on him, he began to withdraw himself: and fearing to leave his Army in two parts, he sent threatening Messengers to Ezekiel King of Judea perswading him to submit himself: the renor whereof is set down in the second of Kings in these words: Have eye of the Gods of the nations delivered his land out of the hands of the King of Assyria: Where is the God of Hamath? &c. by which proud Ambassage, if he had obtained entrance into Jerusalem, he then meant to have united that great Army before Jerusalem commanded by Rehabeam with the other which lay before Pelusium, a great City upon the branch of Nilus next Arabia. For Senacherib had already mastered the most part of all those Cities in Judea and Benjamin with a third Army, (which himself commanded) being then at the Siege of Lema. But upon the rumour of that Arabian Army led by their King Thirrhakeh (whom Josephus Josephus calls Tharces) Rehabeam halted from the Siege of Jerusalem and found Senacherib departed from Lema, and set down before Lema, which was afterwards called Eleutheropolis, as some have supposed. But while he had ill success at Pelusium and feared Thirrhakeh, God himself, whom he least feared, strook his Army before Jerusalem by the Angel of his Power, so as 185000 were found dead in the place, as in the Life of Ezekiel is hereafter more largely written. And that this Army of Thirrahah was from Arabia, Josephus himself makes it plain. For he confesseth in the tenth Book the first Chapter of the Jews Antiquities, that it was come to Senacherib's knowledge, that the Army which was a Foot (both to relieve the Egyptians and the Jews) marched towards him by the way of the Desert: Now the Desert which lay indifferent between Jerusalem and Pelusium, was that of Pharan or Sur, which also toucheth on the three Arabias, to wit, the Stony, of which it is a part, the Desert, and the Happy; and by no other way indeed could the Arabians come on to succour either Pelusium or Jerusalem. But, that there is any Desert between Pelusium and the South part of Egypt, hath never yet been heard of, or described by any Cosmographer or Historian. So then this Scripture of the second of Kings, Verse the ninth, hath the same mistaking as the rest. For here the word [Chush] is also translated Ethiopia; and in this sense have all the Interpreters (but Junius) expressed the beginning of the ninth Verse. He heard also men say of Thirrhakeh King of Ethiopia, &c. whereas it should have been thus converted with Junius. Adiuncti autem de Thirrhakeh Rege Chushi: He heard also of Thirrhakeh King of the Chushites. For they were the Chushites and Arabians, whose Houses and Cities were next the River, and upon whom the very Smoke of Judea flaming was blown, being their nearest Neighbours: and so were not the Ethiopian Black-Moors under the Equinoctial, whom neither War nor Peace (which discovereth all Regions) ever found out, faith Ptolemy. For this King was no more King of Ethiopia than Zerah was, who invaded Asa King of Judea, with an Army of a Million and three thousand Chariots. Indeed, how such an Army and those Chariots should pass through all Egypt, (the Kings of Egypt being mighty Kings) let all Men that know now these Regions are scared, and how far distant, judge. For Princes do not easily permit Armies of a Million to run through theirs: neither was there ever any such strength of Black-Moors heard of in that part of the World, or elsewhere. Neither are these Ethiopians such Travellers or Conquerors; and yet is this King Zerah also called King of Ethiopia. But the word Chush being first converted for Ethiopia, the rest of the Interpreters (not looking into the Seats of Kingdoms, or the possibilities of Attempts, or Invasions) followed one another in the former mistakings.

†. VII.

A farther Expulsion of the place, Isaiah 18. 1.

Concerning these words in that eighteenth Chapter of Isaiah, Navium alarum, winged ships, (so the Sepnagim turn it) or Cymbala alarum (according to the Latin) Sails whistling in the Wind, or terra umbrosa ora (after Junius) the Land of a shadowed Coast, or the Land shadowing with Wings, as our English Geneva hath it. The two first interpretations of the Sepnagim and S. Hierome have one sense in effect. For the Sails are commonly called the Wings of a Ship; and we use to lay ordinarily when our Ships sail slowly, that the wanteth Wings: (that is) when her Sails are either worn or too narrow, and we also use the same Phrase of the wind whistling in the Sails. And it may be that the Egyptians employed so many of those small Ships, as their Sails were said to give a Shadow over the red Sea. But to make both Interpretations good, Vintu (upon Isaiah) affirmeth, that the word [Sabal] doth signify both to Shadow and to Gingle (which is) to make a kind of Cymbaline found: so as the meaning of this place (saith Vintu) is this: Wo to thee, O Egypt, which dost promise to others safeguard, under the shadow of thy Wings, which (indeed) seemeth to agree with the Argument of the eighteenth Chapter of Isaiah: and this Phrase is often elsewhere used, as in the sixteenth Psalm, Sub umbra alarum tuarum protege me: Defend me under the shadow of thy wings. The Boats of Reed spoken of are of two kinds; either of Basket-Willow covered with Hides (as anciently in African) or a Tree made hollow in the bottom, and built upon both sides with Canes. Of the one sort I have seen in Ireland, of the other in the Indies.

§. XI.

Of the Plamation and Antiquities of Egypt.

†. I.

That Mizraim the chief Planter of Egypt, and the rest of the Sons of Ham, were seated in order, one by another.

THE second Son of Ham was Mizraim, who (according to the place of a second Brother) was sent somewhat farther off to inhabit. For Chush first possessed Chaldaea on the West-side of Gehon chiefly: and from thence, as he increased in People, he entered Arabia, and by time came to the Border of the red Sea, and to the South-east-side of Judaea: Mizraim his Brother (with Phut) past over into Africa. Mizraim held Egypt: and Phut (as a third Brother) was thrust farther off into Mauritania. Canaan took the Sea-coast, and held the side of Palastina: and these four Brothers possessed all that Tract of Land, from Gehon in Chaldaea, as far to the West as the Mediterranean Sea: comprehending all Arabia Deserta, and Petrea; all Canaan which embraceth Galilee, Samaria, and Judea; with the two Egypt; whereof the nether is bounded by Memphis on the South, and by the Mediterranean Sea on the North: and Thebaida (called the upper Egypt) stretcheth it self toward the South as far as Syene. All the rest of the Ethiopians or Black-Moors. All the rest of the Coast of Africa Westward, Phut peopled; which Brothers had not any other Nation or Family that dwelt between them. And in the same manner did all their Sons again, and all the Sons of the rest of Noah's Children; fort themselves.

†. II.

†. II.

Of the time about which the name of Egypt began to be known: and of the Egyptians Lunar Year, which made their Antiquities seem the more fabulous.

THIS flourishing Kingdom posselt by Mizraim, changed her ancient name, and became Aegypt, at such time as Aegyptus (otherwise Ramesses), as some think) the Son of Belus chafed thence his elder Brother Danau, thifting him into that part of Greece now called Morea, by whom the Argives were made Danai abandoning their proper names: which happened 877 Years after the Flood, in the time of Jofeph, as S. Augustin conjectureth out of Eusebius. But in Homer's Odyssey it appeareth that the Egyptians were so called at the time of the Trojan War. And before this, Egypt was known by divers other names, as Oceania, Aria, Ofrania, &c. And Manethon (whom Jofephus citeth in his first Book against Apion) numbeth all the Kings of Egypt after Moses's departure, who consumed 393 Years. By which other Men conjecture, that the Egyptians took on them that name 330 Years after Jofeph, and about 1000 Years after the Flood. But where Jofephus in the same Book taketh Israel to be those Hyphs, which he also calleth Pastores or Shepherds, which are said to have reigned in Egypt 511 Years: whom also he calleth his Ancestors, (meaning the Ancestors of the Jews) in this I am sure he was grossly deceived, or that he vainly boasted; for the Israelites had no such Dominion as Manethon feigneth: nor abode in Egypt so long a time by many Years.

Of the Egyptian Antiquities there are many fables in Trogus, Herodotus, Plato, Diod. Siculus, Athen. and others. For they affirm (saith Pomp. Mela) that there had reigned in Egypt 330 Kings before Amosis, who was contemporary with Cyrus; and that they had Memory and Story of 13000 Years; and that the Stars had four times changed their course, and the Sun twice set in the East. These Riddles are also rife among the Athenians and Acadians, who dare affirm that they are more ancient than Jupiter and the Moon, whereof Ovid:

De Faj.
L. 1.

Ante Jovem genitum terras habuisse feruntur
Arcades: & Luna gens prior illa fuit.

The Acadians the Earth inhabited
Ere yet the Moon did shine, or Jove was bred.

But for those 13000 Years it may well be true: seeing it is certain that the Egyptians reckon their Years by Months, which makes after that account not above 1000 or 1100 Years, whether we take their Months or Lunar Years to have been of the first kind of 27 days and eight hours; or otherwise 29 days and twelve hours; or after any other of those five diversities of their Lunar Years.

†. III.

Of certain vain assertions of the Antiquity of the Egyptians.

Erardus Mercator in his Chronology, reasoneth for the Egyptians Antiquity in this manner; That the sixteenth Dynastie (where Eusebius begins to reckon the Egyptians times) had beginning with the general Flood: and that therefore the first of the other fifteen reached the Creation, or soon after it. To which conjecture of Mercator, Pererius maketh this answer: That therein Mercator was first deceived, because he taketh it for granted, that the beginning of the sixteenth Dynastie was at once with the general Flood: which Eusebius maketh 292 Years after, and in the time of Abraham. Secondly, Mercator maketh the beginning of the Shepherds Dynastie (being in number the 17.) in the time of their first King, Salus, to have been in the Year of the World 1846, which Eusebius findeth in the Worlds Age 2140. For the 16 Dynastie was begun but in the 292 Year after the Flood, as they account, and continued 190 Years. Thirdly, whereas Mercator maketh every Dynastie to endure 115 Years, Eusebius reckoneth many of them at less than 100 Years: for the 28 had but 6 Years; the 29 but 20, and the 30 but 18 Years.

Now Amnius in his Supplement of Manethon affirmeth, That all these 15 Dynasties lasted but 162 Years: and that the first of the 15 began but in the 131 Year after the Flood: so as where Mercator makes all the 15 to precede the Flood, and the 16 to have been then in being at the time of the Flood, Amnius makes them all after it. But the contrariety of falsehood cannot be hidden, though disguised. For Amnius had forgotten his former opinion and assertion, that it was in the 131 Year that Nimrod with the Sons of Noah came into the Valley of Shinar: so he forgets the time which was consumed in the building of Babel: and that before the confusion of Speech there was no dispersion, nor far-off Plantation at all. And though he hastily conveyed Gomer into Italy, and Tubal into Spain, in the 10 Year of Nimrod's Reign: (which was ten Years after his arrival into Babylonia) yet herein he is more unadvised. For he makes Aegypt posselt, and a Government established in the very first Year of the arrival of Nimrod into Shinar, before all partition, or any expedition far off or near in question: for from thence (that is, from Babel) did the Lord scatter them upon all the earth.

†. IV.

Against Pererius: that it is not unlikely, but that Egypt was peopled within 200 Years after the Creation; at least, that both it, and the most parts of the World were peopled before the Flood.

BUT whereas Pererius seeketh to overthrow this Antiquity of the Egyptians, touching their Dynasties, (which Eusebius doth not altogether destroy, but lessen) I do not find any great strength in this Opinion of Pererius; (to wit) that it was either unlikely or impossible that Aegypt should be peopled within 100 or 200 Years after Adam, in the first Age. And whereas he supposeth that it was not inhabited at all before the general Flood, I do verily believe the contrary: and that not only of Aegypt, but the better part of all the World was then peopled: Pererius his words are these: Quomodo tunc primis mundi decretis, vel etiam centum annis Adam pulchri adeo multiplicari potuit, ut ad Aegyptum aliqui habitandam & campendos propagata sit, &c. For how could the Children of Adam be so multiplied in the first two hundred, or in the first hundred Years of the World, and so propagated as to inhabit and fill Aegypt? for allowing this (saith Pererius) we must also confess, that there there were then both the Affryians, and other Nations.

Now seeing the Scriptures are silent herein, and that it is no point of our saving Belief, it is lawful for every Man to be guided in this and the like Questions by the best Reason, Circumstance, and Likelihood; and herein, as in the rest, I protest that I do not gain say any Man's Opinion out of any crotling or cavelling Humour: for I think it the part of every Christian, rather to reconcile differences, where there is possibility of Union, than out of froward Subtily, and prejudicate Refolvemets, to maintain Faction needles, and dangerous Contentions.

First, therefore to this Opinion, that Aegypt was not planted so soon after Adam, no, not at all before the Flood, I say that there is no Reason why we should give a less Increase to the Sons of Adam, than to the Sons of Noah. For their length of Life, which exceeded those which came after the Flood double, and (after a few Years) treble, is an infallible proof of their Strength and Ability, to beget many Children: and at that time they observed no degree of Kindred, nor Conflagrancy. And that therefore was a speedy Increase of People, and in great numbers, it may in some fort appear, by this, that Cain, who (being fearful that the Death of Abel would have been revenged on him) withdrew himself from the rest, which were afterward begotten, and dwelt in the Land of Nod, and there by the help of his own liues built a City, (called Enoch) after the Name of his first-born. Now if it be gathered that Nimrod came into the Valley of Shinar with so many multitudes, as sufficed to build the City and Tower of Babel: and that to this Increase there was given but 130 Years by Berosus, and after the Account of the Scriptures (reckoning, as it is commonly understood, by the birth of Arphaxad, Selah, Heber, and Phaleg) but one hundred and one Year: I see no cause to doubt, but that in the Infancy of the first Age, when the Bodies of Men were most perfect, even within 130 Years, the same (if not a greater) number might be increased: and so within 70 Years after (that is, by such time as the World had flood 200 Years) as well Affryia, Syria, and Aegypt might be posselt before the Flood, as they were within the same or less time after it. Neither doth it agree with the Circumstance, or true Story of the Babylonian and Affryian Empire, that all those People, which were increased in the first hundred or 130 Years after the Flood, came into Shinar and Babylonia. For that ever Noah himself came out of the East, as there is no Scripture or Authority to prove it, so all probable Conjecture and Reason it self denies it. Again, those multitudes and powerful numbers, which Semiramis (but the third from Nimrod) found in India, considered with her own Army of three Millions, (and the left not all her Kingdoms empty) do well prove, that if the World had such plenty of People in so few Years after the Flood, it might also be as plentifully filled in like time before it. For after their own Account Ninus governed Babylonia and Affrya but 292 Years after the Flood of Noah. And these Troops of Semiramis were gathered out of all those Eastern Kingdoms: from Media to the Mediterranean Sea; when there had now past from the Flood to the time of this her Invasion, somewhat less or more than 360 Years: for much more time the true Chronology cannot allow; though I confess, that in respect of the strange Greatness of Semiramis's Army, and the incredible multitudes gathered, this is as short a time as can well be convenient. And if but the one half be true of that which is said; That her Army consisted of 1300000 Footmen, and 300000 Horsemen, it must needs be, that long before Semiramis's Reign, the greatest part of Affra (whence her huge Army was gathered) was full of People: yea Arabia it self (much part whereof is barren) must long before this time of Semiramis have been plentifully peopled; when Ninus having a determination to make himself Master of all Nations, entred (notwithstanding) in League with the King thereof: whom therefore he either feared, or fought his Assistance. And if Arabia were then so well replenished, I see no cause but Aegypt might also be peopled. Now if we may believe Trogus Pompeius (epitomis'd by Julian) Aegypt was a most flourishing and magnificent Nation before Ninus was born. For the be his own words, speaking of Ninus. Eratre quidem temporibus antiquioribus Vexoris Rex Aegypti, &c. But there were in times more ancient Vexoris King of Egypt, and Taanis King of the Scythians: of which the one invaded Persia, the other Aegypt. And how full of People all that part of the World was, the Conquests of Ninus witness, who subdued with no small Force the Armenians, the Medes, and afterwards the Babryans; yea, all that whole Body of Affra on this side India. For Diodorus out of Cassius numbeth the Army, wherewith Ninus invaded Zoraster, at 1700000 Footmen, and 200000 Horsemen: and the Stories generally shew, that though Zoraster's Army was far short of this, yet it was greater than any that those parts of the World ever since be held. But to what end should I seek for Foreign Authority? for no Man doubteth but that Aegypt was posselt by Mizraim, the Son of Ham; and that it was an established Kingdom, filled with many Cities in Abraham's time, the Scriptures tell us. And sure to prepare and cultivate a desolate and overgrown Ground, to beautify it with many Cities, Laws, and Policies, cannot be esteemed a Labour of a few Days: and therefore it must be inhabited in a less time than 200 Years after the Flood; and in the same time (if not in a shorter) before the Flood. For if so many Millions of Men were found within 300 Years after the general Flood; so as not only Babylon, and Affrya, Babrya, Armenia, Media, Arabia, Aegypt, Palestina, yea the far-off Libya on the one side, and India on the other, and Syphira (inferiour to neither) were all filled: into what small Corners could then all those Nations be comprest, which 1656 Years brought forth before the Flood? even Necessity, which cannot be resisted, call the abundance of Mens bodies into all parts of the known World; especially, where Death forbore the Father, and made no place for the Son, till he had be held living Nations of his own Body.

†. V.

Of some other Reasons against the Opinion of Pererius.

FOR what a strange Increase did the long Lives of the first Age make, when they continued 800 or 900 Years. Surely, we have reason to doubt, that the World could not contain them, rather than that they were not spread over the World. For let us now reckon the Date of our Lives in this Age of the World: wherein if one exceed 50 Years, ten for one are cut off in that passage, and yet we find no want of People; nay, we know the multitude such, as if by Wars or Pestilence they were not sometimes taken off by many thousands, the Earth with all the Industry of Man could not give them Food. What strange heaps then of Souls had the first Ages, who enjoyed 800 or 900 Years as aforesaid! These numbers, I say, cannot be counted counted or conceived. For it would come to the same Reckoning in effect, as if all those which have been born in Britain since 3 or 4 hundred Years before the Norman Conquest (having such as by accident or by violence were cut off) were now alive; and if to these there were added as many as by Polygamy might have been increased. For (to omit, that the Giants and mighty ones of the first Age observed no Law of Marriamony) it is to be thought that those Lovers of the World and of Pleasure, when they knew the long and liberal time which Nature had given them, would not willingly or hastily present themselves to any danger which they could flee from or shew. For what humane Argument hath better persuasion to make Men careless of Life, and fearless of Death, than the little time which keeps them amuse, and that short time also accompanied with so many pains and diseases, which this envious old Age of the World mingled together, and foweth with the Seeds of Mankind.

Now if that Berosus or Amnius may be alleged for sufficient Authors, whom Pererius himself in this Question citeth, then is it by them affirmed, and by Jesphus confirmed, that the City of Enoch was seated near Libanus in Syria; and if other parts of Syria were peopled in Cain's time, I see no cause why Palastina (which is also a Province of Syria) and Egypt (which neighboureth it) could be left desolate both all the life time of Cain, and all those times between his Death and the Flood, which were by estimation 700 or 800 Years. And sure though this Fragment of Berosus with Amnius his Comment be very ridiculous in many places (the ancient Copies being corrupted or lost) yet all things in Berosus are not to be rejected. Therefore Saint Hierome for such Authors gives a good Rule. Bona eorum eligamus, vitiosum contraria; Let us chose what is good in them, and reject the rest. And certainly in the very beginning of the first Book, Berosus agreeth (in effect) with Moses, touching the general Flood: and in that first part Berosus affirmeth, that those mighty Men and Giants which inhabited Enoch, commanded over all Nations, and subjected the Universal World: be often used though that phrase [of all the World] be often used in the Scriptures for a part thereof; as in the second of the Acts. That there were dwelling at Jerusalem Jews, men that feared God of every Nation under Heaven: yet by words which follow in Berosus, it is plain that his words and sense were the same: for he addeth from the Sun's rising to the Sun's setting, which cannot be taken for any small part thereof. Again, we may safely conjecture, that Noah did not part and proportion the World among his Sons at adventure, or left them as Discreverers, but directed them to those Regions which he formerly knew had been inhabited. And it cannot be denied that the Earth was more passable and easie to travel over before the Flood, than after it. For Pererius himself confesseth that Arctica (by reason of Mud and Slime which the Water left upon the Earth) was uninhabited 200 Years after the Oxygus Flood, whereby we may gather that there was no great pleasure in passing into far Countries after the general Deluge, when the Earth lay (as it were) incopied for 100 or 130 Years together. And therefore was the Face thereof in all conjecture more beautiful, and less cumbersome to walk over in the first Age, than after the general Overflowing.

†. VI.

Of the words of Moses, Gen. 10. vett. ult. ubi pererius Pererius grounded his Opinion.

Altho, whereas Berosus draws this Argument out of the last Verse of the tenth of Genesis. And out of these were the Nations divided after the Flood: Quo significatur talem divisionem non fuisse ante diluvium: By which it appeareth (saith Pererius) that there was no such Division before the Flood; which he also seeketh to confirm out of the eleventh of Genesis, because the division of Tongues was cause of the Dispersion of the People. This consequence, quo significatur, &c. seemeth to me very weak: the Text it self rather teaching the contrary: for out of these (saith Moses) were the Nations divided in the earth after the Flood; inferring, that before the Flood the Nations were divided out of others, though after the Flood out of these only. But whatsoever Sense may be gathered from this place, yet it can no way be drawn to the times before the Flood, or to any Plantation or Division in that Age: for if there were none else among whom the Earth could be divided after the Flood, but Noah's Sons, wherein doth that necessary division contro the planting of the World before it? And whereas it is alleged that the confusion of Speech was the cause of this dispersion, it is true, that it was so for that present; but if Babel had never been built, nor any confusion of Languages at all, yet increase of people and time would have enforced a farther-off and general Plantation: as Berosus says well, that when Mankind were exceedingly multiplied, ad comparanda novus sedes necessitate compellatur. For we find (as is before said) that within 300 Years after the Flood, there were gathered together into two Armies, such multitudes as the Valley about Babylon could not have sustained: those numbers with their increase for any long time: all Asia the greater and the lesser; all Syria, Arabia, Palastina, and Egypt, with Greece, and the Islands thereof; Mauritania and Libya being also at that time fully peopled. And if we believe Berosus, then not only those parts of the World, but (within 140. Years after the Flood) Spain, Italy, and France were also planted: much more then may we think, that within 166 Years before the Flood, in the time of the chief strength of Mankind, they were replenished with People. And certainly seeing all the World was overflowed, there were People in all the World which offended.

†. VII.

A Conclusion, resolving of that which is most likely, touching the Egyptian Antiquities: with Jemethat of Phut, (another Son of Ham) which peopled Libya.

Therefore for the Antiquity of the Egyptians, as I do not agree with Mercator, nor agree with the Volgar, which give too much Credit to the Egyptians Antiquities: so I do not think the report of their Antiquities so fabulous, as either Pererius or other Men conceive it. But I rather incline to this, That Egypt being peopled before the Flood, and 200 or 300 Years, more or less after Adam, there might remain unto the Sons of Mizraim, some Monuments (in Pillars or Altars of Stone or Metall) of their former Kings or Governors: which the Egyptians having added to the List and Roll of their Kings after the Flood, in succeeding ceding time (out of the vanity of glory, or by some corruption in their Priests) something beyond the truth might be inserted. And that the memory of antiquity was in such sort preserved, Berosus affirmeth it of the Chaldeans, and so doth Epigenes. For they both write, that the use of Letters and the Art of Astronomy was known to the Babylonians 3634. Years before Alexander's Conquest: and this report Amnius findeth to agree and reach to the time of Enoch, who was born 1034. Years before the Flood, and wrote of the Worlds Destruction, both by Water and Fire; as also of Christ his coming in judgement; as St. Jude hath witnessed. But leaving these Antiquities to other mens judgments, and every Man to his own Reason, I will conclude this Plantation of Egypt. It is agreed by all, that it was peopled by Mizraim, and that it took the name of Egypt from Aegyptus the Son of Belus, as afore said. Being divided into two Regions, that part from Mempbis or Nicopolis to the Mediterranean Sea, was called the inferior Egypt; furnished also Delta: because the several branches of Nilus breaking asunder from one body of the River, gave it the form of the Greek letter Delta, which is the form of a Triangle. That branch, which ran toward the North-East and embraced the Sea, next unto the Desarts of Sur and Pharan, had on it the City of Pelufus, where Senacherib was repulsed: The other branch, which yielded it self to the salt water towards the North-West, is beautified by that famous City of Alexandria: The upper part of Egypt is bounded between Mempbis and Syene near Chibiola, and had the name of Thebaida, of that ancient City of Thebes, which (according to Homer) was adorned with 100. Gates: and therefore called Givitas centum portarum; and by the Greeks Dispolis; in the Scriptures No-bemon, which signifieth multitudes of Inhabitants, exceeding belief. Jesphus calls Egypt Merfus of Mizraim: and Herodotus affirms that it had once the name of Thebais.

Joseph l. i. cap. 19. Herod. l. 2. cap.

L. 9. l. 1.

Plus the third Son of Ham took the next portion of land to his Brother Mizraim, and inhabited Libya: whose People were anciently called Phuties; (saith Jesphus) and Pliny mentioneth the River Fus in Mauritania: which River from the Mountain Atlas (known to the Inhabitants by the name of Dyris) he maketh to be distant the space of two hundred Miles. It also appeareth in the thirtieth Chapter of Ezekiel, that Fus, Chush and Lud were coterminals and Associates with the Egyptians.

§. XII.

Of the eleven Sons of Canaan, the fourth Son of Ham.

†. I.

Of the bounds of the Land of Canaan: with the names of his eleven Sons.

Canaan (the fourth Son of Ham) possessed all that Region called by the Romans Palastina; in the Scriptures Galilee, Samaria, and Judea; in the latter times known by the name of the Holy Land and Jurie: the limits whereof are precisely let down by Moses, Genesis the tenth. Then the border of the Canaanites was from Zidon as thou goest to Gerar until Asahab, and as thou goest unto Sodam and Gomorra, and Admah, and Zeboim, even unto Leha. Now however, these words of the Hebrew Text [as thou goest] are connected, Moses's meaning was that Gerar was the South bound of Canaan and Zidon the North; Sodam and Gomorra the East, and the other Cities named Leha on the Frontiers thereof. For Gerar, Harpheth in a right line from Gaza, in the way of Egypt, the uttermoſt Territory of Canaan Southward: and this was properly the Land of Canaan.

Now the Sons of Canaan which possit this Country, and inhabited some part of the Borders thereof, were in number eleven:

1. Zidon.
2. Heth or Chethus.
3. Jehus or Jehulcus.
4. Emari or Emoreus, or Amoreus.
5. Girgesu or Girgesu.
6. Heti or Chivueu.
7. Arhi or Harzew.
8. Seni or Sinaneu.
9. Aradi or Arvadeneu.
10. Zemari or Samareu, or Tzemareu.
11. Hamathi or Hamatheneu, or Chamatheneu.

Of which the most renowned were the Hebities, Girgesites, Amoritites, Hevites, Jehusites, and Perizites: which Perizites were descended of Zemari or Samareu, or from some of his.

†. II.

Of the Portions of Zidon and Heth.

Zidon the first born of Canaan, built the famous City of Zidon in Phoenicia, which afterward fell in partition to the Tribe of Aſer: for Aſer, Zabulon, and Nephthali had a great part of the ancient Phoenicia distributed among them; but the Aſerites could never obtain Zidon it self.

The second Son of Canaan was Heth or Chethus: of whom came the Hebities, or Hittites, one of those seven principal Nations (commanders of Canaan) appointed by God to be rooted out: Canaan namely, the Girgesites, the Amoritites, the Canaanites, the Perizites, and Hevites, and the Jehusites. The Hittites inhabited about Berſabe, and towards Hebron near the Torrent Beſor, and about Gerar, which Moses maketh the uttermoſt limit of Canaan, having the Desert of Pharan, to the South: 19. for about Berſabe (otherwise Puteus iuramenti) four Miles from Gaza dwelt Heth and his Posterity, as far to the North East as Hebron, and Amor; and of Ephraim the Hittite did Abraham buy the Field of Sarah's Burial. Of which Nation Rebecca bewailed her self to Isaac, saying, That she was weary of her Life for the Daughters of Heth. The Giants Anakim were of these Hittites, a strong and fierce Nation, whose entertainment by the Kings of Israel against them the Syrians greatly feared: as in the second of the Kings, Israel hath hired against us the Kings of the Hittites. 2. Kings: 26. 7. v. 6.

†. III.

Of the Jehusites and Amoritites.

Jehus, the third Son of Canaan, of whom came the Jehusites, and whose principal feat was Jebu, (afterward Hiersalem) were also a valiant and stubborn Nation, and held their City and the Country near it, till such time as David by Gods assistance recovered both: yet were not the Yehusims extinguished, but were Tributaries to Salomon.

Amoraeus was the fourth Son of Canaan, of whom the Amorites took name, who inhabited that Land to the East of Jordan below the Sea of Galilee, having Arnon and the Mountains of Galaad on the East, and Jordan on the West: of whom Of (King of Babylon) and Sihon (overthrown by Moses) were Princes.

The Amorites had also many other habitations dispersed within the bounds of Canaan: as behind Libanus in the edge of Cadiz, or Syria Libanica. They had also their being in the Mountains of Judea, and in Idumea near the Arabis thereof, called Duma. And hereof it came that all the Canaanites were sometime called Amorites: as in Genesis the fifteenth, for the wickedness of the Amorites is not yet full. And that this was also a powerful Nation, we find in the Prophet Amos; I've destroyed the Amorite before them, whose brights was like the heights of a Cedar, and he was strong as the Oak.

†. IV.

Of the Gergesites, Hevites and Harikites.

THE fifth Son of Canaan was Gergesius or Gergesus, (otherwise Girgah) who inhabited on the East side of the Lake of Tiberias, or the Sea of Galilee, where Ptolemy sets the City Gergah, which Galilee calls Gisra in the Territory of Decapolis. Here it was that Christ dispossessed the possessed with Devils; and the Gergesites desired him to depart their Coasts: because their Swine filled with the evil Spirits drowned themselves in the Sea of Galilee. Gergesus also built Beryne (sometime Giris) afterward Felix Julia, three Miles from the River Adan in Phoenicia: in which the Romans held a Garrison: and to which Augustus gave many large Privileges.

Hevites the sixth Son; and Father of the Hevites, inhabited under Libanus near Emath. These Hevites, however, the Caphtorims the second is remembered (yet many of them remained all the War of Joshua, and afterward to the time of Salomon. For God was not pleased utterly to root out these Nations, but they were sometimes made Tributaries to the Israelites, and at other times served (in their falling away from the true Worship of God) to afflict them: for as it is written Judges the third; They remained to prove Israel by them, whether they would obey the Commandments of God.

The seventh Son was Araceus or Hark, who between the foot of Libanus and the Mediterranean Sea, (over against Tripoli) built the City of Archas, Aree, or Arca, afterwards Archie.

†. V.

Of Sini and Arvadi.

Sineus the eighth Son Hierosylimitanus sets at Cappadocia, which Ptolemy finds in Judea not far from Jehus; to the South thereof, faith Tinnus. But it is more probable, that Sineus founded Sin, which St. Hierome calls Sim; Ptolemy Simyra; Mela and Pliny Simyru: Brochard Syon, (called Synechis) near Arca. Petrus thinks that Sineus inhabited the Defarts of Sini or thereabout: a big herof there is no other certainty than the report of Brochard, who took view of all these places, affirming that Sineus built Synechis, as Zidon built Zidon. There is also another Nation of Cini (written with the letter C. otherwise Keni) who defended of Hebels the Son of Raguel the Madianite, who afflicted the Israelites, in their conduction through the Wilderness of Pharan. But these Cini were admitted among the Israelites, and had a portion of Land with the Nephthims, beside their habitations with the Amalekites: against these Cini Balaam Joel 4. prophesied, that they should be destroyed by the Affians.

The ninth Son was Aradeus or Aradeus, who in Gal. 7th the Life of Aradeus built the City Arados: opposite a Phir, gainst which Island on the main of Phoenicia, they founded another City of that name, which for opposition was afterwards called Arados and in this City came S. Peter (faith Joannes) and in this Isle preached the Gospel: and founded a Church in Honour of our Lady: but we find no such work of his in the Acts of the Apostles. Both these were very famous: and places of skillful Seamen: whom Ezekiel remembereth in his prophecies against the Tyrians. The inhabitants of Zidon c. 7. v. 8. and Arad were thy Mariners.

†. VI.

Of Zemari.

OF Samareus, or Zemari, the tenth Son, there are divers opinions. Some think that he first inhabited in Calestria at Edessa, and founded Samarein, which in Joshua is placed in the Tribe of Benjamin. There is also Samareim (Of the same Orthography) upon the Mountains of Ephraim (faith Berodolus) mentioned in the second of Chronicles c. 13. v. 4. which the Latine converteth amiss (faith he) by Semerem. The Hierosolymitanus Paraphrast makes Samareus (of whom were the Perizzites) the parent of the Emisani, which Pliny calls the Hemijani, in Calestria; and it may be that it was their first habitation, and that they afterwards inhabited those other places before remembered. But that they founded Samaria, both the Hebrew Orthography, and this place in the first of Kings (speaking of Omri) disprove. And he bought the Mountain Samaria or Semerem of one Semer for two Talents of Silver, and built in the Mountain: and called the name of the City which he built, after the name of Semer, Lord of the Mountain Samaria. But of all these places I shall speak more at large in the Conquest of the Holy Land, by the Children of Israel. Of whomsoever the Samarians were defended, sure I am, that they were ever a perfidious Nation, and base: for as long as the State of the Jews stood up, they always called themselves Jews: when it suffered or sunk, they then utterly denied to be of that Nation or Family; for at such time as they were returned from their first Captivity, they became a mixt Nation; partly of the Colonies of the Affians; and partly of the naturals.

†. VII.

Of Hamathi.

THE last of Canaan's Sons was Hamathius, (according to the Hebrew) Hamathi, of Hamath (faith Berodolus) of which (the aspiration taken takes away) the fame is pronounced Emath, where of Hamathus was Parent. Josephus and St. Hierome confound Emath with Antioch, not that Antioch which standeth on the River Orontes on the Frontier of Camagene, between the Mountain Cassius and the Province of Parras, and Selucia, of which S. Peter was Bishop, and in which S. Luke and Ignatius were born: but Antioch, surnamed Epiphania, as Berodolus supposed, which standeth between Aranea and Emefa in Cassius. Yet, indeed, Emath cannot be taken for either: for both that Antioch upon Orontes, and that which neighbourhood Emath are farther off from Canaan, than ever any of those Nations straggled. And whereas S. Hierome setteth Emath, which he confounded with Epiphania, in the Tribe of Nephthali; it is manifest that Epiphania, which standeth to the North of Emefa hath all the Province of Laodicea between it and any part of the Land divided. And if Libanus itself were not thared among the Tribes, then could not Epiphania belong unto them: for both the Provinces Laodicea and Libanica, are between Epiphania and any part of the Holy Land, and therefore Emath for taken could not be a part of Nephthali, as in the thirteenth of Joshua is directly proved. For Joshua, counting the lands that remained unpossessed, reckoneth all mount Libanus towards the Sun-rising, from Baalath under Mount Herman, until we come to Hamath. And this reason (among others) is used, that Emath was not in Nephthali, or any way belonging to the Children of Israel: because David accepted the Presents of Tahm King of Emath, and (therewithal) conditions of Peace: which he would not have done, if that Territory had ever belonged to the Children of Israel, but would have recovered it without composition, and by strong hand, as he did the rest. But this Argument (as I take it) hath no great weight. For if the promise which God made be considered, as it is written in Deuteronomy, then might Emath be comprehended, though seated altogether without the Bounds of the Land promised, according to the description of Moses and Joshua: for Emath is indeed situate on the other side of the Mountain of Herman, which joinech to Libanus: and is otherwise called Iura. But whereas Hamath is named in Joshua the 19. v. 35. and written in the Latine conversion Emath, therewith (faith Berodolus) was S. Hierome mistaken. Emath or Iura is that over the Mountains, and the City in Nephthali should be written Hamath: and so the Septuaginta (understanding the difference) write it Amath and not Emath, the fame which indeed belonged to the Nephthims, seated on the South-side of Libanus to the East of Asdodim: which City S. Hierome writes Emath, Josephus Hamath, others Emathin, or Amathos, and the People Amath, of which (as I take it) Rabbi saith vaunth in the second of Kings. Where is the God of Hamath?

§. XIII.

Of the Sons of Chulh (excepting Nimrod) of whom hereafter.

The Sons of Chulh were {Seba, Havila, Sabta, Raama, Sabtea, Nimrod.} And the Sons of Raama were, {Seba, and Dedan.

S. Ebn or Saba was the eldest Son of Chulh, the eldest Son of Hom, to make a difference between him and his Nephew Sheba, the Son of his Brother Raama, or Regma (or Ragna, after Momana) his name is written with a single [S] Samach, and Sheba the Son of Regma with an [S] aspirate, which is the Hebrew Sabin. Seba the eldest Son of Chulh, Regma his Brother, and Sheba the Son of Regma posselt both the Shores of Arabia Felix. Saba took that part toward the Red Sea, as nearest his Father Chulh, and the Land of the Chusites: Regma, and Sheba, the East Coast of the same Arabia which looketh into the Gulf of Persia; of which Pliny. Sabai Arabum populi proper thura clarissimi ad utrag; maria portibus gentibus habitant. The Sabaeans people, of Arabia, famous for their Frankincense, extending their Nations, dwell along both the Seas (to wit) the Perfian, and the Arabian, or Red Sea. This Country was afterwards called Arabia a populi mixione, faith Ptolemy. To this agreeth Ptolemy, who setteth the City of Saba towards the Arabian or Red Sea, and the City Rhagana towards the Perfian, with whom also we may leave Saba: for so much Ammonius gathereth out of Ptolemy, because he remembereth a Nation (called Stabai) near the Perfian Sea; and Malabathis which defended of them. But Momana hath sent Regma, or (as he calls him Rabma) into Carmania, for which I see no reason. Josephus, who only attended his own fancies, hath banished Saba or Seba to the border of Aethiopia. But Berodolus thinks it strange, that the Sabai, which stole away Job's Cattle, should run thence all Aegypt and all Arabia Petrea, and find out Job in Tracumia between Palestina and Calestria 1200. Miles off: Now as this conjecture was more than ridiculous, so do I think, that neither the Sabai on the Red Sea, nor those toward the Perfian Sea, could by any means execute the flesh upon Job, which Josephus Berodolus shall take for needful. But there were the Sabai of Arabia the Defart, where Guilandinus Melchior affirmeth out of his own experience, that the City Saba is seated, the fame which Ptolemy calls Saba, now Semifalca: and from this Saba in Arabia the Defart, came those Magi or Wijemen which worshipped Christ, faith Melchior, whose words are these: The Magi came neither out of Mesopotamia (as Chrysostome, Hierome, and Ambrose supposed) nor out of Arabia the Happy, as many wise Men do believe, but out of Saba in Arabia the Defart: which City when my self was there, was (as I judged it) called Semifalca. And to approve this opinion of Guilandinus, it appeareth that these Sabai were Neighbours to Job, and lay fit to invade and rob him. For both the other Nations (as well those on the Perfian Sea, as those on the Red Sea) are so disjoyned with large Defarts, as there is no possibility for Strangers to pass them, especially with any numbers of Cattle, both in respect of the Mountains, of the Sands; and of the extreme want of Water in those parts. Ubi nec homines nec bestia videtur, nec avari, immo nec arboris, nec germen aliquod, sed non infirmos saxos, alijum, sperrimi: Where there are found neither Men nor Beasts, nor so much as Birds, or Trees, nor any Pasture, or Grass, but only sharp, and high fowry, and crazy Mountains. Berodolus Pererius

Perrus conceive that the Queen of Saba which came to visit Solomon, was of the Sabaei on the East side of Arabia Felix; but the contrary seemeth more probable, and that she was Queen of Saba towards the Red Sea: for Solomon at that time commanding all that part of Arabia Petraea, 'twixt Idumaea and the Red Sea, as far down as Adrian or Maan, and the Queen of Saba, which inhabited the West Part of Arabia Felix, being his Neighbour, might without any far Travel enter his Territories, free from all danger of Surprise by any other Prince or Nation.

But to avoid tediousness, it is manifest that Saba or Saba, Sabta, Raama, or Rhegma, with his Sons Sheba and Adnan, and Sabteca, were all the posteriors of Arabia the Happy and the Desert: for Isaac and Nimrod dwelt together on the East side of Chush, who held Arabia Petraea. Now for Saba, there is found of his Name the City of Sabatha or Sabana in the fame Arabia: of which both Philo and Pliny, who withal nameth Sabotela, within the Walls whereof there were sometimes found sixty Temples. Exod 10. The Merchants of Sheba and Raama the Son together. And that they were the Eastern Arabians their Merchandize witnesseth, formerly repeated in the Chapter of Paradise. For Josephus his Fancies, that Saba was the Parent of the Ethiopian about Meroe, and Sabta of the Ethiopian Assabari, they are not worthy any farther Answer than hath already been given: especially seeing these Cities preserving the memory of the Names of Saba and Sabta in Arabia were yet remaining in Philo's time, though in some Letters changed. As also in the Coasts adjoining the Names of other of the Brethren of the Family of Cush, with little Alterations are preserved. In Arabia the Desert is found the City Saba or Sava, (now Semilescia) with the City of Rhegama for Rhegma; and the Nation by Philo himself called Raamini of Raama. In Arabia the Happy is found the City of Rhegma, and Rabana, which also keepeth the found of Rhegma, the City of Saptha or Saptah, not far from the East Coast of Arabia: as also the Metropolis and chief City, in the body of the South part of Arabia, called without difference or alteration Sabatha; and to the West of Sabatha towards the Red Sea the great City of Saba; and the Nation adjoining, Sabai: and to the South thereof again toward the straight entrance of the Red Sea, the Region of Saba. To all these his Brethren and Neighbours which were seated on the East side of Arabia, Hasidai by the passage of Tyrrus was a Neighbour, to whom he might pass by Boat even unto Rhegma the City of Raama or Rhegma, set near the River of Lar towards the mouth of the Persian Sea, which stood in Philo's time.

†. II.

Josephus his Opinion of Deban, one of the Issue of Chush, to have been seated in West Ethiopia, disproved out of Ezekiel and Jeremy.

AND whereas Josephus (whom in this S. Hierome followeth, as not curious herein) sett Deban the Son of Raamah into West Ethiopia, it is strange that Ezekiel should couple Sheba, Raamah, and Deban together; Deban in the 10 Verse, and Sheba and Raamah in the 22 Verse to be the Merchants of Tyre, if Deban had dwelt in West Ethiopia, which is distant from Raamah and Sheba (the Habitation of his Father and Brother) above 4000 Miles. Besides which the Merchandize that the Debanites brought to Tyre doth not make them naked Black-moors. For they of Deban (saith Ezekiel) were thy Merchants in precious Cloths for thy Chariots; and these Western Ethiopian never lay Cloth, till the Portugals seeking those Coasts traded with them: the Merchandize of the Country being Hides, Elephants Teeth, some Gold and Amber, Cyves Cats, and Rice, but nothing at all of any Manufacture; and all these they exchanged for Linen, or Iron chiefly.

But in those days the West part of Africa within the Body of the Land was known only by Imagination: and being under the burnt Zone was held uninhabitable. And therefore that the Negrids of the West Ethiopia, which inhabit about Serra, Lima, or Niger, could either pass by Sea or Land to Tyre in the bottom of the Mediterranean Sea, is a strange, or rather a foolish Fancy. Now to put it out of dispute that Deban also dwelt by the rest of the Children of Chush, which Seats they held by that Name in the time of Jeremy the Prophet, let us hear Jeremy his own words. Ely ye Inhabitants of Deban, for I have brought the destruction of Ely upon him. Hereby it appeareth that Deban was a Neighbour to the Idumeans: and Deban was a Province of Arabia Petraea; and Deban which dwelt on the North part of Arabia Felix, joined in that part to Petræa, the Seat of his Grand-father Chush, which Neighbourhood and Fellowship of Deban and the Idumeans is also confirmed by Ezekiel. I will stretch out mine hand upon Edom, and deliver Edom and Edom out of it, and I will make it desolate from Teman: and they of Deban shall fall by the Sword.

§. XIV.

Of the Issue of Merem: and of the place of Jeremy, Chap. 9. Ver. 7.

AFTER Chush it followeth to speak of Mizraim's Sons, whose Names (saith Saint Augustine) were plural, to signify the Nations, which came of them. Ludim the eldest Son of Mizraim was the Father of the Libyans in Africa: and the rest of his Brothers dispersed themselves into all Regions adjoining. Among the Sons of Shem there is also Lud; but he is differed from Lud the Son of Mizraim by the singular number: the Son of Shem being written Lud, the Son of Mizraim Ludim: and yet these Names and Nations are often confounded, notwithstanding the apparent difference both of Names and Nations. For that Ludim the Son of Mizraim was Parent of the Libyans in Africa, and that he was seated not far from Mizraim his Father, appeareth by the Prophet Jeremy, who joineth them in this sort together. Come ye ye Horites, and rage ye Charitans: and let the valiant Men come forth, the Black-moors and the Libyans which bear the Shield: for those Nations afflicted the Egyptians being of one Parent descended. And in Ezekiel, Phut and Lud are joined together. Ethiopia (or Chush) saith Ezekiel c. 30. v. 3. And Phut and Lud, and all the common People, and the Men of the Land that are in League shall fall with them by the Sword: which is as much to say, as the Sons of Chush; (which were the Cushites) the Sons of Mizraim, (which were the Egyptians) and the Libyans, (descended of his Son Lud) with other the Inhabitants of Egypt and Africa shall fall together. Hieronymus also finds also in Africa a Nation of the Libyans. And I believe it: because Jeremy joineth the Libyans and Libyans together in the place before remembered. But Libya in Africa is by the Hebrew called Ludim (saith Aristo Metastemo)

The re-mission in the Hebrew, commonly a sign of the plural number, as used, the last.

ver. 6.

Isa 11. though 2 Chron. 12. 3. they seem to be called Lubim or Lubai, a name somewhat nearer the word Liby, and by which it may seem that the truer writing is, not Liby, but Liby. Neither is it here to be omitted, that Phut (upon the thirtieth of Ezekiel) understandeth that which is spoken in the third Verse of Lud, not to be meant of the Libyans at all: for he will have this threatening to be meant against the People of Lyda, a City (saith he) which I could not mislike if the City of Lyda were so feared. But Lyda (which should be written Lyda with a double D, and is the same City which was afterward Diopolis, in which S. Peter cured Aeneas of the Palsy) standeth near the Torrent Gaza, not far from Toppa the Port of Hierusalem. Yet it is not impossible but that this City might have Lud for the Founder. For there are many Cities of one name founded in all the Regions of the World, and far asunder; as after the names of Alexander, Selencus, and Antiochus, many Cities called Alexandria, Selencia, and Antiochia, of divers others. S. Hierome maketh Lebanon to be the Father of Libya who was the eldest Son of Mizraim: and so doth Pofellus; and either opinion may be true.

The rest of Mizraim's Sons have no proper Countries given them in the Scriptures, saving Cushim and Caphrim, of whom came the Philistines, whom the Scriptures call Peletst.

Their Cushim inhabited Cassitis, a Region lying in the entrance of Aegypt from Palestina, in which the Lake Sirbonis and the Mountain Cassus are found: not far from whence Pompey was buried.

Caphrim seated near Cashim in that Tract of Aegypt called Sethrois, not far from Pelufium. Stra-bo callist Sethrois; Sethrois and Phary Sethrois, or of the City Sethrois: which Orellius takes to be the same which Philo calls Hercules pursu. Of the Cashim and Caphrim came the Philistines, which are called by the Synagogs Adelphe, which is Afropetia. Stra-bo says of a strange Kindred. These Philistines inhabited the South part of the Holy Land towards Aegypt, of whom Palestina took name. For the Hebrews (saith Isidore) do not use the letter [P] but instead of it [Ph]. Their principal Cities were Gaza, Ascalon, Acco, Geth, and Accaron: and the People of them called Gazeti, Ascaloniti, Accoti, Gethi, and Accaroniti. Isidore affirms that Ascalon was first called Philistim: and of that City the Country adjoining. But where Isidore had it I know not.

The first known King of the Philistines was that Abimelech, who had a liking to Abraham's Wife, with whom Abraham made a Covenant and League. This Abimelech dwelt indeed at this time in Gaza; but it is written that he was also King of the Philistines, in these words: Wherefore Isaac went to Abimelech King of the Philistines unto Gaza. Now Abimelech King of the Philistines seems to be the same that this or some ancienter Abimelech governed the Commonwealth greatly to his glory, the rest of his Successors called themselves by the same name. The Philistines commanded that Tract of Land upon the Mediterranean Sea to the Northward, from the Cattle of Pilgrims (otherwise Caesarea Palestine or Sidon's Tower) which was the South border of Phoenicia, to Gaza, or to the River of Aegypt. The Anaks or strong Giants were of these Philistines, and Goliath was of Geth one of the five Cities above named. They had sometimes five Kings, saith Liramus. They mastered the Israelites at several times above 150 Years, and kept them Tributaries, till they were weakened by Samson and Samuel; but in the end this yoke was taken off by David, and laid on themselves.

It is objected, That because these Cities and the Countries adjoining were held by the Sons of Mizraim, therefore did the Israelites dispofe the Sons of Mizraim, and not of Canaan, by forcing those places.

To this saith Perrus, that although the Philistines or Philistim be said to be in the time of Isaiah, yet at the time of the promise it was possib. by the Canaanites; as in the second of Deuteronomy. The Hebrews dwell in the Villages unto Gaza. And what marvel if the Canaanites being the greater part the denomination were from them? For that the Philistines were of Caphur, and so of Mizraim and not of Canaan, besides Moses, the Prophet Hierome witnesseth. The Lord will destroy the Philistines, the remnant of the Issue of Caphur: and in like manner in the ninth of Amos, the Philistines are said to be the Reliques of Caphurim; have not I brought up Amos 2. 9. Israel out of the land of Egypt, and the Philistines from Caphur, and Aram from Kir? so I read this place with divers of the learned. For whereas the Vulgar hath, & Palestinos de Cappadocia, & Syris de Cyrene, this conversion Berolaud condemneth; where Caphur is taken for Cappadocia, and Cyrene for Kir. For Cyrene is a City directly West from Egypt, between Palestina or Berce and Apollonia, but Kir in Afia under the Affrians: Junius hath it Kir, and not Cyrene: and so hath the Geneva. But Perrus calls Caphurim Cappadocia, according to the Vulgar translation, to which he is bound: and yet it is not altogether improbable if he mean Cappadocia in Palestina, and not that Cappadocia by the Sea Pomus in the North of Afia the less. For whether they inhabited Sethrois, or Cappadocia of Palestina, it is not certainly known. And sure in this manner he may expound Cappadocia to be ambiguous, as well as he doth Cyrene: taking it here not for Cyrene in Africa, but for a place in Meis. For it is written in the second of Kings, that Tiglatpalezer King of the Affrians carried away the Incubators of Da-masus unto Kir; and Isaiah seems to understand the Kir, for Cyrene in Meis, calling this Cyrene Meis superior: for it was the manner and policy of the Affrians to transplant the People Conquered by them, as they did the Samaritans or Israelites, and other Nations. And hereof it came that Kir was called Syro-mesia: because the Syrians by the Affrians were therein captived.

Of which see in the second Book c. 7. 3.

§. XV.

Of the Issue of Scm.

†. I.

Of Elam, Assur, Arphaxad, and Lud:

It remaineth lastly to speak of the Sons of Scm, who were these:

1. Elam, or Elam.
2. Assur.
3. Arphaxad.
4. Lud, and
5. Aram.

THE Posterity of Scm, Moses recometh after the rest: because from them he proceedeth in order with the Genealogy and Story of the Hebrews. For of Scm was Abraham descended. Of these five Sons the Scriptures remember the length of the Life of Arphaxad only, and only the Children of him and Aram, the rest are barely spoken of by Phil. 1. 12.

c. 14.
Psalm tab. 6.
Afo. 27.

And surely whatsoever mens opinions have been herein, yet it is certain, that the Division of Tongues and of Men must go near together with the ceasing of the work at Babel: and that the enterprise of Babel was left off instantly upon the confusion of Languages, where followed the Execution of the Division; and so neither at the birth nor death of Phaleg: for Phaleg was born in the year 101 after the Flood, which was the year that Nimrod came into Shinar, or 10 years after he arrived, faith Jerofa.

Now if it be objected that Phaleg (the Etymology of whose name signifieth Division) must have lived without a name, except the name had been given him at the time of this Confusion and Partition: To this objection it may be answered, That the change of names upon divers accidents is not rare in the Scriptures: for Jacob was called Israel after he had wrestled with the Angel; Abraham was first Avram, and Edem Edu; and that Phaleg being upon this division had his first name upon this accident changed, it is most probable.

And lastly whereas the Hebrews, S. Hierom and Chrysostom account Heber a great Prophet, if that by giving his Son the name of Phaleg, he foretold the Division which followed: To this I say, I do not find that Heber deserved any such honour, if he had thereupon so called his Son: for division and dispersion followeth increase of people of necessity; and this Prophecy (if any such had been) might also have reference to the division, which afterwards fell among the Hebrews themselves.

But if we give a reasonable time to the building of the Tower and City of Babel, by which time many people (by reason and by demonstrative proof) might be increased: and that upon the fall thereof the confusion and division followed (whereupon Phaleg took name) then in this opinion there is nothing either curious or monstrous.

†. IV.

Of the Sons of Jochan, the other Son of Heber.

1. Elmodad.
2. Salapb, or Selep, or Shelaph.
3. Alamath, or Chattar.
4. Tare, or Tarah, or Terah.
5. Hadoram.
6. Uzal, or Uzal.
7. Dichab, or Dicia.
8. Obad, or Ebal, or Hobab.
9. Abimael.
10. Sheba, or Saba.
11. Ophir, or Opir.
12. Havilah, or Chavilah, and
13. Jokab.

The Sons of Jochan were

ALL those Sons of Jochan (according to S. Hierom) dwelled in the East parts of the World, or India, even from the River Cophor or Chosai, which is one of the branches or heads of Indus.

But the certain places of those thirteen Sons cannot be gathered out of the Scriptures, the words of Moses being general. And their dwelling was from Melisa as thou goest unto Sephar a mount in the East. Of all these thirteen Sons, there were only three memorable, (to wit) Sheba, Ophir, and Havilah. Concerning whose names to avoid confusion it is to be observed, that among the Sons of Chusy, two of them had also the names of Sheba and Havilah. Abraham had also a third Saba or Sheba, his grand-child by his Wife Keturah. But Saba the Son of Chusy, and Sheba the Son of Rhegma his Nephew, we have left in Arabia Felix: and Havilah the Son of Chusy upon Tigris. Saba the Grand-child of Abraham was (as some have thought) the Father of the Sabeans in Perfia: of which Nations Dionysius de Orbis fusi maketh mention. Primum Sabei; post hoc sunt Pallagardæ, præter vero hos sunt Talsi: The first are Sabeans: after these be Pallagardæ; and near these the Talsi. And whereas it is written: But unto the Sons of the Conventus which Abraham had, Abraham gave gifts; and sent them away from Isaac his Son (while he yet lived) Eastward into the East Country: hereupon it is supposed, that this Saba the Son of Abraham wandered into Perfia: for Perfia was accounted the furthestmost East Country in respect of Judea; which also Osai setteth under the Sun-rising. Yet seeing the rest of Abraham's Sons seated themselves on the Borders of Judea, I rather choose to leave Saba the Son of Abraham in Arabia the Desert, where Phaleg setteth a City of that name.

But Saba the Son of Jochan, the Son of Heber, (as I conceive) inhabited India itself. For Dionysius After in his Periegesis, (or description of the World) which he wrote in Greek Verse, among the Regions of India findeth a Nation called the Sabei. Taxilus his inter medius habitantibus Sabæis. In the midst of these dwell the Sabæi, and the Taxili, faith this Dionysius.

†. V.

Of Ophir one of Jochan's Sons, and of Peru, and of that Voyage of Salomon.

Ophir also was Inhabitant of the East India, and as (S. Hierom understands it) in one of the Islands plentiful of Gold, which are now known by the name of Moluccæ. Tophus understands Ophir to be one of those great Head-lands in India, which by a general name are called Ceylonis, or Penninsula: of which there are two very notorious; Calicut, and Malacca. Peruvius takes it rightly for an Island, as S. Hierom doth, but he sets it at the Head-land of Malacca. But Ophir is found among the Moluccæ farther East.

Aristo Mantanus out of the second of Chronicles, the third Chapter and sixth Verse, gathers that Ophir was Peru in America, looking into the West Ocean, commonly called Mare del Sur, or the South Sea; by others Mare pacificum. The words in the second of the Chronicles are these, And he overlayed the House with precious Stones for Beauty; and the Gold was Gold of Parvaim. Tunius takes this Gold to be the Gold of Havilah, remembered by Moses in the description of Paradise: And the Gold of that Land is good: finding a Town in Cheracene a Province of Susiana called Barbata; so called (as he thinks) by corruption for Parvaim: from whence those Kings subjected by David, brought this Gold, with which they presented him; and which David preferred for the enriching of the Temple.

But this fancy of Peru hath deceived many men, before Mantanus, and Plessius, who also took Ophir for Peru. And that this question may be subject of no farther dispute; it is very true, that there is no Region in the World of that name: I am that at least America hath none, no not any City, Village, or Mountain so called. But when Francis Pizarro first discovered those Lands to the South of Panama, arriving in that Region which Abalathia commanded (a Prince of magnificence, Riches and Dominion inferior to none) some of the Spaniards utterly ignorant of that Language, demanding by signs (as they could) the name of the Country; and pointing with their hand athwart a River, or Torrent, or Brook that ran by, the Indians answered Peru, which was either the name of that Brook, or of Water in general. The Spaniards thereupon conceiving that the people had rightly understood them, set it down in the Diurnal of their Enterprise, and so in the first description made, and sent over to Charles the Emperor, all that West part of America to the South of Panama had the name of Peru, which hath continued ever since as divers Spaniards in the Indies assured me; which also Aegius the Jesuit in his natural and moral History of the Indies confirmeth. And whereas Mantanus also findeth, that a part of the Indies (called Tucatan) took that name of Jochan, who as he supposed navigated from the utmost East of India to America: it is most true, that Tucatan, is nothing else in the Language of that Country, but [What is that] or [What say you?] For when the Spaniards asked the name of that place (no man conceiving their meaning) one of the Salvages answered Tucatan (which is) What ask you, or What say you? The like happened touching Paria, a mountainous Country on the South side of Trinidad and Margarita: for when the Spaniards inquiring (as all men do) the names of those new Regions which they discovered, pointed to the Hills afar off, one of the People answered, Paria, which is as much to say, as high Hills or Mountains. For as Paria begins that marvellous ledge of Mountains, which from thence are continued to the Strait of Magellan: from 8 degrees of North Latitude to 52. of South; and so hath that Country ever since retained the name of Paria.

Riches

The same happened among the English, which I sent under Sir Richard Oreenville to inhabit Virginia. For when some of my People asked the name of that Country, one of the Salvages answered Wingandacan, which is as much to say, as, Thou wear good Cloths, or gay Cloths: The same hapned to the Spaniards in asking the name of the Island Trinidad: For a Spaniard demanding the name of that self place which the Sea incompeled, they answered Cura, which signifieth an Island. And in this manner have many places newly discovered been intruded: of which Peru is one. And therefore we must leave Ophir among the Moluccæ whereabout such an Island is credibly affirmed to be.

Now although there may be found Gold in Arabia itself (towards Perfia) in Havilah, now Susiana, and all along that East Indian shore; yet the greatest Plenty is taken up at the Philippins, certain Islands planted by the Spaniards from the West India. And by the length of the passage which Salomon's Ships made from the Red Sea, (which were three years in going and coming) it seemeth they went to the uttermost East, as the Moluccæ or Philippins. Indeed these that now go from Portugal, and from hence, find that Navigation in two Years, and sometimes less: and Salomon's Ships went not above a tenth part of this our Course from hence. But we must consider, that they evermore kept the Coast, and crept by the Shores, which made the way exceeding long. For before the use of the Compaſs was known, it was impossible to Navigate athwart the Ocean; and therefore Salomon's Ships could not find Peru in America. Neither was it needful for the Spaniards themselves (had it not been for the plenty of Gold in the East India Islands, far above the Mines of any one place of America) to fail every Year from the West part of America thither, and there to have strongly planted, and inhabited the richest of those Islands: wherein they have built a City called Mantika. Salomon therefore needed not to have gone farther off than Ophir in the East, to haveaped worse: neither could he navigate from the East to the West in those days, whereas he had no Coast to have guided him.

Tostatus also gathereth a phantastical opinion out of Rabam, who makes Ophir to be a Country, whose Mountains of Gold are kept by Griffins; which Mountains Salomon affirmed to be in Syria /Asia, in their words. Nam cum cura & gemma affiant, Griffes tacent. Univerſis, alites ferociffime, Arimalpi cum his dominant, &c. For whereas those Countries abound in Gold, and rich Stones, the Griffins defend the one and the other: a kind of Fœderis species of all other; with which Griffins a Nation of people called Arimalpi make war. These Arimalpi are said to have been men with one eye only, like unto the Cyclops of Sicilia: of which Cyclops Herodotus and Aristotle make mention: and so doth Lacan in his third Book: and Valerius Flaccus in the story of Alexander Macedon. But (for mine own opinion) I believe none of them. And for these Arimalpi, I take it that this name signifying One-eyed was first given them by reason that they used to wear a vizard of defence, with one sight in the middle to serve both Eyes; and not that they had by nature any such defect. But Salomon borroweth these things out of Pliny, who speaks of such a Nation in the eastern North, at a place called Cylindus, or the Cave of the North-East Wind. For the rest, as all Fables were commonly grounded upon some true Stories or other things done: so might these tales of the Griffins receive this Moral: That if those men which fight against so many dangerous passages for Gold, or other Riches of this World, had their perfect senses, and were not deprived of half their Eye-sight (at least of the Eye of right reason and understanding) they would content themselves with a quiet and moderate estate; and not subject themselves to Famine, corrupt Air, violent Heat, and Gold, and to all sorts of miserable Diseases. And though this Fable be feigned in this place, yet such a Tale were told of some other places of the World, where wild Beasts or Serpents defend Mountains of Gold, it might be avowed. For there are in many places of the World, especially in America, many high and impellable Mountains which are very rich and full of Gold, inhabited only with Tigers, Lions, and other ravenous and cruel Beasts: into which if any man ascend (except his strength be very great) he shall be sure to find the same War, which the Arimalpi make against the Griffins: not that the one or other had any sense of Gold, or seek to defend that Metal, but being disquieted, or made afraid of themselves or their young ones, they grow enraged and adventurous. In like sort it may be said that the Algarues, (which the Arabians call the Crocodiles) defend these Pearls which lie in the Lakes of the Islands: for many times the poor Indians are eaten up by them, when they dive for the Pearl. And though the Algarues know not the Pearl, yet they find favour in the flesh and blood of the Indians, whom they devour.

†. VI.

Of Havilah the Son of Joctan, who also passed into the East Indies: and of Melia and Serpher named in the bordering of the Families of Joctan: with a conclusion of this Discourse touching the Plantation of the World.

OF Havilah the Son of Joctan, there is nothing else to be said, but that a general Opinion is, that he also inhabited in the East India in the Continent, from which Ophir pass into the Islands adjoining. And whereas Ganges is said to water Havilah, it is meant by Havilah in the East India, which took name of Havilah, the Son of Joctan: but Havilah, which Pisga compasseth, was so called of Havilah, the Son of Cush, as is formerly proved by this place of Scripture: Saul smote the Amalekites from Havilah, as thou comest to Shur, which is before Egypt. But that Saul ever made War in the East India, no man hath inspected. For an end we may conclude, that of the thirteen Sons of Joctan, these three Saba, Havilah, and Ophir, though at the first seated by their Brethren about the Hill Mafius, or Mefi, Gen. 10. 30. (to wit) between Gilicia and Mesopotamia; yet at length either themselves or their Issues removed into East India, leaving the other Families of Joctan, to fill the Countries of their first Plantation, which the Scripture desires to have been from Mefi unto Sephur. And although S. Hieron take Mefi to be a Region of the East India, and Sephur a Mountain of the same (which Mountain Adamantus would have to be the Andes in America) those fancies are far beyond my understanding. For the Word [East] in the Scriptures, where it hath reference to Yudea, is never farther extended than into Persia. But Mefi is that part of the Mountains of Mafius in the North of Mesopotamia, out of which the River Chaboras springeth which runneth by Charran: and in the same Region we also find for Sephur (remembered by Moses) Sophara by Ptolemy, standing to the East of the Mountain Mafius: from whence Joctan having many Sons, some of them might pass into India, hearing of the Beauty and Riches thereof. But this was in process of time.

The other fashion of Planting I need not being grounded but upon mens imaginations, contrary to reason and possibility. And that this Mountain in the East was no farther off than in those Regions before remembered, it appeareth by many places of the Scripture where the same phrase is used: as in Numbers 23. Balaac the King of P. Moab hath brought me from Aram, out of the Mountain of the East; which was from the East part of Mesopotamia. For Balaac brought Balaam out of Mesopotamia, (witness this place of Deuteronomy.) Because they hired Balaam the Son of Beer, of P. C. 23. 24. to curse thee: for Aram Nabarraim was Syria superiorum, which is Mesopotamia, as aforesaid.

This Plantation of the World after the Flood doth best agree, (as to me it seems) with all the places of Scripture compared together. And these be the reports of reason and probable conjecture; the Guides which I have followed herein, and which I have chosen to go after, making no valuation of the opinions of men, conducted by their own fancies: be they Antient or Modern. Neither have I any end herein, private, or publick, other than the discovery of Truth. For as the partiality of man to himself hath disguised all things: so the factions and hireling Historians of all Ages (especially of these latter times) have by their many Volumes of untrue reports left Honour without a Monument, and Vertue without Memory: and (instead thereof) have erected Statues and Trophies to those, whom the darrest forgetfulness ought to have buried, and covered over for evermore. And although the length and dissolving nature of time hath worn out or changed the names and memory of the Worlds first Planters after the Flood (I mean the greatest number and most part of them) yet all the footsteps of Antiquity (as appears by that which hath been spoken) are not quite worn out nor overgrown: for Babylon hath to this day the sound of Babel; Phenicia hath Zidon, to which City the Eldest Son of Canaan gave name; so hath Gilicia Thersis; and the Armenians, Medes, Elberians, Cappadocians, Phrygians, the Syrians, Idumeans, Lybians, Moor, and other Nations, have preserved from the death of forgetfulness some signs of their first Founders and true Parents.

C H A P. IX.

Of the Beginning and Establishing of Government.

§. I.

Of the proceeding from the first Government under the Eldest of Families to Regal, and from Regal Absolute to Regal tempered with Laws.

IT followeth now to entreat how the World began to receive Rule and Government, which (while it had scarcity of People) underwent no other Dominion than Paternity and Eldership. For the Fathers of Nations were then as Kings, and the Eldest of Families as Princes. Hereof it came, that the Word [Elder] was always used both for the Magistrate, and for those of Age and Gravity: the same bearing one signification almost in all Languages. For in the eleventh of Numbers God commanded Moses to gather together 70. of the Elders of the People, and Governours over them: the Hebrew bearing the same sense, which the Latin word Senes or Seniores doth. So it is written in Susanna, Then the Assembly believed them as those that were the Elders and Judges of the people. And so in the words of those false Judges and wittnelles to Daniel. Show us unto us, seeing God hath given thee the office of an Elder. Demosthenes useth the same word for the Magistrate among the Grecians. Cicero in Cato giveth two other reasons for this appellation: Apud Lacedaemonios qui amplissimum magistratum gerunt, ut sunt, sic etiam appellantur Senes: Among the Lacedaemonians the chief Magistrates, as they are, so are they called Eldermen: and again, Ratio & prudentia nisi essent in senibus *non summum Concilium Majores nostri appellarent Senatum: If Reason and Advice were not in old Men, our Ancestors had never called the highest Council by the name of a Senate. But though these Reasons may well be given, yet we doubt not but in this Name of [Elders] for Governors or Counsellors of State, there is a sign that the first Governors were the Fathers of Families; and under them the eldest Sons. And from thence did the French, Italian, and Spaniard take the word [Signor] and out of it [Seignory] for Lordship and Dominion: signifying (according to Lysleu) Puissance in Propriety, or proper Power. The kinds of this Seignory, Seneca makes two: the one, Potestas aut imperium, Power or Command: the other, Proprietas aut dominium, Propriety or Masterhip: the Correlative of the one is the Subject, of the other the Slave. Ad Celsorem (saith he) potestas omnium pertinet, ad singulos proprietas: Celsor hath Power over all; and every Man Propriety in his own. And again, Celsor summum imperium possidet, singuli dominium: Celsor holdeth all in his Power, and every Man possesseth his own. But as Men and Vice began abundantly to increase: so Obedience, (the fruit of natural Reverence, which but from excellent seed seldom ripeneth) being exceedingly overshadowed with Pride, and ill Examples, utterly withered and fell away. And the soft weapons of paternal persuasions (after Mankind began to neglect and forget the original and first giver of Life) became in all over-weak, either to resist the first inclination of evil, or after (when it became habitual) to constrain it. So that now, when the Hearts of Men were only guided and steered by their own Fancies, and tost to and fro on the tempestuous Seas of the World, while Wildom was severed from Power, and Strength from Charity: Necessity (which bindeth ever Nature but the immortal) made both the Wife and Foolish understand at once, that the estate of reasonable Men would become far more miserable than that of Beasts, and that a general Flood of Confusion would a second time overflow them, did they not by a general Obedience to Order and Dominion prevent it. For the Mighty, who trusted in their own strengths, found others again (by interchange of times) more mighty than themselves: the feeble fell under the forcible; and the equal from equal received equal harms. In so much that licentious Disorder (which seemed to promise a Liberty upon the first acquaintance) proved upon a better trial, no less perilous than an unendurable Bondage.*

These Arguments by Necessity propounded, and by Reason maintained and confirmed; persuaded all Nations which the Heavens cover, to submit themselves to a Master, and to Magistracy in some degree. Under which Government, as the change (which brought with it less evil, than the former mischiefs) was generally pleasing: so Time (making all Men wise that observe it) found some imperfection and corrosive in this Cure. And therefore the same Necessity which invented, and the same Reason which approved Sovereign Power, bethought it self of certain equal Rules, in which Dominion (in the beginning boundless) might also discern her own Limits. For before the invention of Laws, private Affections in Supreme Rulers made their own Fancies both their Treasurers and Hangmen: measuring by this Yard, and weighing in this Balance both Good and Evil.

For as Wisdom in Elderhip preceded the Rule of Kings: so the Will of Kings fore-went the Inventions of Laws. Populus nullis legibus tenebatur: arbitria Principum pro legibus erant: The People were not governed by any other Laws than the Wills of Princes: Hereof it followed, that when Kings left to be good, neither did those Mens virtues value them which were not fanished by their Kings, nor those Mens vices deform them that were. Amor interdum nimis videt, interdum nihil videt, Love sees one while too much, another while farks nothing. Hence it came to pass, that after a few Years (for direction and restraint of Royal Power) Laws were established: and that Government which had this mixture of Equality (holding in an even Balance Supreme Power and Common Right) acquired the Title of Regal: the other (which had it not) was known for Tyrannical: the one God established in favour of his People: the other he permitted for their affliction.

In the Infancy of this Regal Authority, Princes as they were chosen for their Virtues only: so did they measure their Powers by a great deal of Moderation. And therefore (saith Fabius Pictor) Principes, quia iusti erant, & religionem dedux, jure habiti fecerunt, Dei & dii: Princes, because they were just and religious, were rightly accounted and called Gods. De arce part. 1.

And though (speaking humanly) the beginning of Empire may be ascribed to Reason and Necessity; yet it was God himself that first kindled this Light in the minds of Men, whereby they saw that they could not live and be preserved without a Ruler and Conductor: God himself by his eternal Providence having ordained Kings; and the Law of Nature Leaders, and Rulers over others. For the very Bees have their Prince; the Deer their Leaders; and Cranes (by order imposed) watch for their own safety. The most High beareth Rule over the Kingdoms of Men; and appointeth over it whomsoever he pleareth. By me (saith Wisdom, spoken by the Son of God) Kings reign; by me Princes rule, and it is I God (saith Daniel) that setteth up Kings, and taketh away Kings: and that this Power is given from God, Christ himself witnesseth, speaking to Pilate, Those couldst have no power at all against me, except it were given thee from above. Dan. 4. 21. Prov. 8. 15. Dan. 2. 21. Job. 19. 21.

It was therefore by a threefold Justice that the World hath been governed from the beginning, (to wit) by a Justice natural: by which the Parents and Elders of Families governed their Children, and Nephews, and Families, in which Government the Obedience was called Natural Piety: again, by a Justice Divine, drawn from the Laws and Ordinances of God: and the obedience hereunto was called Conscience; and lastly by a Justice Civil, begotten by both the former: and the obedience to this we call Duty. That by these three those of the eldest times were commanded: and that the Rule in general was paternal, it is most evident: for Adam being Lord over his own Children, instructed them in the service of God his Creator, as we read, Cain and Abel brought Obolations before God, as they had been taught by their Parent, the Father of Mankind.

Of the three commendable sorts of Government with their opposites: and of the degrees of Humane Society.

WHAT other Policy was exercised, or State founded after such time as Mankind was greatly multiplied before the Flood, it cannot be certainly known, though it seem by probable Conjecture, that the same was not without Kings in that first Age: it being possible that many Princes of the Egyptians (remembered among their Antiquities) were before the general Flood; and very likely,

Necessity of laws just as, & immutability of Providence requires.

AND with this Supreme Rule and Kingly Authority began also other degrees and differences of Orders, by the same Rule, by which themselves were chosen; unto whom they gave Place, Traikt and Power. From which Employments and Offices sprang those Titles and those degrees of Honour, which have continued from Age to Age to these days. But this Nobility or difference from the Vulgar, was not in the beginning given to the succession of Blood, but to succession of Vertue, as hereafter may be proved. Though at length it was sufficient Verus nobilis non nascitur sed fit.

Of Nimrod, Belus, and Ninus : and of memorable things about those times.

That Nimrod was the first after the Flood that reigned like Sovereign Lord: and that his beginning seemeth to have been of iust Authority.

Noah to Sem and his Issues. In familia Heber Aug. de remansit hac lingua, In the family of Heber this Lan- Civ. Dei guage remained (saith S. Augustine out of Epipha- l. 6. c. 11.
mas;) and this Language Abraham used: Yea it was antiently and before the Flood the general Speech: and therefore first called (saith Catefrimus) lingua humana: the humane Tongue.

We know that Goropius Becanus following Theodorus, Rabbi Mosés, Aegyptius, Vergara, and others, is of another opinion; but howsoever we determine of this point, we may with good probability resolve, that none of the Godly Seed of Sem were the chief Leaders of this presumptuous multitude. And seeing it is not likely but that some one was by order appointed for this charge, we may imagine that Nimrod rather had it by just Authority, than by violence of usurpation.

6. II.

That Nimrod, Belus, and Ninus were three distinct persons.

BELUS, and out of him Nauclerus with others make many Nimrods. Euphrates confounds him with Belus; and so both S. Affertum upon Ofa; and these words of S. Auguftine feem to make him of the fame opinion. His autem Ninus regnabat poft mortem patris fui Beli, qui primus ille regnaverat 65. annos; There did Ninus Reign after the death of his Father Belus, who first governed in Babylon fifty five Years. But it could not be unknown to S. Auguftine, that Nimrod was the Establisher of that Empire: Mofes being plain and direct therein. For the beginning of Nimrod's Kingdom (faith he) was Babel, Ere, Accad, and Chalne, in the Land of Shinar: Wherefore Nimrod was the first King of Babel. And certainly it beft agreeth with reason, that Ninus was the third, and not one with Nimrod, as Mercator (led by Clement) fuppofed: for in Ninus time the World was marvelloufly repopled. And if S. Auguftine had undoubtedly taken Belus for Nimrod, he would have given him the name which the Scriptures give him, rather than have borrowed any thing out of prophane Authors. And for those words of S. Auguftine (qui primus ille regnaverat, Who was the first that Reigned there) fuppofed to be by Belus: thefe do not fo difprove that Nimrod was the founder of the Babylonian Empire. For although Julius Cæfar overthrew the liberty of the Roman Commonwealth, making himself a perpetual Dilator; yet Auguftus was the first Establisher of the Empire: and the first that Reigned absolutely by Sovereign Authority over the Romans, as an Emperor. The like may be said of Nimrod, that he first brake the rule of Eldership and Paternity, laying the foundation of Sovereign Rule, as Cæfar did; and yet Belus was the first,

The fame is also confirmed by divers ancient Historians, that Nimrod, Suphne, and Jafan were the Captains and Leaders of all those which came from the East. And though Sem came not himself so far West as Shinar (his lot being cast on the East parts,) yet from his Sons Nephew Heber, the name and Nation of the Hebrews (according to the general opinion) took beginning, who inhabited the Southermost parts of Chanaan about the City of Ur; from whence Abraham was by God called into Charran, and thence into Canaan.

And because those of the Race of Sem which came into Chaldea were no Partners in the unbelieving work of the Tower: therefore (as many of the Fathers conjecture) did they retain the first and most antient Language, which the Fathers of the first Age had left to Noah; and

... and Joe Davis was the one who

cient for those whose Parents were advanced, to be known for the Sons of such Fathers: and so they needed then no endeavour of well-doing at all, or any contention for them to excel, upon whom Glory or Worldly Nobility necessarily depended. Yet herof had Nobility denomination in the beginning, That such as excelled others in Vertue were so called. Hinc dictum Nobilitas, quasi virtute præ aliis nobilitas. But after that time as the deserved Honour of the Father was given in reward to his Posterity, S. Hieron. judged of the Succession in this manner. Nihil aliud video in Nobilitate appetendum, nisi quod Nobilitas quadam necessitate constringatur, ut antiquiorum probitate degeneret: I seque non aliud thing to be effected in Nobility, than that Noblemen are by a kind of necessity bound on to degenerate from the vertue of their ancestors. For if Nobility be virtus & antiqua decore, Vertue and ancient Riches, then to exceed in all those things which are extra hominem, as Riches, Power, Glory, and the like, do no otherwise define Nobility, than the word Animal alone doth define a reasonable Man. Or if heronour (according to L. Fieser) be a witness of Vertue and well-doing: and Nobility (after Plutarch) the continuance of Vertue, then the Race or Linage: then are those in whom Vertue is extinguished, but like unto Painted and Printed Passions, which ignore men worship instead of Christ, our Lord, and other Saints: Men, in whom there remain, but the dreggs and vices of antique vertue: Flowers, and Herbs, which by change of Soil and want of Mannuring are turned to Weeds. For what is found praise-worthy in those waters, which had their beginning out of pure Fountains, if in all the rest of their course they run foul, filthy, and defiled? Ex terra fertilis producit aurum, aliquid et cicuta venenosa, & ex terra ferilis pretiosum aurum: Out of fruitful ground ariseth sometimes poisoning Hemlock: And out of barren Soil pretious Gold. For as all things consist of matter and form, so doth Cherion (in his Chapter of Nobility) call the Race and Linage be the matter of Nobility: the form (which gives life and perfect being) he maketh to be the Vertue and Quality, profitable to the Commonwealth. For he is truly and entirely Noble, who maketh a singular profession of publick Vertue, serving his Prince and Country, and being defended of Parents and Ancestors, that have done the like. And although that Nobility, which the fame Author calleth personal, (the fame which our selves acquire by our Vertue and well deservings) cannot be balanced with that which is both natural by descent, and also personal; yet if vertue be wanting to the natural then is the personal and acquired Nobility by many degrees to be prepared: For (saith this Charon) this Honour, to wit) by descent, may lie upon such one, as in his own nature is a true Villain. There is also a third Nobility which he calleth Nobility in Parchment, bought with Silver or Favour: And these be indeed but Honours of affection, which Kings with the change of their fancies will they know well how to wipe off again. But surely if we had as much sense of our degenerating in Worthiness, as we have of Vanity in deriving our selves of such and such Parents, we should rather know such Nobility (without Vertue) to be Shame and Dishonour, than Nobleness, and glory to vaunt thereof, What calamity is wanting (saith Bernard) to him that is born in sin, of a Poſtore body and barren mind? for (according to the same Barth) Ole facinus fugacius honoris hujus, & male contentum glorie, &c. Wipe away the painting of this fleeting Honour, and the glittering of the ill earned glorie, that then thou maist consider thyself nakedly: For thou canst naked out thy Mothers Womb. Canst thou thence with thy Arms, or glistering with Jewels, or garnished with Silks, or adorned with Feathers, or ſuffed with Gold? If thou scatter and blow away all these by thy consideration as certain morning Clouds, which do or will soon pass over, then shalt thou stand a naked, and poor, and wretched, and miserable Adam, and blessing, because he is naked, and weeping because he is born, and repining because he is born to Labour, and not to Flourish.

For as touching the matter of all Men, there is no difference between it and Dust: which if thou dost not believe (saith S. Chrysostom) look into the Sepulchers and Monument of thy Ancestors, and they shall easily persuade thee by their own example; that thou art dust and dirt: So that if man seems more Noble and beautiful than dust, this proceedeth not from the diversity of his Nature, but from the cunning of his Creator.

For true Nobility standeth in the Trade
Of vertuous life ; not in the fleshly line :
For Blood is brute, but Gentry is Divine.

And howsoever the custom of the World have made it good, that Honours be cast by Birth upon unworthy Issues: yet Salomon (as wise as any King) reprehendeth the same in his fellow Princes. There is an evil (saith he) that I have seen under the Sun, as an error that proceedeth from the face of Ecclesiastes him that ruleth. Folly is set in great excellency.

CHAP.

who peaceably, and with a general allowance excused such a power. Petrus is of opinion, that Belus and Nimrod were the same, because many things are said of them both agreeing in time: for it was about 200 years after the Flood (as they account) that Belus Rained: but such agreement of times proves it not. For Edward the Third, and his Grand-child Richard the Second, were Kings both in one Year: the one dyed; the other in the same Year was Crowned King.

And yet the opinion (that Nimrod and Belus were one) is far more probable than that of Mercator, who makes Ninus and Nimrod to be the same. For it is plain that the beginning of Nimrod's Kingdom was Babel, and the Towns adjoining: but the first and most famous work of Ninus was the City of Ninive.

Now whereas D. Siculus affirmeth that Ninus overcame and suppressed the Babylonians, the same rather proveth the contrary, than that Ninus and Nimrod were one Empire. For Ninus established the seat of his Empire at Ninive in Assyria, whence the Babylonians might (perchance) in disdain thereof fall from his obedience, whom he recovered again by strong hand; which was easie: Babylon being not walled till Semiramis's time.

— Dicitur autem Cathibus muris cinxisse Semiramis Urbem.

Semiramis with Walls of Brick the City did inclose.

Further where it is alledged, that as the Scriptures call Nimrod mighty: so Jysine hath the same of Ninus, which is one of Mercator's arguments; It may be answered, that such an addition might have been given to many other Kings aswell. For if we may believe Jysine; then were Pexoris King of Egypt, and Tanis of Scythia mighty Kings before Ninus was born. And if we may compare the words of Moses (touching Nimrod) with the undertakings of Ninus, there will be found great difference between them. For whereas Mercator conceiveth that it was too early for any that lived about the time of the confusion of Languages, to have invaded and mastered those Cities so far removed from Babel, namely Erec, Accad, and Chane: which work he therefore ascribeth to Ninus, as a Man of the greatest undertaking; and consequently would have Nimrod to have been long after the time, in which we suppose he flourished; and both those names of Nimrod and Ninus to belong to one person, to wit, to Ninus: to these things to make some answer. First, I do not find that supposition true, That ever Nimrod invaded any of these Cities; but that he founded them and built them from the Ground, being the first after the Flood, that conducted the Children of Noah into those parts: and therefore had nothing built or erected to his hands.

Belides, whereas these Cities in many mens opinions are found to stand far away from Babylon, I find no reason to bring me to that belief. The City of Accad which the Sepuagint calls Archad, and Epiphanius Arphal, Junius takes to be Nisibis in Mesopotamia: for the Region thereabout, the Cyngographi (faith he) call Accadene for Accadene. Others understand Nisibis and Ninus to be one City: so do Strabo and Sepuagint confound it with Charan; but all mistaken. For Nisibis, Accad, and Charan are distinct places. Though I cannot deny Accadene to be a Region of Mesopotamia, the same which Aria Montanus out of S. Hieron calls Acad: and so do the Hebrews also call Nisibis, which seemeth to be the cause of this mistake. As for the City of Erec, which the Sepuagint call Orech, S. Augusline Oreg, and Pagninus Erec, this place Junius understandeth for Arraca in Susiana: but there is also a City in Comagena called Arace: and indeed likelihood of name is no certain proof, without the assistance of other circumstances.

Concerning the third City (called Chane) some take it for Calansis: of which Am. Marcellinus, Lit. 23. S. Hieron takes it for Seleucia; Hieropolymitanus for Cressiphon: others do think it to be the Agrani upon Euphrates, destroyed and razed by the Perfians. But let Moses be the Moderator and Judge of this dispute, who teacheth us directly, that these Cities are not seated in so divers and distant Regions; for these be his words: And the beginning of his Kingdom (speaking of Nimrod) was Babel, Erec, Accad, and Chane, in the Land of Shinar: so as in this Valley of Shinar, or Babylonia, or Chaldaea (being all one) we must find them. And therefore I could (rather of the two) think with Vierbiewitz, that these four made but one Babylon, than that they were Cities far removed, and in several Provinces, did not the Prophet Amos precisely distinguish Chane from Babylon. Amos (faith Amos) is Chane, and from thence go you to Hamath, and to Gath of the Philistines.

The Geneva Translation favouring the former opinion, to set these Cities out of Shinar, hath a Marginal Note expressing that Shinar was here named: not that all these Cities were therein seated, but to distinguish Babylon of Chaldaea, from Babylon in Egypt; but find little substance in that conceit. For sure I am, that in the beginning of Nimrod's Empire there was no such Babylon, nor any City at all to be found in Egypt: Babylon of Egypt being all one with the great City of Cairo, which was built long after, not far from the place where stood A Memphis the ancient City, but not so ancient as Babylon upon Euphrates. Now that Chane is situate in the Valley of Shinar, it hath been formerly proved in the Chapter of Paradis. So as for any argument that may be brought to the contrary, from the remote situation of these three Cities from Babylon, we may continue in our opinion, That Nimrod, Belus, and Ninus, were distinct and Successive Kings.

§. III.

That Nimrod, not Assur, built Ninive: and that it is probable out of Esay 23. 13. that Assur built Ur of the Chaldees.

NOW as of Nimrod: so are the opinions of Writers different touching Assur, and touching the beginning of that great Seat of Babylon and Assyria: a Controversie wearisomely disputed without any direct proof, conclusion, or certainty. But to me (of whom, where the Scriptures are silent, the voice of Reason hath the best hearing) the interpretation of Junius is most agreeable; who besides all necessary consequence doth not disjoin the sense of the Scriptures therein, nor confuse the understanding thereof. For in this sort he converteth the Hebrew Text. Erat enim principium Regni ejus Babel & Erec, & Accad, & Chane, in terra Shinar; i. terra hac processit in Assyriam ubi edificavit Ninivem: (which is) For the beginning of this Kingdom was Babel, bel, and Erec, and Accad, and Chane, in the Land of Shinar: and he went forth of this Land into Assyria, and built Ninive. So as Junius takes Assur in this place, not for any person, but for the Region of Assyria: the Land being focussed in Moses's time, and before it. For certainly the other construction, (where the word [Assur] is taken for Assur the Son of Sem) doth not answer the order which Moses observeth through all the Books of Genesis, but is quite contrary unto it. For in the beginning of the tenth Chapter he setteth down the Sons of Noah in these words. Now these are the Generations of the Sons of Noah: Sin, Ham, and Japheth, unto whom Sin was born after the Flood: then it followeth immediately. The Sons of Japheth were Gomer, &c. so as Japheth is last named among Noah's Sons, he is eldest or youngest: because he was first to be spoken of: with whom (having last named him) he proceeds and sets down his issue, and then the issue of his Sons: first, the issue of Gomer; Japheth's eldest Son; and then speaks of Javan and his Sons: for of the rest of that Family he is silent. Upon after he numbeth the Sons of Ham, of which Cush was the eldest; and then the Sons of Cush and Mizraim; and afterward of Sin Canaan; leaving Sem for the last, because he would not disjoin the Story of the last, because he would not begin with Sem, he continueth from thence by Arphaxad, Shelah, and Eber, unto Abraham; and so to Jacob, and the Fathers of that Nation. But to have brought in one of the Sons of Sem in the middle of the Generations of Ham, had been against order; neither would Moses have passed over so slightly the erection of the Assyrian Empire. In one of the Sons of Sem, if he had had any such meaning: it being the Story of Sem's Sons which he most attended. For he nameth Nimrod apart, after the rest of the Sons of Cush, because he founded the Babylonian and Assyrian Empire: and in the eleventh Chapter he returns to speak of the building of Babel in particular, having formerly named it in the tenth Chapter, with those other Cities which Nimrod founded in Shinar. And as he did in the tenth Chapter, so also in the eleventh he maketh no report of Sem, till such time as he had finished so much of Nimrod as he meant to touch: and then he beginneth with the issue of Sem, which he continueth to Abraham and Israel. And of Junius's opinion touching Assur, was Calvin: to which I conceive that P. Comestor in his Historia Scholastica gave an entrance, who after he had delivered this place in some other sense, he useth these words. Vel intelligendum non est de Assur filio Sem, &c. sed Assur (id est) Regem Assyriorum inde egressum est, quod tempore Saragis praevis Abrahami factum est. (which is) Or else it is not to be understood of Assur the Son of Sem, &c. but Assur (that is) the Kingdom of the Assyrians came from thence (videlicet from Babylon) or was made out of it: which happened in the time of Sarag the great Grandfather of Abraham. After which he reconcilith the differences in this sort: If you take the Ancient Belus (meaning Nimrod) to be the first erector of the Assyrian Empire, or the first Founder thereof, it is true quantum ad initium, respecting the beginning; but others conceive that it had beginning from Ninus, which is also true quantum ad Regni ampliationem, regarding the enlargement of the Empire. To this I may add the opinion of Epiphanius confirmed by Cassiodorus, who takes Assur to be the Son of Nimrod: and so doth Abrahamus, and Vierbiewitz, S. Hieron and Cyrillus, and now lastly Ternellius: who faith he took upon him that name of Assur after he had beaten the Assyrians, as Scipio did of Africanus after his Conquest in Africa: and that Assur was a common name to the Kings of Assyria, as it appeareth by many Scriptures, as Psalm 81. Esay 10. Olea 5. &c. but to help the matter he makes Nimrod of the race of Sem, and the Son of Ira. But Rabanus Maurus, who was Archbishop of Metz, in the Year of Christ 834. an Ancient and learned Writer, understandeth this place with Comestor, or Comestor with him, agreeing in substance with that translation of Junius: to which words of Moses he giveth this fence. De hac terra Assyriorum pullavit imperium, qui ex nomine Ninus, Belu filii, Ninum considerant, urbem magnam, &c. Out of this Land grew the Empire of the Assyrians who built Ninus the great City, so named of Ninus the Son of Belus. On the contrary Calvin objecteth this place of Isaiah. Behold the land of the Chaldeans, this was no people, Assur founded it by the inhabitants of the wilderness; than which there is no one place in the Scriptures that hath a greater diversity in the translation and understanding; inasmuch as Michael de palatio Isaias (though in all else very diligent) passeth it over. But Calvin seemeth hereby to infer, that because Assur founded the State of the Chaldeans; therefore also Assur rather than Nimrod established the Assyrian Empire, and built Ninive: contrary to the former translation of Junius, and to his own opinion. Now out of the Vulgar, (called Etymologiae translation) it may be gathered that Assur both founded and ruined this Estate or City of the Chaldeans, by Isaiah remembered: unto which City, People or Estate, he plainly telleth the Tyrans that they cannot trust, or hope for relief thence. Or rather it may be taken, that the Prophet maketh this City of Chaldaea, and that Estate, an example unto those Phoenicians, whom in this place he foretelleth of their ruin: which City of Chaldaea being of strength, and carefully defended, was (notwithstanding) by the Assyrians utterly wasted and destroyed: whereby he giveth them knowledge, and foretelleth them, that their own City of Tyre, (invincible, as themselves thought) should also soon after be overturned by the same Assyrians: as (indeed) it was by Nabuchodonosor. And these be the words after Hierome: Eccae terra Chaldaeorum, talis populus non fuit, Assur fundavit eam, in captivitatem traducerunt robustos ejus, infederunt domos ejus, populum eam in ruinam. (which is) Behold the Land of the Chaldeans, such a People there were not (or this was no People, after the Geneva) Assur (or the Assyrians) founded it, they carried away their strong Men Captives, they undermined their Houses, and ruined their City. The Sepuagint express it but in a part of another Verse, in these words. *Et in terra Chaldaeorum, & hac desolata est ab Assyris, quantum murus ejus corruit, making the fence perfect by the preceding Verse, which all together may be thus understood. If thou go over to Chittim (which is Macedonia or Greece) yet thou shalt have no rest, (speaking to the Tyrans) neither in the Land of the Chaldeans, for this is made desolate by the Assyrians, because their Walls fell together to the Ground. Pagninus and Vasbanus convert it thus. Eccae terra Chaldaeorum, sicut populus non erat illic olim; nam Assur fundavit eam novam, erexitque aces illius, contrivitque domos ejus, populum eam in ruinam: which may be thus Englished. Behold the Land of the Chaldeans, this People was not once therein inhabiting: for Assur built it a Harbour for Ships, they crested the Towers thereof, and again broke down the Houses thereof, and wasted it. Junius in the place of Ships sets the word [pro Barbaris] that is, for the Barbarians; and the Geneva, by the Barbarians. But this is undoubted that the Prophet Isaiah, as may be gathered by all the fence of the Chapter) did* not. Assur

Gen. 10.

So as this place of Eſay, which breedeth some doubt in Calvin, proveth in nothing the contrary opinion, nor in any part weakeneth the former Translation of Junius, nor the interpretation of Comestor and Rabanus. For though other Men have not conceived (for any thing that I have read) that Aſſir is in this place diversly taken (as for the Son of Sem, when he is spoken of as a Build-

Of the acts of Nimrod and Belus, as far as now they are known.

BUT to return to the Story, it is plain in Masfa that Nimrod (whom Philo interpreteth Infusum; and Jafus of the B-lybanian Monarchy) was the Establisher of this City, and that his Empire in the beginning consisted of those four Cities before remembred, Babel, Eref, Accad, and Cadash; and that from hence he propagated his Empire into Affria; and in Affria built four more Cities (to wit) Ninive, Rebekab, Celab, and Refen. And feeling that he spent much time in building Babel it self and those adjoining, and that his Travails were many ere he came into Shinar at that wo:k of Babel (such as it was) with the other three Cities, and the large Foundation of

§. V.

That we are not to marvel how so many Kingdoms could be erected about these times: and of Vexoris of Fievet, and Panais of Scythia.

THAT so many Kingdoms were erected in all those Eastern parts of the World so soon after Nimrod, Y as by the Story of Nimrod is made manifest: the Causes were threefold; (namely) Opportunity, Example, and Necessity. For Opportunity being a Prince's liberal and powerful bettoweth on her first Entertainers many times more Benefits, than either Fortune can, or Wisdom ought; by whose preference alone the understanding Minds of Men receive all those Helps and Supplies; which they either want, or wish for: so as every Leader of a Troop (after the division of Tongues and dispersion of People) finding these fair Offers made unto them, held the Power which they possess, and are governed by Discretion all those People, whom they conducted to their designed places. For it cannot be conceived, that when the Earth was divided, Mankind straggled abroad like birds in a Desert; but that by Agreement they disposed themselves, and undertook to inhabit all the known parts of the World, and by distinct Families and Nations: otherwise, those remote Regions from Babylon and Sinear, which had Kings, and were peopled in Nimrod's time, would not have been peopled in many hundreds of Years after, as then they were; neither did those that were sent, and travelled far off (Order being the true Parent of prosperous Success) undertake so difficult Enterprises without a Conductor or Commander. Secondly, the Example of Nimrod with whom it succeeded well, strengthened every Humour that aspired. Thirdly, Necessity resolved all Men by the Arguments of common Miseries, that without a Commander and Magistrate, neither could those that were laborious, and of honest Dispositions, enjoy the Harvest of their own Travels: nor those which were of little strength, secure themselves against forcible Violence: nor those which fought after any proportion of Greatness, either possess the same in quiet, or rule and order their own Ministers and Attendants.

That these causes had wrought these effects, the Undertakings and Conquests of Ninus (the Son of Belus) made it apparent: for he found every where Kings and Monarchs, what way soever his Ambition led him in the Wars.

But Ninurad (his Grand-father) had, no Companion King, to us known, when he first took on him Sovereignty and sole Commandment of all those the Children of Noah, which came from the East into Babylonia: though in his Life time others also raised themselves to the same Estate; of which hereafter. Belus (his Son and Successor) found Sabatur King of Armenia and Scythia, sufficiently powerful to resist his Attempts: which Sabatur I take to be the same, which Tyfine calls Tanis; and should compare, that Misram had been his Exoriz, were it not that I vehemently suspect some error, (as Tyfine placeth him) in the time of that Exoriz, who by many Circumstances seems to me rightly accounted by the judicious and learned Reineccius all one with the great Sesoftris, that lived certain Ages after Ninus. This Belus, the second King of Babylon, reigned 65 Years, according to the common Account.

§. VI.

Of the Name of Belus, and other Names affine unto it.

W Hence this second King and Successor of Nimrod had the Name of Bel, or Belus, question hath been made: for it seemeth rather a Name imposed, (or of addition) given by Nimrod, than assumed by Belus himself.

Cyrillus against Julian calls the Father of Ninus Arborea, affirming that he was the first of all Men that could himself be called a God: whence more it is so, then might the Name of Belus be thence derived. But Belus as many learned Writers have observed, signifies the Sun in the Chaldean Tongue; and therefore did Ninus and Semiramis give that Name to their Father, that he might be honoured as the Sun, which the Babylonians worshipped as a God. And as this Title was assumed in after-times by divers others of the Chaldean Princes, and Babylonian Satraps: so was it used (in imitation) by the chief of the Carthaginians and other Nations, as some Historians have conceived.

have come To this Bel, or Belus, pertain (as in affinity) those Voices of Baal, Belphegor, Belphegor, Belphegor, Belphegor, and Belphegor. Those that are learned in the Hebrew and Chaldaean, convert the word Baal
by the Latin Principis militie, Chief in the War, though Daniel was so called (Chief Suidas) ob honorem explicatissimi arcanaeum verum. In honour of his expounding secrets. S. Hierome makes Bel, Beel, and Baal, to have the same signification: and Nicetas that the Idol of Babylon was so called, which Nicetas in memory of his Father set up to be worshipped:
to which that he might add the more Honour and Reverence, he made it a Sanctuary and Refuge for all Offenders. Hence (Latin Lyranus) came Idolatry, and the first use of Images into the World. Nicetas doth interpret Bel by Vetus, old or ancient; adding, that as among the Affyrans it is taken for Savem and the Sun: so in the Persick or Cartaginian Language it signifieth God. Geoplic makes it a Tyrann name properly; and Thyoplic a Tyrann. He also affirmeth that the Idol which the Moabites worshipped (by them erected upon the Mountain Phegor, or Peor, and called Baal) is the same which the Latins call Friapus, the God of Gardens; which was also the opinion of S. Hierome. But that the word Bel, or Beel, was as much to say as God, apareth

appareth by the word Belzebub, the Idol of Accaron. For Bel, or Bel founded [God] and Sabab, [Flies or Hornets:] by which Name (notwithstanding) the Yews express the Prince of Devils. But the Prophet Osai teacheth as the proper signification of this word from the voice of God himself; And as that day (saith the Lord) thou shalt call me Ishi, and shalt call me no more Baalim: for I will take away the name of Baalim out of their mouth. For although the name of Baal, or Babel, be justly to be used towards God: yet in respect that the same was given to Idols, God both hated it and forbid it. And the using of the word Bel among the Chaldeans for the Sun, was not because it properly signifieth the Sun, but because the Sun there was worshipped as a God: as also the Fire was, tantum Solis particula. As for the words compounded (before remembered) as Belphegor, and Belphegon; Belphegon is expounded out of Fagus, Dominus specula vel custodia, The Lord of the Watch-tower or of the Guard: the other word noteth the Idol, and the place wherein it was worshipped. It is also written Belpoor, or Baalpeor: and Peor (they say) is as much as Demadavis; and therefore the word joined expresseth a naked Image. Some there are that call this Belus, the Son of Saturn: in that it was used among the Ancients to name the Father Saturn, the Son Jupiter, and the Grand-child Hercules. Saturnus dicuntur familiaribus Belus, Regem qui urbes considerant sensibus; primogeniti eorum Jovis & Junonis; Hercules vero nepotes eorum fortissimi. The ancientest of Noble Families and Kings which founded Cities, are called Saturnus; their first-born Jupiters and Janos's; their eldest nephews Hercules. But this Belus (saith L. Vossius) was famous by reason of his Warlike Son Ninus, who caused his Father to be worshipped as a God by the name of Jupiter Babilonius, whom the Aegyptians (transported by the Dreams of their Auidity) make one of theirs. For Neptune (they say) upon Lilya the Daughter of Epaphus begat this Jupiter Belus, who was Father to Aegyptus. They add, that this Belus carrying a Colony to the River of Emphrates there built a City, in which he ordained Priests after the Aegyptian manner. But there were any Belus the Son of Epaphus and Isti, or of Neptune and Lilya, or (with Eusebius) of Telephus, who after the death of Apis married Isti, (except their reigning in Athen) the same was not this Babylonian Belus of whom we speak, but rather some other Belus, of whom the Aegyptians so much wanted.

§. VII.

Of the worshipping of Images begun from Belus in Babel.

AS for the Babylonian Belus, he was the most ancient Belus, and the Inventor of Astronomy, it Pliny lay true: from whence the Aegyptians might borrow both the Name and the Doctrine. Some part of the Temple, in which his Statue or Image was honoured as a God, the same Author affirmeth that it remained in his time.

Of the Sepulchre of Belus, Strabo writeth thus. Over the River (saith he) there are Gardens, where they lay the Ruines of Belus his Tomb, which Xerxes brake up, are yet remaining. It was a square Pyramid made of Brick, a Furlong high, and on every side it had a Furlong in breadth. It appears by Cyris against Julian, that he obtained Divine Worship yet living: for so he writes of him (calling him Arbelus, Arbelus, vir superbus & arrogant, primus hominum dicitur à subditis Deitatis nomen accipit: perferendum igitur Asprios, & finitima illis gentes sacrificantes ei. Arbelus, a Men very proud and arrogant, is accounted to be the first of all Men that was ever honoured by their Subjects with Title of Deity; (or with the Name of God) The Assyrians therefore and the bordering Nations have performed, sacrificing to him. Even Arus also, whom Suidas calls Thurax, who succeeded next after Ninyas, was made an Idol-God among them, if we credit Suidas.

After Ninus (that is, after Ninyas) Thurax reigned (saith Suidas) whom they called after the name of the Planet Mars; a Man of sharp and fierce Disposition, who bidding Battel to Caucasus of the Stock of Japheth slew him. The Assyrians worshipped him for their God, and called him Baal (that is) Mars; thus far Suidas. Neither is it unlikely but that many among idolatrous Nations were Deified in their Life-times, or soon after: though I deny not but that the most of their Images and Statues were first erected without Divine Worship, only in memory of the glorious Acts of Benefactors, as Glycerus rightly conceiveth; and so afterward the Devil crept into those wooden and brazen Carcases, when Polegry had lost the Memory of their first Invention. Hence Isidore speaketh in this manner. Quasi autem Pagani Deos essent homines fuerunt, & pro uniuscujusque vita meritis vel magnificentia, colit apud suos post mortem caperunt: sed (Demetrius persequitur) quos illi pro sua memoria habuerunt, videtur Deos existimant: ad id autem magis excedit, quod post mortem signamenta, They were Men (saith he) whom the Pagans affirmed to be Gods; and every one of these Merits or Magnificence began after his death, & he honoured of his own. But in length (the Devil persuading) they accounted themselves Gods, which Memories they believed: and the Editors of this Book made the Opinions (concerning the Honours of the Dead) much more superstitious.

And that the worshipping of Images was brought in by the Pagans, and Heathen Nations, it is not Isidore alone that witnesseth; but Gregory, Gregorius (saith he) invenit & caput est imaginum, Gentilium is the Inventor and ground of Images; and Ambrose; Gentes lignum adorant, tantum imaginem Dei. The Gentiles adore Wood as if it were the Image of God. Eusebius also affirmeth as much, and calleth the worshipping of Images a Custom borrowed of the Heathen. The like hath Saint Augustine against Adimantus. Et veretur (saith Augustinus) ne religio vana sit, si nihil vident quid Lat. lib. 2. adorent, They fear their Religion would be vain, should they not see that which they worship.

And (out of doubt) the Schoolmen thift this fearful Custom very strangely. For feing the very Workmanship is forbidden, how can the Heart of a wise Christian fatisfie it self with the distinction of Doula and Hyperdoula, which can imply nothing but some difference of worshipping of those Images after they are made? And it is of all things the most strange, why religious and learned Men should strain their Wits to defend the use of those things, which the Scriptures have not only no where warranted, but expressly in many places forbidden, and cursed the practicers thereof. Yet this Doctrine of the Devil was so strongly and subtilly rooted, as neither the expresse Commandment of God himself, Thou shalt not make any graven Image, nor all the threatnings of Moses and the Prophets after him could remove, weed it, or by fear, or by any persuasions lead the Hearts of Men from it. For where shall we find words of greater weight, or of plainer instruction than these? Take therefore good heed to your selves (for ye saw no Image in the day that the Lord spake unto you in Horeb out of the midst of the fire) that ye corrupt not your selves, and make you a graven Image, or representation of any figure, whether it be the likeness of Male or Female.

And besides the expresse Commandment, Thou shalt make thee no graven Image, and the prohibition in many Scriptures, so it is written in the Book of Wisdom. That the invention of Idols was the beginning of Whoredom: and the finding of them the corruption of life: for they were not from the beginning, neither shall they continue for ever.

And whereas the Schoolmen affirm, that the Prophets spake against the worshipping of the Heathen Idols, it is manifest that Moses spake of Images of the living God, and not of Baal and the rest of that nature. For you saw no Image (saith Moses) that day that the Lord spake unto you in Horeb: surely it was excellently said of Baith, Noli aliquem in illo formam imaginari, ne circumscribas eum mente tua. Do not imagine any form to be in God, lest thou limit or circumscribe him in thy mind too. Now, if the great Baith thought it a presumption unlawful to represent a pattern of the infinite God to our own thoughts and minds, how far do those men presume that put him under the greafie pencil of a Painter, or the rusty Ax or other instrument of a Carpenter or Carver?

For as this dishonour to the infinite and incomprehensible God began in Babel: so did the Devil transport and speed this invention into all the Regions adjoining, and into Egypt, and Greece.

The Romans for a while resisted the erection of these Idols and Images, refusing to set them in their Temples for 170 Years, observing therein the Law of Numa: who thought it impious to resemble things most beautiful, by things most base. But Tarquinius Priscus afterwards prevailing, and following the vanity of the Gracians (a Nation of all others under the Sun most deluded by Satan) let up the Images of their Gods; which (as S. Augustine witnesseth) that learned Varro both bewailed, and utterly condemned: and which Seneca thus deniceth. Simulachra deorum venerantur, illis supplicatur, genus peffio illa adorant, & cum hoc supplicium, fides qui illa fecere continentur. The Images of the Gods are worshipped, those they pray unto with kneeling knees; those they adore, and while they greatly admire them, they contemn the Handicraftsmen that made them: which also Sedulius the Poet in this fort scoffeth at.

De Crete. lib. 1. c. 13.

Heu miseri qui vana colunt, qui corde sinistro Religiosa fide sculptant simulachra, suavem faciem jurgunt, & quæ fecere venerant. Quis furor est? quæ tanta animi dementia ludii? Ut Volucrum, turpes, Bovem, torvumque, Draconem, Semi-hominemque, Canem supplex Homo prorsus adoret.

Ah wretched they that worship Vanities, And consecrate dumb Idols in their Heart, Who their own Maker (God on high) despise, And fear the work of their own hands and art. What fury? what great madness doth beguile Mens minds? that Man should ugly shape adore, Of Birds, or Bulls, or Dragons, or the vile Half-dogg Half-man on Knees for aid implore.

And though this device was Barbarous, and first, and many years practised by Heathen Nations only, till the Yews were corrupted in Egypt, yet it is not Seneca alone that laugheth to scorn the ignorant stupidity of his Nation: but Justin Martyr remembered how the Sibyls inveighed against Images: and Hosianus, how Sophocles taught, that it was pernicious to the Souls of men to erect and adore those Bables. Strabo and Hierodotus witness, that the Perfians did not erect or set up any Statue of their Gods. Lycurgus never taught it the Lacedæmonians, but thought it impious to represent immortal natures by mortal figures. Eusebius also witnesseth in his sixth Book de preparativa Evangelica, that it was forbidden by a Law in Syria, or among the Brachmans in India, that Images should be worshipped. The same do Tacitus and Crispian report of the Ancient Germans. Many other Authors might be remembered that witness the disdain which the Heathen themselves had of this childish idolatry: of which Hosianus hath written at large in his Tract de origine imaginum. And it was truly said, Omnia male exempla hominis orta sunt. All ill examples have sprung from good beginning. The Heathen at first made these Statues and Images, but in memory of such remarkable men, as had deserved best of their Countries and Commonwealths: Effigies hominum (saith Pliny) non solum exprimi nisi aliqua illustri causâ perpetuarent merentur: Men were not wont to make pictures, but of men which merited for some notable cause to be perpetually remembered. And though of the more ancient Papists, some have borrowed of the Gentiles (as appeareth in Laërtius) that defence for Images: That Simulacra sunt pro elementis literarum, ut per ea discreti homines Deum invisibilem cognoscere: Images (say they, and so before them the Heathen said) are instead of Letters, whereby men might learn to know the invisible God: in which understanding (perhaps) they no otherwise esteemed them than Pictures indeed; yet as that of Baal or Bel set up in memory of Belus the Babylonian became afterwards the most revered Idol of the World, by which so many Nations (and they which were appropriate to God himself) were misled and cast away: so those very Stocks and Stones, and painted Canvases (called the Pictures of Christ, our Lady, and others) were by thousands of ignorant people, not only adored, but esteemed to have life, motion, and understanding. On these stocks we call (saith the Book of Wisdom) when we pass through the raging Waves, on these stocks more rotten than the Ship that carrieth us.

This Heathen invention of Images became so fruitful in after times, breeding an infinite multitude of Gods, that they were forced to distinguish them into Degrees and Orders; as Dio Consentes, seu majorem gentium; scilicet, Patrii, regni, civitatis, medi: Counting Gods, or Gods of the highest Nobility, scilicet Gods, Patrians, Gods of mark, and common Gods (which the Romans called Maxima) dii infimi, and Terrastial Hero's, and multitudes of other Gods: of which S. Augustine hath made large mention in his Book de Civitate Dei. But (saith Laërtius) among all those miserable Souls and rotten Bodies, worshipped by men more like to their Idols, did Epimenides Cretensis (by what good Angel moved I know not) erect in the Athenian Fields, Altars to the unknown God, which stood with the same Title and Dedication even to the times of S. Paul: who made them first know to whom those Altars belonged, and opened their Eyes which were capable of Grace, that they might discern the difference betwixt that light which lighteth every man, and the obscure and stinking mist wherein the Devil had so many years led and misled them. And it sufficed not that the multitude of these Gods was so great in general, or that every Nation had some one which took particular and singular care of them; as Jupiter in Crete, and Isis in Egypt, in Athena Minerva, in Samos Juno, in Paphos Venus, and so of all other parts; but every City, and almost every Family had a God a part.

C. 17. 26.

For as it is written in the second of Kings: the Men of Babel, made Succoth Benoth, and the Men of Cush made Nergal, and the Men of Hamath made Ashma, and the Avims made Nibhaz and Tirach, and the Sephernaim burnt their Children in the fire to Airmenelech. All which how plainly hath the Prophet Esay decided? Men cut down Trees, rinde them, burn a part of them, make ready their meat, and warm themselves by the fire thereof, and of the residue he maketh a God, an Idol, and prayeth unto it: but God hath shut their Eyes from sight, and their hearts from understanding. It is therefore safest for a Christian to believe the Commandments of God fo direct against Idolatry, to believe the Prophets, and to believe S. Paul: who speaketh thus plainly and feelingly. My beloved fly from Idolatry, I speak as unto them which have understanding, judge ye what I say.

Of the Wars of Ninus: and of his War against Zoroaster.

UNTO this Belus succeeded Ninus, the first that commanded the exercise of Idolatry, the first that injuriously invaded his neighbour Princes; and the first that without shame or fear committed Adultery in publick. But as of Belus there is no certain memory (as touching particulars:) so of this Ninus (whose Story is gathered out of prophane Authors) I find nothing fo warrantable, but that the fame may be disputed, and in the greatest part doubted. For although that piece of Berogius set out and commented upon by Amnius hath many good things in it, and giveth great light (as Cyprian noteth) to the understanding of Diadormis Siculus, Dion, Halicarassus, and others: yet Lodovicus Vives, B. Rhennanus, and others after them have laid open the imperfection and defects of the fragment; proving directly that it cannot be the same Berogius which lived in Alexanders time, cited by Athenius and Josephus: and whole Statue the Athenians erected, saith Pliny. Yet it is from him chiefly, that many have gathered the succession of the Babylonian and Assyrian Princes, even from Nimrod to the eighteenth King Ascalades, and to the times of Johanna. For of Metasthenes an Historian, of the Race of the Persian Priests, there are found but certain Papers, or some few lines of the Chaldean and Assyrian Monarchies: but he afterwards in the collection of the Persian Kings is not without his errors.

Citus of Cnidus (a City adjoining to Halicarnassus) who lived together with Cyrus the Young-ger, and with Ariaxerxes Mnemon, gathered his History out of the Persian Records, and reacheth as far upwards as Ninus and Semiramis: and though in the Story of Cyrus the Younger Xenophon approveth him in some things, and Athenius, Paulinus and Tertullian cite him; yet fo base and apparent are his flatteries of the times and Princes with whom he lived, and fo incredible are the numbers which he finds in the Armies of Ninus, and especially of Semiramis; as whatsoever his reports were, times have confuted his works, faving some very few exceptions lately published.

And therefore in things uncertain, feeling a long diffidence cannot be pleasing to men of judgment, I will pass over the acts of this third Assyrian, in as few words as I can exprels them. S. Augustine affirms that Ninus murthered all Asia, India excepted. Others say that he wan it all, fave India, Bactria, and Arabia. For he made Arices of Arabia the companion of his Conquests, with whom he entred into a straight League of amity, because he commanded many people, and was his kinsman, and a Chaste, and the nearest Prince confronting Babylonia. His first enterprize was upon Syria, which he might easily subdue, both because he invaded it on the fuddain, and because it lay next him: And also because the Arabians and their King Arices (which bordered Syria) assisted him in the Conquest thereof.

The King of Armenia, Barzanes, he forced to acknowledge him, and to aid him in his War against Zoroaster: for from Armenia he bent himself that way toward the East; but that ever he commanded the lesser Asia, I do not believe, for none of his successors had any possession therein.

His third War was against Pharus, King of the Medes, whom it is said that he overthrew, and cruelly murthered with his seven Children, though others affirm that they all dyed in one Battle against him. Whether he invaded Zoroaster before the building or amplifying of Ninive, or after, it is uncertain. It is said that he made two expeditions into Bactria: and that hiding little or ill success in the first, he returned, and let the work of Ninive forward: and then a second time entred Bactria with 1700000. Foot, and 200000. Horse, and 10000. fix hundred Chariots: being encountered by Zoroaster with 400000. But Ninus prevailing, and Zoroaster slain, he entred farther into the Country, and belieged the chief City thereof, called Bactra or Bactrian (saith Stephanus;) which by a Sepius wife of Menon he entred and possess. Upon this occasion Ninus both admiring her judgment and valour, together with her person and external Beauty, fancied her fo strongly, as (neglecting all Princely respects) he took her from her Husband, whose eyes he threatened to thrust out if he refused to consent. He therefore yielding to the passion of Love, Ninus, and to the passion of sorrow in himself, by the strong persuasions of shame and dishonour, call himself headlong into the water and died.

CHAP. XI.

Of Zoroaster, supposed to have been the chief Author of Magick arts: and of the divers kinds of Magick.

§. I.

That Zoroaster was not Cham, nor the first Inventor of Astrology, or of Magick: and that there were divers great Magicians of this name.

Zoroaster King of the Bactrians, Vincennus suppoeth to be Cham, the Son of Noah: A fancy of little probability. For Cham was the paternal Ancestor of Ninus; the Father of Cush; the Grand-father of Nimrod, whose Son was Belus, the Father of Ninus. It may be that Vincennus had heard of that Book which was called Scriptura Cham, devised by some wicked Knave, and fo intitled: of which Siculus Senensis hath made the due mention.

It is reported by Cassianus, that Serenus Abbas gave the invention of Magick to Cham, the Son of Noah: fo did Comestor in his Scholistical History: which Art (saith he) with the seven Liberal Sciences he writ in fourteen Pillars: Seven of which were made of Brass, to resist the defacing by the Waters of the Flood; and seven of Brick against the injury of Fire. There was also another devised Discourse, which went under the title of Prophetia Cham. Cassianus out of Serenus hath somewhat like unto this of Comestor. These be Cassianus's words. Cham (filius Noah) qui superfluous istis & sacrilegis suis artibus infestus, scien nullum se posse super his memoriam librum in Arcam profusa inferre, in qua erat cum patre jussu, &c. Cham (the Son of Noah) who was infested with these superfluous, and sacrilegious Arts, knowing that he could not bring any Book or memorial of that nature into the Ark, wherein he was to remain with his godly Father, caused the precepts and rules thereof to be graven in Metal and hard Stone.

S. Augustine noteth that Zoroaster was said to have laught at his Birth, when all other Children weep; which prelagd the great knowledge which afterward he attained unto: being taken for the inventor of natural Magick and other Arts; for the corrupter, saith Pliny and Iustine. But I do not think that Zoroaster invented the Doctrine of the Horoscopes or Nativities: or first found out the nature of Herbs, Stones, and Minerals, or their Sympathetical or Antipathetical workings; of which I know not what King of Chaldea, is also made the Inventor. I rather think that these knowledges were far more antient, and left by Noah to his Sons. For Abraham who had not any acquaintance with Zoroaster, (as Josephus reporteth) was no less learned herein than any other in that age, if he exceeded not all men then living: differing from the wisdom of after-times in this, that he knew and acknowledged the true cause, and gave his Life and Vertue to nature and all natural things; whereas others (forgetting Gods infinite, diffused, and Universal Power) admired the instruments and attributed proper strength to the things themselves, (from which the effects were sensible) which belonged to that wisdom, Which being one, and remaining in it self, can do all things and reneweth all.

Now whether this Zoroaster (overthrown by Ninus) were the same which was so excellent a Naturalist, it is doubted. For Zoroaster the Magician, Cicilius calls Oxyartes, whom Pliny finds of a later time. And if Zoroaster were taken away by a Spirit (being in the midst of his Disciples) as some Authors report, then Zoroaster, slain by Ninus, was not the Magician: which is also the opinion of Scaliger.

Scalig. in Esf. 1.

Again, Josephus and Cadrenus affirm that Serb first found out the Planets, or wandering Stars, and other Motions of the Heavens: for if this Art had been invented by Zoroaster, he could not have attained to any such excellency therein, in his own life time; but being a man (as it seemeth) of singular judgment, he might add somewhat to this kind of knowledge, and leave it by writing to Posterity.

ant. c. 4.

But of this Zoroaster there is much dispute: and no less jangling about the word and art of Magick. Arnobius remembereth four to whom the name of Zoroaster, or Zoroartes was given: which by Hermodorus and Dion seemeth to be but a cognomen, or name of art, and was as much to say, as astrorum cultor. The first, Arnobius calleth the Bactrian, which may be the same that Ninus overthrew: the second, a Chaldean and the Astronomer of Ninus: the Third was Zoroaster Pamphilius, who lived in the time of Cyrus, and his familiar: the fourth Zoroaster Armenius, the Nephew of Hofianes, which followed Xerxes into Greece: between whom and Cyrus there past 78 Years. Suidas remembereth a fifth, called Persomedus sapiens: and Plato speaketh of Zoroaster the Son of Orontasides; which Picus Mirandula confirmeth.

Now of what Nation the first and chief Zoroaster was, it is doubted. Pliny and Laertius make him a Persian. Gemisthius or Pletho, Ficinus and teuchius make him a Chaldean. But by those Books of one Zoroaster, found by Picus Mirandula, it appeareth plainly, that the Author of them was a Chaldean by Nation, though the word (Chaldean) was as often given to the learned Priests peculiarly, as for any distinguishing of Nations. Porphyrius makes the Chaldean and Magi divers; Picus the same. But that this Zoroaster was a Chaldean both by Nation and Profession, it appeareth by his Books, which (saith Picus) were written in the same Language: and the Comment in the same Language. Now that the Magi and they were not differing, it may be judged by the name of those Books of Zoroaster, which in an Epistle of Mirandula to Ficinus, he saith, to be intitled, Parris Ezre Zoroastris & Melchior magorum oracula.

P

by the falshood, subtilty and evnry of the Devil. In the latter there is no other doctrine, than the use of certain ceremonies per malam fidem: by an evil faith: in the former no other ill, than the investigation of those virtues and hidden properties which God hath given to his creatures, and how fully to apply things that work to things that suffer. And though by the Jews, those excellent Ma-

phicians, Philophers, and Divins which came to Worship our Saviour Christ, were termed Macheph- cephim, or Mescalphim; yet had they no other reason than common custom therein. Confectus usual communis Magistri pro Malificis accipit, Common custom (saith S. Hieron.) undersatendit Witches under the name of Magicians: And amiquity (saith Peter Martyr) by the word Malicus understood good and wise men. Quid igitur expawis Mal- icomen fermidolese, nomen Evangelio gratissim, quod non malificum & venificum: sed sapientem sonat & Sacerdotem? O thou fearful one (saith Christ) why dost thou to use the name of Magus, a name glorious in the Gospel, which dost not signify a Witch or Conjuror, a wife man and a Priest? For what broughtest thou to that studdy and profession but only idle ignorance: the Parent of all evils admitted? Causa facti sunt miserrima quodammodo opem, que ut vera est, non potest esse iniqua: sed quia iniqua est, non potest denominari naturalis: sed vel conjunguntur, vel communicantur, vel aliter ad operem unum expeditum facta sunt, opera denominantur crederetur ab ignorantibus here. De operibus hujusmodi facti Magia naturalis, quam Ne-crromantiani multi improprie vocant. The marvelousness of some works of this kind, indeed are natural, both been the cause of this slander: but because these works have been done by procurement of Devils joining the natures together or mingling them, or howsoever joining the natures to their working, they were thought but the works of the Devils by the ignorant. Among these works is natural Magick, which men call very improperly Necromancy.

That the good knowledge in the antient Magick is not to be condemned: though the Devil here as in other kinds hath sought to obtrude evil things under the name and colour of good things.

Seeing therefore it is confelley by all of understanding, that a Magician (according to the Perfian word) is no other than divinatorum cultor & interpret, Afridius obfervor and expounder of Divine things; and the art it felf (I mean the Art of natural Magic) no other, than quam naturalis Philofophia absoluta confummatio. Thus the absolute perfetion of natural Philofophy: Certainly then it proceedeth from common ignorance, and no way forthwith wife and learned Men promiffive, and without difference and diffinition, to confound lawfull and praiseworthy knowledge with that impious, and (to fce S. Paul's words) with thofe beggerly rudiments, which the Devil hath fhuffled in, and by them bewitcheth and befootheth gracelefs Men. For if we condemn natural Magic, or the wil-dom of Nature, becaufe the Devil (who knoweth more than any man) doth alfo teach Witches and Poyfoners the harmful parts of Herbs, Drugs, Minerals, and Excrements: then may we by the fame rule condemn the Phyfician, and the Art of healing. For the Devil alfo in the Oracles of Amphiarus, Amphilochus, Trochimus; and the like, taught men in Dreams what Herbs and Drugs were proper for fuch and fuch Difcafes. Now no man of judgment is ignorant, that the Devil from the beginning hath fought to thruft himfelf into the flame employment among the Minifters and Servants of God, changing himfelf for that purpofe into an Angel of light. He hath led men to Idolatry as a Doctrine of Religion; he hath thruft in his Prophets among thofe of the true God; he hath corrupted the Art of Astrology, by giving a Divine power to the Stars, teaching men to affect them as Gods, and not as Instruments. And (as Buning observeth) it is true, that judicial Astrology is corrupted with many superstitions: but the Astrologers themselves are not without some considering that heavenly Bodies (as even general experience sheweth) have and exercise their operation upon the inferior. For the Sun, and the Star of Mars do dry; the Moon doth moisten, and govern the Tides of the Sea. Again, the Planets, as they have several and proper names, so have they several and proper virtues: the Stars do also differ in beauty and in magnitude; and to all the Stars hath God given also their proper names, which (had they not influences and virtues different) needed not: He counteth the number of the Stars, and calleth them by their names.

 But into the good and profitable knowledge of the celestial influences, the Devil casteth not to thrust in his superstitions: and so to the knowledge of the secret virtues of nature hath he blended his doctrines of Cheremata, Incantations, and Amulets, and taught us to believe the strength of Words and Letters: (which without faith in God are but Ink or common breath) thereby either to equal his own with the al-pow-erful word of God, or to diminish the glory of Gods creating Word, by whom are all things.

Ferency

(C.A. 1077) Terrory the Prophet, Even the Stork in the Air knoweth her appointed times, and the Turtle, and the Crane, and the Swallow. Hereupon, this enemy of Mankind working upon thee as upon the rest of Gods Creatures, long time abused the Heavens by teaching thee to oblige the Gods to the Cause of Man, and thereby to judge of good or ill by the Issue in the War: as if (initial) to look into their Entrails for the same, as if God had written the secrets of unsearchable providence in the Livers and Bowels of Birds and Beasts. Again, because it pleased God sometimes by Dreams, not only to warn and teach his Prophets and Apostles, but Heathen Princes also; as

Gen. 12.17. Abimelech to returne to Sarà to Abraham; & recalle ne admoneth Joseph, and by Dream informed Jacob, Laban, Pharaoh, Salem, Paul, Ananias, the Magi of the East, and others. For as it is remembered in Job 35.17. Thou in Dreams and Visions of the night when sleep falsch upon man, &c. then God openeth the eyes, that might cause man to return from his error; & thus I say, that the Devil by his craft, his divinations by Dreams, or (after Paraphrasia) divinitive instinations, his most Devils. This the end grew fo commones Druides compiled an Ephemerides of his owne Dreams; Mithridates of those of his Concubines.
Yet the Romans finding the inconvenience hereof, because all Dreams (without distinction of causes) were drawn to divination, forbade the same by a law, as by the words of prohibition (anti narrandis omnis occultam aliquam artem divinantem) it may appear. Likewise by the Law of God in Deuteronomy
cap. 13. feding Dreamers were ordered to be slain.
Yet it not to be contemned that Marcus Antonius was told a remedy in his Dream for two grievous Difraies that opprest him; nor that of Alexander Macedon for the cure of Ptolomy's poyfoned wound; nor that which S. Augustin reporteth of a Milite- rie; whose Son (the Father dead) being demanded a debt already paid, was told by his Father in a Dream where the acquittance lay to discharge it; nor that of Alyage of his Daughter, and many others of like nature. Of the reason of all which, forasmuch as the cause is not in our selves, this place denieth dispute.

§. IV.

That Daniel's misliking Nabuchodonosor's condemning of the Magicians doth not iustifie all their practises.

BUT it may be objected, that if such Divinations as the Heathens commonly used were to be condemned in them, who took on them very many and strange Revelations : how came it to pass that Daniel both condemned the hasty sentence of Nabuchodonosor against the Magicians of Chaldaea; and in a sort forbade it? especially considering that such kind of people God himself commanded to be slain. To this divers answers may be given. First it seemeth that Daniel had respect to those Chaldaeans, because they acknowledged that the Dream of the King, which himself had forgotten, could not be known to any man by Art, either Natural or Diabolical: For there is none other (saith the Chaldaeans) that can declare before the King, except the Gods: whose dwelling is not with flesh : and herein they confessed the power of the ever-living God.

Secondly, it may be conjectured (and that with good reason) that among so many learned Men, some of them did not exercise themselves in any civil or unlawful Arts, but were nicely Magicians and Naturalists: and therefore when the King commanded to kill all, Daniel perswaded the contrary, and called it a hasty judgment, which proceeded with fury without examination. And that some of those men

Studies and Professions were lawful, it may be gathered by Daniel's instruction : For himself had been taught by them, and was called chief of the Inchanters ; of which some were termed Soothsayers, others Astrologians, others Chaldeans, others Magi or Wise men : and therefore of distinct professions.

Thirdly, Daniel disliked and forbade the Execution of that Judgment, because it was unjust. For howsoever those Men might deserve punishment for the practice of unlawful Arts (though not unlawful according to the Law of that State) yet here in they were altogether guiltless. For it exceeded humane power to pierce the Kings thought, which the Devil himself could not know. So then in Daniel's dislike, and hindering of the Execution of sentence of Death pronounced against the Magicians, there is no absolute justifying of their practice and Profession.

The abuse of things which may be found in all kinds, is not to condemn the right use of them.

Notwithstanding this mixture every where of good with evil, of falsehood with truth, of corruption with cleanness and purity : The good, The truth, The purity in every kind may well be embraced : As in the antient worshipping of God by Sacrifice ; there was no man knowing God among the Elders, that therefore forbore to offer Sacrifice to the God of all Power, because the Devil in the Image of Baal, Astarah, Chemah, Jupiter, Apollo, and the like was so adored.

Neither did the abuse of Astrology terrifie Abr- ham (if we may believe the most ancient and Religious Historians) from observing the motions and natures of heavenly Bodies; neither can it dehort wife and learned Men in these days from attributing those Vertues, Influences, and Inclinations to the Stars and other lights of Heaven, which God hath given to those his glorious Creatures.

The Sympathetical and Antipathetical working of Herbs, Plants, Stones, Minerals, with their other utmost Vertues sometimes taught by the Devil, and applied by his Miniftrers to harmful and uncharitable ends, can never terrifie the honeft and learned Physician or Magician from the uſing of them to the help and comfort of Mankind: neither can the Illuſions, whereby the Devil betrayeth ſuch Men as are fallen from God, make other men reject the obſervations of Dreams; ſo far as with a good Faith and a Religious caution they may make uſe of them.

(as Signs of good or evil Success) hath no reference at all to the crying of Crows against rain, or to any observation not superfluous, and whereof a Reason or cause may be given. For if we confound Arts with the abuse of them, we shall not only condemn all honest Trades and interchange among Men (for there are that deceive in all Professions) but we shall in a short time bury in forgetfulness all excellent Knowledge and all Learning, or obscure and cover it over with a most foolish and beggerly ignorance: and (as Pliny teacheth) we should shew our selves ingratos et aculi, who labour crying; luceat nobis operumus in hac luce, We thankful we should shew our selves towards those, who with pains and care have discovered unto us light in this light.

Indeed not only these natural knowledges are condemned by those that are ignorant ; but the Mathematicks also and Professors thereof: though those that are excellently learned judge of it in this sort. In speculo Mathematico Verum illud, quod in omni scibili augetur, relucet: non magis remota

Simulacra, sed fulgida formae propinquitate. In the glass of the Mathematicks that truth doth shine, which is sought in every kind of knowledge; not in obscure images, but in a clear and manifest representation.

§. VI.

Of the divers kinds of unlawful Magic;

IT is true that there are many Arts, if we may so call them, which are covered with the name of Magic; and esteemed absurdly to be as Branches of that Tree, on whose Root they never grew. The first of these hath the name of Necromancy or Goëtic: and of this again there are divers kinds. The one is an Invocation at the Graves of the Dead, to whom the Devil himself gives answer in stead of those that seem to appear. For certain it is, that the Immortal Souls of Men do not inhabit the dust and Dead Bodies, but they give motion and understanding to the living: Death being nothing else but a separation of the Body and Soul: and therefore the Soul is not to be found in the Graves.

A second practice of those Men, who pay Tribute, or are in League with Satan, is that of conjuring or raising up Devils, of whom they hope to learn what they list. These Men are so diffract, as they believe that by terrible words they make the Devil to tremble; that being once impaled in a circle (a circle which cannot keep out a Mouse) they therein (as they suppose) inforce themselves against that great Monster. Doubtless they forget that the Devil is not terrified from doing ill and all that is contrary to God and goodness, nor, by the fearful word of the Almighty: and that he feared not to offer to sit in Gods seat, that he made no scruple to tempt our Saviour Christ, whom himself called the Son of God. So, forgetting these proud parts of his, an unworthy wretch will yet resolve himself, that he can draw the Devil out of Hell, and terrify him with a phrase: whereas in very truth, the obedience which Devils seem to use, is but thereby to possess themselves of the Bodies and Souls of those which raise them up; as His Majesty in his Book aforementioned hath excellently taught. That the Devils obedience is only secundum quid, scilicet ex pacto; respectu, that is, upon bargain.

I cannot tell what they can do upon those simple and ignorant Devils, which inhabit Tamblicus's imagination; but sure I am the rest are apt enough to come uncalled: and always attending the cogitations of their Servants and Vassals, do no way need any such inforcement.

Or it may be that these Conjurers deal altogether with Cardan's mortal Devils, following the opinion of Rabbi Avramathan and of Porphyrius who taught that these kind of Devils lived not above thousand Years: which Plutarch in his Treatise of Oraculum defectu confirmeth, making example of the great God Pan. For were it true that the Devils were in awe of wicked Men, or could be compelled by them, then would they always fear those words and threats, by which at other times they are willingly maltreated. But the Familia of Simon Magus when he had lifted him up in the Air, call him headlong out of his Claws, when he was sure he should perish with the fall. If this perhaps were done by S. Peter's Prayers (of which S. Peter no where vaunteth) yet the same prank at other times upon his own accord the Devil played with Theodorus: who transported (as Simon Magus was supposed to have been) had the same mortal fall that he had. The like success had Budas, a principal Pillar of the Manichean Heresie, as Socrates in his Ecclesiastical History wittily telleth: and for a manifest proof hereof we see it every day, that the Devil leaves all Witches and Sorcerers at the Gallows, for whom at other times he maketh himself a Pegasus, to convey them in halt to places far distant, or at least makes them so think: For to those that received not the truth (saith S. Paul) God shall send them strong illusions. Of these their supposed transpositions (yet agreeing with their confessions) His Majesty in the second Book and the fourth Chapter of the demonologie, hath confirmed by unanswerable reasons, that they are merely illusive. Another sort there are who take on them to include Spirits in Glasses and Crystals: of whom Casanaus: Exist sunt incantatores, qui in unguis & vitris volens spiritum includere: quia Spiritus non clauduntur corpore. They are foolish Incantators, which will shut up their Spirits within their nails or in Glass: for a Spirit cannot be included by a Body.

There is also another Art besides the aforementioned, which they call Tizmagia, or White Magic; a pretended conference with good Spirits or Angels, whom by Sacrifice and Invocation they draw out of Heaven, and communicate withal. But the administering Spirits of God, as they require no any kind of adoration due unto their Creator: so feeling they are most free Spirits; there is no Man so absurd to think (except the Devil have corrupted his Understanding) that they can be constrained or commanded out of Heaven by threats. Wherefore let the Professors thereof cover themselves how they please by a professed purity of life, by the ministry of Infants, by fasting and abstinence in general; yet all those that tamper with immaterial substances and abstract natures, either by Sacrifice, Vow, or inforcement, are Men of evil Faith and in the power of Satan. For good Spirits or Angels cannot be constrained; and therefore are Devils which willingly obey.

Other sorts there are of wicked divinations: as by Fire, called Pyromania: by Water, called Hydromania: by the Air, called Meteoromania, and the like.

The last, and (indeed) the worst of all other is Falcination or Witchcraft: the practitioners whereof are no less envious and cruel, revengeful and bloody, than the Devil himself. And these accursed Creatures having sold their Souls to the Devil, work two waies; either by the Devil immediately, or by the Art of Poisoning. The difference between Necromancer and Witches, His Majesty hath excellently taught in a word: that the one (in a fort) commandeth, the other obey the Devil.

There is another kind of petty Witchery (if it be not altogether deceit) which they call Charming of Beasts and Birds, of which Pythagoras was accused, because an Eagle lighted on his Shoulder in the Olympian Fields. But if the same exceeded the Art of Falconry, yet was it no more to be admired than Mahomet's Dove, which he had used to feed which Wheat out of his Ear: where Dove, when it was hungry, lighted on Mahomet's Shoulder, and thrust his Bill therein to find his breakfast: Mahomet perfwading the rude and simple Arabians, that it was the Holy Ghost that gave him advice. And certainly if Bankes had lived in elder times, he would have shamed all the Inchanters of the World: for whoever was most famous among them, could never master or instruct any Beast as he did his Horse.

For the drawing of Serpents out of their dens, or killing of them in the holes by Inchantments (which the Marsians, a People of Italy, practised. Colubros disrumpit Marsia cantu, Inchanting Lucid in Marsia Sigs.

Marsia makes the Snakes to hiss.) That it hath been used it appears Plin 58. 6. though I doubt not, that by many Impostures may be in this kind; and even Natural Causes it may be done. For there are many fumes that will either draw them out or destroy them; as Womens hair burnt, and the like. So many things may be laid in the entrance of their holes that will allure them; and therein I find no other Magic or Inchantment, than to draw out a Mouse with a piece of toasted Cheefe.

§. VII.

Of divers waies by which the Devil seemeth to work his wonder.

BUT to the end that we may not doat with the Manichees, who make two powers of Gods: that we do not give to the Devil any other Dominion than he hath (not to speak of his Ability, when he is the minister of Gods vengeance, as when Aegypt, according to David, was destroyed by evil Angels) he otherwise worketh but three waies. The first is by moving the cogitations and affections of Men: The second by the exquisite knowledge of Nature: and the third by deceit, illusion, and false semblance. And that they cannot work what they would, G. Parisiens giveth three causes: the first a natural Impotency: the second, their own Reason disallowing them from daring over much, or indeed (and that which is the only certain cause) the great mercy of the Creator. Tenei eas ligatus (saith the same Author) velut immensitatem belluas. S. Augustine is of opinion that the Frogs which Pharaoh's Sorcerers produced were not Natural, but that the Devil (by betraying of their senses that looked on) made them appear to be fish. For as Varus observeth, those Frogs of the Inchanters were not found corrupted as those of Moses were, which might argue that they were not Creatures indeed. Hereof saith S. Augustine, Nec sunt demones naturae creati, sed quia a Deo creati sunt commutati, ut videntur esse quod non sunt. The Devils create not any natures, but so change those that are created by God, as they seem to be that which they be not: of which in the 83. question he giveth the reason, Demon quibusdam nebulis implet omnes meatus intelligentie, per quos aperire lumen rationis radius mentis solet. (that is) The Devil fills with certain Clouds all passages of the understanding, by which the beam of the mind is wont to open the lights of reason.

And as Tertullian in his Book de anima rightly conceiveth, if the Devil can possess himself of the eyes of our minds, and blind them, it is not hard for him to dazzle those of the Body. For (out of doubt) by the same way that God passeth out, the Devil entereth in, beginning with the fantastic, by which he doth more easily betray the other faculties of the Soul: for the fantastic is most apt to be abused by vain apprehensions.

Aquinas on the contrary held that those Frogs were not imaginary, but such indeed as they seemed: not made magica artis ludibrio, which indeed agreeth not with the art, but (according to Thomas) per aptum & idoneum agendum & patientium applicationem, By an apt and apt applying of agents and patients. And this I take to be more probable. For Moses could not be deceived by that slight of false semblance; and S. Augustine in another case like unto this (to wit) of the turning of Diomedes his Companions into Birds, per alvum cum passivis, inclineth rather to this opinion: though I am not persuaded that S. Augustine believed that of Diomedes.

And this opinion of Thomas, G. Parisiens a Man very learned also confirmeth. For speaking of Natural Magic he useth these words. De hismodi autem operibus est scilicet generatio ranarum & pedicularum, & vermium, aliorumque animalium quorundam: in quibus omnibus sola natura operatur, verum adhibitis adiutoriis, quae ipsa semina naturae confortant & accunt, ita ut opera generationis tantum accelerent, ut eis qui hoc nesciunt non sua natura videatur (qua tardius talia efficiere consuevit) sed potentia demonum, &c. to which he addeth. Qui autem in his doli sunt talia non mirantur, sed solum Creatorem in his glorificant: In such works (saith he) the Judain generation of Frogs, and Lice, and Worms, and some other Creatures is: in all which Nature alone worketh; but by means strengthening the seeds of Nature, and quickening them; in such way that they so hasten the work of Generation, that it seemeth to the ignorant not to be the work of Nature, which usually worketh more leisurely, but they think it is done by the power of Devils. But they who are learned in these Arts marvel not at such workings, but glorify the Creator. Now by these two waies the Devils do most frequently work, (to wit) by knowing the uttermost of Nature; and by illusion: for there is no incomprehensible or unsearchable power, but of God only.

For shall we say, he causeth sometimes Thunders, Lightnings, and Tempests; and can infect the Air, as well as move it or compress it, who knows not that these things are also Natural? Or may it be objected that he foretelleth things before they happen, which exceedeth Nature, and is no illusion? it is true, that he sometimes doth it; but how? In elder Ages he stole his knowledge out of the predictions of the Prophets: and he foretold the Death of Saul, at such time as he was in his own Possession and power to dispose of. And he that hath lived from the infancy of the World to this day, and observed the success of every Council: he that by reason of his swift motions can inform himself of all places, and preparations: he that is of Counsel with all those that study and practise subversion and destruction: he that is Prince of the Air, and can thence better judge, than those that inhabit the Earth: if he should not sometimes, yea if he should not very oftentimes guess rightly of things to come (where God pleareth not to give impediment) it were very strange. For we see that wife and learned Men do oftentimes by comparing like Causes conceive rightly of like effects, before they happen: and yet where the Devil doubteth and would willingly keep his credit, he evermore answereth by Riddles, as Cresus Halym penetrans magnam subvertet opum vim.

If Cresus over Halys go,
Great Kingdoms he shall overthrow.

Which answer may be taken either way: either for the overthrow of his own Kingdom; or of his Enemies. And thus far we grant the Devil may proceed in Predictions, which otherwise belong to God only; as it is in Isaiah. Show the things that are to come hereafter, that we may know that ye are Gods: show us at all times and certainly what is to come. Solius enim divina intelligentia et sapientie est occulta nosse & revelare. It is only proper to Gods understanding and wisdom to know and reveal hidden things.

ding which she was cast from the top of her Temple into the Lake adjoining, and (as the Poets have feigned) changed by Venus into a Fish, all but her Face, which still held the same Beauty and human Shape. It is thought that from this Dereos (the Invention of that Idol of the Phisians (called Dagon) was taken: for it is true, that Dagon had a Mans Face, and a Fishes Body: into whole Temple when the Ark of God was brought, the Idol fell twice to the Ground: and at the second fall there remained only the Trunk of Dagon, the head being broken off: For so S. Hieron hath converted that place. Vasahus, Pagninus, and Tunius write it by Dagon only, which signifieth a Fish, and so it only appeared: the Head thereof by the second fall being fundered by the Body.

For my self I rather think, that this Dagon of the Phisians was an Idol representing Triton, one of those imaginary Sea-gods under Neptune. For this City being maritime (as all thole of the Phisians were, and so were the best of Phoenicia) used all their devotions to Neptune, and the rest of the petty Gods which attended him.

§. IV.

Of her expedition into India, and death after discomfure: with a note of the improbability of her Vices.

BUT for her Pedigree I leave it to the Affrian Herald: and for her vicious life I ascribe the report thereof to the envious and lying Grecians. For delicacy and ease do more often accompany licentiousness in Men and Women, than labour and hazzard do. And if the one half be true which is reported of this Lady, then there never lived any Prince or Princess more worthy of fame than Semiramis was, both for the works she did at Babylon and elsewhere, and for the Wars she made with glorious Success: all but her last Enterprize of India; from whence both Strabo and Arianus report that she never returned: and that of all her most powerful Army there survived but only twenty Persons: the rest being either drowned in the River of Indus, dead of the Famie, or slain by the Sword of Sauvobates. But as the multitude which went out are more than reason hath numbered: so were thole that returned less than could have escaped of such an Army, as consisted of four millions and upwards. For these numbers which she levied by her Lieutenant Dereosus (saith Suidas) did consist of Foot-men three millions; of Horsemen one million; of Chariots armed with hooks on each side one hundred thousand; of thole which fought upon Camels as many; of Camels for burden two hundred thousand; of raw Hildes for all uses three hundred thousand; of Gallies with brazen heads three thousand; by which she might transport over Indus at once three hundred thousand Soldiers: which Gallies were furnished with Syrans, Phenicians, Cilicians, and Men of Cyprus. These incredible and impossible numbers, which no place of the Earth was able to nourish (had every Man and Beast but fed upon Grass) are taken from the Authority of Ctesias whom Diodorus followeth. But as the one may be taxed with many frivolous reports: so Diodorus himself hath nothing of certainty, but from Xerxes expedition into Greece and afterwards: whose Army

(though the fame was far inferior to that of Semiramis) yet had it weight enough to overload the belief of any reasonable Man. For all Authors consent, that Xerxes transported into Greece an Army of 1700000 and gathered together (therein to pass the Hellepont) three thousand Gallies, as Herodotus out of the several Provinces whence thole Gallies were taken hath collected the number.

But of what multitude soever the Army of Semiramis consisted: the same being broken, and overthrown by Sauvobates upon the Banks of Indus, canticum cantavit extremum: she sang her last Song; and (as Antiquity hath feigned) was changed by the Gods into a Dove, (the Bird of Venus) whence it came that the Babylonians gave a Dove in their Ensigns.

§. V.

Of the Temple of Belus built by Semiramis: and of the Pyramids of EGYPT.

AMong all her other memorable and more than magnificent works (besides the Wall of the City of Babylon) was the Temple of Bel, erected in the middle of this City, invironed with a Wall carried four square of great height and beauty, having on each square certain brazen Gates curiously Engraven. In the Core of the square the raised a Tower of a furlong high, which is half a quarter of a Mile; and upon it again (taking a Basis of a less circuit) she set a second Tower, and so eight in all, one above another: upon the top whereof the Chaldeans Priests made the observation of the Stars, because this Tower overtopped the ordinary Clouds.

By beholding the ruins of this Tower have many Travellers been deceived; who suppose that they have seen a part of Nimrod's Tower, when it was but the Foundation of this Temple of Bel: (except this of Bel were founded on that of Nimrod.) There were burnt in this Temple one hundred thousand talents of Frankincense every Year (saith Herodotus.) This Temple did Nabuchodonosor adorn with the spoils of Jerusalem, and of the Temple of Salomon: all which Vessels and Ornaments Cyrus redelivered. This Temple Xerxes evened with the soil; which Alexander is said to have repaired by the perswasions of the Chaldeans. I deny not that it might have been in his desire so to do; but he enjoyed but a few Years after Babylon taken, and therefore could not perform any such work. The Egyptians (saith Proclus) inhabiting a low and level Ground, and given to the same superstition of the Stars that the Chaldeans were, erected in imitation, and for the same service and use, the Pyramids by Memphis, which were conspicue undique navigantibus, saith Pliny. Of these Pyramids Belisarius a careful observer of rarities (who being in Egypt mounted by steps to the top of the highest) maketh this report. Le meilleur archer qui seroit a sa Jonniete, & tirant une fleche en l'air, a peine pourroit envoyer hors de sa balle qu'elle ne se tombast sur les degrez. The best Archer (standing on the top of one of these Pyramids, and shooting an Arrow from thence into the Air as far as he can, with great difficulty shall be able so to force the same, but that it will fall upon some of the degrees or steps.

THE FIRST PART OF THE HISTORY OF THE WORLD:

Intreating of the Times from the Birth of ABRAHAM to the destruction of the Temple of SOLOMON.

The SECOND BOOK.

CHAP. I.

Of the time of the Birth of Abraham: And of the use of this Question, for the ordering of the Story of the Assyrian Empire.

§. I.

Of some of the Successors of Semiramis: With a brief transition to the Question, about the time of the Birth of Abraham.

After the death of Semiramis, Ninias or Zameis succeeded her in the Empire, on whom Berosus Annianus bestows the Conquest of Bactria, and the overthrow of Zoroaster; contrary to Diodorus, Justin, Orosius, and all other approved Writers. For Ninias being esteemed no Man of War at all, but altogether Feminine, and subjected to Ease and Delicacy, there is no probability in that opinion. Now because there was nothing performed by this Ninias of any moment, other than that out of jealousy he every year changed his Provincial Governours, and built Colleged for the Chaldean Priests, his Astronomers: nor by Ariss his Successor, whom Suidas calleth Tomas; but that he reduced again the Bactrians and Cassians, revolted as it seemeth in Ninias his time: nor of Arulius, the Successor of Ariss, but that he added sumptuosity, invented Jewels of Gold and Stone, and some Engines for the War: I will for this present pass them over, and a while follow Abraham, whose ways are warrantable, (till we meet these Affrians again in this Story) by whom, and by whose Issues we shall best give date to the Kings of Babylon: Abraham living at once with Nimus, Ninias, Semiramis, Aris, Arisius, and Xerxes or Balanus. For otherwise if we seek to prove things certain by the uncertain, and judge of those times, which the Scriptures let us down without error, by the Raigos of the Assyrian Princes, we shall but patch up the Story at this day, and leave it in the same confusion, in which to this day it hath remained. For where the Scriptures do not help, Abraham non est in rebus antiquis Historiam non emendat. No marvel of them as things of the Ancients, History want assurance.

The better therefore to find out, in what age of the World, and how long these Assyrian Kings Reigned, as also for other good causes, we must first settle the time of Abraham's Birth, and in what Year the same happened after the Flood. Now since all agree, that the fortythird year of Nimus was the Birth year of Abraham; by proving directly out of the Scriptures, in what year after the Flood the Birth of Abraham happened, we shall thereby let all the rest in square and order. But of this time there is much jangling between those Chronologers, which follow the Hebrew account, and others: the most part making 292. or 293. years; others 352. years between Abraham's Birth and the Flood: a matter often disputed, but never concluded.

Archilochus de temporibus (as we find him in Ammian) makes but 250. years from the Flood to Nimus: then seeing that Abraham was born in the forty third year of Nimus, according to Engelbus, and St. Augustine, it followeth by the addition of those two numbers, that the year of Abraham's Birth was the year after the Flood 293. or as the most part of all Chronologers gather, the year 292.

Now, since I do here enter into that never resolved question, and Labyrinth of times, it becometh me to give reason for my own opinion: and with so much the greater care and circumspection, because I walk alone, and in a way apart from multitude; yet not alone, and without company, though the fewer in number: with whom I rather choose to endure the wounds of those Darts, which Envy casteth at novelty, than to go on safely and sleepily in the safe ways of Ancient mistakings: seeing to be learned in many errors, or to be ignorant in all things, hath little diversity.

§. II.

Approposal of reasons or arguments, that are brought to prove Abraham was born in the year 292. after the Flood, and not in the year 352.

THole which seek to prove this account of 292. years, between the general Flood and Abraham's Birth, ground themselves, first on these words of the Scripture. So Terah lived 70. years, and begot Abraham, Nabor, and Haran: secondly upon the opinion of Josephus, St. Augustine, Bede, Isidore, and many of the Ancient Hebrews before them: Authorities (while they are slightly looked over) seeming of great weight.

From the place of Scripture last remembered, the latter Chronologers gather these arguments. First out of the words as they lie; that Terah at 70. years begot Abraham, Nabor and Haran: and that Abraham being the first named, Abraham being the worthiest, Abraham being the Son of the promise, ought in this respect to be accounted the eldest Son of Terah, and so necessarily born in the seventieth year of his life. Secondly it was of Abraham that Moses had respect, in whom the Church of God was continued, who was Heir of the Blessing; and not of Nabor and Haran: for the scope of the Scripture was to show the Genealogy of the Chosen People, from Adam to Abraham, without any regard of Nabor, and Haran.

It is thirdly objected, that if Abraham were not the eldest Son, then there can be no certainty of his age, and to are all those times made doubtful. For if it came then be proved, that Abraham was born more than in the 70. year of Terah, he was not the eldest Son, and so the age of Abraham was not where it down perfectly that Abraham went into Canaan that very year, in which his Father died.

Fourthly it is thought improbable, that Terah begot Abraham at 130. year: seeing Abraham himself thought it a wonder to be made a Father at 100. years.

§. III.

The answer to one of the objections proposed, showing that Abraham made one journey out of Mesopotamia into Canaan: and it, after his Father's death.

TO answer all which objections it is very ealie, the way being prepared thereto by divers learned Divines long since, and to which I will add somewhat of mine own, according to the small talent which God hath given me. Now forasmuch as the state of the question cannot well be scanned, unless the time of Abraham's journey into Canaan be first considered of; before I descend unto the Particular examination of these arguments, I will make bold with order and method so far, as to search into a strange tradition concerning his Travels, that serveth as a ground for this opinion, and a bulwark against all that can be said to the contrary.

But it is conceived that Abraham made two journeys into Canaan: the latter after his Father's death, the former presently upon his calling, which he performed without all delay, not tarrying for his Father's death at Haran: a conjecture, drawn from a place in the Epistle to the Hebrews, where it is written, By faith Abraham (when he was called) obeyed God, to go out into a place, which he should afterwards receive for inheritance: and he went out, not knowing whither he went. This supposition (if it be granted) serves very well to uphold the opinion, that can ill stand without it. Let us therefore see whether we may give credit to the supposition it self.

Surely, that Abraham first departed Charran or Haran after the death of Terah his Father, the same is proved, without the admision of any diffinition, by these words of St. Stephen: And after his Father was dead, God brought him into this Land, where ye now dwell, that was, out of Haran into Canaan. Against which place so direct and plain, what force hath any Mans fancy or supposition, persuading, that Abraham made two journeys into Canaan; one before Terah's death, and another after: no such thing being found in the Scriptures, nor any circumstance, probability, or reason to induce it. For if any Man out of this place before alleged can pick any argument, proving, or affording any strong presumption, that Abraham first went into Canaan, and then returned unto Haran, from whence he departed a second time: then I think it reason, that he be believed in the rest. But that he performed the Commandment of God after his Father's death, leaving Ur and Haran for Canaan, it is as true as the Scriptures themselves are true. For after his Father was dead, (saith the Martyr Stephen) God brought him into this Land. And, as Beza noteth,

teth, if Abraham made a double journey into Canaan, then must it be inferred, that Moses omitted the one, and Stephen afterwards remembered the other: and whence had Stephen, saith Beza, the knowledge of Abraham's coming into Canaan, but out of Moses? For if Stephen had spoken any thing of those times, differing from Moses, he had offered the Jews his adversaries too great an occasion both of scandalizing himself, and the Gospel of Christ. Indeed we shall find small reason to make us think that Abraham passed and repassed those waies, more often than he was enforced so to do, if we consider, that he had no other guide or comforter in this long and wearisome journey, than the strength of his Faith in Gods promise: in which if any thing would have brought him to despair, he had more cause than ever Man had to fall into it. For he came into a Region of strong and stubborn Nations: a Nation of valiant and resolute Idolaters. He was besieged with Famine at his first arrival, and driven to fly into Egypt for relief. His Wife was old, and he had no Son to inherit the Promise. And when God had given him Isaac, he commanded him to offer him up to himself for Sacrifice: all which discomforts he patiently and contently underwent.

Secondly, let us consider the waies themselves, which Abraham had to pass over, the length whereof was 300. English Miles: and through Countries of which he had no manner of experience. He was to transport himself over the great River of Euphrates, to travel through the dangerous and barren Deserts of Palmyrena, and to climb over the great and high Mountains of Libanus, Hermon or Gilead: and whether these were ealie walks: for Abraham to march twice over, containing, as afore-said, 300. Miles in length, let every reasonable Man judge. For if he traveled it twice; then was his journey in all 1800. Miles from Ur to Haran: and from Haran twice into Canaan. But were there no other argument to disprove this fancy; the manner of Abraham's departing from Haran hath more proof, that he had not animus reverendi, not any thought looking backward, than any Mans bare conjecture, be he of what Antiquity or Authority forever. For thus it is written of him: When Abraham took Sarah his Wife, and Lot his Brother's Son, and all their substance that they possessed, and the Souls that they had gotten in Haran: and they departed to go to the Land of Canaan, and to the Land of Mesopotamia they came. Now if Abraham brought all with him that was dear unto him; his Wife, and his Kinmen, and his, and their goods: it is not probable that he meant to walk it back again for his pleasure, in so warm, dangerous, and barren a Country as that was: or if he could have been thence removed, it is more likely that he would have then returned, when he was yet unfeared, and profit without, when he was at his first arrival. For had his Father been then alive, he might have hoped from him to receive more assured comfort and relief, than among the Egyptians, to whom he was a meer stranger both in Religion and Nation.

What the cause might be of Abraham's return to Haran, as I will not enquire of them, that without warrant from the Scriptures have sent him back to Haran, about the time of his Father's Death: for they perhaps, if they were urged, could say little else, than that without such a second Voyage their opinion were not maintainable. One thing in good reason they should do well to make plain; if it be not over-troublesome. They say that Abraham was in Haran at his Father's death, or some time after, being then by their account 135. years old, or a little more. How then did it happen, that he left quite undone the business, which as we read, was within four or five years after that time his greatest, or (as may seem) his only care? Did not he bind with a very solemn Oath his principal Servant, in whom he reposed most confidence, to travel into those parts, and seek out a Wife for Isaac his Son? and doth it not appear by all circumstances, that neither he nor his Servant were so well acquainted in Mesopotamia, that they could particularly design any one Woman, as a fit match for Isaac? Surely if Abraham had been there in person so lately, as within four or five years before, he would not have forgotten a matter of such importance; but would have trusted his own judgement, in choosing a Woman, fit for 'her Piety, Vertue, and other desirable qualities, to be linked in marriage with his only Son, who was then 35. years old; before which age most of the Patriarchs after the Flood had begotten Children, rather than have left all at random to the consideration of a Servant, that either knew any, nor was known of any in that Country. But let it be supposed (if it may be believed) that either Abraham forgot this business when he was there, or that somewhat hapned which no Man can devise.

What might be the reason, that Abraham's Man in doing his Masters errand was faine to lay open the whole Story of his Masters Prosperity, telling it as news, that Sarah had born him a Son in her old Age? If Abraham himself, a more certain Author, had so lately been among them, would not all this have been an idle tale? It were needles to stand long upon a thing to evade: Whether it were lawful for Abraham to have returned back to Haran, would perhaps be a question hardly to be answered: considering how awfully he was from permitting his Son to be carried thither, even though a Wife of his own Kindred, could not have been obtained without his personal presence. Take as I judged was sent thither by his Parents, to take a Wife of his own Lineage; not without Gods especial approbation, by whose Blessing he prospered in that journey: yet he lived there as a Servant, suffered many injuries; and finally was driven to convey himself away from thence by disguise. For although it be not a sentence written, yet out of all written examples it may be observed, that God alloweth not in his Servants any desire of returning to the place, from whence he hath taken and transplanted them. That brief saying, Remember Lot's Wife, contains much matter. Let us but consider Mesopotamia from whence Abraham was taken, and Egypt out of which the whole Nation of the Israelites was delivered: we shall find, that no Blessing issued from either of them, to the Posterity of the Hebrews. When Ezechias was visited with an Honourable Embassy from Babel, it seems that he conceived great pleasure in his mind, and thought it a piece of his prosperity; but the Prophecy which thereupon he heard by Isaiah, made him to know, that the Council of God was not agreeable to such thoughts: which more plainly appeared in a following Generation, when by the Waters of Babylon they sat down and wept. Concerning Egypt we read, that Sisac and Neco Kings of Egypt brought calamity upon Israel: also that their confidence in the Egyptian Incurers was the cause of their destruction. Where they were forbidden to return into Egypt I do not remember, nor can readily find; but it is found in Deuteronomy, that God had said, They should no more return that way; which is given, as the reason, why their King might not cause the People to return to Egypt, for the multiplying of his Horses. Whether the Lord had laid any such injunction; injunction upon Abraham of not returning to Mesopotamia, I cannot say; many things do argue it probably: that he never did return, all circumstances do (to my understanding) both strongly and necessarily conclude.

But because this double passage of Abraham's is but an imagination; and that imaginations of Men are rather valuable among Children, than that they can persuade those of judgment or understanding: I take it sufficient, that S. Stephen hath directly taught us, that Abraham left Haran, his Father being dead. And for the rest, when they shew any one Scripture to prove it, I will believe as they do. For all the Travels of Abraham are precisely let down in the Scriptures: as first from Ur or Chaldaea in Chaldaea to Haran or Charran: and then from Haran (after his Father's death) to Sichem; from Sichem he removed to a Mountain between Bethel and Hai: thence into Egypt: from Egypt he returned thither again, where Lea and he parted, because their Flocks and Herds of Cattle were more, than could be fed in that part: from thence the second time he removed to Mamre, near Hebron: and thence having purified Ananias, and received Lot, he after inhabited at Gerar, in the border of Idumea, under Abimelech: and after near unto it at Bersabee, under Abimelech: and after near unto it at Bersabee, at which time he was ready to offer up his Son Isaac on the Mountain Moriah. But this Fiction of his retreat to Haran or Charran, appeareth not in any one Story, either Divine or Humane. Now if it may be supposed, that Abraham had made any former journey into Canaan, as Leviticus in his Cabala hath feigned, it should in reason be therewith believed, that he would in those his first Travels have provided himself of some certain seat, or place of abiding: and not have come a second time, with his Wife, Kinsmen, Family, Goods and Cattle, not knowing whereon to rest himself. But Abraham, when he came from Charran, pass through the North part of Canaan, thence to Sichem, and the Plain of Moriah: where finding no place to inhabit, he departed thence to Bethel and Hai: and so from Nation to Nation, to discover and find out some fit habitation: from whence again, as it is written in Genesis the eleventh, He went forth, going and journeying towards the South: and always unsettled. By occasion of which wandering to and fro, some say, the Egyptians gave him and his the name of Hebrew. Further, to prove that he had not formerly been in the Country, we may note, that ere he came to Bethel and Hai, and at his first entrance into Canaan, God appeared unto him saying, Unto thy Seed will I give this Land, shewing it him as unto a Stranger therein, and as a Land to him unknown. For Abraham without any other provident care for himself, believed in the word of the living God: neither sending before, nor coming first to discover it; but being arrived he received a second promise from God, that he would give those Countries unto him and his Seed to inhabit and inherit.

Lastly, what should move any man to think, that Moses would have omitted any such double journey of Abraham's, seeing he setteth down all his passages elsewhere, long and short? As when he moved from Sichem, and seated between Hai and Bethel: the distance being but twenty Miles: and when he moved thence to the Valley of Mamre, being but twenty four Miles: and when he left Mamre, and sat down at Gerar, being less than six Miles; no, Moses past over all the times of the first Age with the greater brevity, to hasten him to the Story of Abraham: shutting up all between the Creation and the Flood in six Chapters; which age lasted 1656 Years: but he belongeth on the Story of Abraham fourteen Chapters, beginning with his Birth in the eleventh, and ending with his Death in the five and twentieth; and this time endured but 175 Years. It hath therefore no face of truth, that Moses forgot or neglected any thing concerning Abraham's Travels, or other actions: or that he would set down those small removes of five Miles, and omit those of three hundred. For such a journey as going and coming would have ministred some variety of matter, or accident, worthy the inserting and adding to Abraham's Story.

§. IV.

The answer to another of the objections proposed, shewing that it is not unlikely, that Terah should beget Abraham in his hundred and thirtieth Year.

NOW touching the Objection, where it is said, that it was very unlikely, that Terah should beget Abraham in his 130. Years, seeing Abraham himself thought it a wonder to have a Son at an hundred: this is hardly worth the answering. This wonder is indeed mislaid, and mislaid: Abraham having respect only to Sarah his Wife, when he spake of their many Years. For when the Angel said unto Abraham in his Tent door at Mamre's Lo, Sarah thy Wife shall have a Son, at Mamre's Lo, Sarah thy Wife shall have a Son, it followeth in the next verse, Now Abraham and Sarah were old and stricken in age, and it ceased to be with Sarah after the manner of Women: therefore Sarah laugheth, &c.

So then, in that it is said it ceased to be with Sarah after the manner of Women, it appeareth that the wonder was wrought on her, and not on Abraham. For Abraham by his second Wife Keturah had many Sons after Sarah's death, as Zimran, Joktan, Medan, Midian, Ishback, and Shuah: and the Eldest of these was born 37. Years after Isaac: and the youngest divers Years after. What strangeness then, that Terah being 130. Years old should beget Abraham, will they say, may be gathered from this supposed despair of Abraham at one hundred Years? For Sarah dyed in the Year of the World 2145. and Isaac was born in the year 2109. and Abraham did not marry Keturah till Sarah was buried. So if we deduct the number of 2109. out of 2145. there remaineth 36. And therefore if Abraham beget five Sons 36. years after this supposed wonder, and when Abraham was 137. years old: it is not strange that his Father Terah should beget Abraham at 130. And if Boaz, Obed and Jesse, who lived to many years and Ages after Abraham, beget Sons at 100. years or near it, it cannot be marvelled at, that Terah beget Abraham at 130. and Abraham others at the same Age and seven years after.

§. V.

The answer to two more of the objections: shewing that we may have certainty of Abraham's Age from the Scriptures, though we make not Abraham the eldest Son: and that there was great cause, why in the Story of Abraham his two Brethren should be respected.

IT followeth now to speak something to the objection, which brings Abraham's age altogether in doubt, except we allow him to be the eldest Son of Terah, and born when Terah was 70 years old. For Abraham's age being made uncertain, all succeeding times are thereby without any perfect rule or knowledge.

But this proposition, That we cannot be certain of Abraham's age, unless we make him the eldest Son, is false. For it is plain in the Scriptures, that when Terah was 205. which was the Year of his Death, then was Abraham 75. And if you ask, how I can judge of times, either preceding or succeeding, by knowing that Abraham departed Haran at that age: I answer, that S. Stephen hath told us, that Abraham's departure followed the death of his Father Terah: and Terah died at 205; so as the 75. Year of Abraham was the 205. Year of Terah; which known, there can be no error in the account of times succeeding. Now to come to the objection, where it is said, That Moses had no respect unto Nachor and Haran, because they were out of the Church, but to Abraham only, with whom God established the Covenant, and of whom Christ defended according to the Flesh, &c. I answer, that Moses for many great and necessary Causes had respect of Nachor and Haran. For the succession of Gods Church is not witnessed by Abraham alone, but by the Illies of Nachor and Haran, were they Idolaters or otherwise. For Nachor was the Father of Bethuel and Bethuel of Rebecca the Mother of Isaac: and Haran was the Parent of Lot, Sarah, and Milchah: and Sarah was Mother to Isaac, and Grand-mother to Jacob: Milchah also the Wife of Nachor, and Mother of Bethuel, was Jacob's great Grand-mother: and the age of Sarah the Daughter of Haran is especially noted, in that it pleased God to give her a Son at 90. years, and when by Nature she could not have conceived. And therefore, though it were not in regard of themselves, yet because both Nachor and Abraham married the Daughters of their Brother Haran; and because Isaac married Rebecca the Grand-child of Nachor; and Jacob Lea and Rachel, the Daughters of Laban, the Grand-child also of Nachor: it was not superfluous in Moses to give light of these men's times and ages. And though sometime they worshipped strange Gods, as it is Job. 24. yet I see no cause to think, that they still continued Idolaters. For they believed and obeyed the calling of Abraham, leaving their Natural Country, and City of Ur in Chaldaea, as Abraham did, and removed thence all, except Haran, who died before his Father Terah, ere they left Chaldaea; but Lot, his Son, followed Abraham into Canaan; and Sarah, the Sister of Lot, Abraham married. Nachor also, who remained at Charran, gave his Sons Daughters to Isaac and Jacob, his own kinsmen: he himself having also married in his own Family; not thinking it pleasing unto God to mix themselves with frangers and Idolaters. And that these Men at length believed in the God of Abraham, it can no way be doubted. For when Laban had seen the Servant of Abraham standing at the Well beside Charran, he invited him to his Father's House in this manner: Come in thou blessed of Jehovah, &c. And when this Servant of Abraham's demanded an answer as touching Rebecca, then answered Laban and Bethuel, and said: This thing is proceeded of Jehovah: meaning that it was the will of the true God it should be so; wherein he acknowledged Gods Providence. Likewise in the following verse it is written: Take, take, say, that I may be thy Masters Sons Wife, even as Jehovah hath said. This their often using of the name of Jehovah, which is the proper name of the true God, is a sign that they had the knowledge of him.

Now although it be the opinion of Saint Chrysostom, and some later writers, as Cajetan, Oleaster, Musculus, Calvin, Mercer, and others, that Laban was an Idolater, because he retained certain Idols, or household Gods, which Rachel stole from him; yet that he believed in the true God, it cannot be denied. For he acknowledgeth the God of Abraham and of Nachor, and he called Abraham's Servant, Blessed of Jehovah, as aforesaid. So as for my self I dare not avow, that these Men were out of the Church, who sure I am were not out of the Faith.

§. VI.

That the naming of Abraham first of the three Brethren, Gen. 11. ver. 26. doth not prove that he was the eldest: together with divers reasons proving that Abraham was not the eldest Son of Terah.

TO the main objection which I answer last, because it seemeth of most strength, by which, those that strive to shorten the times, endeavour to prove that Abraham was the eldest Son of Terah, and born in the 70. Year of Terah's life: grounding themselves first and chiefly on this place of the Scripture, And Terah lived 70. Years and begat Abraham, Nachor and Haran: To this I say, that although Abraham in this verse be first named, yet the fame is no proof at all that he was the eldest and first-born Son of Terah. For it is no necessary consequence, that the first named in Scriptures was therefore eldest in Blood and Birth, neither doth it appear that it pleased God to make especial choice of the first Sons in Nature and time: for Seth was not the first-born of Adam: nor Isaac of Abraham: nor Jacob of Isaac: nor Nod and Joseph of Jacob: nor David the eldest of Jesse: nor Solomon of David: as is formerly remembered.

But it is written of Noah, Noah was 500. years old, and Noah begat Shem, Ham and Japhet: shewing that at the 500. year of his Age he began to beget the first of those three Sons. For according to S. Augustine speaking generally, Nec attendamus esse in his ordo nativitate, sed significatio suae dignitatis: in qua excellit Abraham. The order of nativitate is not here to be respected, but the signification of the future dignity: in which Abraham was preferred. And therefore as in the order of the Sons of Noah: so is it here; where it is said that Terah lived 70. years and begat Abraham, Nachor, and Haran: for it was late ere Terah began to beget Sons, himself being begotten by his Father Nachor at 29. as other his Ancestors were at 30. The like also happened to Noah; for whereas Adam begat Seth at 130. Enosh Kenan at 90. Kenan Mahalalel at 70. Mahalalel Tered at 60. Noah was yet 500. years old when he began to beget the first of his three Sons as aforesaid. And S. Augustine in the place before cited, rather inclineth to the opinion that Abraham was the youngest of Terah's Sons, than fumed : and taking the Assyrian History with us, the same number of years were spent from the Flood to the 43. year of Ninus : in which 43. year of Ninus Abraham was born : which happened in the year of the World 2009.

Now of this time of 352. years, we must give one part, as well to the increase of those people which came into Shinar, as to those that staid in the East, to wit, 30. year to Chus, ere he begat Shem : of which, though the Scriptures are silent, yet because those of the same time had that age when they begat their first Sons, we may the more safely give the like allowance to these. For Eber begat Peleg at 34. Peleg Regu at 30. Regu Serug at 32. Now after Seba, Chus begat Havila, Saba, Raama and Sabtechu : and Raama begat Sheba and Dedan, before Nimrod was born, as it appeareth Gen. 10. which S. Augusine approveth. Giving then 30. years more to Raama ere he begat Sheba, and five years to the five elder Brothers of Nimrod, it may be gathered that 65. years were consumed ere Nimrod himself was born : and that Raamah had that age ere any of his Sons were begotten, it may be gathered, by example and comparison : For Peleg, the fourth from Noah, as Raamah was, begat Regu in the same year of his Life.

Let us then allow 60. years more after the birth of Nimrod, for two other Generations to be brought forth, or else we shall hardly find people to build Babel : for sure we are that it was done by Hands, and not by Miracle : because it displaced God. These two numbers of 65. and 60. make 125 : The rest of the time of 121. (in which they arrived in Shinar whereof there are 6. years remaining) we may give them for their Travels remaining : we may give them for their Travels from the East : because they were pestered with Women, Children and Cattle : and as some ancient Writers have conceived, and Eusebius of later times, they kept always the Mountains sides, for fear of a second Flood. Now if we take this number of 121. out of 352. there remains 221. of which number Berosus bewoeth 65. on Belus, and 42. on Ninus, before Abraham born : Both which S. Augusine approveth : which two numbers taken again out of 221. there remaineth 114. years of the 352. from the Flood to Abraham's Birth : which number of 114. necessity bewoeth on Nimrod.

And it is to be objected that this time given to Nimrod, is over long : sure if we compare the Age of Nimrod with the rest of the same descent from Noah, it will rather appear over-short. For Nimrod, by this account, lived in all but one hundred seventy nine years : whereof he Reigned one hundred and twelve : whereas Sale who was the Son of Arphaxad the Son of Sem, lived four hundred and thirty three years : And of the same Age of the World was Nimrod, the Son of Chus, the Son of Cham.

Now after Abraham was born Ninus Reigned 9. years : which added to 43. make 52. Ninus dyeth and leaveth Semiramis his Successor. Semiramis governed the Empire of Babylonia and Assyria 42. years, and dyed in the 52. year complete of Abraham's life.

Ninus or Zameis succeeded Semiramis, and ruled 38. years, in the second year of whose Reign Abraham left Meopotamia.

When Abraham was 83. years old, he refused his Nephew Lot, and overthrow by Isurph Abraham King of Shinar, or Babylonia. Ninia Reigned 38. years, and Abraham came into Canaan but 23. years after Semiramis dyed : which was the 75. year of his Age : So that Abraham may seem to have been this Ninus the Son of Ninus, and Semiramis, whose 23. year, as aforesaid, being the 75. year of Abraham, he and his Fellow-Kings might have received this overthrow in the 85. year of Abraham, and the 33. year of his own Reign : after which he Reigned five years : which make in all 38. But the truth is, that the reasons to the contrary, urging that this Abraham could not be Ninus, are not easily answered. Howbeit for the times of the Assyrian Kings, that they are to be ordered as we have let them down, according to the times noted by Moses, in the Story of Abraham, is most certain : unless we will either derogate from the truth of Moses his computation, which were impiety : or account the whole History of Ninus and Semiramis to be a Fiction, which were to condemn all Ancient Historians for Fable.

That Amraphel, one of the four Kings whom Abraham overthrow, Gen. 14. may probably be thought to have been Ninus the Son of Ninus.

AND now touching this Amraphel, whom Moses makes King of Shinar or Babylonia, in the 85. year of Abraham's life, that is, in the 33. year of the Reign of Ninus Zameis the King of the Assyrians, the Son of Ninus and Semiramis, it is hard to affirm what he was, and how he could be at this time King of Babylonia : Ninus Zameis then Reigning there. To this doubt the answer which first offereth it self as most probable, is that which hath been already noted, that this Ninus or Zameis, was no other than our Amraphel : who invaded Tracemisi or Babylon, and overthrow those five Kings of Pentapolis, or the valley of Siddim. For the Scriptures tell us, that Amraphel was King of Shinar, which is Babylonia : and the times before accounted make him to be the Successor of Ninus and Semiramis : and it falleth out with the 85. Year of Abraham's life : wherein he refused Lot, Reu, Chedorlaomer, and overthrow the rest. True it is, that this Amraphel was not at this time the greatest Monarch : For Chedorlaomer commanded in chief, though Amraphel be first named by Moses in the first verse of the 14. Chapter of Genesis. For the Kings of the Valley of Siddim, or of Pentapolis, or of the five Cities, were the Vassals of Chedorlaomer, and not of Amraphel : as it is written. Twelve years were they subject to Chedorlaomer, but in the 13. year they rebelled, and in the 14. year came Chedorlaomer and the Kings that were with him : and therefore was Chedorlaomer the principal in this enterprise, who was then King of Elam, which is Persia. Now Persia being leaved over Tigris, and to the East of Amraphel's Country ; and the other two Kings, which were Companions with the other four, being leaved to the West of Shinar or Babylonia : Amraphel, who held Babylonia it self, cometh at this time to have had no great scope or large Dominion. For had Amraphel been so great a Prince as prophane Historians make Ninus or Semiramis whom he succeeded, he should not have needed the assistance of three other Kings for this expedition. But though Chedorlaomer were the first and greatest of those four Kings, (as it is manifest that he was : For these little Kings of Sodom, Gomorrha, &c. were his Vassals, and not Amraphel's) yet this makes not the conjecture less probable, but that this Amraphel might be Ninus. For it may be, that the great and potent Empire of Assyria, had now (as we shall then more plainly in that which followeth) received a down-right fall, at the time of this War : though not long before it commanded all the Kingdoms between India and the Phenician Sea : to wit, in the times of Ninus and Semiramis.

Of Arich another of the four Kings : and that Eliaz, whereof he is said to have been King, lies between Cælefyria and Arabia Petrea.

NOW the two other Kings joyned with Amraphel, and Chedorlaomer, were Arich and Tidal : the one King of Eliaz, the other of the Nations. For Eliaz, Arich, and Hierom write Pentus : fo Tobias thinketh that it should be Hellepont : which opinion Petrus favourieth. But this is only to defend the Latin Translation. For as Pentus, fo is Hellepont far distant, and out of the way to find any Armies into Arabia Petrea, or into Idumæa : which Countries these four Kings chiefly invaded : Besides that, it is certain, that the Assyrians (when they were greatest) had never any Dominion in Asia the less. For at such time as the Assyrians feared the invasion of the Medes and Persians, they sent not into Asia the less as Commanders : but used all the art they had to invite Cresus to their assistance : perswading him that nothing could be more dangerous for himself, and the other Kings of those parts, than the success of the Medes against the Assyrians. But examine the enterprise what it was. These Kings (saith the Text) made War with Bera, King of Sodom, Bispha King of Gomorrha, Shinab King of Admah, and Shemur King of Zebonim, and the King of Bela which is Zoar. All which five Kings had not so much ground as Middlesex : being lack of a kind of Reguli, as Tobias found in the Land long after : Namely Lords of Cities and small Territories adjoining ; of which Canaan had 33. all slain or hanged by Tobias. Neither can the other Countries, which in the Text they are said also to have invaded, be imagined to have been at that time of any great power : And therefore to call in Kings from Pontus or Hellepont, had manifested a great impotency and weakness in the Kings of Babylon and Persia.

And though it be alledged for an example, that divers Kings far off, came to assist Pompey against Cæsar : yet these same examples without like occasions and circumstances, do neither lead nor teach. For there was no cause to fear the greatness of these petty Kings, or of the other Countries : But the eyes of the World were fixed on Cæsar : and his undertakings and intents were to all other Princes, no less doubtful than Perseus : But the whole Country by these four Kings mastered in their passage, was afterward given to the half Tribe of Manasseh, Gad, and Ruben : a narrow valley of Ground lying between Jordan and the Mountains of Seir : inclosed by the River of Arnon on the South side, and by Libanus on the North, consisting of the two small Provinces of Tracemisi or Babylon, and the Region of the Maabites : a Conquest far invaluable, and little answering the power of the Assyrian Empire, if the same had remained in any comparable Estate with the times of Ninus and Semiramis, who subjected all the great Kings of that part of the World, without the assistance of any of the Kings of Hellepont, or any other part of Asia the less. But as the Volgar and Apollon convert a King of the Scythians, a King indeed, as far fetched to joyn with the Assyrians in this War, as the World had any at that time. The Septuagint do not shaming the word of Eliaz at all, but as they keep the word Arach, on the Mountains whereof the Ark did rest, so do they in this place retain the Hebrew word Eliaz, being doubtful to give it a wrong interpretation. And Petrus himself remembrateth other opinions far more probable than this of Pontus or Hellepont : yet he dares not avow his liking of them, because the Latin Translation hath it otherwise. For Stephanus de Orbibus a Græcian Cosmograph, findeth the City of Eliaz in the border of Cælefyria. And S. Hierom calleth Eliaz the City of Arach, as in truth it was. Now although the same be seated by Stephanus in Cælefyria, yet it standeth on the border of Arabia, of which Arach was King : who formerly joyned with Ninus in all his Conquests, being of the same Family, and descended from Cham and Chus after whom the name of Arach was by the Hebrews written Arich : and afterward again Arach : as in the Maabites : the Kings of Arabia holding that name even to the time of S. Paul, who was fought to be betrayed by the Lieutenant of Arach commanding in Damascus. They were Princes for the most part confederate and depending upon the Assyrian Empire. It is true that we find in Daniel, that in the time of Nabuchodonosor, one Arich was General of his Army, and the Principal Commander under him, who was a King of Kings : which makes it plain, that Arich here spoken of, the Son of that Arich confederate of Ninus, was no King of Pentus, nor of Scythia : Regions far removed from the Assyrians and Babylonians. The name also of Arach, who commanded under Nabuchodonosor is mentioned in Judith, by the name of King of the Elymeans : who are a Nation of Persians bordering Assyria : according to Stephanus : though Pliny sets it between the Sea-coast, and Adria : as if any Brother of the Arabian Kings or other of that House (known by the name of Arach, Arach, Arach or Arach) had the Government of that Persian Province called Elymeis (as it seemeth they had by the places of Daniel and Judith) yet the same was in Nabuchodonosor's time. But this Arich here spoken of may with more reason be taken for the King of Arabia, the Son of Arach, the confederate of Ninus : whose Sons held league as their Fathers did, being the next bordering Prince of all on that side towards the West to Babylonia, and Chaldaea : and in amity with them from the beginning, and of their own House, and Blood : which D. Siculus also confirmeth.

§. XI.

Of Tidal another of the four Kings.

THE fourth King by Abraham overthrow was Tidal, King of the Nations. The Hebrew writes it Gogim, which Vatellius takes to be a proper name : Lyra of mixt people : Calvius of runawayes without habitation : Petrus out of Sirach, finds that Gabæa was inhabited by divers Nations, which were a mixt people : namely of Assyrians, Arabians, and Phœnicians. Nam tales sunt qui Gabæa habitant. Such are the inhabitants of Calice, saith Sirach : and therefore was Tidal called King of these Nations, as they suppose. And it may be so : but the authority of Sirach is nothing in this question. For Gabæa was not peopled at this time as it was in the time of Sirach. For when Abraham came into Canaan, the Canaanite was then in the Land, howsoever they might be afterwards mixt : which I know not. But there are many ptry Kingdoms adjoining to Phœnicia, and Chaldaea, as Palmyra, Batanea, Ludæa, Apamea, Chalcedice, Callistia, Chalchoni, and all these do also joyn themselves to Meopotamia, on the North, and to Arabia on the East. And that these Nations gathered themselves together under Tidal, I take to be the probablest conjecture.

§. XII.

§. XII.

That Chedorlaomer the chief of the 4. Kings was not of Assyria, but of Persia: and that the Assyrian Empire at this time was much impaired.

Lastly, whereas it is conceived that Chedorlaomer was the Assyrian Emperor, and that Amraphel was but a Satrap, Viceroy, or Provincial Governor of Babylon, and that the other Kings named were such also, I cannot agree with Perrin in this. For Moses was too well acquainted with the names of Assur, and Shinar, to call the Assyrian a King of Elam: those Kings being in the Scriptures evermore called by the name of Chaldees, Shinar, Babylonians, or Assyria: but never by Elam, and Chedorlaomer or Kedarlaomer was for led of Kidar, from Gidarim which in the Hebrew signifieth Regale: for so Q. Curtius calleth the Garment which the Persian Kings wore on their heads.

Neither do I believe that the Assyrian or Babylonian Empire stood in any greatness at the time of this Invasion, and my reasons are these: First, example and experience teach us, that those things which are set up hastily, or forced violently, do not long last: Alexander became Lord of all Asia, on this side of Indus, in a time of so short a life, as it lasted not to over-look what it self had brought forth. His Fortunes were violent, but not perpetual. For his Empire died at once with himself: all whose chief Commanders became Kings after him. Tamercain conquered Asia and India with a storm-like and terrible success: but to prevalent fury God hath adjoined a short life: and whatsoever things Nature her self worketh in haste, she taketh the least care of their continuance. The fruit of his victories perished with him, if not before him.

Ninus being the first whom the madness of boundless dominion transported, invaded his neighbour Princes, and became victorious over them: a Man violent, insolent, and cruel. Semiramis taking the opportunity, and being more proud, adventurous, and ambitious, than her Paramour: enlarged the Babylonian Empire, and beautified many places therein with buildings unexampled. But her Son having changed Nature and Condition with his Mother, proved no less Feminine than she was Masculine. And as Wounds and Wrongs, by their continual smart, put the Patient in mind how to cure the one, and revenge the other: so those Kings adjoining (whose subjection, and calamities incident was but new, and therefore the more grievous) could not sleep, when the advantage was offered by such a Successor. For in Regno Babylonico hic parum resplenduit, This King shined little (saith Niclausus of Ninus) in the Babylonian Kingdom. And likely it is that the necks of mortal Men having been never before galled with the yoke of foreign dominion, Nor having ever had experience of that most miserable and detested condition of living in slavery: no long deferred having as yet invested the Assyrians with a right: nor any other title being for him to be pretended than a strong hand; the foolish and effeminate Son of a tyrannous and hated Father, could very ill hold for many great Princes and Nations his Vassals, with a power less mastering, and a mind less industrious than his Father and Mother had used before him. And he that was so much given over to licentious idleness, as to suffer his Mother to Reign 42. years, and thereof the greatest part after he came to

Mans estate: witnessed thereby to the World, that he so much preferred ease before Honour, and bodily pleasures before greatness, as he neither endeavoured to gain what he could not govern, nor to keep what he could not without contentions peril enjoy.

These Considerations being joined to the Story of Amraphel, delivered by Moses, by which we find that Amraphel King of Shinar was rather an inferior to the King of Persia, than either his superior or equal, make it seem probable, that the Empire of Ninus and Semiramis was at that time broken asunder, and restrained again to Babylon.

For conclusion I will add these two arguments confirming the former: First, that at such time as it pleased God to impose that great travel upon Abraham, from Ur in Chaldea to Charran, and then to Canaan a passage of 700. Miles, or little less, with Women, Children, and Carriages: the Countries through which he wandered were then settled, and in peace. For it was in the 23. year of Ninus, when Abraham obeying the Voice of God, took this great journey in hand: in which time of 23. years after the death of Semiramis, the neighbour Princes had recovered their Liberty and former Estates. For Semiramis Army of four Strabiles, millions, with her self utterly consumed in India, and all her Arms and Engines of War, at the same time lost, gave an occasion and opportunity even to the poorest Souls and weakest hearted Creatures of the World, to repurchase their former Liberty.

Secondly, it is affirmed by the best and ancientest Historians, that Arius the Son of Ninus, or Amraphel, invaded the Babylonians and Cassians, and again subjected them: which needed not if they had not been revolted from Ninus, after Ninus death. And as Arius recovered one part, so did Baleus or Balanus, otherwise Xerxes, reduce the rest revolted to their former obedience. Of whom it is said that he conquered from Aegypt to India: and therefore was called Xerxes, id est, Victor & triumphator, a Conquerour and Triumpher, which undertakings had been no other than the effects of madness, had not those Countries freed themselves from the Babylonian subjection. Now if we shall make any doubt hereof, that is of the conquest of Arius and Xerxes, both which lived after Ninus and Ninias, we may as well think the rest of Ninus and Semiramis to be but feigned: but if we grant this conquest, then is it true that while Ninus or Amraphel ruled, the Assyrian Empire was torn asunder, according to that which hath been gathered out of Moses as before remembered.

§. XIII.

That it is not improbable that the four Kings had no dominion in the Countries named, but that they had elsewhere with their Colonies planted themselves: and so retained the names of the Countries whence they came; which if it be so, we need not say that Amraphel was Ninus, nor trouble our selves with many other difficulties.

THE consent of all Writers, whose works have come to my perusal, agreeing as they do, that these 4. Kings, Amraphel of Shinar, Chedorlaomer of Elam, and their fellows were Lords of those Regions, whereunto they are or seem intitled: doth almost enforce us to think that the History

History must be understood, as I have delivered. But if in this place, as often elsewhere in the Scriptures, the names of Countries may be set for people of those Lands, or if (as Hierem hath it) Chedorlaomer, was King of the Elamites, as Tidal was said to be of the Nations, that is of people either wanting a fixed habitation, or gathered out of sundry Regions: then may we otherwise conceive of this History: removing thereby some difficulties which Men perhaps have been unwilling to find, because they could not find how to resolve them. For as it had been a strange conjecture to think that Arius was drawn to assist the Persians, against the Sodomites; as far as from Pontus, where it is very unlikely that Chedorlaomer was known, and almost impossible that the Vale of Siddim should have been once named: so in true estimation it is a thing of great improbability, that Chedorlaomer, if he were King of Persia, as Chedorlaomer, should pass through so great a part of the World, as the Countries of Assyria, Chaldea, Me, Isopattania, Syria, and part of Arabia, and Canaan, to subdue those five Towns, whose very names how they should come to his Ear, being disjoin by so many great Nations of different Languages, a Wife man could hardly conjecture. And if all the Countries bordering Persia, together with the Babylonian himself, yea the Kingdom of Eklessar, and that of Tidal, so far off removed were become his dependants, what reason can we find that might have induced him to hearken after Sodom and Gomorra? and when he should have fought the Establishment of his new-gotten Empire, by rooting out the Posterity of Ninus (as Ninus had dealt by Pharus of Medis, and Zerobabel of Babylonia) than to employ the forces of Amraphel, and those other Kings, against five petty Towns, leaving Tyrus, and Sidon, and the great City of Danuel, with many other places of much importance, and far nearer unto him, unsubdued? Now as these doubts which may be alleged against the first Conquest of the Vale of Siddim, are exceeding vehement: So are the objections to be made against his re-conquest of these five Cities, when they had revolted, as forcible; yea and more, as being grounded partly upon the Text it self. For first, what madness had it been in that small Province to Rebel against so powerful a Monarch? Or if it were so that they dwelling far from him, hoped rather to be forgotten, than that he should come or find to reclaim them, when his terrible Army approached, fill to entertain hope of Evailon: Yea to make resistance (being themselves a dissolute and therefore unwelcome people) against the power of all the Nations between Euphrates, yea between themselves and the River of Indus? Likewise on the part of Chedorlaomer we should find no greater wisdom, if he knowing the weakness of this people, had raised such a World of Men against them: whom by his Lieutenants, with small forces he might have subdued. For the perpetual inheritance of that little Country, was not sufficient to conserve one months charges of so huge an Army. How small then must his Valour have been, who with so mighty preparations effected no more than the wailing of that Valley, wherein he left the Cities standing, making no use of them; but returned well contented with a few Prisoners, and the pillage of the Country, although he had broken their Army in the Field? Now the Scriptures do not of this invasion (supposed to great) make any fearful matter: but compose the two Armies, as equally match, saying they were four Kings against five: yea, if the place be literally expounded, we shall find that Abraham fl. w. all these Kings, of which great laughter no History makes mention: Neither will the Reign of Ninus, who lived four or five years longer, permit that he should have died so soon: neither would Histories have forgotten the manner of his death, if he had so strangely perished in Syria. Whereby it appears that these four Kings, were not the fame that they are commonly thought: nor their forces so great as opinion hath made them. It may therefore well be true, that these Kings were such as many others, who in that age carried the same title: Lords and Commanders every one of his own company, which he carried forth as a Colony, seeking place where to settle himself and them, as was the usual manner of those times.

Neither is it improbable, that Chedorlaomer leading a Troop of Persians, Amraphel some people out of Shinar, and Tidal others gathered out of sundry places, might conjoin together, and make the weakest of the Country which lay about them, to pay them tribute. Whosoever will consider the beginning of the first Book of Tenochides, with the manner of Discoveries, Conquests and Plantations, in the infancy of Greece, or the manner of the Saracens invading Africa and Spain; with almost as many Kings as several Armies: or the proceedings of the Spaniards in their new Discoveries, Passages, and Conquests in the West-Indies: may easily perceive, that it was neither unusual, for the Leaders of Colonies to receive title from the people whom they conducted: nor to make Alliances to gether, and break them again, disturbing sometimes one the other, sometimes helping in pursuit of a Conquest. That Amraphel and his associates were such manner of Commanders, it may seem the more likely, by the stothful quality of Ninus then Reigning in Assyria: whose unmanlike temper was such, as might well give occasion to such undertaking Spirits, as wanted the employments whereunto they were accustomed, in the Reign of Semiramis, rather to seek adventures abroad, than to remain at home unengaged: whilst others more unworthy than themselves, were advanced. If the consent of the whole stream of Writers upon this place make this conjecture disagreeable to the Text, to the authority whereof of all humane reason must subscribe, then we may hold our selves to the former conjecture, that Amraphel was Ninus: And that the power of his Ancestors being by his stoth decayed, he might well be inferior to the Persian Chedorlaomer: or if this do not satisfy, we may say that Amraphel was an Under-King or Satrap of Shinar, under Ninus: who may be supposed to have had his Imperial Seat in his Fathers City Ninive: and to have preferred it before Shinar and Babylon the City of his Mother, whom he hated as an Usurper of his right. But if it were possible that in a case not concerning any Mans Salvation, and wherein therefore none hath cared to take great pains, all might ere: then can I think that the opinion, That these four Kings were Leaders of Colonies, sent out of the Countries named in the Text, and not Kings of the Countries themselves, is most consonant both to the condition of those times, and to the Scripture. And hereto add that Chedorlaomer seems rather called a Persian King, than King of Persia: and that Arius (whose Kingdom undoubtedly was between Syria and Arabia) having been a Man of Action or being

being a worthy Mans Son, was very well pleased to give passage and assistance to these Captains or petty Kings. These and such like things here to urge, were but with circumstances to adorn a supposition, which either may stand without them, or if it must fall, is unworthy to have cost bestowed upon it: especially considering, that it is not my intent to employ any more time in making it good, but to leave it wholly to the Readers pleasure, to follow any of these opinions, or any other, if he find any that shall seem better than these. But of what Countries or people forever these four were Kings, this expedition is the only publick Action that we know of performed by Abraham. And as for other things belonging to his Story, and of his Sons, and of his Nephews Elam and Jacob, as they are regulated by Moses, because it is not our purpose, neither to stand upon things generally known to all Christians, nor to repeat what hath been elsewhere already spoken, nor to prevent our selves in things that may hereafter in due place be remembered, we pass them here in silence. And because in this Story of Abraham and his posterity, there is much mention of Egypt: by which it appears that even in the time of Abraham, it was a settled and flourishing Kingdom, it will not be amiss in the next place to speak somewhat of the Antiquities, and first Kings thereof.

CHAP. II.

Of the Kings of Egypt from the first Peopling of it after the Flood, to the time of the delivery of the Israelites from thence.

§. I.

A brief of the names and times of the first Kings of Egypt: with a note of the causes of difficulty in resolving of the truth in these points.

Soon after the Confusion at Babel (as it seems) Cham with many of his Issue and followers (having doubtless known the fertility of Egypt before the Flood) came thither and took possession of the Country: in which they built many Cities: and began the Kingdom one hundred ninety one years after the Deluge. The ancient Governours of this Kingdom till such time as Israhel departed Egypt, are shewn in the Table following.

The Table and especially the Chronology, is to be confirmed by probabilities and conjectures, because in such obscurity manifest and restless truth cannot be found. For S. Augustin, a Man of exceeding great judgment, and incomparable diligence, who had sought into all antiquities, and had read the Books of Varro, which now are lost, yet omitted the Succession of the Egyptian Kings: which he would not have done, if they had not been more uncertain than the Syrian ones, whom he remembereth, than whom doubtless they were more glorious. One great occasion of this obscurity in the Egyptian Story, was the ambition of the Priests: who to magnifie their Antiquities, filled the Records (which were in their hands) with many leafings: and recounted unto Strangers, the names of many Kings that never Reigned. What ground they had for these reports of supposed Kings, it shall appear anon. Sure is it that the magnificent Works and Royal Buildings in Egypt, such as are never found but in States that have greatly flourished, witness that their Princes were of marvelous greatness: and that the reports of the Priests were not altogether false. A second cause of our ignorance in the Egyptian History, was the too much credulity of some good Authors, who believing the manifold and contrary reports of sundry Egyptians, and publishing in their own name, such as pleased them best; have confirmed them, and as it were enforced them upon us, by their authority. A third and general cause of more than Egyptian darkness in all ancient Histories, is the edition of many Authors by John Amnius, of whom (if to the censures of sundry very learned I may add mine) I think thus; That Amnius having seen some fragments of those Writers, and added unto them what he would, may be credited, as an avoucher of true Histories, where approved Writers confirm him: but otherwise is to be deemed fabulous. Hereupon it cometh to pass that the account of Authors, either in the Chronology or Genealogy of the Egyptian Kings, runs three altogether different ways. The Christian Writers, such as are ancient, for the most part follow Enchirion: Many late Writers follow the Edition of Amnius his Authors: The prophane Histories follow Hecataeus, Diodorus, and such others.

§. II.

§. II.

That by the accounts of the Egyptian Dynasties, and otherwise, it appears that Cham's Reign in Egypt began in the Year after the Flood 191.

To reconcile these, or gather out of them the times of the ancient Kings, about whom is most Controversie, the best means is by help of the Dynasties: of whose continuance there is little or no disagreement. The account of the Dynasties (besides the authority of approved Authors) hath this good ground, that it agreeth for the most part, if not altogether with the Histories of the Assyrians, Trojans, Italians, and others, &c. The beginning of the 16. Dyn. is joined by general consent, with the 43. year of Ninus: in which Abraham was born. The twelve first Dynasties lasted each of them seven years, under the twelve, which were called the greater Gods: So that all the years of their continuance were 84. The thirteenth Dynasty, endured fourteen years: the fourteenth 26: the fifteenth 37. These three last are said to have been under the three younger Gods. So the fifteen first Dynasties lasted 161. years. As I do not therefore believe that the continuance of these Dyn. was such as hath been mentioned, because Amnius in such wide limits out their time: so I cannot reject the account upon this only reason, That Amnius hath it to: considering that both hitherto it hath passed as current, and is greatly strengthened by many good reasons. For, whereas Enchirion placeth the beginning of the sixteenth Dynasty, in the year of Abraham's birth, as aforesaid, the reckoning is easily cast; by which the sum of 161. years, which according to our account were spent in the fifteen former, being subducted out of the sum of 332. years, which were between the Flood and Abraham's birth, sheweth that the beginning of the first Dynasty, which was the beginning of Cham's Reign in Egypt, was in the year 191. As also by other probabilities the same may appear. For it is generally agreed, that the multitude of Mankind which came into Shinar, arrived at Babel, Anno à diluvio 131. In building the Tower were consumed forty years as Glycas recordeth: whose report I have elsewhere confirmed with divers probabilities. That Cham was long in passing with his company, their Wives, Children, Cattle, and Substance, through all Syria then desolate, and full of Bogs, Forests, and Briers (which the Deluge and want of Culture in one hundred and seventy one years had brought upon it) no reasonable Man will doubt. To this passage therefore, and the seating of himself in Egypt, we allow 20 years: and these summs being added together, to wit one hundred thirty one years after the Flood, before they arrived at Babel, 40. years for their stay there, and 20. for Cham's passage into Egypt, and settling there, make up the sum of 191 years: at which time we said that Cham began his Reign in Egypt, in the beginning of the first Dynasty. And to this sum of 191. years if we add the 161. years of the 15. first Dynasties, as they are numbered in common account, we shall fall right with the year of Abraham's birth, which was An. Dil 352. And hereunto, omitting many other reasons, which might be brought to prove that these first Dynasties must needs have been very short, and not containing in the whole sum of their several times above 161. years: Let it suffice that had they lasted longer, then either must Egypt have been peopled as soon as Babel after the Flood: or the Dynasties

(as Mercator thinks) must have been before the Flood. That the arrival at Babel was many years before the Plantation of Egypt, after the Flood, enough hath been said to prove: and that the Dynasties were not before the Flood, the number of the long-lived Generations between Adam and the Flood, which was less than the number of the Dynasties, may sufficiently witness. Or it we will think, that one life might (perhaps) be divided into many Dynasties, then may this have been as well after the Flood, as before: considering that the Sons of Noah did not in every Country erect such form of Policy, as had been used in the same ere the Deluge: but such, as the disposition of the people, the authority and power of the Conduiter, together with many other circumstances, did induce or enforce them to.

§. III.

That these Dynasties were not divers Families of Kings, but rather Successions of Regents, oftentimes many under one King.

THE short continuance of the Dynasties, doth shew that they were not several Races of Kings, as the vaunting Egyptians were wont to stile them. What they were it cannot certainly be warranted. For in restitutions of decayed Antiquities, it is more easie to deny than to affirm. But this may be said, partly upon good circumstance, partly upon the surest proof, That it was the manner of the Egyptian Kings, to put the Government of the Country into the hands of some trusty Councillor, only reserving the Sovereignty to themselves, as the old Kings of France were wont to the Masters of the Palace, and as the Turks doth to the chief Vizier. This is confirmed first by the number of the Dynasties, whereof many are under Cham, and more than one under Ofiris or Ahoris, and must therefore have been lucidations, not of Kings, but rather of Councillors and Regents. Secondly, by custom of such Princes Borderers to Egypt, as are mentioned in the Scriptures: of whom Amimilech the Philistin in his dealing with Abraham and Isaac about confederation, did nothing without Phicol Captain of his Host: though in taking Abraham's Wife, and in his private carriage, he followed his own pleasure. Likewise of Amimilech the Son of Gidon it was said: Is not he the Son of Jerubbal? and Zebul is his Officer? Also Ishobab the Son of Saul, feared Ahner the Captain of the Host. Yea, David himself hating Joab for his cruelty, did not punish him, in regard of his greatness, which was such, as was feared even of Hadad the Edomite living then in Egypt. Thirdly, this is confirmed by the temper and disposition of Cham, who was lewd, as appears by the Scriptures: therefore likely both for his own idleness and pleasure, to have laid the burthen of Government upon others; and upon jealousie, the companion of unworthiness, to have changed his Lieutenants often. Above all other proofs is the advancement of Joseph by Pharaoh. For Pharaoh said to Joseph: Only in the Kings Throne will I be above thee: behold I have set thee over all the Land of Egypt. William, Archbishop of Tyre, who flourished about the year of our Lord one thousand one hundred eighty, affirms that the like or very fine form of Government by Viceroy, was in his time practised in Egypt, having there been in use (as he believed) ever since the time of Joseph. He plainly shews, that the Soldans of Egypt were not Lords of the Country, callesh Vexoris: For Jufine placeth Vexoris in ages before Nimus: whereby it would follow that Sefoftris, if he were Vexoris, was more ancient than was Ofiris (otherwise Mizraim) a thing altogether unlikely. Certain it is that after the departure of Israel out of Egypt, no one Pharaoh came into the land of Canaan (which lieth in the way from Egypt into Asia) till the Father-in-law of Salomon, Pharaoh Yaphis, took Gerar, and gave it to his Daughter: after which time Sefac oppressed Rehobam, and gave it to his Daughter: after which time Sefac oppressed Rehobam, and Necho fought passage through the land of Israel, when he made his expedition against the Chaldeans. Of King Vaphres and Necho it is out of question, that neither of them was the great King Sefoftris. Of Sefac it is doubted by some, forasmuch as he came into Judea, with a great Army. Reineccius propounding the doubt leaveth it undecided; unless it be sufficient proof of his own opinion, that he himself placeth Sefoftris next to Orus: following the Scholastic Apollonius. But further answer may be made to show that they were not one. For as Jufine witnesseth, Sefoftris, otherwise Vexoris, made War on People far removed, abtaining from his neighbours. Sefac came up purposely against Hierufalem. Sefoftris, as Diad. witnesseth, had but 24000. horse. Sefac had 60000: Sefoftris had 8020. Chariots, Sefac but 1200: Sefoftris made his expedition for no private purpose, but to get a great name: Sefac, as most agree, had no other purpose than to succour Terebans, and give him countenance in his new reign: whom he had favoured even against Salomon: therefore Sefoftris must needs have reigned whilst Israel abode in Egypt.

Whereas Kremzheimius collecteth out of Hierodotus, and Diadorus, that one Menas, or Menas, was next to Orus: because those Historians affirm that he reigned next after the Gods; it moveth me nothing. For Ofiris did succeed those 12. Gods, namely the twelve greater and three lesser: himself also (as the learned Reineccius noteth) being callesh Menas. Which name, as also Mineus, and Menis, were titles of dignity: though mistaken by some as proper names. Kremzheimius doth very probably gather, that Menas was Mercurius Ter-maximus: the Hebrew word Meni signifying an Aritmetician: which name Ter-maximus might well be attributed to Ofiris: who was a great Conqueror, Philosopher, and benefactor to mankind, by giving good Laws, and teaching profitable Arts. In proofs and great undertakings Sefoftris was no whit inferior to Ofiris. For he fought victory not for gain, but for honour only: and being well contented, that many Nations had acknowledged his power, and submitted themselves to his will and royal disposition, leaving them in a manner to their liberty, returned into Egypt. Soon upon his return he was endangered by a great Treason, the house in which he was, being by his own brother purposely fired: which nevertheless he is said to have escaped, and to have reigned in all thirty three years: after which time he chose rather to die than to live: because he fell blind. Both Hierodotus, and Diadorus, affirm that Sefoftris left a Son, whose name was Phoron or Phorones: who afterwards took the name of Sefoftris: but was nothing like to his Father in glory: for he shortly fell blind. The cause of his blindness Hierodotus attributes to his assaulting the River Nilus with a Javeline: which tale Diadorus having likewise heard, yet reports as a fable, saying that perhaps he took the disease naturally from his Father. How long this Man reigned it is no where expressed: yet forasmuch as Orus the second, (otherwise Bu-

ris) who succeeded him, began 14. years after that this Sefoftris had been King, it must needs be that this reigned 14. years at least. That Bufris began not until these 14. years at least were expired, the very account of time from the first of Bufris, to the departure of Israel out of Egypt plainly shews, being almost generally agreed upon, to have been 75. years. That none came between Sefoftris the second and Bufris or Orus the second, it stands only upon probabilities: which are these. After Sefoftris had regained somewhat, he fell blind: after certain years he recovered his sight, as is said: which may have been true, but is more like to have been a fable: surely the manner of his recovery as it is set down, is very fabulous: namely that by looking upon a Woman, or washing his eyes with her water, who had only known her own Husband, he got his sight again. As the time of his Reign, before his blindness, and when he was well again (if ever he were) may have taken up a good part of 14. years: so his works, which were great, do much more strongly argue, that his Reign was not very short. His works are largely set down by Hierodotus, and Diadorus: a part of which may seem to have been the fulfilling of that which his Father had begun, about the Channels and Sluces of Nilus: whom I think he rather frighted, (as his Father had done) with spades and shovels, than with darts, and javelins: and by his diligent oversight of that work, was like enough to lose both his eyesight and his peoples love: whom his Father had very busily employed in excessive labour about it.

§. VII.

Of Bufris the first oppressor of the Israelites: and of his successor Queen Thermutis that took up Moyses out of the water.

AND herein (if I may presume to conjecture) Bufris, who was afterwards King, is like to have dealt with him, as Terebans did with the Son of Salomon. For that Bufris himself was much addicted to magnificent works, it well appeared, by the drudgery wherewith he wearied the Children of Israel in his buildings: If therefore he were employed by the great Sefoftris, as Terebans was by Salomon in the oversight of those businesses, he had good opportunity to work his greatness with the King by industry: and afterward with the people by incensing them against their new King: as Terebans did. For what the multitude will endure at one Princes hands, they will not at another: unless he have either an equal Spirit, or a furer foundation. If moreover he sought to derive all the pain and labour of public works from the Egyptians, to the Israelites: he is surely did that which to his own people was very plausible, (as appears in Exodus) were nothing lack in fulfilling the Kings cruelty. Now that Orus the 2. or Bufris was the King that first oppressed Israel, and made the Edict of drowning the Hebrew Children, which (saith Cedrenus) lasted ten months: it is a common opinion of many great and most learned Writers, who also think that hereupon grew the fable of Bufris sacrificing strangers. It is also a common interpretation of that place, Ex. 1. that the King, who knew not Jefeph, was a King of a new family. That Bufris was of a new family, Reineccius doth shew: who also thinks him Author of the bloody Edict. Nevertheless, true it is, that Bufris according to all mens computation, began his reign 5. years after the the birth of Mofes: before whose birth it is most manifest, that the Law was made, and much more that the persecution began: which Burning thinks to have lasted 87. years, ere the departure out of Egypt. Let us therefore consider, besides the blindness of Sefoftris the second, how great the power of the Regents or Pharaohs in Egypt was: and how great countenance the Kings did put in them: seeing Jefeph ruled with such full power, that he bought all Egypt, and all the Egyptians for Bread: bought all Egypt, and all the Egyptians for Bread: at the same time the best of the Land to his own Father and Brethren, for nothing: seeing also that when the Egyptians cried out upon Pharaoh, that he had sold them for Bread: Pharaoh laid to all the Egyptians, Get ye for Bread: Pharaoh laid to all the Egyptians, Get ye for Bread: what he said to you, do ye. Here a Stranger Jefeph: what he said to you, do ye. Here a Stranger born, lately fetched out of Prison, a King not able to have governed himself, would give such Traff, and Sovereign Authority: it is not unlikely that a blind Prince should do so to a Son of especial Reputation. For God often punishes, not only the good (such as Jefeph was) but wicked Men also, as by his Instruments against the day of Wrath. Therefore perhaps the King did (as many have done) resign his Kingdom to him, though his Reign was not accounted to have begun, till the death of Sefoftris. But whether Bufris did usurp the Kingdom, or possession of the Land by violence: or whether the blind King resigned it, keeping the Title: or whether Bufris were only Regent, whilst the King lived, and afterwards (as is acknowledged by all) King himself: it might well be said that Pharaoh's Daughter took up Mofes, and that Pharaoh vexed Israel: seeing he both at that time was King in effect, and shortly after King in deed and Title both. It were not absurd for us to say that the blind King Sefoftris the second oppressed Israel: but forasmuch as it may seem that the wicked Tyrant showed his evil Nature even when he first arose: I think it more likely, that Bufris did it, using at first the power of a King, and shortly after the file. Thus of the 122. years which passed between the beginning of Sefoftris his Reign, and the departure of Israel out of Egypt, 47. being spent: the 75. which remain, are to be accounted to Bufris or Orus the second, and his Children. Bufris himself reigned 30. years, according to Eusebius: whom very many judicious Authors herein approve. After him his Daughter, who took Mofes out of the Water, is said by all that I have read, to have reigned 12. years: Her name was Thermutis Pharaoh: or Amnis according to Cedrenus: Euseb. calls her Ameritis: and out of Arabanus his History Miris: Jofephus calls her both Ameritis and Thermutis. Epiphanius in Panoplia faith that she was honoured afterward of the Egyptians, by the name of Thermutis the Daughter of Amneph, the Son of Pharaoh. Of this last Title question might be made and much spoken: For the Scriptures call her not Pharaoh's Sons Daughter, but Pharaoh's Daughter. Amneph indeed is placed next before Bufris or Orus the second by Eusebius and others: But whether he were a King or only a Regent I cannot conjecture. For Hierodotus, Diadorus, and the Ancient Historians name the Son of Sefoftris, Phoron. Perhaps his name was Pharaoh Amneph: and his Daughter by the Egyptians called rather the Niece or Grandchild, than the Daughter of Pharaoh, because of the glory of Sefoftris, and the disreputation of his Son. If so, and if that Bufris or Orus the second marrying her, pretended any Title by her, then is our conjecture strengthened, and then was the both Daughter, Grandchild, and Wife unto Pharaoh: and surviving him, Queen of the Land, 12. years. But if she were the Daughter of Orus the second and Sister of Ahoris, or Rathoris, as many think, to whose conjecture I will not oppose mine, then may it seem, that either her Brethren were degenerate, or too young to rule, when her Father died.

§. VIII.

Of the two Brethren of Queen Thermutis: and what King it was, under whom Moyses was born: and who it was that perished in the Red Sea.

THE had two Brethren: the one was Rathoris, or Ahoris, who succeeded her; the other Telegmus, who is only named by Eusebius: but his lineage and Offspring described by Reineccius. Rathoris after his Sisters death Reigned 9. years: after whom Cherres, thought to be his Son, Reigned 10. and then perished in the Red Sea. During the Reign of Cherres, Eusebius faith, that Telegmus begat Epaphus upon 16. of which History elsewhere he reporteth otherwise. After the death of Cherres (whom some call Acherres: but all or most do stile Sefac, a fighter against God) Acherres Reigned 8. years: and then Cherres 15. This descent seems from Father to Son. In the 17. year of Cherres it is said by Euseb. that Epaphus Reigning in the lower part of Egypt built Memphis. This is an argument of that which otherwise was not unlikely: viz. That Egypt was greatly brought out of order by the Plagues which God had laid upon it, and the destruction of her King and Army in the Red Sea: else could it not have had two Reigning in it at once; the latter of whom, or his Posterity seems to have taken all from Cherres the Grandchild of Cherres. For whereas Amnis is said to have Reigned 4. years after Cherres: and Amnis one after Amnis: these two Kings are by Eusebius and others accounted as one; and his Reign said to have been 5. years. His name is called Amnis, otherwise Danau: and his Pedegree thus described by Reineccius in Historia Julia,

Telegmus:
Epaphus:
Libya, who had

Agenor, Belus, and Bufris.

Egyptus or Rameses: who gave name to the Country, having expelled his brother Danau, Reigned, and begat Lyncus Married to Hypermestra.

Danau or Armeus expelled by his brother Egyptus, after he had Reigned five years, became King of Argos in Greece: was Father to Hypermestra.

How it might come to pass that the Nephews Sons of Epaphus should have occupied the Kingdom after Cherres, it is hard to say: considering that Epaphus himself is reported by Eusebius to have been born in the time of Cherres. But forasmuch as the History of Epaphus his birth, is diversely related by Eusebius, it may suffice, that Belus the Father of Danau and Egyptus, otherwise called Armeus and Rameses, was equally distant from Bufris or Orus the second, with Cherres the Grandchild of Cherres.

And that the Posterity of Telegonus did marry very young, it appears by the History of these two Brethren, Danau and Aegyptus: of whom the former had 50. Daughters, the latter 50. Sons: perhaps, or rather questionless, by divers Women: yet surely they began to beget Children in their first youth: Howsoever it were, the general consent of Writers is, that Armeus or Danau did succeed Cherres: and (according to Eusebius and good Authors approving him) reigned five years. Ramses followed, who reigned 68. years. This Ramses or Aegyptus is that Armses of Armses, of Armses, under whom, in the opinion of Mercator, and of Bunting that follows Mercator, Moses was born: and the cruel Edict made of drowning the Hebrew Children. The length of his Reign seems to me the chief, if not the only ground of Mercator's opinion. For whereas the Lord said to Moses, Go return to Egypt, for they are all dead which went about to kill thee, Mercator hereupon conceives, that it was one and the same King under whom Moses was born, and under whom he slew the Aegyptians at the 40. year of his age: and did into the Wilderness, and there abode for fear: all which Circumstances could agree with none, but this Ramses, who reigned so long: wherefore defrout rather to hold a true Paradox, than a common Error, he placeth one Alisfragmus (whose name is found in the Life of Aegyptian Kings, but the time uncertain wherein he reigned) in an age 12. or 13. years more ancient than others left him in: and so continuing the Catalogue of his successors from Themul (whom Euf. calls Anafis) downwards with no other variation of the length of each Mans Reign, than is the difference between Manetho and Euseb. he binds Moses born under Armses to Armses: and Israel delivered in the days of his Son Amenophis. The very name of Alisfragmus seems to him with little alteration to sound like Pharates, of which name one was thought to have flourished either as a King, or a wise Man about the time of Isaac. For (saith he) from Alisfragmus to Phragmus, Pharagmus, Pharagmus, or Pharates, the change is not great. Mercator was a Man of excellent learning and industry: and one to whom the World is bound for his many notable works: yet my assent herein is withheld from him, by these reasons. First, I see all other Writers agree, that Cherres was the King who was drowned in the red Sea: Secondly, the place Exod. 4. all are dead, &c. may better be understood of Burris and all his Children, than of one King alone: Thirdly, S. Cyril in his first Book against Julian the Apostate, saith that Dardanus built Dardania, when Moses was 120. years old: Ramses, which was this Armses, being then King of Aegypt. After Ramses, Amenophis reigned 19. years: who is thought by Mercator, and peremptorily by Bunting pronounced, to be the King that perished in the red Sea: of which our opinion being already laid open, I think it most expedient to refer the Kings ensuing to their own times (which a Chronological Table shall lay open) and here to speak of that great deliverance of Israel out of Aegypt: which for many great considerations depending thereupon, we may not lightly over-pass.

CHAP. III.

Of the delivery of Israel out of Egypt.

§. I.

Of the time of Moses's birth, and how long the Israelites were oppressed in Egypt.

TRUE it is that the History it self is generally and well known: yet concerning the time of Moses's birth, who was the excellent and famous instrument of this, and other great works of the Highest, the different opinions are very near as many, as the Men that have written of that Argument.

L. Vives in his Annotations upon S. Augustine's sixth many of their conjectures: as that of Porphyrie out of Sanchoniato, that Moses lived in the time of Semiramis: but if he meant the first Semiramis, it was but a fond conceit: for besides that the same is contrary to all stories Divine and humane; while that Semiramis lived the commanded Syria, and all the parts thereof absolutely: neither were the Ammonites or Moabites or Edomites while he ruled, in terram naturam.

A second opinion he remembereth of Apion, taken from Ptolema a Priest of Mendes, who saith that Moses was born while Inachus ruled the Argives, and Ameis in Aegypt.

The third opinion is taken out of Polemon, in his Greek History the first Book: that Moses was born while Apis the third King ruled Argos.

A fourth is borrowed from Tatianus Africanus, who though he cite some Authorities, that Moses lived after the Trojan War, is himself of opinion, that Moses was far more ancient, proving it by many Arguments.

Fifthly, he setteth down the testimony of Numerius the Philosopher, who took Museus and Moses to be one: confirming the same out of Arctanus, who confesseth that Moses was called Moseus, by the Græcians: and who farther delivereth that he was adopted by Chemphis, or Thermis, the Daughter of Aegypt: the same which Eupolemus calleth Moris; others (as Rabanus Maurus) Thermis. Eusebius also affirmeth that by Eupolemus in his first Book De bono, Moses vir Deo conjunctissimus is called Museus Judeorum. Eusebius in his Chronologie, finds that Moses was born while Amenophis ruled Aegypt. The ancient Manetho calls that Pharaoh, which lived at Moses's birth, Thumosis or Thumosis: the same perchance which Apion the Grammarian will have to be Ameis, and elsewhere Amenophis the Father of Setubos: to whom Lysimachus and Cornelius Tacitus give the name of Bocchoris. To me it seemeth most probable, that while Sapirus, called also Spherus or Spherus, governed Affrica; Orthopolis Sycyonia; and Crisius the Argives; that then (Scythia the second ruling in Aegypt) Moses was born. For if we believe S. Augustine, it was about the end of Cecrops's time, that Moses led Israel out of Egypt. Eduis Moses ex Egypto populum Dei novissimo tempore Cecrops Atheniensium re-gie: Moses (saith he) led the People of God out of Egypt, about the end of Cecrops's time King of the Athenians. In this sort therefore is the time of Moses's birth, and of his departure out of Egypt best proved. S. August. affirms (as before remembered) that Moses was born: Sapirus governing Affrica; and that he left Aegypt about the end of Cecrops's time. Now Sapirus ruled 20. years; his successor Manelus 30. years; Sapirus after him 40. years: in whose fourth year Cecrops began to govern in Attica: Athenades followed Sapirus, and held the Empire 41. So as Moses being born while Sapirus ruled Affrica; Orthopolis Sycyonia; and Crisius Argos (for these three Kings lived at once at his birth, saith S. Augustine, as Cecrops did when he departed Aegypt) it will follow that the birth of Moses was in the nineteenth year of the Affrican Sapirus: for take one year remaining of 20. (for so long Sapirus reigned) to which add the thirty years of Manelus, and the 40. years of Sapirus, these make 71. with which there were waited three years of Cecrops his 50. years: then take nine years out of the Reign of Athenades, who was Sapirus's successor, those nine years added to 71. make 80. which age Moses left Egypt: and add these nine years to the three years of Cecrops formerly spent, there will remain but four years of Cecrops his 50. and so it falleth right with S. Augustine's words, affirming that towards the end of Cecrops his time, Moses led the People of Israel out of Egypt.

Now the time in which the Hebrews were oppressed in Egypt, seemeth to have had beginning some eight or nine year before the birth of Moses, and 54. year, or rather more, after Joseph: between whose death and the birth of Moses, there were consumed 64. years: some of which time, and 80. years after, they lived in great servitude and misery. For as it is written in Exodus, They set task-masters over them, to keep them under with burdens: and they built the Cities Pithom and Ramses, &c. And by cruelty they caused the children of Israel to serve; and made them weary of their lives, by sore labour in clay and brick, and in all work of the field, with all manner of bondage. All which laid upon them by a mastering power and strong hand, they endured to the time by the wisdom of God appointed: even from 54. years, or not much more, after the death of Joseph, who left the World, when it had lasted 2370. years, to the eightieth year of Moses, and until he wrought his Miracles in the Field of Zaan, which he performed in the Worlds age 2514. towards the end thereof according to Codeman, or after our account, 2513. And because those things which we deliver of Egypt, may the better be understood, I think it necessary to speak a few words of the principal places therein named, in this discourse.

§. II.

Of divers Cities and places in Egypt, mentioned in this Story, or elsewhere in the Scripture.

THIS City which the Hebrews call Zaan, was built seven years after Hebron. Ezekiel call it Taphnes; and so doth Hieremie; the Septuaginta; Tanis; Josephus Protatidis, after the name of an Egyptian Queen; Antonius gives it the name of Tonius; Helegippus Thannia; and William Tyrinus, Tanias. It adjoineth to the Land of Gosen, and is the same, wherein Hieremie the Prophet was stoned to death, for preaching against the Egyptian and Jewish Idolatry.

Zaan or Taphnes was in Moses's time the Metropolis of the lower Egypt, in which their Pharaohs then commonly resided; and not unlikely to be the same City, where Abraham in his time found him. But Eusebius out of Arctanus affirmeth, that Abraham read Abram in Helipolis or On, to Pitarates King of Egypt. Alex. Polyhistor out of Eupolemus hath it otherwise: saying, that Abraham instructed the Egyptian Priests, and not the King; both which Authorities Eusebius citeth. The Septuaginta, and the Vulgar Edition, for Zaan write Helipolis. Paginus, Vatinius, Junius, and our English call it On; and Ptolema Onium. There are two Cities of that name; the one on the frontier of the lower Egypt, towards the South; the other somewhat lower on the Eastern-most branch of Nilus falling into the Sea at Pelufium. And it may be that Helipolis to the South of the River Trojan, was the same which Vatinius, and our English call Aven. Of the latter it is, that the Scriptures take certain knowledge: the same which Phy, Mela, and Phry call Solis oppidum; Tyrinus in the Holy War, Malvee; the Arabians Bahabeth; and Simon Sabis, Sabis. Of this Helipolis or On, was Phimphar Priest, or Prince, whose Daughter Joseph married. In the Territory adjoining Jacob inhabited, while he lived in Egypt. In the confines of this City, Onias the high Priest of the Jews built a Temple, dedicated to the eternal God; not much inferior to that of Jerusalem (Ptolema Philopater then governing in Egypt) which stood to the time of Vespasian, 333. years after the Foundation by Onias, whom Josephus falsely reporteth, herein to have fulfilled a Prophecy of Isai, c. 19. In die illa erit altare Domini in medio terra Egypti. In that day shall the altar of the Lord be in the midst of the land of Egypt. Amos Ephraim at that time of the building Tyrannus over the Jews, gave the occasion for the erecting of this Temple in Egypt. Lastly, there it was, that our Saviour Christ Jesus remained, while Joseph and the Virgin Mary feared the violence of Herod: near which (saith Brocardus) the Fountain is still found, called Jesai Well, whose streams do afterward water the Gardens of Balsamum, no where else found in Aegypt. And hence let me more in Brocardus in his description of Egypt.

There is also the City of Nepis, remembered by Isidore and Ezekiel; the same which Hesai the Priest calleth Moph: which latter name it took from a mountain adjoining, so called, which Mountain Herodotus remembereth. And this is that great City, which was called Amenphis; and so the Septuaginta write it. It is known to the Arabians by the name of Mazar. The Chaldeans name it Alcalaby; and Tudalenti, Mizaraim.

Pelufium, which Vatinius, Paginus, Junius, and our English write Sin; the Septuaginta call Sais; and Montanus Lebna; is not the same with Damietta, as Gul. Tyrinus witnesseth. In the time of Saladin the third, Pelufium was called Belbeis. Belbeis (saith Tyrinus) quo olim dicitur esse Pelufium, Belbeis, that in times past was called Pelufium.

The City of No, the Septuaginta call Diopolis. Of which name there are two or three in Egypt. Hierome converts it Alexandria, by anticipation, because it was so called in the future.

Bubastus, for so Hierome and Ziegler write it, is the same which the Hebrews call Pisefeth.

To make the Story the more perceivable, I have added a description of the Land of Gosen, in which the Israelites inhabited; with those Cities and places so often remembered in the Scripture: as of Taphnes or Zaan, Helipolis or Belbeis, Balsamum, Succoth, and the rest; together with Moses's passage through the Delarts of Arabia the Story. For all all Story without the knowledge of the places, wherein the Actions were performed, as it wanteth a great part of the pleasure; so it no way enricheth the knowledge and understanding of the Reader; neither doth any thing serve to retain, what we read, in our memories, so well as these Pictures and Descriptions do. In which respect I am driven to digress in many places, and to interpose some such Discourse, otherwise seeming impertinent: taking for my authority, after many others more ancient, that great learned Man Arrianus Montanus; who in his Preface to the Story of the Holy Land, hath these words. Si enim aliquid quod locorum observatione res seque narrentur, adeo confusa atque perturbata evasit, ut nec ulla res nihil non observamus, nihil non difficile elici possit. If narration (saith he) be made of those things which are performed, without the observation of the places, wherein they were done: or if Histories be read without Topographical knowledge, all things will appear so intricate and confused, as we shall thereby understand nothing but obscurely, nor draw thence any knowledge, but with the greatest difficulty.

§. III.

Of the cruelty against the Israelites young Children in Egypt: and of Moses his preservation, and education.

BUT to return to the Story it self. It appeareth that notwithstanding the Labour and Slavery, which the Israelites endured, yet they decreased not in numbers: inasmuch as Pharaoh considering the danger of discontented Poverty, and the able Bodies of an oppressed multitude, how perilous they might be to his Estate, by suggestion of the Devil resolved to slaughter all the male Children of the Hebrews, so soon as they should be born. To which end he sent for Sephora and Tina, Women the most famous and expert amongst them, qua preerat (saith Commentor) multitudine obsequiorum, who had command given them over all Midwives; by whom (as it seemeth) he gave order to all the rest for the execution of his Edict. To have called all the Midwives of Egypt together, had been a strange Parliament. Now whether these two, before named, were of the Hebrews, or of the Egyptians, it is diversely disputed. S. Augustin calls them Hebrews, because it is written Exodus the first, The King of Egypt commanded the Midwives of the Hebrews, Wives, &c. But Josephus, Abulensis, and Perrinus believe them to be Egyptians. Whoever they were, when it pleased God to frustrate the execution of that cruel Murder, to the end the World might witness both the wickedness of the Egyptians, and the just cause, thereby made manifest, of his future Indignation and Revenge: Pharaoh finding those Women filled with Piety, and the fear of God, commanded others of his people to execute his former intent; and publicly, or howsoever, to destroy all the male Hebrew Children born within his Dominions.

Now besides the doubts, which Pharaoh had of the multitudes of the Hebrews, the greatest part of whom he might have assured, by affording them the justice, which every King oweth to his Vassals, and the rest he might have employed or sent away at his pleasure; Josephus giveth another cause, of his rage against them, namely, That it was prophetically delivered him by an Egyptian Priest, that among the Hebrews there should be born a Child; who growing to Mans Estate should become a plague and terror to his whole Nation. To prevent which, (and presuming that he could resist the Ordinance of God, by a name, contrary to the Laws of Heaven and of Nature) he stretched out his bloody and merciless Hand to the execution of his former intent. The same prevention Herod long after practised, when fearing the Spiritual Kingdom of Christ, as if it should have been Temporal, he caused all the Male Children at that time born to be slaughtered. And that Pharaoh had some kind of forknowledge of the future success, it may be gathered by these his own words, in the tenth verse of the fifth of Exodus. Come, let us work wisely with them, lest they multiply; and it come to pass, that if there be War, they join themselves also unto our enemies, and fight against us, and get them out of the Land. But we see, and time hath told us from the beginning, how God derideth the wisdom of the worldly Men, when forgetting the Lord of all Power, they rely on the inventions of their own most feeble, and altogether darkened understanding. For even by the hands of the dearly beloved Daughter of this Tyrant, was that great Prophet and Minister of Gods marvellous works taken out of Nitus, being therein turned off, in an Ark of Reeds, a sucking and powerless Infant. And this Prince's having beheld the Child his form and Beauty, though but yet in the blouth, he pierced her compassion, as he did not only preserve it, and cause it to be fostered; but commanded that it should be esteemed as her own, and with equal care to the Son of a King nourished. And for memory that it was her Deed, the called the Child Moses, as it were, extrañus, or creptus, taken out, to wit, out of the Water: or after Josephus and Gyca, Moy, a voice expelling Water, and hisei, as much to say, as that which is drawn out of water, or thence taken. Clement Alexandrinus was of opinion, that Moses was Circumcised, before he was put into the Ark of Reeds, and that Amram, his Father, had named him Joachim. In his youth he was carefully brought up by the care and at the charge of Pharaoh's Daughter, and by Men of the most understanding taught and instructed: quem regis more educavit, profectus est sapientius: Egyptianum Magistru, a quibus eruditur, saith Basil; Unto whom he gave Princely education, appointing over him wise Masters of the Egyptians for his Instructors. Thereby (say Josephus and Philo) he became excellently learned in all the doctrine of the Egyptians; which also the Martyr Stephen in the seventh of the Acts confirmeth. And Moses was learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians. Which wisdom or sapience, such as it was, or at least so much thereof as Six. Seneca hath gathered, we have added, between the death of Moses, and the Reign of Joshua.

§. IV.

Of Moses his flying out of Egypt; and the opinions of certain ancient Historians of his War in Ethiopia; and of his Marriage there: Philo his judgement of his Pastoral life: and that of Petrus of the Books of Genesis and Job.

WHen Moses was grown to mans Estate, Josephus and Enschius, out of Arrianus, tell us of ten years War that he made against the Ethiopians: of the besieging of Saba, afterward by Cambyses called Meroe; and how he recovered that City by the favour of Tharbis, Daughter of Abisipha, whom he took to Wife. So hath Commentor a pretty tale of Moses. How after the end of that War, Tharbis redressing his return into Egypt, Moses, most skillful in Astronomy, caused two Images to be engraven in two precious Stones: whereof the one encreased memory; the other caused forgetfulness. These he set in two Rings; whereof he gave the one, to wit, that of oblivion, to his Wife Tharbis, reserving the other of memory for himself: which Ring of forgetfulness, after the said a while worn, he began to neglect the love the bare her Husband: and so Moses without danger returned into Egypt. But leaving these fancies to the Authors of them: It is true, that about the 40. year of Moses age, when he beheld an Egyptian offering violence to one of the oppressed Hebrews, moved by compassion in respect of his brother, and stirred up by disdain against the other, in the contention he slew the Egyptian. Soon after which act, finding a disposition in some of his own Nation to accuse him, for whose defence he had thus greatly endangered his own life: by the ordinance and advice of God, whose chosen servant he was, he fled into Arabia Petrea, the next bordering Country to Egypt; where wandering all alone, as a Man left and forsaken, in a place unknown unto him, as among a Nation of barbarous strangers; and who in future times were the irreconcilable enemies of the Hebrews: it pleased God (working the greatest things by the weakest worldly means) to make the watering of a few sheep, and the assisting of the Daughters of Raguel the Medianite, an occasion whereby to provide him a Wife of one of those, and a Father-in-law, that fed him, and sustained him in a Country nearest Egypt; fittest to return from: necessary to be known, because interjacent between Egypt and Juda, through which he was to lead the Israelites; and wherein God held him, till the occasion which God presented, he served. And lastly, where the glory of the World shined least, amidst mountainous Deserts, there the glory of God, which shineth most, covered him over, and appeared unto him, not finding him as a Kings Son, or an adopted Child of great Pharaoh's Daughter, but as a meek and humble Shepherd, sitting at a Mountain foot; a keeper and commander of those poor Beasts only.

In that part of Arabia, near Madian, he continued 40. years. And though (as Philo tells the Story of Moses life observeth) he did not neglect the care of those flocks, committed to his charge; but that he excelled all others in that Pastoral knowledge; yet in that solitary Desert enjoyed himself; and being separated from the press of the World, and the troublesome affairs thereof, he gave himself to contemplation, and to make perfect in himself all those knowledges, whereof his younger years had gathered the grounds and principles: the same Author also judging, that his Pastoral life did excellently prepare him for the execution of the Principality, which he afterward obtained. Est enim (saith Philo) qui Pastorali, quasi praeludium ad regnum, hoc est, ad regimen hominum, regis munusculum. Quemadmodum bellicosa ingenia præexercere se in venationibus, experientia in feris, quod posita in militia & bello perscutione sunt; brutis præambulationibus exercitiis, tam belli quam pacis tempore. At vero præfectura munusculi pecoris habet quoddam simile cum regno in subsidio; adeoque Reges cognominantur Pastores populi, non contumelia sed honoris gratia: The art of keeping Sheep is, as it were, an introductory exercise unto a Kingdom, namely, the rule over men, the most gentle flock: Even as warlike natures do before- hand exercise themselves in hunting, practising on wild Beasts those things, which after they will accomplish in Warfare: those brute Beasts affording matter, wherein to train themselves, both in time of War and of Peace. But the government of gentle Cattle, hath a kind of resemblance unto a Kingly rule over Subjects; therefore, Kings are styled Shepherds of the People, not in way of reproach, but for their honour.

That Moses, in this time of his abode at Madian, wrote the Book of Job, as Perrinus suppotheth, I cannot judge of it, because it is thought, that Job was at that time living. Neither dare I subscribe to Perrinus's opinion, that Moses, while he lived in that part of Arabia, wrote the books of Genesis; although I cannot deny the reason of Perrinus's conjecture, That by the example of Job's patience he might strengthen the oppressed Hebrew: and by the promises of God to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, put them in assurance of thir delivery from the Egyptian slavery, and of the Land of rest, and plenty promised.

Of his calling back into Egypt by the Angel of God, and the marvels and wonders which he performed, thereby to persuade Pharaoh, that he was the messenger of the most High, the particulars are written in the first fourteen Chapters of Exodus; and therefore to treat of all the particulars therein contained, it were needless. But for the first, it is to be noted, that when Moses desired to be taught by God, by what name he should make him known, and by whom he was sent; he received from God so much, as Man could comprehend of his infinite and ever-being nature. Out of which he delivered him in the first part of his answer, a name to be considered of by the wisest: and in his second, to be understood by all. For there is nothing that is, or hath being of it self; but the Eternal: which truly is; which is above all; which is immutable. The bodies of Men are changed every moment: their substance waleth, and is repaired by nutriment; never continuing at one stay, nor being the same so long, as while one may say Now. Likewise, whatsoever is consumed in the longest continuance of time, the same in every shortest piece of time suffereth decay; neither doth any thing abide in one state. *Una est Dei & sola natura, qua verè est: id enim quod subsistit non habet aliquid, sed semetipsum. Cetera que creata sunt, etiam si videntur esse, non sunt, quia aliquando non fuerunt, & potest rursus non esse, quod non fuit; It is the one and only nature of God, which truly is: for he hath his being of himself, and not from any thing without him. Other things that are created, although they seem to be, yet they are not; for sometimes they were not: and that which hath not been, may again cease being. And with this, in respect of the Divine nature, the saying of Zeno Eternus excellently agreeth: *Tota verum natura umbra est, aut inanis, ut folium: The whole nature of things is but a shadow, either empty or deceitful: in comparison of whom (saith Epicurus) all Nations are as nothings, less than nothing, and vanity.

C. 16. v. 9.

Angel of the waters say, Lara, thou art full, which is dead and which wast: and holy, because thou hast judged these things; for they shed the blood of the Saints and Prophets, and therefore hast thou given them blood to drink.

intercalations that formerly had been used; for by the intercalation of 7. Months in the 19. years, all was so even, that no sensible difference could be found: Yet that error which in one year could not be perceived, was very apparent in a few of those Cycles; the new Moons anticipating in one Cycle 7. hours, and some minutes of the precise rule. Therefore Calippus devised a new Cycle containing four of Metons, that is to say, 76. years; and afterwards Hipparchus, a noble Astronomer, framed another, containing four of Calippus his Periods, each of them finding some error in the former observations, which they diligently corrected. The last reformation of the Kalendar was that which Julius Caesar made, who by advice of the best Mathematicians, then to be found, examining the courses of those heavenly bodies; reduced the year unto the form which is now in use with us, containing 365. days and six hours, which hours, in four years make up one whole day, that is intercalated every fourth year, the 24. of February: The correction of the Julian year by Pope Gregory the 13. Anno Domini 1582. is not as yet entertained by general consent; it was indeed, but as a note added unto the work of Caesar; yet a note of great importance. For whereas it was observed, that the Sun, which at the time of the Nicene Council, Anno Dom. 324. entered the Aequinoctial on the 21. day of March, was in the year 1582. ten days sooner found in that time, Pope Gregory struck out of the Kalendar ten days, following the fourth of October, so that in stead of the fifth day was written the fifteenth; by which means the movable Feasts depending on the Suns entrance into Aries, were again celebrated in such time, as at the Nicene Council they had been. And the better to prevent the like alterations, it was by the Council of Trent ordained, that from thence forward in every hundredth year, the Leap-day should be omitted, excepting full the fourth hundred: because the Sun doth not in his yearly course take up full six hours above the 365. days; but falleth so many minutes, as in 400. years make about three whole days.

But the Cycle of 19. years, which the Hebrews used, was such as neither did need any nice curiosity of hours, minutes, and other lesser fractions to help it; neither did in summing up the days of the whole year, neglect the days of the Moon, confounding one Month with another. For with them it fell out so, that always the Kalends or first day of the Month was at the new Moon, and because that day was festival, they were very careful as well to observe the short year of the Moon, passing through all the 12. Signs in one Month, as that longer of the Sun, which is needfully regarded in greater accounts. First therefore they gave to Nisan their first Month, which is about our March or April, 30. days; to Iar their second Month 29. days; and so successively 30. to one, 29. to another. Hereby it came to pass, that every two Months of theirs contained somewhat even two revolutions of the Moon, allowing 29. days, 12. hours, and odd minutes, from change to change. The spare minutes were bestowed among the superfluous or Epact days, which made up 7. Months in 19. years; to 6. of which 7. were commonly given 30. days; to one of them 29. days, or otherwise as was found requisite. Their common year (as appeareth by the several days of each Month) contained 354. days, which fall of the year; wherein the Sun finisheth his course, 11. whole days, with some fractions of time. But these days, and other broken pieces, howsoever they were neglected in one year, yet in the Cycle, of 19. years were so disposed of by convenient intercalations, that still at the end of that Cycle, both the Sun and Moon were found on the same day, of the year, Month and Week, yea, commonly on the same hour of the day, where they had been at the beginning of 19. years before.

Divers have diversely set down the form of the Hebrew year, with the manner of their intercalations. Sigenius tells us: that every second year they did add a Month of 22. days; every fourth year a Month of 23. in the regular of 11. days and a half wanting to 12. Moons to fulfil a year of the Sun. But herein Sigenius was very much deceived: For the Moon doth never finish her course in 22. or 23. days: and therefore to have added so many days to the end of the year, had been the way to change the fallow of all the Months in the years following, which could not have begun as they ought, with the new Moon. Genebrard saith, that every third year, or second year, as need required, they did intercalate one Month, adding it at the years end unto the other 12. This I believe to have been true; but in which of the years the intercalation was (if it be worthy of consideration) methinks they do not probably deliver, who keep all far from evenness until the very last of the 19. years. For to omit such as err grossly I fume there are who say, that after three years, when besides the days spent in 36. courses of the Moon, 32. days are left remaining, that is, 11. days of each year; then did the Hebrews add a Month of 30. days; keeping three days as it were in pluggage unto the next account. The like, say they, was done at the end of the sixth year; at which time, besides the intercalary Month, remained six days, namely three surmounting that Month, and the Epact of three years, besides the three formerly reserved. Thus they go on to the 18. year; at which time they have 18. days in hand: all which with the Epact of the 19. year make up a Month of 29. days, that being intercalated at the end of the Cycle makes all even.

Whether this were the practice, I can neither affirm nor deny; yet surely it must needs have bred a great confusion, if in the 18. year every Month were removed from his own place by the distance of 48. days, that is, half a quarter of the year and more; which in convenience by such a reckoning was unavoidable. Wherefore, I prefer the common opinion, which preventeth such dislocation of the Months, by setting down a more convenient way of intercalation in the 8. year. For the 6. days remaining after the 2. former intercalations made in the 3d and 6th years, added unto the 22. days, arising out of the Epacts of the 7th and 8th years, do fully serve to make up a Month, with the borrowing of one day or two from the year following; and this borrowing of two days is so far from causing any disorder, that indeed it helps to make the years ensuing vary the less from the proper season of every Month. This may suffice to be spoken of the Hebrew Months and Years, by which they guided their accounts.

§. VII.

Of the passage of Israel from Succoth towards the Red Sea: and of the divers ways leading out of Egypt.

FROM Succoth in the morning following, Moses led the Israelites towards the Desert of Eihon, to recover the Mountain Foot, by the edge of that Wilderness, though he intended nothing less than to go out that way, of all other the nearest.

This is a historical map of Egypt and its surrounding regions. The Nile River is depicted as a winding line flowing from the south (bottom) towards the north (top), where it branches into the Delta. The word 'EGYPT' is written vertically in large, bold letters across the central part of the map. To the west of the Nile, the word 'AEG' is written vertically. The map includes several labeled locations: 'Memphis' (labeled 'Noph or Memphis'), 'Thebes' (labeled 'Gizeh or Thebes'), 'Alexandria' (labeled 'R. Suez'), 'Damietta', 'Zaan or Tanis', 'Og or Heliopolis', 'Mizraim or Babylon', 'Pachon', 'Etham', 'Azen or Heliopolis', 'Traianus flu', 'Piathere', and 'Mizdol'. The Red Sea is shown to the east of the Nile Delta. The Mediterranean Sea is at the top. The Nile River is labeled 'Nile flu.' at the bottom. The map is framed by a decorative border at the top.

nearest. But being assured of the multitude of Horsemen and armed Chariots, that followed him, he kept himself from being compassed, by keeping the rough and mountainous ground on his left hand. At Eihom he rested but one night, and then he reflected back from the entrance thereof, and marched away directly towards the South; the distance between it and Succoth being about eight miles. That he forbore to enter Arabia being then in fight thereof, it seemeth to proceed from three respects; the first two natural; the third divine. For Pharaoh being then at hand, and having received intelligence of the way which Moses took, persuaded himself, that the numbers which Moses led, consisting of above a Million, if not two Millions of Souls, (for as it is written Exod. the 12. Great multitudes of sundry sorts of people went out with them) could not possibly pass over those desert and high Mountains with so great multitudes of Women, Children, and Cattel, but that at the very entrance of that fastness he should have overtaken them, and destroyed the greatest numbers of them. For these his own words. They are tangled in the Land, the Wilderness hath shut them in, do shew his hopes and intents; which Moses by turning another way did frustrate. Secondly, Moses by offering to enter Arabia that way, drew Pharaoh towards the East side of the land of Gosen, or Ramesses: from whence (milling Moses there) his pursuit after him with his Chariots was more difficult, by reason of the roughness of the way; and howsoever, yet while the Hebrews kept the Mountain foot on the left hand, they were better secured from the over-bearing violence both of the Horse and Chariots. Thirdly, Moses's confidence in the all-powerful God was such, by whose Spirit, only wife, he was directed, as he rather made choice to leave the glory of his deliverance and victory to almighty God, than either by an escape the next way, or by the strength of his multitude, consisting of 600,000 Men, to cast the success upon his own understanding, free conduction, or valour. The third day he marched with a double pace from Eihom towards the Valley of Pihacherath, 16. mile distant, and fare down between two Ledges of Mountains adjoining to the Red Sea; to wit, the Mountains of Eihom on the North, and Balezephon towards the South: the fame which Osorius calleth Climax: on the top whereof there stood a Temple dedicated to Baal. And as Phagius noteth, the word fo compounded, is as much to say, as Domicus specula, five custodies, Lord of the watch-tower. For the Egyptians believed, or at least made their Slaves believe, that if any of them offered to escape that way into Arabia, this Idol would both arrest them, and force them to return to their Lords and Masters. For the Egyptians had Gods for all turns. Egyptii Diis facundi; The Egyptians were fruitful in Gods, saith St. Hierome. But Moses who incamped at the foot of this Mountain with a million of Souls, or as others conceive, with two millions, found this Lord of the watch-tower all-ep, or out of countenance.

Now these two passages leading out of Egypt into Arabia upon the firm land Moses refused, as well that of Pelusium and Cafotis, the fairest and shortest of all other, in respect of Judea, as the other by Eihom; from which he reflected, for the reasons before remembered, and took the way by the valley of Pihacherath, between the Mountains, which made a straight entrance towards the Sea. After whom Pharaoh made fo great speed with his horsemen and chariots, as he gave the Hebrews no time at all to rest them after so long a march; but gat fight of them, and they of him, even at the very brink and wath of the Sea: in-much as the Hebrews being terrified with Pharaoh's sudden approach, began to despair, and to mutine, at that time when it behoved them most to have taken courage for their own defence; laying it to Moses's charge, that themselves foresaw those perils in which they were wrapped. And fear, which, saith the book of Wisdom, is the betraying of those succours which reason offers, made them both despair in Gods former promises, and to be forgetful of their own strength and multitudes.

§. VIII.

Of their passage over the Red Sea: and of the Red Sea it self.

But Moses who feared nothing but God himself, persuaded them to be confident in his goodness, who hath never abandoned those, that assuredly trust in him; using this comfortable and resolved speech: Fear not, &c. for the Egyptians whom you have seen this day, ye shall never see them again. The Lord shall fight for you. After which Moses called on God for succour, received encouragement, and commandment to go on, in these Words. Wherefore criest thou unto me? speak unto the Children of Israel that they go forward; and lift thou up thy rod, and stretch out thy hand upon the Sea, and divide it, and let the Children of Israel go on dry ground through the midst of the Sea. Moses obeying the voice of God, in the dark of the night finding the Sands uncovered, pass on towards the other side and Coast of Arabia: two parts of the night being spent ere he entered the Ford, which it pleased God by a forcible Eastern wind, and by Moses's Rod to prepare.

Pharaoh followed him even at the heels, finding the same dry ground which Moses trod on. Therefore, as it is written, The Angel of God which went before the Host of Israel, removed, and went behind them: also the pillar of the Cloud went from before them, and stood behind them; which is, that it pleased God therein either by his immediate power, or by the ministry of his Angel, to interpose his defence between the Hebrews and their Enemies; to the end that the Egyptians might hereby be blinded, in such sort, as they could not pursue.

Israel with any harmful speed. But in the morning watch Moses sciled the other bank of Arabia side: and Pharaoh (as the dawn of day began to illighen the obscure air) finding a beginning of the Seas return, hastied himself towards his own Coast: But Moses stretched forth his hand, and the Sea returned to his force, that is; the Sea moved by the power of God, ran back towards the land with irresistible fury and swiftness, and overwhelmed the whole Army of Pharaoh, so as not one escaped. For it is written, that God took off their Chariot-wheels, that is, when the waters began to cover the sands, the Egyptians being stricken with fear of death, ran one athwart another, and missing the path by which they had pass on, after the Hebrews, their wheels stuck fast in the Mud and Quick-sands, and could not be drawn out: the Sea coming against them with supernatural violence.

Lyranus upon Exod. 14. and others, following the opinions or old Traditions of the Hebrews, conceived, that after Moses had by the power of God divided the Red Sea, and that the Children of Israel were fearful to enter it, Aminadab Prince or Leader of the Tribe of Juda first made the adventure,

It is probable that all those Egyptians & others brought by the Hebrews to the knowledge of the true God, followed Moses at his departure.

Climax is rather so called in respect of a passage up and down, than that it is any proper name.

ture, and that therefore was that Tribe ever after honoured above the rest, according to the prophecy of Isaiah, Gen. 49. 8. Thy fathers Sons shall bow down upon thee. But Hierome upon the 11. of Moses condemns this opinion. And though it be true, that Juda had the first place in all their marches in the Desert, and as we now call it, led the Vanguard; (whereupon it may be inferred, that he also led the way through the Red Sea) yet that Moses himself was the conductor of Israel at that time, it is generally received. For, as it is written in the 77. Psalm: Thou didst lead thy people like Sheep by the hand of Moses and Aaron.

The Hebrews have also another fancy, that the Red Sea was divided into 12. parts, and that every Tribe pass over in a path apart, because it is written in the 135. Psalm, according to the Psalmist, Disiit mare rubrum in divisiones; He divided the Red Sea in divisions. Also that the bottom of the Sea became as a green Field or Pasture. But Origen, Epiphanius, Abulensis, and Genesius, favouring this conceit, had forgotten to consider, that there were not 12. pillars nor 12. Armies of the Egyptians. It is written in the 77. Psalm; v. 16. Troynay is in the Sea; not thy ways; and in the last of the book of Wisdom, vers. 7. In the Red Sea there was a way.

Now this Sea, through which Moses pass, and in which Pharaoh, otherwise called Cheneer, perished in the 16. year of his Reign, is commonly known by the name of the Red Sea; though the same differ nothing at all in natural colour from other waters. But as Philopstratus in his third Book noteth, and our selves know by experience, it is of a bluish colour, as other Seas are. It entrench at a narrow strait between Arabia the Happy and Æthiopia, or the land of the Abyssinians: the Mouth of the indraught from the Cap, which Ptolemy calleth Pofidium, to the other land of Æthiopia, hath not above six Leagues in breadth; and the same also filled every where with Islands, but afterwards it extendeth it self 58. Leagues from Coast to Coast: and it runneth up between Arabia the Happy, and Arabia Petraea, on one side, and Æthiopia, and Ægypt on the other, as far as Suez, the uttermost end and indraught of that Sea: where the Turks now commonly give it the name of the Cismographers: but the North part towards Suez, and where Moses pass, is called Heropolites of the Sea, and Hero, sometime Troy: and of later times Suez. Pliny calls it Cambisus, by which name it was known, since he, before it was called Hero many years.

The Arabians call this Sea towards the North, Arapsa, Ecane, and Eam. Artemidorus writes it Æthiopian: King Juba Lentiscus: others more properly Elaeonicum, of the Port and City Elaa: which the Septuagint call Elath: Ptolemy Elaa: Pliny Lena: Josephus Ilana, and Marius Niger Aila: there is also Ilalab in Affrica, to which Salmannasser carried the Israelites captive, 2 Kings c. 8. 11. which Ilalab in Affrica, the Septuagint call Elaa: and in the first of Chron. the 5. Aia. But as for this Red Sea or the parts thereof, thus diversely named, the Moor and Arabians (Vassals to the Turks) know it by no other appellation, than the Gulf of Mecca, after the name of Mahomet's Town Mecca. The Greeks write it the Sea Erythraea: of a King called Erythras, or Erythraus: and because Erythras in the Greek signifieth red, hence it is, that, being denominated of this Erythraeus, the Sea of Perseus and Andromeda, yet it took the name of the Red Sea, and the Arabs call it Al-Baher, Curios conjureth: which Arianus and Strabo confirm. But it seemeth to me by the view of a discovery of that Sea in the year 1544. performed by Steven Gama, Viceroy of the East India for the King of Portugal, that this Sea was so called from a reflection of redness, both from the Banks, Cliffs, and Sands of many Islands, and part of the Continent bordering it. For I find by the report of Cæsar, a principal Commander under Gambra (which discourse I gave Mr. Richard Hakluis to publish) that there is an Island called Dalagua, sometime Leques, containing in length 25. Leagues, and 12. in breadth, the Earth, Sands, and Cliffs, of which Island, being of a reddish colour, serve for a Foil to the waters about it; and make it seem altogether of the same colour. Secondly, the same Cæsar reporteth, that from 24. Degrees of Septentrional Latitude, to 27 (which make in length of coast 180. Miles, lying as it doth Northerly and Southerly) all the Cliffs and Banks are of red earth, or Stone, which with reflection of the Sun-beams, give a kind of reddish luster to the waters. Thirdly, those Portugals report, and we know it by many testimonies, that there are found in the bottom of this Sea towards the Shore, great abundance of Corral grows, which is carried into most parts of Europe, and elsewhere. There are also on the Islands of this Sea many red Trees, faith Strabo, and those growing under water, may also be a cause of such a colour. Of these appearances of redness by the shadows of these Stones, Sands, Earth, and Cliffs, I suppose that it first took the name of the Red Sea, because in so many places it seemeth to be such: which Johannes Barros in his second Decade, eight Book, and fifth Chapter, confirmeth.

The breadth of this Sea from Elaa, or Esien Gaber adjoining, now Toro, called by the ancient Cosmographers Sinu Elaeiticus, which waleth the Banks of Median or Midian, is for 16 or 17. Leagues together, along Northward towards Suez, some three Leagues or nine English M. Le. and from this Port of Toro, to Suez, and the end of this Sea, it is in length about 28. Leagues, of which the first 26. have nine Mile breadth as afore said, and afterward the lands both from Egypt and Arabia, thrust themselves into the Sea, and straiten it so fall, as for six Miles together it is not above three Mile over; from thence upward the land on Ægypt side, falleth away, and makes a kind of Bay or Cove for some ten Miles together, after which the land grows upon the Sea again, and so binds it into the very end thereof, at four Miles breadth or thereabout, in which tract it was that Moses pass it over, though others would have it to be over against Elaa or Toro; but without judgment: for from Ramafes to Pihachero and Balsaphon, there is not above 30. Miles interjunct, or 35. Miles at most, which Moses pass over in three days; and between the land of Ægypt opposite to Elaa or Toro, the distance is above 80. Miles. For Ramafes to which City Moses came (being the Metropolis of Gosen) when he left Pharaoh at Zaan, and took his last leave, standeth in 30. Degrees five Minutes of Septentrional Latitude: and Migdal, or the Valley of Pihachero, at the foot of the Mountain Cinara, or Balsaphon, in nine and twenty and a half, which made a difference of five and thirty English Mile: the way lying in effect North and South.

§. IX.

That the passage through the red Sea was miraculous, and not at a low Ebb.

THE Egyptians, and of them the Memphites, and other Heathen Writers, who in hatred of the Hebrews have objected that Moses pass over the red Sea at a low Ebb, upon a great spring-tide, and that Pharaoh conducted more by fury than discretion, purified him so far, as before he could recover the Coast of Ægypt, he was overtaken by the Flood, and therein perished, did not well consider the nature of this place with other circumstances. For not to borrow strength from that part of the Scriptures, which makes it plain, that the Waters were divided, and that God wrought this Miracle by an Easterly Wind, and by the Hand and Rod of Moses (which Authority to Men that believe not therein periwade nothing) I say that by the same natural reason upon which they fasten themselves, it is made manifest, that had there been no other working power from above, or assistance given from God himself to Moses, and the Children of Israel than ordinary and casual, then could not Pharaoh and all his Army have perished in that pursuit.

For whereforever there is any ebbing of the Sea in any gulf, or indraught, there do the Waters fall away from the Land: and run downward towards the Ocean: leaving all that part towards the Land as far as the Sea can ebb, or fall off, to be dry Land. Now Moses entering the Sea at Migdal end Balsaphon (if he had taken the advantage and opportunity of the Tide) must have left all that part of the red Sea towards Suez, on his left hand, dry and uncovered. For if a passage were made by falling away of the Water, ten or twelve Mile farther into the Sea than Suez, much more was it made at Suez, and between it and where Moses pass: who entered the same so far below it, and towards the body of the same Sea. It followeth then, that if all that part of the Sleeve or Strait, had been by the Ebb of a spring-tide discovered, when Pharaoh found the Flood increasing, he needed not to have returned by the same way toward Ægypt side, but might have gone on in his return before the Tide, on his right Hand: and so taken ground again at the end of that Sea, at Suez it self, or elsewhere. But the Scriptures do truly witness the contrary, that is, That the Sea did not fall away from the Land, as naturally it doth; but that Moses pass on between two Seas: and that the Waters were divided. Otherwise, Pharaoh by any return of Waters could not have perished, as he did: and therefore the effects of that great Armies destruction, prove the cause to have been a power above nature, and the miraculous work of God himself. Again, those words of the Scriptures, that God caused the Sea to run back by a strong east-wind, do rather prove the Miracle, than that thereby was caused an Ebb more than ordinary: for that Sea doth not lie East and West, but, in effect, North and South. And it must have been a West and North-west Wind, that must have driven those Waters away through their proper Channels, and to the South-east into the Sea. But the East-wind blew athwart the Sea, and cut it alunder: so as one part fell back towards the South, and main body thereof: the other part remained towards Suez, and the North. Which being unknown to Pharaoh; while he was checky by that Sea, which used in all times before to ebb away: the Flood press him and overwhelmed him. Thirdly, seeing Josephus avoweth, that Moses was not only of excellent Judgment generally, but also of great a Captain, as he overthrew the Egyptians in many Battles, being employed by Pharaoh, and won divers Cities seeming impregnable: it were barbarous to condemn him of this grossness, and distraction: that rather than he would have endured the hardness of a mountainous passage at hand, (had not God commanded him to take that way, and foretold him of the honour which he would there win upon Pharaoh) he would have trusted to the advantage of an ebbing Water. For he knew not the contrary, but that Pharaoh might have found him, and press him, as well when it flowed as when it ebb'd, as it seemeth he did. For the People, beholding Pharaoh's approach, cried out against Moses, and despair'd altogether of their safety: and when Moses prayed unto God for help, he was answered by God: Wherefore cryest thou unto me? speak unto the children of Israel that they go forward and lift thou up thy rod, and stretch out thy hand upon the Sea, and divide it: which proves that there was not at the time of Pharaoh's approach any Ebb at all; but that God did disperse and cut through the weight of Waters, by a strong East-wind, whereby the Sands discovered themselves between the Sea on the left hand toward Suez, from whence the Waters moved not, and the Sea which was towards the South on the right hand, so that the waters were c. 14. c. 25. a wall unto them on the right hand, and on the left hand, that is, the Waters so defended them on both sides, as the Egyptians could only follow them in the same path; not that the Waters stood upright as Walls do, as some of the Schoolmen have fauted. For had Pharaoh and the Egyptians perceived any such buildings in the Sea, they would soon have quitted the chase and pursuit of Israel. Furthermore, there is no Man of Judgment, that can think, that Pharaoh and the Egyptians, who then excelled all Nations in the observations of Heavenly motions, could be ignorant of the fluxes, and refluxes of the Sea, in his own Country, on his own Coast, and in his own most traded and frequented Ports and Havens, and wherein his People having had so many hundreds of years experience of the Tides, he could not be caught, as he was, through ignorance, nor by any fore-known or natural accident, but by Gods powerful Hand only; which then falleth most heavily on all Men, when looking through no other Spectacle but their own prosperity, they least discern it coming, and least fear it. Lastly, if the Army of the Egyptians had been overtaken by the ordinary return of the Flood, before they could recover their own Coast; their bodies drowned would have been carried with the Flood which runneth up to Suez, and to the end of that Sea, and not have been cast ashore on that Coast of Arabia where Moses landed, to wit, upon the Sea-bank over against Balsaphon, on Arabia side: where it was that the Israelites saw their dead Bodies; and not at the end of the red Sea, to which place the ordinary Flood would have carried them: which Flood doth not any more cross the Channel, and run athwart it, as it must have done from Egypt side to Arabia, to have call the Egyptians Bodies there; but it keeps the natural course towards the end of that Sea: and to which their Carcasses would have been carried, if the work had not been supernatural and miraculous. Apollonius in the Lives of the Fathers affirmeth, that those of the Egyptians which he laid in the Country, and did not follow Pharaoh in the pursuit of Israel, did ever after honour those Beasts, Birds, Plants, or other Creatures, about which they were buried at the time of

Pharaoh's

Pharaoh's destruction: as he that was then labouring in his Garden made a God of that Plant or Root, about which he was occupied: and so of the rest. But how those Multitudes of Gods were erected among them, a more probable reason shall be given elsewhere. Orfus in his first Book and tenth Chapter against the Pagans tells us, that in his time, who lived some 400. years after Christ, the prints of Pharaoh's Chariot Wheels were to be seen at a low Water on the Egyptian Sands: and though they were some time defaced by Wind and Weather, yet soon after they appeared again. But hereof I leave every Man to his own belief.

CHAP. IV.

Of the journeying of the Israelites from the Red Sea, to the place where the Law was given them: with a Discourse of Laws.

§. I.

A Transition, by way of recapitulation of some things touching Chronologies with a continuance of the Story, until the Amalekites met with the Israelites.

BUT to go on with the Story of Israel, in this fort I collect the times. Moses was born in the year of the World 2434. Sapirus then governing Affria; Oribopolis Sycionia, or Peloponessus; Crispus the Argives; Orus Egypt; and Deucalion Thessalie. He died into Median when he had lived 40. years, in the year of the World 2474. and two years after was Caleb born. He returned by the Commandment and Ordinance of God into Egypt, and wrought his Miracles in the Fields of Zaan, in the year 2514. in the last Month of that year. On the 14. day of the first Hebrew Month Abib, or the 15. of that Month, beginning the day (as they) at Sun setting, in the year of the World 2514. was the Celebration of the Passover: and in the dead of the Night of the same Day were all the first-born slain through Egypt, or in all those parts where the Hebrews inhabited nor. The 15. Day of the first Month, of the Hebrews called Abib, being about the beginning of the year of the World 2514. Moses with the Children of Israel removed from the general Assembly at Ramesses, and marched to Succoth. And departing thence they made their third Station at Eiham: and journeying from Eiham they incamped in the valley of Phicheoroth, or Migdoll under the Mountain Baalzephon; and in the 1st. Night after mid-night, they pass'd the red Sea: Pharaoh and his Army perishing in their return, about the first dawn of the Day. Moses having recovered the Banks of Arabia, gave Trunks unto God, for the delivery of Israel: and making, no stay on that Coast, entered the Djarrs of Arabia Petrea, called Sir. But finding no Water in that passage, he incamped at Marah, in the Desert of Eiham, which in Exod. 15. v. 22. is also called Sir, 25. Miles from the Sea: where the Children of Israel perished with extreme Thirst, murmured against Moses the second time; first at Pharaoh's approach in Phicheoroth, and now in Arabia. But Moses taking the Branches of a Tree, growing near a Lake of bitter Water, and calling the same thereto, made the same sweet: a plain Type and Figure of our Saviour; who upon the Tree of the Cross changed the bitterness of everlasting Death into the sweetness of eternal Life. Pliny remembers thirst, bitter Fountains in his sixth Book and 29. Chapter. From whence to Delta in Egypt, Sisijra first, Darius after him, and lastly Ptolemy the second, began to cut an Artificial River, thereby by Boats and small Shipping to Trade and Navigate the red Sea, from the great Cities upon Nilus. From Marah he removed to Elim, the sixth Mansion, a march of eight Miles: where finding twelve Fountains of sweet Water, and 70. Palm trees, he rested divers days.

Whether this Elim were the name of a Town or City in Moses's time, I cannot affirm. And yet the fertility of Waters in that Region was such, as Elim, which had twelve Fountains, could hardly be left unpeopled. William, Archbishop of Tyre, in his History of the Holy War, found at Elim the ruins of a great and ancient City. And at such time as Balaam the first past that way into Egypt, Ingressus (saith he) Helim, Civitas antiquissimum populo Israelitico aliquando familiarem; ad quam cum pervenisset, loci illius incolae, Regni adventu precogitantes, navicularum ingredienti in mare vicinam se conulerunt; Enting Helim a very ancient City, well known sometime to the People of Israel; whither, when he came, the Inhabitants, forewarned of the Kings approach, took Boat, and shifted themselves into the Sea, lying near from them. From Elim he returned again towards the South, and late down by the Banks of the red Sea: the seventh Mansion. For it seemeth that he had knowledge of Amalech, who prepared to resist his passage through that part of Arabia. And Moses who had not as yet trained those of the Hebrews, appointed to bear Arms: nor assured the minds of the rest, who encountering with the least misery, were more apt to return to their quiet slavery, than either to endure the wants and perils which every where accompanied them in that passage, or at this time to undertake or sustain so dangerous an Enemy: he therefore made stay at this Mansion, until the fifteenth of the second Month called Zim, or Jar: and made the eight Mansion in the Desert of Zim; where the Children of Israel murmured against Moses the third time, having want of Food. In the sixteenth Chapter of Exodus, Moses omitteth this retreat from Elim to the red Sea, but in the Collection of every several incamping, in the 33. of Numbers, it is let down.

Here it pleased God to lend to many flights of Quails, as all the Country about their incamping was covered with them. The Morning following it also rained Manna, being the sixteenth of their Month, which served them instead of Bread. For now was the store consumed with the People carried with them out of Egypt. And though they had great numbers of Cattle and Sheep among them, yet it seemeth that they durst not feed them for the Milk to relieve the Children withal, and for bread to force themselves when they came to the Land promised.

From hence towards Raphidim they made two removes of twenty Mile: the one to Daphna, the other to Alu, distant from Raphidim six Miles. Here being being again perished with want of Water they murmured the fourth time, and repeated them of their departure out of Egypt; where they rather contented themselves to be fed and beaten after the manner of Beasts, than to suffer a casual and fortuitous necessary want, and to undergo the hazards and travels which every manly mind seeketh after; for the love of God and their own freedoms. But Moses with the same Rod which he divided the Sea withal, in the sight of the Elders of Israel, brought Waters out of the Rock, wherewith the whole Multitude were satisfied:

§. II.

Of the Amalekites, Madianites, and Kenites, upon occasion of the Battle with the Amalekites, and Jethro's coming: who being a Kenite, was Priest of Madian.

AND while Moses incamped in this place, the Amalekites who had knowledge of his approach, and guessed that he meant to lead the Children of Israel through their Country (which being barren of it self, would be utterly wasted by so great a Multitude of People and Cattle) thought it most for their advantage to set upon them at Raphidim: where the want of Water, and all other things needful for the life of Man infeebled them. On the other side Moses perceiving their resolutions, gave charge to Jehro, to draw out a sufficient number of the ablest Hebrews, to encounter Amalech. Between whom and Israel, the Victory remained doubtful, for the most part of the day: the Hebrews and Amalekites contending with equal hopes and repulses for many hours. And had not the strength of Moses's Prayers to God been of far greater force, and more prevalent, than all resistance and attempt made by the Bodies of Men; that valiant and warlike Nation had greatly endangered the whole enterprise. For those Bodies which are unacquainted with frascity of Food, and those minds whom a servile education hath dulled, being beaten, and depaired in their first attempts, will hardly, or never be brought again to hazard themselves.

After this Victory Jehro repaired to Moses, bringing with him Moses's Wife, and his two Sons, which either Jehro forbore to conduct, or Moses to receive, till he had by this overthrow of Amalech the better assured himself of that part of Arabia. For it is written in the 18. of Exodus, v. 1. When Jehro the Priest of Midian, Moses's Father in Law, heard all that God had done for Moses, &c. of which, the last deed, to wit, the overthrow of Amalech, gave Jehro courage and assurance, he then repaired to his Son-in-law Moses, at Sinai; where amongst other things, he advised Moses to appoint Judges, and other Officers, over Israel; being himself unable to give order in all Causes and Controversies, among so many thousands of People, full of discontentment and private contrivance.

This Jehro, although he dwelt amongst the Midianites, yet he was by Nation a Kenite, as in the fourth of Judges, v. 11. & 17. it is made manifest; where it is written. Now Heber the Kenite, which was of the children of Hobab, to wit, the Son of Jehro, the Father-in-law of Moses, was departed from the Kenites, and pitched his tent; until the plain of Zaanaim, which is by Kadesh. Likewise in the first of Samuel, Saul commanded the Kenites to depart from among the Amalekites, lest he should destroy them with the Amalekites. For the Kenites inhabited the Mountains of Sin Kadesh: and the Amalekites dwell in the Plains, according to the laying of Abraham, speaking of the Kenites. Strong is thy dwelling place, and thou hast put thyself in the way. And that Saul spared this Nation, he giveth for cause, that they showed mercy to all the Children of Israel, which they came up from Egypt. For these Kenites were the Kenites of the Midianites, and the Midianites were of the Isles of Madian, one of the 13. Sons which Abraham begat on Keturah, and might also take that name of Ken, as Kenites from Keturah, of whom they descended by the Mother, who as it seemeth kept the knowledge of the True God among them, which they received from their Parent Abraham. For Moses, when he fled out of Egypt into Midian, and married the Daughter of Jehro, would not (had he found them Idolaters) have made Jehro's Daughter the Mother of his Children. And although the Kenites are named amongst those Nations, which God promised, that the Seed of Abraham should root out, and inherit their Lands; yet it cannot be meant by these, who are descended from Abraham himself: but by some other Nation, bearing the same name; and in all likelihood of the Race of Cain. For in the fifteenth of Gen. ver. nineteenth, these Kenites or Chusites are listed with the Elutians and Perizites, with the Amorites, Canaanites, Gergesites, and Jebusites, which were indeed afterwards rooted out. But these Kenites, descended from Abraham, had Gen. 15. separated themselves from among the rest, which were altogether Idolatrous. For, as is before remembred, Heber the Kenite, which was of the Children of Hobab, was departed from the Kenites, that is to say, from those Kenites of Canaan, and inhabited in Zaanaim, which is by Kadesh or Kadesh. Again, Moses nameth that Nation of the Kenites, before Midian, or any of Abraham's other Sons were born: which he did (referring my self to better Judgment) rather, because they were more ancient, than by anticipation.

And as of the Kenites, so we may consider of the Midianites, parted by Moses into five Tribes. For some of them were corrupted, and Heathens; as those of Abraham by the River Zareph, afterwards destroyed by Moses. But the Midianites near the Banks of the red Sea, where Moses married his Wife Zippora, and with whom he left her and his Children, till after the overthrow of Amalech, seem likewise not to have been corrupted. For these Midianites with the Kenites assisted Israel, and guided them in the Desarts. But the Midianites in Moab, and to the North of the Metropolis of Arabia, called Petrea, were by Israel rooted out, when those adjoining to the red Sea were not touched.

And though it may be doubted, whether those of Madian, of whom Jehro was Priest, and the other Cities in Moab were the same, yet the contrary is more probable. For Moses would not have sent 12000. Israelites, as far back as the red Sea, from the Plains of Moab, to have destroyed that Madian, where his Wives Kindred inhabited: seeing himself coming with 60000. able Men, was encountered by Amalech, in that passage. Neither could Moses forget the length of the way through those discomfortable Desarts, wherein himself and Israel had wandered 40. year.

That Jehro or Jethro, Raguel or Reuel, and Hobab, were but one Person, the Scriptures teach us. For the Vulgar and Septuagint, which call him Raguel, and our English Reuel, Exod. 2. 18. calls him Jehro, or Jethro, Exod. 3. & v. 1. c. 4. v. 18. & c. 18. 1. & 6. 9. 10. & 12. and in Numbers c. 10. v. 29. Hobab. Others take Jehro and Hobab to be the same, but not Raguel.

To this eternal Law all things are subjected: as well Angels and Men, as all other creatures, or things created, whether necessary or contingent, natural, or moral, and humane. For the Law eternal runneth through all the universal, and therefore it is the Law of all things which are simple, natural, and inanimate.

Hence it is, that all things created are commanded to praise God their Creator and Director: as, Praef. him qui tibi Angeli: praise ye him Sun and Moon, all bright Stars: Heavens of Heavens, for he hath established them for ever and ever. He hath made an ordinance which shall not pass: Praef. ye the Lord from the Earth ye Dragons and all depths: Fire, and Wind, Snow, and Capovers, stormy Winds, which execute his Word: Mountains, and Hills: fruitful Trees and all Cedars: Beasts, and all Cattle, &c. Now as the reasonable Creatures are by this eternal Law bound, by the glory and felicity propounded unto them (beatitude being both the attractive, and the end) so all other natural things and creatures, have in themselves, and in their own natures, an obedience formal to it: without any proper intention, known cause, or end proposed. For Beasts are led by sense, and natural instinct: things without life by their created form, or formal appetites, as that which is heavy to fall downward: things light to mount upward, &c. and fire to heat whatsoever is opposed. This kind of working the Aristotelians ascribe to common Nature: others to fate; a difference used in terms only; it being no other than Gods general providence: for as it is truly said of God, that he is omnipotens omniscient: so are all things which appear in themselves, thence derived: there-under subjected: thence-from by his eternal Law and providence directed, even from the greatest to the least of his creatures, in Heaven and in Earth.

The Schoolmen are very curious and ample in the consideration of these Laws: and in discourse of the profit, and of the matter, and object of the eternal Law. But as the profit is manifest in the good of all creatures, who have thence-from, either reason, sense, vegetation, or appetite, to conduct them: so is the object and matter of the Law, the whole creature. For according to St. Augustine, Lex eterna est, qua iustum est omnia sint ordinata: sicut The Law eternal is that, whereby it is just, that all things should be disposed in the best and goodliest order.

Lastly, it is disputed, whether the eternal Law be immutable, yea or no? But the resolution is, that it changeth not; for which St. Augustine useth a sufficient argument in his first Book of Free-Will, the sixth Chapter. For the Law of Moses which had a time prefixed, was eternally by God ordained to last until the time of the Pedagogus of Gods people, or introduction to Christ should be expired: which time of expiration some think our Saviour noted to be come, when on the Cross he said, Consummation est. But I rather think these words of our Saviour to have no other signification, than that now the Prophecy of their giving him Vinegar to drink was fulfilled. For so St. John expounds it, when he saith v. 23. That Christ seeing all (other things) to be fulfilled, Ut consummaretur Scriptura, That the Scripture in this also might be fulfilled, said, I thirst: though I deny not, but at the same time also the date of the Law was expired, to wit, of the Law ceremonial, and of so much of the judicial, as appertained peculiarly to the Jews, and agreeth not with the Law of the N. or Testament and Gospel of Christ. For the immutable Law of God, though preferring things mutable, is not therefore changed in it: but the things prescribed change according to this eternal ordinance; to which the Wisdom of Solomon: And being one she can do all things, and remaining in herself reneweth all.

§. VI. of the Law of Nature.

Of the Law of Nature as it is taken in general, I find no definition among the Schoolmen: only as it is considered in Man, it is called the impression of divine light, and a participation of the eternal Law in the reasonable creature. Lex naturalis est impressio divini luminis in nobis, et participatio legis aeternae in rationali creatura. Ulpian defines the natural Law to be the sense which Nature hath taught all living creatures: Ius naturale est quod Natura omnia animalia docuit: et ab aeternum addedit, Ius istud non humani generis proprium, sed omnium animalium quae terra, mari, aëre, quaeque sunt, communes est. The Law of nature is not proper to Man alone, but the same is common to all living creatures: as well to Birds, as to those which the Land and Sea produce. But this definition is not general, but of the natural Law in things of life.

The Law of Nature in general, I take to be that disposition, instinct, and formal quality, which God in his eternal providence hath given and imprinted in the Nature of every creature, animate, and inanimate. And as it is divinum lumen in Men, enlightning our formal reason: so is it more than sense in Beasts: and more than vegetation in Plants. For it is not sense alone in Beasts, which teacheth them at first sight, and without experience or instruction, to fly from the enemies of their lives: feeling that Bulls and Horses appear unto the sense more fearful and terrible, than the least kind of Dogs: and yet the Hare and Deer feedeth by the one, and lyeth from the other, yea though by them never seen before, and that as soon as they fall from their Dams. Neither is it sense which hath taught other Beasts to provide for Winter, Birds to build their Nests, high or low, according to the tempestuous or quiet seasons: or the Birds of India to make their Nests on the smallest Twigs which hang over Rivers, and not on any other part of the Tree, or elsewhere: to save their Eggs and young ones from the Monks, and other Beasts, whose weight such a Twig will not bear: and which would fear to fall into the water. The instincts in this kind are exceeding many which may be given. Neither is it out of the vegetable or growing Nature of Plants, that some Trees, as the female of the Palmetto, will not bear any Fruit except the male grow in sight. But the duty of that Law which the infinite and unsearchable wisdom of God, had in all eternity provided for them, and for every nature created. In Man this Law is double, corrupt, and incorrupt; corrupt where the Reason of Man hath made it self subject, and a Vassal to passions, and affections brutal: and where time and custom hath bred in Men a new Nature, which also, as is aforesaid, is a kind of Law. For it was not by the Law of Nature, but by Nature blinded and corrupted, that the Germans did naturally allow of theft: and that other Nations were by Law constrained to become idolaters; that by the Laws of Lycurgus, it was permitted to Men to use one anothers Wife, and to the Women to choose them others besides their Husbands, to beget them with Child: which Law in those parts hath lasted long, and is not forgotten to this day.

The Scythians, and the People of both Indies, hold it lawful to bury with them the best beloved Wives: as they have many other customs remembered by G. Valentinus, against Nature and right reason. And I know not from what authority it is that these Laws some Men avow to be natural: except it be that of this corrupt Nature, as among others to pay guilt with guile: to become faithless among the faithless: to provide for our selves by another mans destruction: that injury is not done to him that is willing: to destroy those whom we fear: and the like. For taking the definition of Natural Laws either out of St. Augustine or Aquinas, either do (the one calling it the impression of divine light; the other, the dictate or sentence of practical reason) the same can teach us, or incline us to no other thing, than to the exercise of Justice and Uprightness: and not to offer or perform any thing toward others, save that which we would be content should be offered or performed toward our selves. For such is the Law of Nature to the mind, as the eye is to the body; and that which according to David sheweth us good, that is, the observation of those things which lead us thereby to our last end;

end; which is eternal life: though of themselves not sufficient without Faith and Grace.

Now, that which is truly and properly the Law of Nature, where the corruption is not taken for the Law, is, as aforesaid, the impression of Gods divine light in men, and a participation of the law increased and eternal. For without any Law written, the right Reason and understanding which God hath given us, are abilities within our selves, sufficient to give us knowledge of the good and evil, which by our gratitude to God, and distribution of right to men, or by the contrary, we prepare and purchase for our selves. For when the Gentiles (saith St. Paul) which have not the law, do by nature things which are contained in the law: they having not the law, are a law unto themselves. Now, to love God by whom we are, and to do the same right to all men, which we desire should be done unto us, is an effect of the purest reason: in whose highest Turrets, the quiet of conscience hath made her resting place, and habitation. In arce altissima rationis quies habitat; Therefore, the Gentiles (saith St. Paul) which show the effects of the law written in their hearts, have their consciences for witnesses of those effects: and the reprobate their thoughts to accuse them.

And it is most true, that whosoever is not a law unto himself (while he hopeth to abuse the World by the advantage of hypocrite) worketh nothing else, but the betraying of his own Soul, by crafty unrighteousness, purchasing eternal perdition. For it helpeth us not to hide our corrupt hearts from the Worlds eye, seeing from him, who is an infinite eye, we cannot hide them: some Gardens we may gather in this May-game of the World, Sed fasti ille, dum loquimur, ardescit; These flowers wither while we discourse of their colour, or are in gathering them. That we should therefore inhabit and dwell within our selves, and become fearful witnesses of our secret evils, did that reverend Philosopher Pythagoras teach in this golden precept. Nisi turpe committas, neque coram aliis, neque tecum, maxime omnium verere teipsum; Commit nothing foul or dishonest, faith he, neither to be known to others, nor to thine own heart: but above all men reverence thine own conscience. And this may be a precept of nature and right reason: by which Law, Men, and all creatures, and bodies, are inclined to those operations, which are answerable to their own form; as Fire to give heat. Now, as the reasonable mind is the form of Man, so he is aptly moved to those things which his proper form prekeneth unto him: to wit, to that which right reason offereth; and the acts of right reason, are the acts of virtue: and in the breach of the rules of this reason, is Man least excusable: as being a reasonable creature. For all else, both sensitive, growing, and inanimate, obey the law which God imposed on them at their first creation.

The Earth performeth her office, according to the Law of God in nature: for it bringeth forth the Bud of the Herb which feedeth seed, &c. and the Beast, which liveth thereon. He gave a Law to the Seas, and commanded them to keep their bounds: which they obey. He made a decree for the Sun, and a way for the lightning of the Thunders. He caused the Sun to move, and to give light, and to serve for Signs and for Seasons. Were these rebellious as Man, for whose sake they were created, or did they once break the law of their natures and forms, the whole World would then perish, and all return to the first Chaos, Darkness, and Confusion.

By this natural Law, or Law of humane reason, did Cain perceive his own wickedness, and offence, in the murder of Abel: for he not only feared the displeasure of God, but the revenge of Men: it being written in his reason, that whatsoever he performed towards others, the same by others might be done unto him again. And that this judgment of well and evil doing, was put into our natures by God, and his eternal law, before the Law written: Adfer in the person of God witnesseth, Gen. the fourth. If thou do well, shalt thou not be accepted? and if thou do not well, sin lieth at thy door.

The Schoolmen are large also in this question of the natural Law: the same being opened amply by Reinerus, Antoninus, and Valentinus. But it is not my purpose to write a volume of this Subject.

But this law which Thomas Aquinas calleth an act of reason taken properly, and not a habit, as it is an evident natural judgment of practical reason: they divide into indemonstrable, or needing no demonstration (as that good is to be followed, and evil eschewed) and demonstrable, which is evidently proved, out of higher and more universal propositions. Again, as it answereth the natural appetite, prescribing things to be desired as good, or to be avoided as evil (as of the first to desire to live, and to satisfy hunger, &c. and of the second, to eschew pains, sorrow, and death) in this consideration they divide it, according to the divers kinds of appetites that are in us. For in every Man there are three sorts of appetites, which answer the three degrees of natural Law. The first is, to be that which we are; in which is comprehended the desire, both to live, and to preserve our being and life, also the desire of life, with care to provide for them: for the Father after his death lives in his Children; and therefore the desire of life comprehends the desire of Children. And to these appetites are referred the first indemonstrable laws of nature, for the most part. For it needs no proof, that all creatures should desire to be, to live, and to be defended, and to live in their life, when they cannot in themselves. And as Man is a being, Ens or Res: so he doth desire good, and shun evil. For it is common to all things, to desire things agreeable to their own natures, which is, to desire their own good. And so is God defined by Aristotle, to be that which all desire. Which definition Boetius upon the 44. Plato approveth: Recte quidem Bonum desiderant, quod omnia appetunt. Recte habet bonum desideratum, quod omnia appetunt. Recte habet bonum desideratum, quod omnia appetunt.

The second kind of appetite is of those things which appertain to us, as we have sense. Whence by the law of Nature, we desire the delights of every sense; but with such moderation, as may neither glust us with satiety, nor hurt us with excess. For as Sense it self is for the preservation of life and being: so it is meet, even by the law of nature, that the sensitive appetite should not carry us to the destruction, either of our life or being. And although (seeing both these kinds of appetites are in Beasts) we may well say, that Nature hath given divers laws unto them: In which sense the Civilians define Natural right, or Ius naturale, to be the same which Nature hath taught all living creatures; Yet the Schoolmen admit not, that the instincts of beasts can be properly called a Law, but only a Ius, or Right, which is the matter, and aim of every Law. For so they distinguish it; where Ulpian affirmeth, that Ius naturale is that, which Nature hath taught all living creatures. In this place (saith Valentinus) Ius is not to be taken for a Law, but for the matter of the Law. And yet where Ulpian also distinguisheth the right belonging to living creatures in general, from the right belonging to Men; calling the one Ius naturae, the other Ius gentium: the Diviues understand the Law of Nature more largely, that is for all evident dictates, precepts, or biddings of divine reason: both in Beasts and Men; and restrain the Law of Nations to a kind of humane right.

The third appetite is of those things which appertain properly to Man, as he is a living creature reasonable: as well with relation to God, and to our Neighbour, as for our selves: and the Laws of this appetite are the Commandments of our Religion.

Now although there are many other branches and divisions of this Law of Nature answering the division of Matter, yet in the natural or morive faculty, which is but one, stirring up to good, and declining the contrary; secondly, because all is contained in that general natural precept, That good is to be followed, and ill avoided: and thirdly, because all the parts are reduced to one and the same last end.

Bapt.

That this Law of Nature bindeth all creatures, it is manifest: and chiefly Man; because he is endowed with reason; in whom as reason groweth, so this band of observing the Law of Nature increaseth, Postquam ratio ad perfectum venit, tunc fit quod scriptum est, Advenerunt mandata peccatorum reuixit; When reason grew to perfection, then it came to pass, which was written by S. Paul, When the Commandment came, sin revived. Neither is it a small warrant for this Law of Nature, when those which break the fame, are said by S. Paul, To be delivered over into a reprobate sense (or mind) to do those things which are not convenient: and again, that their consciences bear witness, and their thoughts accuse them. For, though this Law of Nature stretch not to every particular: as to command fasting and the like: yet it is agreeable in general all good, and whatsoever is agreeable to right reason. And therefore said Damasene; Homines facti sunt mali, declinando in id quod contra naturam est; Men (saith he) are made evil, by declining unto that which is contrary to nature: and S. Augustine, Omne vitium natura nocet, ac per hoc contra naturam est; Every vice doth wrong to nature, and is therefore contrary unto it.

Neither yet are the rules of this Law of Nature so streight, but that they suffer exceptions in some particulars. For whereas by this Law all Men are born Lords of the earth, yet it well alloweth inequality of Portions, according to unequal merit: by taking from the evil, and giving to the good: and by permitting and commanding that all Men shall enjoy the Fruits of their labours to themselves: according to the rules of Justice and Equity.

And though the Law of Nature command, that all things be restored which are left in trust, yet in some causes this law the sufficiency to be broken: as to deny a mad Man his weapons, and the like, which he left in keeping while he was sober. But the universal principles can no more be changed, than the decrees of God are alterable: who according to St. Paul, abideth faithful, and cannot deny himself.

Of the written Law of God.

As for the eternal, and natural, the Law Positive or imposed is the next in order, which Law, being nothing but an addition, or rather explication of the former, hath two kinds: Divine, and Humane. Again, the divine positive Law is double; the old and new: The old was given unto Moses in Mount Sinai or Horeb, at such time as the World had stood 2513. whole years: and in the 67. day of this year when as Abram or Abraham governed the Assyrians, Marabhu the Assyrians, Triquet the Argives, Corpus Africa, and Abraham 430. years. And this, it seems, was the first written Law which the World received. For the very word Nomos, signifying a Law, was not then, nor long after invented by the Grecians: no not in Homer's time: who lived after the fall of Troy 80. years at least: and Troy it self was cast down 335. years, after Moses led Israel out of Egypt. This Law, it pleased God to engrave in Stone, that it might remain a lasting Book of his express will in the Church; and that the Priests and people might have, whereof to meditate, till the coming of Christ: and that so these Children of Israel, though bred among an idolatrous people in Egypt, might be without excuse: the slight defences of ignorance being taken from them.

The reason known to us why this Law was not written before, is, that when the people were few, and their Lives long, the Elders of families might easily without any written Law instruct their own Children: and yet as they increased, so doubts fell he had belides the Law of Nature many precepts from God, before the Law written. But now at length, forasmuch as the Law of Nature did not define all kinds of good, and evil; nor condemn every sin in particular: nor sufficiently terrify the Consciences of Offenders: nor expound divine worship, as for those after-ages was required, who gave every day less authority than other to the natural Law; in these respects it was necessary, that the Law should be written, and lay before the eyes of all Men: which before, they might, but would not read, in their own consciences. The Schoolmen, and the Fathers before them, enlarge the causes and necessity, why the Law was written, whereof these are the chiefest.

The first, for restraining of Sin, directly grounded upon this place of David, The Law of the Lord is undefiled, converting Souls: The testimonies of the Lord are faithful, giving wisdom to Children. For the humane Law, saith St. Augustine, meeteth not with all offences, either by way of prohibition or punishment; seeing thereby it might take away something seeming necessary, and hinder common profit: but the Divine Law written, forbiddeth every evil, and therefore by David it is called undefiled.

Secondly, it serveth for the direction of our minds. For the Laws of Men, can only take knowledge of outward actions, but not of internal motions, or of our disposition and will: and yet it is required, that we be no less clean in the one, than in the other. And therefore were the words concerning our Souls, added by David: wherein are all our outward acts first generated, according to the Cabalists. Athiones hominum nulla efficit, nisi prius in mente decernerentur. The actions of Men (say they) would be none at all, were they not first conceived in the Mind.

Thirdly, it leadeth us to the knowledge of truth, which by reason of diversity of opinion, and difference of peculiar Laws among sundry Nations, we cannot be assured of; but the Law of God bindeth all Men, and is without error: and therefore also said David, That the Testimony of the Law of God is faithful: giving wisdom to Children.

§. VIII.

§. V. III.

Of the unwritten Law of God, given to the Patriarchs by Tradition.

NOW, that in all this long tract of time, between the Creation and the written Law, the World and People of Gr-1 were left altogether to the Law of Reason and Nature, it doth not appear. For the Patriarchs of the first Age received many Precepts from God himself, and whatsoever was first imposed by Adam, the same was observed by Seth, who instructed Enos: from whom it descended to Noah, Sem, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Joseph, and Moses. Yea many particular Commandments afterward written, were formerly imposed, and delivered over by Tradition; which kind of teaching the Jews afterward called Cabala, or Receptio: Precepts received from the Mouth of their Priests and Elders: to which the Jews after the Law written, reserved in the Bosoms of their Priests, and unlawful to be uttered to the People. But the true Cabala was not to be concealed from any, as being indeed the Divine Law revealed to the Patriarchs, and from them delivered to the Posterity, when as yet it was unwritten. The Commandments which God gave unto Adam in the beginning, were, that he should impose names to all Beasts, according to their natures; to whole perfection of understanding they were sufficiently known. For finding the reason of his own name Adam of Adamah, Earth, or red Clay, he gave other names significant, not only to Beasts, but to his Children and Nephews, which afterward his issues imitated; as the name of Seth signifieth, as some take it, one that was laid for the Ground or Foundation of the Church, or rather, one given in recompence for Abel that was slain: and Enosh signifieth Man or Miserable, &c. Further, God commanded Adam to till the Ground, and to live by the labour thereof: God also gave him the choice of all Fruits, but the forbidden, and in Adam also was Marriage first instituted: all Men thenceafter being commanded to cohabit with their Wives, rather than with their Father and Mother.

That murder and cruelty was also forbidden, both before the Law written, and before the Flood itself, it is manifest. God himself making it appear, that it was one of the greatest causes of the destruction of Mankind by the general Flood, For God said unto Noah, An end of all flesh is come before me: for the earth is filled with cruelty through them: and behold I will destroy them from the earth. That offence therefore, for which all perished, could not be unknown to all that perished: Gods Mercy and Justice interposing between the untaught, and revenge. This commandment God repeated to Noah, after the Waters were dried up from the Earth. Who sa Hebrews mans blood, by man shall his blood be shed: for in the Image of God hath he made man.

Also the Law of honouring and reverencing our Parents, was observed among the Faithful, and the contrary punished by the Fathers Curse: as Gen. 25. Cursed be Canaan, a servant of servants shall he be unto his brethren. Again, we find that the unnatural sin of the Sodomites was punished in the highest degree; as with fire from Heaven. The sin of Adultery and Ravishment, was before the Law no less detested than this, as appeareth by that revenge, taken for Debs's forcing: and by the judgment which Juda gave against Tamar, That she should be burnt: and by the repentance of Pharosh and Abimelech, against whom this sentence was pronounced, These are but dead, because of the Woman which thou hast taken: for she is a mans Wife. To these we may add the Ordinance of Sacrifice, of distinction of clean and unclean Beasts, of Circumcision, of the Brood, to raise up Seed to his Brother that left a Widow childless, and divers other constitutions, being delivered before the written Law, were after by it confirmed. So that this Divine Law imposed, of which the Law of Moses containeth that which is called The Old Testament, may be said, not only to have been written in the hearts of Men, before it was engraven in Stone, but also in substance to have been given in Precept to the Patriarchs. For as S. Paul witnesseth of himself, I knew not sin, but by the Law: so ever the Law naturally preceded, and went before offences, though written after offences committed.

It is true, that all the Creatures of God were directed by some kind of unwritten Law; the Angels intuitively; Men by Reason; Beasts by Sense and Instinct, without Discourse; Plants by their vegetative powers; and things inanimate by their necessary motions, without sense or perception.

Of the Moral, Judicial, and Ceremonial Law, with a note prefixed, How the Scripture speaketh not always in one sense, when it nameth the Law of Moses.

NOW as the word [Law] in general, as is aforesaid, hath divers significations, and is taken for all Doctrine which doth prescribe and refrain: so this Law, called the Law of Moses in particular, is taken by S. Paul diversly; as, sometime for all the Old Testament, as, Now we know whatsoever the law saith, it saith to them which are under the law.

When it is opposed, or differed from the Prophets, and Psalms, it is there taken for the five Books of Moses. For so S. Luke hath distinguished them; as All must be fulfilled which are written of me in the Law, in the Prophets, and in the Psalms. When it is opposed to the Gospel, then it is taken for the Law Moral, Ceremonial, and Judicial, as, Therefore we conclude, that a man is justified by faith without the works of the Law.

When it is opposed to Grace, it signifieth the declaration of Gods wrath, and our guilt of condemnation; or the extremity of Law, and summum jus: as, For ye are not under the law, but under grace.

When it is opposed to the Truth, namely, where the ceremonies or signs are taken for the things signified; as the Sacrifice for Christ; and the like: then it signifieth but Shadows and Figures; as, The Law was given by Moses, but grace and truth came by Jesus Christ.

Lastly, when it is opposed to the time of Christs coming, it signifieth the whole Policy of the Jews Commonweal; as, Before faith came, we were kept under the Law, &c. or the Law of the Order and Institution of the Aaronical Priesthood; as, All the Prophets, and the Law, or the Priests, prophesied unto John. And if the Priesthood be changed, the Law also, to wit, of the Priesthood, must needs be changed.

The word [Law] is sometime also taken by the Figure Metonymia, for Interest, Authority, and Empire, or for contrainforcing force; as, The Law of the Spirit of life, the law or the force of sin and death, the enforcements of conscience, &c.

James 2.
10.

But the written Law of Moses, or the Law of the Old Testament, of which we now speak, is thus defined: The Law a Doctrine, which was first put into the minds of Men by God, and afterwards written by Moses, or by him repeated, commanding Holiness and Justice, promising Eternal Life conditionally, that is, to the observers of the Law, and threatening death to those which break the Law in the least. For according to Saint James, Whoever shall keep the whole, and faileth in one point, is guilty of all. The definition used by the Schoolmen, in which both the Old and New Law are comprehended, is thus given, Lex divina est divinum decretum, hominibus prescribens modum necessarium ut apte pervenire possint ad supernaturalem beatitudinem, quæ est ultimus humane vite finis; The divine Law (say they) is the decree of God, prescribing unto Men a necessary mean, whereby they may attain supernatural beatitude, which is the last end of Mens life.

Rom. 7. 12

The Law of Moses hath three parts: Moral, Ceremonial, and Judicial. The Moral part commandeth this or that good to be done, and this or that evil to be avoided, in particular; as also it declareth, for whose sake it is to be done; as this for I am the Lord, whereas the Law of Nature commands it but in general. Again, the Moral Law entreateth of virtue and goodness; the Ceremonial of Divine Service, and of Holiness; (for external worship, and the order of hallowing our selves unto God is called Ceremony) and the Judicial teacheth the particular government, &c. for the Commonwealth of the Jews, and prescribeth orders for Justice and Equity. And therefore was it said of Saint Paul, The commandment is just, holy and good: Just, or Justice being referred to the Judicial; Holy, or Holiness to the Ceremonial; good, or honest to the Moral. The Judicial part is touching the Government of the Commonwealth of the Jews, in which many things must needs be proper to that State, as such as were inflicted either in respect of Place or Persons.

The Ceremonial is divided into four parts, according to the four kinds of things, of which it speaketh, to wit, Sacrifice, Holy things, Sacraments, and Observances. To Sacrifices belong Beasts, and the Fruits of the Earth; to Holy things the Tabernacle, Temple, Vessels, Altars, and the like; to Sacraments Circumcision, the Passover, and such like. For the Observances, they consisted either in prohibition of certain Meats, as not to eat the Blood and Fat of Beasts: or in some other outward things, as in Washings, Purifications, Anointings, and Attire; as not to wear mixt Garments of Linen and Woollen; as also it prohibited other unnatural and improper commixtions, as thou shalt not yoke together an Ox and an Ass, or call mingled Seed in one Field. It also exhorteth natural compassion, and forbiddeth cruelty even unto Beasts, Birds, and Plants, whereby the Creatures of God might be defroved without any profit to Man. For so some refer these Precepts, Thou shalt not kill the bird sitting on her nest, nor beat down the first buds of the tree, nor muzzle the labouring Ox, and the like, to the Ceremonial Law.

Neither is there any of these three parts of the Law of Moses, but it hath as yet in some respects, the same power which it had before the coming of Christ. For the Moral liveth still, and is not abrogated or taken away: saving in the ability of justifying or condemning; for therein are we commanded to love and worship God: and to use Charity one towards another: for which ever shall be required at our hands. Therein also are we in particular directed, how this ought to be done:

which power of directing by special Rules and Precepts of Life, it retaineth still. For these things also are commanded in both Testaments to be observed: though principally for the fear of God in the one, and for the love of God in the other.

The Ceremonial also liveth in the things which it fore-signified. For the Shadow is not destroyed, but perfected, when the Body it is represented to us. Besides, it still liveth, in that it giveth both instruction and testimony of Christ, and in that it giveth direction to the Church for some Ceremonies and Types of Holy signification, which are still expedient; though in a far fewer number than before Christ's coming, and in a far less degree of necessity.

Lastly, the Judicial liveth in substance, and concerning the end, and the natural and universal equity thereof.

But the Moral faileth in the point of Justification, the Ceremonial as touching the use and external observation (because Christ himself is come, of whom the Ceremonies were Signs and Shadows) and the Judicial is taken away, as far forth as it was peculiar to the Jews Commonwealth, and Policy.

§. X.

A Proposal of nine other points to be considered, with a touch of the five first.

As for that which remaineth in the general consideration of the Divine written Law, it may in effect be reduced into these nine points.

1. The dignity and worth of the Law.
2. The Majesty of the Law-giver.
3. The property and peculiarity of the People receiving it.
4. The conveniency of the time in which it was given.
5. The efficacy and power thereof.
6. The difference and agreement of the Old and New Testament.
7. The end and use of the Law.
8. The sense and understanding of the Law.
9. The duration and continuance thereof.

1. The Dignity of the Law is sufficiently proved by S. Paul in these words, Wherefore the Law is holy, and the Commandment is holy, and just, and good: which three Attributes are referred, as aforelaid, to the Moral, Ceremonial, and Judicial.

2. The Majesty of the Law-giver is approved in all his Creatures: who as he hath given all things their Lives, and beings, so he only gave the Law, who could only give the end and reward promised, to wit, the Salvation of Mankind: but he gave it not to Moses immediately, but by the Ministry of Angels, as it is said. And the Law was ordained by Angels, in the hand of a Mediator: and in the Acts, He gave the Law by the ordinance of Angels.

3. The propriety and peculiarity of the People, receiving this Law, is in three respects. First, in that they were prepared: Secondly, in that they were a Nation apart and disfavoured: Thirdly, in that they were the Children of the Promise made to Abraham. Prepared they were, because they had the Knowledge of one God, when all other Nations were Idolaters. A Nation apart and favoured they were, because of Gods Choice and Election. Children of the Promise they were, for the Promise was made by God unto Abraham, and his Seed: not unto his Seed, as to Ethan and Jacob, but but to his Seed, as to Jacob, or Israel singularly, of whom Christ. Now to Abraham and his Seed were the promises made: he saith not to the Seeds, as speaking of many, but to thy Seed, as of one, which is Christ.

4. The conveniency of the time, in which it was given, is noted by S. Augustine: that it was about the middle time, between the Law of Nature, and Grace: The Law of Nature continued from Adam to Moses: the Law written in the Commandments, received by Moses in the Worlds year 2514, continued to the Baptism of John: from which time began the Law of Grace, which shall continue to the Worlds end. Other reasons for the conveniency are formerly given.

5. The fifth consideration is of the efficacy of this Law, the same being a disposition to, or sign of our justification: but not by it self sufficient, but as a figure of Christ in Ceremonies, and a preparation to righteousness in Moral Precepts. For through the passion of Christ were sins forgiven, who taketh away the sins of the World: And therefore S. Paul calleth the rudiments of the Law beggery and weak, beggery as containing no grace, weak as not able to forgive and justify. The blood of Goats and Bulls, and the ashes of an Heifer could only cleanse the Body; but they were figures of Christ's Blood, which doth cleanse the inward Soul. For if the Law could justify, then Christ died in vain.

§. XI.

Of the fifth point, to wit, of the difference and agreement of the Old and New Testament.

THE Old and New Testament differ in name, and in the mean and way propofed for attaining to Salvation; as the Old by Works, the New by Grace: But in the thing it self, or object and remoted end, they agree: which is, Mans Happiness and Salvation.

The Old Testament, or Law, or Letter, or the Witness of Gods will, was called the Old, because it preceded the New Testament; which is an explication of the Old: From which the New taketh witness. Yet the New of more excellency, in that it doth more lively expreſs, and openly and directly delineate the ways of our Redemption. It is also called the Old, to show that in part it was to be abrogated: In that he saith the New Testament, he hath abrogated the Old. For the Old Law, though greatly extolled by the Prophets, and delivered with wonderful Miracles, yet was it constituted in a policy perishable: but the New was given in a promise of an everlasting Kingdom, and therefore called in the Apocalypse, a Testament and Gospel for ever during.

The Old Testament is called the Law, because the first and chief part is the Law of Moses, of which the Prophets and Psalms are Commentaries, explicating that Law.

The New Testament is called the Gospel, because the first and chief part thereof is the glad tidings of our redemption: The other Books, as the Epistles or Letters of the Apostles, and the Acts or story of the Apostles, are plentiful interpreters thereof: The word Evangelium signifying a joyful, happy, and prosperous message, or (as Homer used it) the reward given to the Messenger, bringing joyful news. It is also sometime taken for a sacrifice, offered after victory, or other pleasing success, as by Xenophon. In the Scriptures it hath three significations. First, for glad tidings in general, as in Elijah the 2. v. 7. concerning peace: Secondly, by an excellency it is refrained to signify that most joyful message of Salvation, as in Luk. 2. 10. whence also by figure it is taken for the History of Christ: and by Act. 1. we understand the four Gospels.

Lastly, For the preaching and divulging the doctrine of Christ, as 1 Cor. 9. v. 14. and 2 Cor. 8. v. 18.

The agreement of both Testaments (taken, I think, as they are divided in Volumes) is by Danmas comprised in these four.

In their Author.

In the substance of the Covenant, or things promised.

In the foundation, to wit, Christ.

In the effects, that is, in Righteousness and Justification.

In the Author they agree, because both are of God, and therefore both one Testament and will of God in substance of Doctrine. For as there was ever one Church; so was there one Covenant, one Adoption, and one Doctrine. As the old Law doth point at Christ, so doth the new Law teach Christ: the old proposing him as to come, the new as already come; one and the same thing being promised in both; both tending to one, and the same end: Even the Salvation of our Souls: Which according to S. Peter is the end of our Faith. For although it be said, that Moses did promise by observing the Law an earthly Kingdom, a Land flowing with Milk and Honey, the propagation of children, and other worldly blessings: yet all these were but figures to teach, and pledges to assure the Fathers of those spiritual blessings by Christ; for by the earthly he raised their minds to the hope of heavenly. And the Fathers notwithstanding these worldly goods, did yet acknowledge themselves Strangers, and Pilgrims, expecting the heavenly Jerusalem: According to this place of the Hebrews: All these died in Faith, and received not the promises, but saw them afar off, and believed them: confessing that they were Strangers and Pilgrims on the Earth. To which purpose also S. Augustine: *Omnes Lib. de Civitate pauci veterem legem intelligunt, non attendentes tit. Dei, per promissa terrenam aera promittit. Few (saith he) do understand the old Law: not attending that by things earthly eternal are promised. And S. Hieron. Natus Deus pascere Judæos, non pecorum corporibus sed fidei opibusque, ut Judæi somniant: God would not feed the Jews as Beasts with corporal gifts and riches as themselves dream. And this may be gathered out of Gods own words, Ego sum Deus tuus, & ero vobis in Deum; I am thy God and I will be your God. For the words, I will be your God, prove that it was not for the present, or for perishable things, that God gave them this promise; but in respect of the future: to wit the safety of their Souls. For as God created both Body and Soul, so hath he of his goodness, not left the better part uncared for, which liveth ever.*

The agreement between the Old and New Testament in substance, infers also the agreement in foundation. For Christ is called the foundation of the Law, laid both by the Apostles and Prophets: in whom all the promises of God in the Old and New, are assured: The Fathers having eaten the same spiritual food, which we eat in our Sacraments.

The agreement in effects, is in that the knowledge of our sin and misery, which is taught us by the Law, maketh way, and as it were, serveth in subordination to the Gospel, the proper effects whereof are Mercy and Salvation: to which the Law serving as an introduction (for to those which acknowledge their sin and misery, God sheweth his Mercy and Salvation) may be laid to agree with the

non deliberatur ratione que est principium proprium actus boni aut vitiosi; Such passions or inclinations are unperfelt acts, that is, not deliberated upon by reason, which is the proper principle of a good or vicious action. And sure, it may seem, that so long as we resist such motions, they harm us not: as they say, Quandiu refragmur nihil nocet: nocent autem cum ea dominari permittimus; As long as we give no assent unto them, it is thought by some that they hurt us not: and that then only they hurt when we suffer them to bear sway. But these Men, as it seems, make nothing forbidden in this tenth precept, but what hath been forbidden in the other: for in every Commandment, not only the outward act, but also the inward assent unto evil, though it break not into act, is forbidden: therefore, that we may know the difference between this Commandment and the rest, the distinction of desires is to be held: that some are with assent, and unbridled; others bridled, and without assent. For so even the Moral Philosopher can tell us, that the Continent Man hath evil desires, but without assent (for they are bridled by the strength of right reason) as on the other side the Incontinent hath good desires, but restrained and suppressed by contrary Passions. The evil desires when they are accompanied with assent, are in every Commandment forbidden, together with the outward act: And therefore if we will have any thing proper to this Commandment, we must needs say, that the evil desires of the Continent Man (that is, even those which we resist and bridle) are here forbidden. For though he that bridles his evil desires, be much better than he that yieldeth unto them: Yet such a Man, even according to the Heathen Philosopher, is not worthy the name of a virtuous Man. For Aristotle himself makes continentia, not to be virtue, but only a degree unto it: confessing that though the Continent Man do well in bridling his evil Affections, yet he doth not all, seeing he ought not so much as to have them at all. Neither is it much more, that true Divinity delivereth touching this matter. For, as he faith, that in the Continent Man the having of these evil desires, though he resist them, is the cause that he cannot be called a virtuous Man: so we, that the having of them is a sin. Only in this we excel him here: that we are able out of Divinity to give the true reason of this Doctrine: which is, that every one sinneth, that doth not love God with his whole heart and affection: Whence it followeth that the evil desires of the Continent Man, that is, of him which bridles them, must needs be in: seeing flesh desires, though bridled, are a pulling away of a part of our heart and affection from God.

Seeing therefore it hath pleased God, to make us know, that by our faithful endeavours to keep his Commandments, we witness our love toward himself: We may not fainly give liberty to our vanities, by calling back upon God (who is justice itself) that he hath given us precepts altogether beyond our power, and Commandments impossible for us to keep. For as he is accused (faith S. Hierom) that avows that the Law is in all things possible to be observed: so he hath made this addition. Male dicitur qui dicit impossibile Deum preceptis; Accused is he that faith that God hath commanded things (in themselves, and not through our fault) impossible. Now, as the places are many which command us to keep the Law: so is our weakness also in the Scriptures laid before us, and therefore it is thus safely to be understood, that we should without evasion, or without betraying of our selves, do our faithful endeavours to observe them: which if we do unfeignedly, no doubt, but

God will accept our desires therein. For that there is no Man just, David witnesseth. Enter not into judgment with thy Servant, for in thy sight no flesh is just: There is Man that sinneth not: And again, Who can say I have made my heart clean? But seeing there is no sin: grievous without deliberation; let every Mans Conscience judge him, whether he give way willingly, or restrain himself in all that he can; yea, or no? For when a King gives to his Subject a Commandment upon pain of loss of his love, to perform some service: if the Subject neglecting the same, seek to falsifie his Sovereign with shifting excuses, out of doubt such a Prince will take himself to be derided therein.

§. XIV.

If there were not any Religion nor Judgment to come, yet the Decalogue were most necessary to be observed.

AND if we consider adively, and soberly, of the Moral Law, or ten Commandments, which God by the hand of Moses gave unto his people, it will appear that such was his merciful providence in the choice of them, as were there neither pain, nor profit adjoined to the observing, or not observing of them, were there no Divine power at all, nor any Religion among Men, yet if we did not for our own sakes strive to observe these Laws: all society of Men, and all endeavours, all happiness and contentment in this Life would be taken away: And every State and Common-wealth in the World fall to the Ground and dissolve. Therefore, these Laws were not imposed as a burden, but as a blessing: to the end that the innocent might be defended, that every Man might enjoy the fruits of his own Trade, that right might be done to all Men from all Men: That by Justice, Order, and Peace, we might give the lives of reasonable Men, and not of Beasts; of Free-men, and not of Slaves; of Civil Men, and not of Salvages. And hereof making our humane reason only Judge, Let us see the inconveniences in this Life which would follow by the breach and neglect of these Laws.

As first, what would the issue be if we acknowledged many Gods? would not a far greater Hatred, War, and Blood-shed follow, than that which the difference of ceremony, and diversity of interpretation, hath already brought into the World, even among those Nations which acknowledge one God, and one Christ?

And what could it profit Mankind to pray to Idols, and Images of Gold, Metal, dead Stones, and rotten Wood, whence nothing can be hoped, but the loss of time, and an impossibility to receive thencefrom, either help or comfort.

The breach of the third Commandment bringeth therewith this disadvantage, and ill to Man, that whatsoever taketh the name of God in vain, shall not at any time benefit himself by calling God to witness for him, when he may justly use his holy Name.

The observing the Sabbath holy, giveth rest to Men and Beasts, and Nature her self requireth intermission of Labour.

If we despise our Parents, who have given us being, we thereby teach our own Children to scorn and neglect us, when our aged years require comfort and help at their hands.

If murder were not forbidden, and severely punished, the Races of Mankind would be extinguished: and whosoever would take the liberty to destroy others, giveth liberty to others to destroy himself.

If

If Adultery were lawful and permitted, no Man could lay unto himself, This is my Son: there could be no inheritance by virtue and undertaking to posterity, no endeavour by virtue and undertaking to raise families: murders and poisonings between Man and Wife would be daily committed: and every Man subject to most filthy and unclean diseases.

If Stealth and violent rapine were suffered, all mankind would shortly after perill, or live as the Salvages, by roots and acorns. For no Man laboureth, but to enjoy the Fruits thereof. And such is the mischief of robbery, as where Mages for lesser crimes appointed restitution four-fold, policy of State and necessity hath made it death.

To permit false Witnesses, is to take all mens lives and estates from them by corruption: the wicked would swear against the virtuous: the waster against the wealthy: the Idle Beggar and loiterer, against the careful and painful labourer: all trial of right were taken away, and justice thereby blinshed out of the World.

The covering of that which belongs to other Men, bringeth no other profit than a diffraction of Mind with an inward vexation: for while we cover what appertains to others, we neglect our own: our appetites are therein fed with vain and fruitless hopes, so long as we do but cover; and if we do attain to the desire of the one, or the other, to wit, the Wives or goods of our Neighbours, we can look for no other, but that our selves shall also, either by theft or by strong hand, be deprived of our own.

Wherein then appeareth the burthen of Gods Commandments, if there be nothing in them, but rules and directions for the general and particular good of all living? Surely, for our own good, and not in respect of himself, did the most merciful and provident God ordain them; without the observation of which, the virtues of heavenly bodies, the fertility of the Earth, with all the blessings given us in this life, would be unto us altogether unprofitable, and of no use. For we should remain but in the state of brute Beasts, if not in a far more unhappy condition.

§. XV.

Of humane Law, written and unwritten.

HUmane Law, of which now it followeth to speak, is first divided into two, viz. Written, and Unwritten. The unwritten consists of usage, approved by time: which Isidore calls Mores: and he defines Mores to be Consuetudines veritate probate, to be customs approved by antiquity or unwritten Laws. Now custom differeth from use, as the cause from the effect: in that Custom is by use and continuance established into a Law: but yet there where the Law is defective, faith Isidore.

And of Customs there are two general Natures, containing innumerable particulars, the first are written Customs, received and exercised by Nations, as the Customs of Burgundy, and Normandy: the ancient general Custom of England, and the Customs of Castile, and other Provinces.

The second are these petty Customs, used in particular Places, Cities, Hundreds, and Mannors. The general or National Customs are some written, others unwritten.

The particular or petty Customs are seldom written, but witnessed by testimony of the inhabitants. The Customs of the Dutchy of Cornwall comprehending also the Statutory of Devon, as touching Tin, and Tin causes, are Written in Devon, but not in Cornwall. But howsoever use and time hath made these Customs as Laws, yet ought every Custom to be reasonable, as well as prescribed. Non firmatur tractu temporis quod de jure ab initio non sufficit; That which at first was not grounded upon good right, is not made good by continuance of time. And (faith Ulpian) quod ab initio vitiosum est, non potest tractu temporis convalescere; Course of time amends not that which was naughty from the first beginning. For these two defences are necessary in all Laws of Custom: the one, that it be not repugnant to the Law Divine, and Natural: the other, that the Cause and reason be strong, proving a right birth, and necessary continuance: it being manifest that every Custom, which is against the Law, had his beginning from evil deeds, and therefore not without the former considerations to be allowed. And it is true, that all Customs of this Nature were but tolerated for a time, by the Law-makers, though they have since continued, because posterity is not bound to examine by what cause their Ancestors were thereto moved. For non sufficit simplex tolerantia: And it is not in this contravention in the Law; Per populum consuetudo contra legem induci non potest, nisi de voluntate illius qui novam legem, & novam constitutionem statuere potest, qui falsa principii est; The people cannot bring in a New Custom, against Law: save by his will, who hath power to make a New Law and Ordinance, which is only the Prince.

Humane Law generally taken, to wit, humane Law written, is by some defined to be the decree or doom of practical reason: by which humane Actions are ruled and directed. Papinian calls the Law a common precept, the adjuvment of Wifemen, and the restraint of offences committed, either willingly or ignorantly. Isidore calls the Law a Constitution written, agreeing with Religion, fittest for Government and common profit: And more largely, Omne id quod ratione conficit; All that stands with reason.

Lastly, and more precisely it is thus defined. Humane Law is a righteous decree, agreeing with the Law natural, and eternal: made by the rational discourse of those, that exercise publick authority: prescribing necessary observances to the subject. That every Law ought to be a righteous decree, S. Augustine teacheth, saying: Mibi lex esse non videtur, quæ iusta non fuerit; It seems to be no Law at all to me, which is not just: and just it cannot be, except it agree with the Law natural and eternal. For there is no Law just and legitimate (faith S. Augustine) which the Law-makers have not derived from the eternal. Nihil iustum acque legitimum est, quod non ab æterna lege sit homines derivaverunt.

Secondly, it ought to be constituted by discourse of reason, whereby it is distinguished from the Law natural, to wit, the natural, indemonstrable, or needing no demonstration from whence the Law humane is taken and deduced.

Thirdly, that it ought to be made by an authorized Magistracy, it cannot be doubted, be the Government of what kind soever. For it falleth otherwise under the Title of those decrees called Violentia, or iriqua constitutiones; Violence, or wicked constitutions.

Of humane Law there are four properties, especially answering these four conditions in the former definition. First, as it is drawn out of the Law of Nature: so every particular of the Humane Law may be resolved into some principle or rule of the Natural.

Secondly, it is to be considered as it is referred unto, and doth respect the common good.

X 2

Thirdly,

jects are bound to fulfil the Law by necessity of compulsion, but the Prince only by his own will, and regard of the common good.

Now concerning the politic Laws, given by Moses to the Nation of the Israelites, whether they ought to be a Precedent, from which no Civil Institutions of other People should presume to digress, I will not presume to determine, but leave it as a question for such Men to decide, whose Professions give them greater ability. Thus much I may be bold to affirm, that we ought not to seem wiser than God himself, as those which it pleased him to give to his Elect People to be governed by.

True it is, that all Nations have their several Qualities, wherein they differ, even from their next Neighbours, no less than in their peculiar Languages, which disagreeable Conditions to govern apply, one and the same Law very hardly were able. The Roman Civil Laws did indeed contain in order, a great part of the then known World, without any notable inconvenience, after such time as once it was received and become familiar: yet was not the administration of it alike in all parts, but yielded much unto the natural Customs of the sundry People, which it governed. For whether it be through a long continued perswasion; or (as Astralogers more willingly grant) some influence of the Heavens; or peradventure some temper of the Soil and Climate, affording matter of provocation to Vice (as Plenty made the Sybarites luxurious: Want and Opportunity to steal, makes the Arabians to be Thieves) very hard it were to forbid by Law, an Offence so common, with any People, as it wanted a Name, whereby to be distinguished from Just and Honest. By such rigor was the Kingdom of Congo unhappily diverted from the Christian Religion, which it willingly at the first embraced, but after with great fury rejected, because plurality of Wives was denied unto them, I know not how necessarily, but more contentiously than seasonably. In such cases, methinks, it were not amiss to consider, that the high God himself permitted some things to the Israelites, rather in regard of their natural disposition (for they were hard-hearted) than because they were consonant unto the ancient Rules of the first-perfection. So, where even the general nature of Man doth condemn (as many things it doth) for wicked and unjust; there may the Law, given by Moses, worthily be deemed the most exact reformer of the evil, which forsooth Man, as near as may be, to the will and pleasure of his Maker. But where Nature or Custom hath entered, a vicious, yet not intolerable Habit, with so long and so publick approbation, that the Vertue opposing it, would seem as uncouth, as it were to walk naked in England, or to wear the English Fashion of Apparel in Turkey: there may a wife and upright Law-giver, without presumption, omit somewhat that the rigour of Moses his Law required; even as the good King Hezekiah did, in a matter merely Ecclesiastical, and therefore the less capable of dispensation, praying for the People; The good Lord be merciful unto him, that prepareth his whole Heart to seek the Lord God, the God of his Fathers, though he be not cleansed according to the purification of the Sanctuary: which Prayer the Lord heard and granted.

To this effect it is well observed by Master Doctor Willet, that the moral Judicials of Moses do partly bind, and partly are let free. They do not hold affirmatively that we are tied to the same severity of punishment now, which was inflicted then; but negatively they do hold, that now the punishment of Death should not be adjudged, where sentence of Death is not given by Moses: Christian Magistrates ruling under Christ the Prince of Peace, that is, of Clemency and Mercy, may abate of the severity of Moses's Law, and mitigate the punishment of Death, but they cannot add unto it to make the burden more heavy: for to them more rigour than Moses, becometh not the Gospel.

But I will not wander in this copious Argument, which hath been the Subject of many learned Discourses, neither will I take upon me, to speak any thing definitively in a Cause which dependeth still in some Controversie among worthy Divines. Thus much (as in honour of the Judicial Law, or rather of him that gave it) I may well and truly say, that the defence of it hath always been very plausible. And surely, howsoever they be not accepted (neither were it expedient) as a general and only Law; yet shall we hardly find any other ground, whereon the Confidence of a Judge may rest, or giving Sentence upon Doubts, arising out of any Law besides it. Hereof, perhaps, that Judge could have been Witness, of whom Fortescue that notable Bulwark of our Laws doth speak, complaining of a Judgment given against a Gentlewoman at Salisbury, who being accused by her own Man, without any other Proof, for murdering her Husband, was thereupon condemned, and burnt to ashes: the Man who accused her, within a Year after being Convict for the same Offence, confessed that his Mistress was altogether innocent of that cruel Fact, whose terrible Death he then (though over-late) grievously lamented: but this Judge, faith the same Author, Sapius ipse mihi falsus esset, quod nunquam in vita sua animam ejus de hoc facto ipse purgaret; Et himself often confessed unto me, that he should never during his Life, be able to clear his Conscience of that Fact. Wherefore that acknowledgment, which other Sciences yield unto the Metaphysicks, that from thence are drawn Propositions, able to prove the Principles of Sciences, which out of the Sciences themselves cannot be proved, may justly be granted by all other politic Institutions, to that of Moses; and so much the more justly, by how much the Subject of the Metaphysicks, which is, Ens quatenus Ens; Being as it is being, is infinitely intericure to the Ens Entium, The Being of beings, the only Good, the fountain of Truth, whose fear is the beginning of Wisdom. To which purpose well faith Saint Augustine: Conditor legum temporalium si vir bonus esset & sapiens, silem ipsam consulis eternam, de qua nullis animis judicare datum est; The Author of temporal Laws if he be good and wise, doubt therein consult the Law eternal, to determine of which there is no power given to any Soul. And as well Prince Edward, in Fortescue his Discourse, Nemo potest melius aut aliud fundamentum ponere, quam populus Dominus; No man can lay a better or another foundation, than the Lord hath laid.

CHAP. V.

The Story of the Israelites from the receiving of the Law, to the death of Moses.

§. I.

Of the numbering and disposing of the Host of Israel, for their marches through the Wilderness: with a note of the reverence given to the worship of God, in this ordering of their Troops.

WHEN Moses had received the Law from God, and published it among the People, and finished the Tabernacle of the Ark and Sanctuary; he mustered all the Tribes and Families of Israel: and having seen what numbers of Men, fit to bear Arms, were found in every Tribe, from 20. years of Age upwards; he appointed Princes and Leaders, as in worth and reputation were in every Tribe most eminent. The number of the whole Army was 603550 able Men for the Wars, besides Women and Children; also, besides the Strangers which followed them out of Egypt. This great Army was divided by Moses into four grots and mighty Battalions, each of which contained the strength of three whole Tribes.

The first of these containing 186400. able Men, consisted of three Regiments, which may well, in respect of their numbers, be called Armies; as containing the three whole Tribes of Judah, Issachar, and Zabulon. In the Tribe of Judah were 74600. fighting Men, led by Nadab, in Issachar 54400. led by Nathanael, in Zabulon 57400. led by Eliab. All these marched under the Standard of the Tribe of Judah, who held the Vanguard, and was the first that moved and marched, being lodged and quartered at their general incamping on the East-side of the Army; which was held the first Place, and of greatest Dignity.

The second Battalion or Army, called in the Scriptures the Host of Reuben, had joynted unto it Simeon and Gad, in number 151450. All which marched under the Standard of Reuben. In the Tribe of Reuben were 46500. under Elizur: in Simeon 59300. under Shelumiel: in Gad 45650. under Eliafab. These had the second place, and incamped on the South-side of the Tabernacle.

The third Army marched under the Standard of Ephraim, to whom were joynted the Regiments of Manasse and Benjamin; who joynted together, made in number 108100. able Men. These marched in the third Place, incamping on the West-quarter of the Tabernacle. Ephraim had 40950. under Eliahama: Manasse 32200. under Gamiel: Benjamin 35400. under Abidam.

The fourth and last Army, or Squadron, of the general Army, containing 157600. able Men, marched under the Standard of Dan; to whom were joynted the two Tribes of Nephthali and Asher. And these had the Rereward, and moved last, incamping on the North-side. Dan had 62700. under Abieser: Asher 41500. under Ingid: Nephthali 33400. under Shira.

Besides these Princes of the several Tribes, there were ordained Captains over Thousands, over Hundreds, over Fifties, and over Tens; as it may appear by that mutiny and insurrection against Moses, Numb. 16. v. 1. & 2. For there arose up against Moses 250. Captains of the Assembly, famous in the Congregation, and men of renown: of which number were Korah, Dathan, and Abiram. Which three principal Mutiniers, with those 250. Captains that followed them, were not any of the twelve Princes of the Tribes, or General Colonels before spoken of, as by their names Num. 1. is made manifest.

The blessing which Israel gave to his Children, took place not only in the division of the Land of Promise, and other things of more consequence, long after following; but even in fortifying them under their several Standards in the Wilderness: it was observed. For Judah had the precedence and the greatest Army, which also was wholly compounded of the Sons of Lea, Jacob's Wife. Reuben having lost his birth-right, followed in the second place, accompanied with his Brother Simeon, who had undergone his Fathers curse; and with Gad, the Son of his Mothers Hand-maid. Joseph, who in Temporal blessings had the Privilege of the first-born a double portion, was accounted as two Tribes, and divided into two Regiments: the younger (according to Jacob's Prophecy) taking place before the Elder. He was assisted by Benjamin, his best beloved Brother, the other Son of Rachel. To Dan, the eldest Son of Jacob's Concubines, was given the leading of the fourth Army, according to Jacob's Prophecy. He had with him under his Standard none of the Children of Lea, or Rachel, but only the Sons of the Hand-maids.

In the middle of these four Armies, was the Tabernacle, or portable Temple of the Congregation carried, surrounded by the Levites. Near unto which, as the Heathens and Pagans could not approach, by reason of these four powerful Armies, which guarded the fame: so was it death for any of the Children of Israel to come near it, who were not of the Levites, to whom the charge was committed. So Sacred was the movable Temple of God, and with such reverence guarded and transported, as 22000. Persons were dedicated to the service and attendance thereof: of which 850. had the peculiar charge, according to their several Offices and Functions; the particulars whereof are written in the third and fourth of Numbers. And as the Armies of the People observed the former order in their incampings: so did the Levites quarter themselves, as in an inner square, on every side of the Tabernacle; The Gishurites on the West, within the Army, and Standard of Ephraim, over whom Eliafab commanded, in number 7500. The Family of Geshon on the South-side, guided by Elizaphan, within the Army of Reuben, and between him and the Tabernacle, in number 8600. The third Company were of the Family of Merari, over whom Zurieel commanded, in number 6200. and these were lodged on the North side within the Army of Dan; On the East-side, and next within those Tribes and Forces which Judah led, did Moses and Aaron lodge, and their Children, brake them: and of their numbers slaughtered the greatest part: and following their victory and pursuit, consumed them all the way of their flight even unto Hormab: the Amalekites in revenge of their former loss, and overthrow at Raphidim: the Canaanites to prevent their dilapidation and destruction threatened. Of which powerful assembly of those two Nations (allisted in all likelihood with the neighbour Kings joyned together for their common safety) it pleased God to forewarn Moses, and to direct him another way, than that formerly intended. For he commanded him to return by those painful passages of the Deserts, through which they had formerly travelled, till they found the banks of the red Sea again: in which retreat before they came back to pass over Jordan there were consumed 38. years: and the whole number of the six hundredth and odd thousand, which came out of Egypt (Moses, Jephua and Caleb excepted) were dead in the Wilderness, the stubborn and careless generations were wholly worn out, and the promised Land bestowed on their Children: and were increased to 600000. and more. For besides the double fault both of refusing to enter the Land upon the return of the discoverers, and the presumption then to attempt it, when they were countermanded: it seemeth that they had committed that horrible Idolatry of worshipping Moloch, and the Host of Heaven. For although Moses doth not mention it, yet Amos doth, and so doth the Martyr Stephen; as also that King of the Israelites worshipped the Sun and Moon after-times it is proved out of sundry other places.

Now after the broken companies were returned to the Camp at Cades, Moses, according to the commandment received from God, departed towards the South from whence he came, to recover the flocks of the Red Sea. And so from Cades or Rithma he removed to Remmonparez, so called of abundance of Pomegranates there found and divided among them. From thence he went on to Lihnah, taking that name of the frankincense there found. From Lihnah he croft the valley, and fate down at Ressa near the foot of the mountain. And after he had rested there, he bended towards the West, and incamped at Celata: where one of the Hebrews, for gathering broken Wood on the Sabbath, was stoned to death. After which, Moses always keeping the valley, between two great ledges of Mountains (those which bound the Desert of Sin, and those of Pharan) croft the fame from Celata; and marched Eastward to the Mountain of Supher, or Sepher: this making the Twentieth manfion. From thence he passed on to Harada; then to Macelab; and then to Tubahab; and so to Thara or Thare: the four and twentieth manfion. Where while Moses rested, the people began that insolent and dangerous mutiny, of Korah, Dathan, and Aviram: who for their contempt of God and his Ministers were fone of them swallowed up alive, and by the earth opening her Mouth devoured, others even two hundred and fifty which offered incense with Korah were consumed with fire from Heaven; and 14700. of their party, which murmured against Moses, stricken dead with a sudden pestilence: one of the greatest marvels and judgements of God, that hath been shewed in all the time of Moses his government, or before. For among so great a multitude, those lay-Men who would have usurped Ecclesiastical authority, were suddenly swallowed up alive into the earth with their families and goods; even while they fought to overthrow the Order, Discipline, and power of the Church, and to make all Men alike therein, rebelliously contending against the High Priest and Magistrate, to whom God had committed the government both of his Church and Common-wealth of his people. And the better to assure the people, and out of his great mercy to confirm them, it pleased him in this place also to approve by miracle the former election of his Servant Aaron, by the twelve rods given in by the Heads of the twelve Tribes; of which Moses received one of every Head and Prince of his Tribe: which being all withered and dry Wands, and on every rod the name of the Prince of the Tribe written, and Aaron's on that of Levi; it pleased God, that the rod of Aaron received by his power a vegetable Spirit, and having lain in the Tabernacle of the Congregation before the Ark one night, had on it both Buds, Blossoms, and ripe Almonds.

From Tharab the whole Army removed to Mefra; and thence to Efmona; and thence to Mefra, (or Mefra after S. Hierome) and from Mefra to Benjamin: and so to Gadgada, which Hierome calleth Gadgada; thence to Tahaba, the thirtieth Manfion; where from certain fountains of water gathered in one, Adrichomus maketh a River, which falleth into the Red Sea, between Madian and Afmon-gaber.

Now although it be very probable, that at Afmon-gaber, where Salomon furnished his Fleets for the East India, there was store of fresh water; and though Herodotus maketh mention of a great River, in Arabia the Story, which he calleth Corys, from whence (saith he) the Inhabitants convey water in pipes of leather to other places, by which device the King of Arabia relieved the Army of Cambyses: yet is Adrichomus greatly deceived, as many times he is, in finding these Springs at Gadgada, or Jetabab; being the nine and twentieth or thirtieth Manfion. For it was at Puzan; that those Springs are spoken of, which in Deut. the 10. v. 7. is also called Jetabab, or Jetabab, a Land of running waters, and which by all probability fall into the River Zared, the next adjoining. And that these Springs should fall into the Red Sea at Afmon-gaber, or Elath, I cannot believe, for the way is very long. And this I find in Belonius, that there are divers Torrents of fresh water in those sandy parts of Arabia: which though they continue their course for a few miles, yet they are drunk up by the hot and thirsty Land, before they can recover the banks of the Red Sea.

From Jetabab, Moses directed his journey towards the Red Sea, and incamped at Hebron; and from thence to Efmon-gaber: which City in Josaphat's time had the name of Beremice; and in Hierome's, Efma. From thence keeping the Sea, and Elath on his right hand, he turned towards the North, as he was by God commanded: Efmon-gaber being the farthest place towards the South-east, that Moses travelled in that passage.

It seemeth that Efmon-gaber or Afmon-gaber, Elath and Madian were not at this time in the possession of the Kings of Edom. For it is said, That the Lord spake unto Moses and Aaron in the Mount Hor, near the Coast of the Land of Edom; so as the Mount Hor was at this time in the South border of Edom. And if Efmon-gaber, and the other places near the Red Sea, had at this present been subject to the Idumians, Moses would also have demanded a free passage through them. It is true, that in the future the Idumians obtained those places: for it is said, And they they arose out of Midian, and came to Paran, and took men with them; which were those companies that followed young Ahad of Idumaea into Egypt, when he fled from Joab. Likewise it is said of Salomon, that he made a Navy of Ships in Efmon-gaber besides Elath, in the Land of Edom.

§. V.

Of Moses's arrival at Zin Kades: and the accidents while they abode there.

From Efmon-gaber he turned again towards the North, and pitched in the Wilderness of Zin, which is Kadef: or in Berith, of the Children of Isaac; where they fare down in the first Month Jazan; where they fare down in the first Month of the fortieth year after they left Egypt. For at the next Manfion Aaron died in the first day of the fifth Month of the fortieth year: the nine and thirtieth year taking end at Efmon-gaber. And at this City of Cades (for so it was thought to be) or near it, died Adrianus, or Mary, Moses's Sister, whose Sepulcher was to be seen in Saint Hierome's time, as himself avoweth. From hence etc they departed to the Mountain Hor, all the people murmured most violently against Moses, by reason of the Scarcity of Water. For neither the punishments by Fire from Heaven; by being devoured and swallowed up by the Earth; by the insidious Pestilence which often seized them; nor any miracle formerly shewing, either the Love or wrath of God, could prevail with these Nations any longer, than while they were full fed and satisfied in every of their appetites: but in stead of seeking for help and relief at Gods hands, when they suffered hunger, thirst, or any other want, they murmured, repined, and rebelled, repenting them of their changed estates, and casting ungratefully on Moses all their misadventures; yea though they well knew that their own Fathers had left their bodies in the Deserts, and that they were now entered into the fortieth year, wherein all their miseries were to take end. And being, as it were, in fight of the Land promised, they again as obstinately tempted God as in former times, and neither trusted his promises, nor feared his indignation. But as the will and purposes of God are without beginning; so his mercies being without end, he commanded Moses to strike a Rock adjoining with his rod; and the waters issued out in a great abundance, with which both themselves and their cattle were refreshed. Nevertheless, because God perceived a kind of diffidence both in Moses and Aaron, at this place: therefore he permitted neither of them to enter the Land promised; whereto perchance their Worldly desires might invite them. But it pleased him to end the travails of Aaron at the Mountain Hor, being the next, and four and thirtieth Station. At which Mountain of Hor, Aaron was depouled of the Garments of his Priest-hood, and the same put on Eleazar his Son, as God had commanded. Which done, Moses and Eleazar descended the Mountain; but God received Aaron on the top thereof, and he was no more seen.

Of this Mountain called Hor, otherwise Mefra, as in Deut. the 10. v. 6. those Horites took name, which the Idumians had formerly vanquished. Some there are which make Mefra, which was the seven and twentieth Manfion; and Mefra which they write Mefra for difference, which was the four and thirtieth Manfion, and is also called Hor, to be two distinct places: because Moses, in passing from Cadesbarn towards Efmon-gaber, incamped at Mefra, after he departed from Hefmona, and before he came to Benjamin. And this Mefra, which is also called Hor, he came unto after he left Cades, where Miriam, Moses's Sister died; the first being the seven and twentieth, and the second being the four and thirtieth Manfion. But for Hor, which is also called Mefra, it should have been written, Hor jasta Mefra; Hor near Mefra: for it is but one root of a Mountain, divided into divers tops, as Sinai and Harib are: whereto the West part Moses calleth Mefra, and the East part Harib. By the West part Moses incamped, as he past towards the Red Sea, on his left hand; by the East part, as he went back again North-wards towards Madab: as in the description of Moses's his passage through Arabia, the Reader may perceive.

Now it was from Cades, before they came to Hor, because Hor belonged to Edom, that Moses sent Messengers to the Prince of Idumaea, praying him that he might pass with the people of Israel through his Territory into the Land of Canaan, which bordered it. For it was the nearest way of all other from the City of Kadef, where Moses then incamped; whereas otherwise taking his journey by the Rivers of Zared, Arnon, and Jordan, he might have run into many hazards in the passage of those Rivers, the far way about, and the many powerful Kings, which commanded in those Regions. Now the better to persuade the Prince of Idumaea hereto, Moses remembered him, that he was of the same race and family with Israel: calling him by the name of Beremice, because both the Edomites and Israelites were the Sons of one Father, to wit, Isaac; insinuating thereby, that he had more reason to favour and respect them, than he had to afflict the Canaanites; against whom Efau his Ancestor (who were of War, and driven out the Horites (who were of their ancient races defended of Cham) out of the Region of Sir, calling it by his own name Edom, or Edumaea. He also making a short repetition of Gods promises bestowed on them, and of his purposes and blessings; assured Edom, or the King thereof, that he would no way offend his people, or wait his Country, but that he would refrain his Army within the bounds of the Common, and Kings high ways, paying money for whatsoever he used, yea even for the water, which themselves or their Cattle should drink. For Moses was commanded by God not to provoke the Children of Edom. But the King of Edumaea knowing the strength of his own Country, the fame being near Canaan, rampard with high and tharp mountains: and with all suspecting, as a natural wife Man, that 600000. strangers being once entered his Country, it would rest in their wills to give him Law, resolutely refused them passage, and delivered this answer to the Messengers: That, if they attempted to enter that way, he would take them to enemie, and resist them by all possible means. And not knowing whether such a denial might satisfy or exasperate, he gathered the strength of his country together, and shewed himself prepared to defend their passage. For as it is written: Then Edom came out against him (to wit, Moses) with much people, and with a mighty power. Whereupon Moses considering, that the end of his enterprise was not the conquest of Sir or Edumaea, and that the Land promised was that of Canaan: like unto himself, who was of a natural understanding the greatest of any Man, and the skillfullest Man of War that the World had, he refused to adventure the Army of Israel against a Nation, which being overcome, gave but a passage to invade others; and which by reason of the seat of their mountainous Country, could not but have endangered, or (at least greatly enfeebled the strength of Israel, and rendered them less able, if not altogether powerless, to have conquered the rest.

§. VI.

Of their compassing Idumæa and travelling to Arnon, the border of Moab.

HE therefore leaving the way of Idumæa, turned himself towards the East, and marched towards the Defarts of Moab. Which when Arad King of the Canaanites understood, and that Moses had blanced the way of Idumæa; and knowing that it was Canaan, and not Edom which Israel aimed at, he thought it safest, rather to find his enemies in his neighbours Country, than to be found by them in his own: which he might have done with a far greater hope of victory, had Moses been enforced first to have made his way by the sword through Idumæa, and thereby, though victorious, greatly have lessened his numbers. But though it fell out otherwise than Arad hoped for, yet being resolved to make trial, what courage the Israelites brought with them out of Egypt, before they came nearer his own home, leading the strength of his Nation to the edge of the Defart, he set upon some part of the Army; which, for the multitude, occupied a great space, and for the many herds of Cattle that they drove with them, could not incamp so near together, but that some quarter or other was ever-more subject to surprise. By which advantage, and in that his attempts were then perchance unexpected, he slew some few of the Israelites, and carried with him many prisoners.

Num. 14.
45.

Now it is very probable, that it was this Canaanite, or his Predecessour, which joyned his forces with the Amalekites, and gave an overthrow to those mutinous Israelites, which without direction from God by Moses would have entred Canaan from Cadibarnæ. For it seemeth that the greatest number of that Army were of the Canaanites, because in the first of Deuter. 44. the Amorites are named along with out the Amalekites, and are said to have beaten the Israelites at that time. And this Arad, who he were the same that had a victory over Israel near Cadibarnæ, or if it were his Predecessour that then prevailed, this Man finding that Moses was returned from the Red Sea, and in his way towards Canaan, and that the South part of Canaan was first to be invaded, and in danger of being conquered, not knowing of Moses's purpose to compass Moab, determined while he was yet in the Defart to try the quarrel. And whereas it followeth in the third verse of the twelfth chapter of Numbers, that the Israelites utterly destroyed the Canaanites and their Cities, they are much mistaken that think, that this destruction was presently performed by the Israelites. But it is to be understood, to have been done in the future, to wit, in the time of Joshua. For had Moses at this time entred Canaan in the pursuit of Arad, he would not have fallen back again into the Defarts of Zin and Moab, and have fetched a wearisome and needless compass, by the Rivers of Zared and Arnon.

Neither is their conjecture to be valued at any thing, which affirm, that Arad did not inhabit any part of Canaan it self, but that his Territory lay without it, and near the Mountain Hor. For Hor and Zin Cades were the South borders of Edom, and not of Canaan. And it was in the South of the Land of Canaan, that Arad dwelt; which South part of Canaan was the North part of Edom.

Again, Horma (for so far the Israelites after their victory pursued the Canaanites) is seated in the South of Judæa. There is also a City of that name in Simeon. But there is no such place to the South of Edom. And were there no other argument, but the Mutiny which followed presently after the repetition of this victory, it were enough to prove, that the fame was obtained in the future, and in Joshua his time, and not at the instant of Arad's assault. For had the Israelites at this time lacked the Cities of Arad, they would not the next day have complained for want of Water and Bread. For where there are great Cities, there is also Water, and Bread, but it was in the time of Joshua, that the Israelites took their revenge, and after they had past Jordan: Joshua then governing them; who in the twelfth Chapter and fourteenth Verse, nameth this Arad by the name of his City so called; and with him the King of Horma: to which place the Israelites pursued the Canaanites. And he nameth them amongst those Kings, which he vanquished and put to death.

Now after this assault and surprize by Arad, Moses finding that all entrance on that side was defended, he led the people Eastward to compass Idumæa and the Dead Sea, and to make his entrance by Arnon and the Plains of Moab, at that time in the possession of the Amorites. But the Israelites, to whom the very name of a Defart was terrible, began again to rebel against their Leader; till God by a multitude of fiery Serpents, (that is, by the biting of Serpents, whose venom inflamed them, and burnt them as fire) made them know their error, and afterward, according to his plentiful grace cured them again by their beholding an artificial Serpent, by his Commandment set up.

From the Mount Hor, Moses leaving the ordinary way which lieth between the Red Sea, and Cadibarnæ, incamped at Zalmana; and thence he removed to Phasnon, where he erected the Brazen Serpent; making these journeys by the edge of Edomæa, but without it. For Phasnon was sometime a principal City of the Edomites. Now where it is written in Numbers 21. Vers. 4. That From Mount Hor they departed by the way of the Red Sea, which grieved the people, it was not thereby meant that the Israelites turned back towards the Red Sea; neither did they march (according to Forficæ) per viam, qua habet à latere mare rubrum; By the way that sided the Red Sea, but indeed they crost, and went athwart the common way from Galaad, Trachonitis, and the Countries of Moab, to the Red Sea, that is, to Esbon-gaber; Elath, and Midian: which way, as it lay North and South, so Israel to thence the Border of Edom, and to take the utmost East part of Moab, crost the common way towards the East, and then they turned again towards the North, as before.

From Phasnon he went to Obeth; where they entred the Territory of Moab, adjoining to the Land of Suph, a country bordering on the Dead Sea; and from

from thence to Arnon, the eight and thirtieth Manfion; that is, where the Mountains so called take beginning, and are as yet but small Mountures of Hills, on the East Border of Moab; From whence they recovered Dibon Gad, or the River of Zared, which riseth in the Mountains of Arabia, and runneth towards the Dead Sea, not far from Petra the Metropolis thereof, being the nine and thirtieth Station. And having past that River, they lodged at Dibon Gad, and from thence they kept the way to Diblahaim, one of the Cities of Moab; which Jeremy the Prophet Chap. 48. Vers. 22. calleth the House of Diblahaim, the same which afterward was destroyed among the rest by Nabuchadnezzar. From thence they came to the River of Arnon, and incamped in the Mountains of Arnon: though in the 22. of Numbers, Moses doth not remember Hel-mendiblahaim, but speaketh of his remove from the River of Zared, immediately to the other side of Arnon; calling Arnon the Border of Moab, between them and the Amorites: speaking as he found the state of the Country at that time. For Arnon was not anciently the Border of Moab, but was lately conquered from the Moabites; by Sehon, King of the Amorites: even from the Predecessour of Balac Poor then reigning. From Diblahaim, Moses sent Messengers to Sehon, King of the Amorites, to desire a Passage through his Country: which though he knew would be denied him, yet he desired to give a Reason to the Neighbour Nations, of the War he undertook. And though Edom had refused him as Sehon did, yet he had no Warrant from God to enforce him. Moses also in sending Messengers to Sehon observed the fame Precept, which he left to his Posterity, and Successors, for a Law of the War, namely in Dent. 20. Vers. 10. in these words, When thou comest near unto a City to fight against it, open shall offer it Peace, which if it do accept of, and open unto thee, then let all the People found therein be Tributaries unto thee, and serve thee, but if it refuse, &c. then shall smite all the Males thereof with the edge of the Sword. Which Ordinance all Commanders of Armies have observed to this day, or ought to have done.

§. VII.

Of the Book of the Battels of the Lord, mentioned in this Story, and of other Books mentioned in Scripture which are lost.

Num. 21.
vers. 14.

NOW concerning the War between Israel and Sehon, Moses seemeth to refer a great part of this Story to that Book entituled, Liber bellorum Domini; The Book of God's Battels; and therefore plentifully over many Encounters; and other things memorable, with greater brevity in this place. His words after the Geneva Translation are these: Wherefore it shall be spoken in the Book of the Battels of the Lord, what things he did in the Red Sea, and in the Rivers of Arnon. The Vulgar Copy differeth not in sense from this: But the Greek Septuagint vary. For the Greek writes it to this effect, For thus it is said in the Book: the War of the Lord hath burnt (or is inflamed) Zoob, and the Brooks of Arnon. Junius for the Red Sea, which is in the Geneva and Vulgar Edition, names the Region of contra Valsabem in Regione Suph: & contra flumina, flumina Arnonis; Therefore it is spoken in repeating of the Battels of Jehovah, against Vahab in the Country of Suph: and against the Rivers, the Rivers of Arnon. In which words he underlands, that amongst the Wars which the Lord disposed for the good of the Israelites, there was in those times a famous Memory in the mouth of most Men, concerning the War of Sehon against Vahab the King of the Moabites, and of his winning the Country near Arnon, out of the possession of the Moabites. For that Vahab was the immediate Predecessor of Balac, who lived with Moses: though it be written that this Balac was the Son of Zippor, and not of Vahab. For it seems (as it is plain in the Succession of the Edomites) that these Kingdoms were Elective and not Successive. And as Junius in this Translation understandeth no special Book of the Battels of the Lord: so others, as Valsab in his Annotations, doubt whether in this place any special Book be meant; and if any; whether it be not a Prediction of Wars in future Ages, to be waged in these places, and to be written in the Book of Judges. Siracides cap. 46. tells us plainly, that those Battels of the Lord were fought by Joshua. Who was there (saith he) before him like to him? for he fought the Battels of the Lord. But seeing the Historicks of the Scripture elsewhere often pass over matters of great weight in few words, referring the Reader to other Books, written of the same matter at large: therefore it seemeth probable, that such a Book as this there was; wherein the several Victories by Israel obtained, and also Victories of other Kings, making way for the good of the Israelites, were particularly and largely written. And that the fame should now be wanting, it is not strange, seeing so many other Volumes, filled with Divine Discourse, have perished in the long race of time, or have been destroyed by the ignorant and malicious Heathen Magistrate. For the Books of Henoch, howsoever they have been in later Ages corrupted, and therefore now suspected, are remembered in an Epistle of Thaddæus, and cited by Origen myi asyriis, and by Terullian.

That Work also of the Patriarch Abraham, of Formations, which others bellow on Rabbi Achiba, is no where found. The Books remember by Joshua, chap. 10. vers. 13. and in the second of Samuel, chap. 1. vers. 18. called the Book of Jasher, or Jasherim, is also lost; wherein the stay of the Sun and Moon in the middle of the Heavens is recorded, and how they stood still, till Israel had avenged themselves of their Enemies: out of which also David took the Precept of teaching the Children of Judah, to exercise their Bows against their Enemies.

Some think this to be the Book of eternal Predestination, in which the just are written, according to the 69. Psalm, vers. 28. where it is said, Let them be put out of the Book of Life, neither let them be written with the Righteous. Hierom thinks, that David by this Book understood those of Samuel; quæ sunt libri Regum. Rabbi Salomon, that the Books of the Law are thereby meant, in which the acts of the just Abraham, of Isaac, Jacob, and Moses, are written; others, that it was the Book of Exodus; others, as Theodoretus, that it was a Commentary upon Joshua by an unknown Author.

The Book of Chozai, concerning Manasse, remembered in the second of Chron. 33. vers. 18. & 19. Of this Book, also lost, Hierom conceives that the Prophet Isay was the Author.

The lame mischance came as well to the Story of Salomon, written by Abia Sionites, who met with Jeroboam, and foretold him of his obtaining the Kingdom of Israel from the Son of Salomon.

It was in exact in Parallels.

Also that Book of Salomon which the Hebrews write Hafscrim, of 3000. verses, of which that part called Canticum Canticorum only remaineth, 1 Kings 4. 32. and with this divers other of Salomon's works have perished, as his Book of the Natures of Trees, Plants, Beasts, Fishes, &c. 1 Kings 4. 33. with the rest remembered by Origenes, Josephus, Hierom, Codexms, Ciccu, Asculanus, Picus, Mirandula, and others.

Of these and other Books many were consumed with the same fire, wherewith Nebuchadnessar burnt the Temple of Jerusalem. But let us return thither where we left.

§. VIII.

Of Moses his sparing the Iffue of Lot: and of the Giants in those parts: And of Sehon and Og.

WHEN Moses had past Arnon, he incamped on the other side thereof at Abarim, opposite to the City of Nebo, leaving the City of Midian on his left hand, and attempting nothing upon the Moabites on that side. For Moab did at this time inhabit on the South side of Arnon, having lost all his ancient and best Territory, which was now in the possession of Sehon the Amorite. For Moses was commanded by God not to molest Moab, neither to provoke them to Battle, God having given that Land to the Children of Lot; The same which was anciently possessed by the Emims, who were Men of great Stature, and comparable to those Giants called Anakims, or the Sons of Anac.

God also commanded Moses to spare the Ammonites, because they likewise were descended of Lot: Who had expelled from thence those Giants, which the Ammonites called Zamzummims. For it seemeth that all that part, especially to the East of Jordan, even to the Desert of Arabia, as well on the West, as on the East side of the Mountains of Gilead, were inhabited by Giants. And in the plantation of the Land promised, the Israelites did not at any time pass those Mountains to the East of Jerusalem, but left their Country to them, as in the Description following is made manifest. We find also, that as there were many Giants both before and after the Flood: So these Nations, which anciently inhabited both the Border of Canaan, and the Land it self, had among them many Families of Giant-like men. For the Anakims dwelt in Hebron, which sometimes was called the City of Araba, which Abrah in Isaiah is called the Father of the Anakims; and the greatest Man of the Anakims. There had also been Giants in the Land of the Moabites, called Emims: And their chief City was Aror or Ar, near the River of Arnon. To the Giants of the Rephaims, the Ammonites gave the name of Zamzummims; which were of the same ancient Canaanites: And their chief City was Rubba, afterward Philadelphia. They were also called Zimzims, which is as much to say, as Viri robusti, horrendique Gigantes, Strong Men, and fearful Giants, who inhabited other Cities of Ham, or Hom, in the same Province, and not far to the North of Aror.

Now Moses having past Arnon, and being incamped at Abarim; and having (as before) past to Sehon, as he had done to Edom, to pray a pe-face through his Country, was denied it. For Sehon being made proud by his former Conquest upon Yabeh the Moabite, which Nation the Amorites esteemed but as Strangers and Murders, (themselves being of the Sons of Canaan, and the Moabites of Lot) refused to grant Israel any entrance that way; and withal prepared to encounter Moses with as much speed as he could, because Moses incamped in the Country of his new Conquests, to wit, the Plains of Moab: the two and fortieth and last Manion: Which Moses waited with the multitude of his People and Cattle. Towards him therefore halting himself, they encountered each other at Yabeh: Where Sehon with his Children and People were broken and discomfited: And the Victory was pursued by Moses, as few or none of the Amorites escaped. He also slaughtered all the Women and Children of the Amorites, which he found in Effehon, and all the other Cities, Villages, or Fields; they being of the Race of Canaan, as those of Bala were: and defended of Emereus or Amoreus: For Moses calleth the Be-Dia. 1. 8. Senites also Amorites. And although Israel might now have taken a ready way and passage into Jordan, being at this time, and after this Victory at the Banks of Jordan: yet knew it to be perilous to leave so great a part of that Nation of the Amorites on his Back, as inhabited all the Region of Bala or Tracenis: and therefore he led on his Army to invade Og: a person of exceeding strength and Stature: and the only Man of mark remaining of the ancient Giants of those parts, and who at that time had 60. Cities walled and defended: lying between the Mountain of Hermom (which Mountain Moses, the Sidomians call Scriam, and the Amorites Senir) and the River of Jordan. And it befell unto the King of Bala (who attended Moses's coming at Edrei) as it did unto Sibon: for he and his Sons perished, and all his Cities were taken and possessed. After this Moses withdrawing himself back again to the Mountains of Arnon, left the prosecution of that War unto Jair the Son of Manasse: who conquering the East parts of Bala, to wit, the Kingdom of Argab, even unto the Nations of the Gessiri and Macbezi, 60. walled Cities: called the same after his own name Hadad Jair: of all which Conquests afterward the half Tribe of Manasse possessed the North part as far as Edrei, but the East part that belonged to Sibon the Amorite, with the Mountains of Gilead adjoining, was given to Ruben and Gad.

Of the troubles about the Madianites, and of Moses his death.

AFTER these Victories, and while Israel sojourned in the Valley of Moab, the Madianites and Moabites (over both which Nations it seemeth that Bala King of the Moabites then commanded in chief) fought, according to the advice of Balaam, both by alluring the Hebrews to the love of their Daughters, and by persuading them to honour and serve their Idols, to divide them both in Love and Religion among themselves: thereby the better both to defend their own interest against them, as also to beat them out of Moab, and the Countries adjoining. The Israelites as they had ever been inclined, so were they now easily perverted to these evil courses, and thereby drew on themselves the plague of Pe-
Num. 25. silence, whereof there perished 24000. persons: besides which punishment of God the most of the Offenders among the Hebrews, were by his com-commandment put to the Sword, or other violent deaths: after this, when that Phineas the Son of Eliazar had pierced the bodies of Zimri, a Prince of the Simeonites, together with Cobi a Daughter of one of the chief of the Madianites, the Plague ceased, and Gods Wrath was appeased. For such was the love and kindness of his all-powerfulness, respecting the ardent zeal of Phineas in prosecuting of Zimri (who being a chief among the Hebrews became an Idolater) as he forgave the rest of Israel, and raised his hand for his sake.

In this Valley it was that Moses caused the people to be numbered the third time: and there remained of able Men fit to bear Arms, 601730. of which as his last enterprise, he appointed 12000. to be chosen out, to invade the Cities of Midian, who together with the Moabites practised with Balaam to curse Israel: and after that fought to allure them (as before remembered) from the worship of the true God, to the service of Beth-Peor: and to the rest of their barbarous Idolatry. Over which Companies of 12000 Moses gave the charge to Phineas, the Son of Eliazar the high Priest: who drew the five Princes of the Midianites, which were, or had lately been, the Vassals of Sehon, as appeareth by Isaiah. These five Princes of the Midianites slain by Eliazar were at this time but the Vassals of Sehon the Amorite, to wit, Evi, Rekem, Zur, Elor, and Reba the Dukes of Sehon, slain by Isaiah. He slew also all the Men, Male-children, and Women: saving such as had not yet used the company of Men, but those they saved and dispersed them among the Children of Israel to serve them.

And Moses having now lived 120. years, making both his own weakness of Body known to the People, and his inability to travel: And also that he was forewarned of his end by the spirit of God: from whom he received a new Commandment to ascend the Mountains of Ararim, and thereon to render up his Life: He halsted to settle the Government in Isaiah: whom he periwaded with most lively arguments to prosecute the Conquest begun, alluring him of Gods favour and assistance therein. And so having spent these his latter days after the Conquest of Og and Sehon, King of the Amorites, in the repetition and exposition of the Law (or an iteration of the Law, according to Augustinus) using both arguments, prayers, and threats unto the people: which he often repeated unto them; thereby to confirm them in knowledge, Love, Fear, and Service, of the all-powerful God: He blessed the twelve Tribes, that of Simeon excepted, with several most comfortable Blessings: Praising the Meekness and Goodness of him: He also commanded the Priests to lay up the Book of the Law, by the side of the Ark of God: The last that he intided was that Prophetical Song, beginning: Hearken ye Heavens and I will speak, and let the Earth hear the word of my mouth: and being called by God from the labours and sorrows of this Life, unto that rest which never afterward hath disquiet, he was buried in the Land of Moab, over against Beth-Peor: but no Man knoweth of his Sepulchre to this day, which happened in the year of the World 2554.

§. X.

Observations out of the Story of Moses, how God disposeth both the smallest occasions, and the greatest references, to the effecting of his purpose.

NOW let us a little, for instruction, look back to the occasions of fondry of the great events, which have been mentioned in this Story of the life of Moses, for (excepting Gods miracles, his promise, and fore choice of this People) he wrought in all things else by the medium of Mens affections, and natural appetites. And so we shall find that the fear which Pharaoh had of the increase of the Hebrews, multiplied by God to exceeding great numbers, was the next natural cause of the sorrows and loss, which befel himself, and the Egyptian Nation: which numbers when he fought by cruel and ungodly policies to cut off and lessen, as when he commanded all the Male-children of the Hebrews to be slain, God (whose providence cannot be refuted, nor his purposes prevented by all the foolish and salvage craft of mortal Men) moved compassion in the heart of Pharaoh's own Daughter, to preserve that Child, which afterward became the most wife, and of all Men the most gentle and mild, the most excellently Learned in all Divine and Humane knowledge, to be the Conductor and deliverer of his oppressed Brethren; and the overthrow of Pharaoh, and all the flower of his Nation; even then, when he fought by the strength of his Men of War, of his Horse and Chariots, to tread them under and bury them in the dust. The grief which Moses conceived of the injuries, and of the violence offered to one of the Hebrews in his own presence, moved him to take revenge of the Egyptian that offered it: the ingratitude of one of his own Nation, by threatening him to discover the slaughter of the Egyptian, moved him to fly into Madian: the contention between the Shepherds of that place, and Jethro's Daughters, made him known to their Father: who not only entertained him, but married him to one of those Sisters: and in that solitary life of keeping of his Father-in-law's Sheep, far from the press of the World, contenting himself (though bred as a Kings Son) with the lot of a poor Herds-man, God found him out in that Desert, wherein he first suffered him to live many years, the better to know the ways and passages through which he purposed that he should conduct his people, toward the Land promised: and therein appearing unto him, he made him know his Will and Divine Pleasure for his return into Egypt. The like may be said of all things else, which Moses afterward by Gods direction performed in the Story of Israel before remembered. There is not therefore the smallest accident, which may seem unto Men as falling out by chance, and of no consequence: but that the same is caused by God to effect somewhat else by: yea, and oftentimes to effect things of the greatest worldly importance, either presently, or in many years after, when the occasions are either not considered, or forgotten.

CHAP. VI.

Of the Nations with whom the Israelites had dealing after their coming out of Egypt; and of the Men of renown in other Nations, about the times of Moses and Joshua, with the sum of the History of Joshua.

§. I.

How the Nations with whom the Israelites were to have War, were divers ways, as it were, prepared to be their Enemies.

IN like manner if we look to the quality of the Nations, with whom the Israelites, after their coming out of Egypt, had to do, either in the Wilderness, or afterward: we shall find them long before hand, by the disposing providence of God, as it were prepared for enmity: partly in respect that they were most of them of the issue of Canaan, or at least of Ham: and the rest (as the Edomites, Moabites, Ammonites, and Ishmaelites) were mingled with them by mutual Marriages: whereas the Israelites still continued Strangers, and separate from them: and so partly in this respect, and partly by ancient injuries or enmities, and partly by reason of diversity in Religion, were these Nations, as it were prepared to be enemies to the Israelites: and so to serve for such purposes as God had reserved them for. To make these things more manifest, we must understand that this part of Syria, bounded by the Mountains of Libanus, and Zidon on the North, by the same Mountains continued as far as the Springs of Amman on the East: by the way of Egypt, and the Red Sea on the South: and by the Mediterranean Sea on the West: was inhabited and peopled by two Nations, the one springing from the Sons of Cham, the other from Sem: But those of Sem, were but as Strangers therein for a long time, and came thither in effect but with * one Family, to wit, that of Abraham, and a few of his kindred. The other for the greatest part were the Canaanites, the ancient Lords and Possessors of those Territories: By process of time divided into several Families and Names: whereof some of them were of eminent Stature and Strength, as the Amukins, Zuzammites, or Zuzas, Emmites, Horites, and others. These (as Men most valiant and able commonly do) did inhabit the utter Borders and Mountains of their Countries: the rest were the Jebusites, Jebusites, Amorites, Hevites, Hetites, and others, who took name after the Sons of Canaan, and after whom the Country in general was still called.

As for the Hevites which descended of Shem by Abraham, they were of another Family, and Strangers in that Country: especially the Ishmaelites, and this was some cause that the Canaanites did not affect them, or induce them: no more than the Philistines did, who descended also of Cham by Mizraim. For though Abraham himself being a Stranger was highly esteemed and honoured among them: especially by the Amorites inhabiting the West part of Jordan: yet now even they which descended from Abraham, or from his Kindred, abode and multiplied in those parts, were alienated in affections from the Israelites: as holding them Strangers and Intruders: making more account of their alliance with the Canaanites, and the rest of the Issue of Cham, with whom they daily contracted affinity: than of their old pedigree from Abraham.

True it is that these Nations descended of A. Dea. 111. brabam, or of his Kindred, who had defended themselves and matched with the Canaanites and others, had so far posset themselves of the borders of those Regions, as they began to be equal in strength to the bordering Canaanites, if not superior. For of Lot came those two great families of the Moabites, and Ammonites: of Esau the Edumians: of Madian the Madianites: of Ismael, the eldest Son of Abraham came the Ishmaelites, with whom are joyed as of the same Nation, the Amalekites, whom though the more common opinion thinketh to have been a tribe of Edom, because Esau had a Grand-child of that name, yet manifest reason convinceth it to have been otherwise. For the Ishmaelites were forbidden to provoke the Edomites, or do Gen. 25. them any wrong, whereas contrariwise Amalek was cursed, and endless War decreed against him: but hence more elsewhere. Chap. 8. §. 1. Of Ismael's kindred. Son Naboth sprung the Arabians of Petra, 17. v. 18. called Nabathes. Now even as Abraham bequeathed Gen. 17. God to bless Ismael, so it pleased him both to promise and perform it. For of him those twelve Princes came, which inhabited, in effect, all that Tract of Land between Hezilah upon Tigris, and Ser which is the West part of the Desert of Arabia Petraea. Yet howsoever the strength of these later named Nations, which descended from Abraham, were great; yet it is not unlikely but that some reason which moved them not to favour the entrance of the Ishmaelites into Canaan, was in respect of fear: because all Princes and States do not willingly permit any Stranger or powerful Nation to enter their Territories. Wherefore, though all these Families before named, were not so united, and in among themselves, but that they had their jealousies of each other, and contended for Dominion: yet fearing a third more strong than themselves, whether they stood apart or united, they were taught by the care of their own preservation, to join themselves together against Israel: though they did it nothing so maliciously and resolutely as the Canaanites did. For the Edumians only denied the Hebrews a passage: which the Moabites durst not deny: because their Country lay more open; and because themselves had lately been beaten out of the richest part of their Dominions, by the Amorites: and as for the Ammonites their Country lay altogether out of the way, and the strength of Sehon and Og Kings of the Amorites, was interjacent: and besides that, the border of the Ammonites was strong by reason of the Mountains which divided it from Basan. Again, that which moved the Moabites in their own reason not much to interrupt Israel, in the Conquest of Sehon the Amorite, and of Og his Confederate: was that the Moabites might hope after such time as the Amorites were beaten by Moses, that themselves might recover again their own inheritance: to wit, the Vallies and Plains lying between the Mountains of Arabia and Jordan: But as soon as Sehon was slain, slain, and that the King of Moab, Balac, perceived that Moses allotted that Valley to the Tribes of Gad and Reuben, he began to practise with Balac, against Israel, and by the Daughters of Moab, as aforesaid, to allure them to Idolatry. And thus at length the Moabites by special occasion were more and more stirred up to enmity against Israel. And as for divers of the rest that were descended from Abraham's Kindred, we may note, how in the beginning, between the Authors of their Pedigrees, God permitted some enmity to be as it were prelates of future Quarrels, which in the Posterity might be the easier incited by the memory of old Grudges: and withal by some disdain from the elder in Nature to the younger. For the Ishmaelites being descended from the eldest Son of Abraham, and the Edomites from the eldest Son of Isaac, Jacob being but a second Son of a second Brother, those Princes which were descended of the elder Houses being natural Men, might scorn to give place, much less to subject themselves to their Inferiours; as they took it; and for a more aggravation, the Issues of Esau, Princes of Edom, might keep in Record that their Parent was bought out of his Birthright by Jacob's taking his advantage, and that he was deceived of his Father's Blessing also by him; and that Jacob after Reconciliation came not unto him, as he promised, unto Seir, or Edom.

So also in the Posterity of Ismael, it might remain as a feed, or pretence of enmity, that their forefather was by the intigitation of Sarah, cast out into the Desert, with his Mother Hagar; and had therein perished, but that it pleased God by his Angel to relieve them. Ismael also had an Egyptian both to his Mother and to his Wife: and Amalek was also an Horite by his Mother; which Horites were of the ancient Canaanites. The Edumians also, or Edomites, were by their maternal line descended of the Canaanites. For Esau took two Wives of that Nation: one of them was Adah the Daughter of Elan the Hittite, and the other Abihahab the Grandchild of Zibeon the Hevite, Lord of Seir, before his name was conquered by Esau, and called after his name Edom, or Edumna.

Lafly; It appears that all those Families of the Ishmaelites, Amalekites, Moabites, Ammonites, Edomites, &c. were in process of time corrupted, and drawn from the Knowledge and Worship of God, and became Idolaters, infected and seduced by the conversation of those People among whom they dwelt, and by those Wives of the Canaanites which they had married: only a few of the Kenites, and those Midianites which inhabited on the edge of the Red Sea, whereof Jehro was Priest, or Prince, or both, worshipped the true and ever-living God.

§ II.

Of the Kings of the Canaanites and Midianites, mentioned in the ancient Wars of the Israelites.

OF the Kings of the Canaanites, descended of Cham, (for Melchizedek may be thought to be of a better Pedegree) we find four named by Moses; and thirty one remembered by Joshua, the few of these named, otherwise than by the Cities over which they commanded; to which each of them had a small Territory adjoining, and no other Dominion. These Canaanites in a general consideration are to be understood for all those Nations, descended of Cham by Canaan, as the Hittites, Jebusites, Amorites, Gergesites, Hevites, &c. and so here we understand this Name in speaking of the Kings of the Canaanites: and so also we call the Country of their Habitation, the holy Land, or the Land of Promise: for God hath appointed that the seven principal Families should be rooted out: and that his own People should inherit their Lands and Cities. But if we consider of the Name and Nation in particular, then is their proper Habitation bounded by Jordan on the East; and by the Mediterranean Sea on the West: in which narrow Country, and in the choicest places thereof, those Canaanites which held their Paternal Name, chiefly inhabited.

The first King of these Nations, named in the Scriptures, was Hamor, or Hemor, of the Hevites, Gen. 34. whom Simeon and Levi slew, together with his Son Schem, in revenge of their Sister's Ravishment. And was the second King which the Scriptures have remembered, who had that part of Canaan towards the South, neighbouring Edom and the dead Sea; the same which surprized Israel, as they encamped in the Wilderness in the edge of Edom. Num. 21. 22.

The third named, was Sehon, King of Efebon, who before Moses' arrival had beaten the Moabites out of the West part of Arabia Petraea, or Nabathes, and thrust them over Ammon into the Deserts, the same whom Moses overthrow in the Plains of Moab; at which time he took Efebon, and all the Cities of the Amorites.

Presently after which Victory, Og was also slain by Israel, who commanded the North part of that Valley between the Mountains Trachon, or Golan, and Jordan, who was also a King of the Amorites.

The fifth was Admidelek, King of the Jebusites, and of Hierusalem, with whom Joshua nameth four other Kings.

Hobab, King of Hebron. Piram, King of Jarmuth. Jephia, King of Lachis: and Deber, King of Eglon: who were all Amorites, Jer. 10. overthrow in Battle, and hanged by Joshua. After this overthrow, Joshua nameth Jabin, King of the Hittites, and Jehob, King of Madon; whom he also slaughtered, and took his Cities: and this Jabin seemed to have some Dominion over the rest, for it is said in the Text, For Hazor before times was the Head of all those Kingdoms.

After these Admidelek that notorious Tyrant is named; who confesseth that he had cut off the thumbs of the hands, and feet of 70 Kings, inflicting them to gather crumbs under his Table: who after Jada and Simeon had used the same execution upon himself, acknowledged it to be a just revenge of God: This King was carried to Hierusalem, where he died.

The last King named is Jabin the second; who as it seemeth had rebuilt Hazor, burnt by Joshua. For at such time as he employed Sisara against Israel, whom he oppressed twenty years, after the death of Ehud, he inhabited Hazor. This Jabin Barac (encouraged by Deborah) overthrow; and his Captain Sisara had by Jael, the Wife of Heber the Kenite, a Nail driven into his head while he slept in her Tent; Jabin himself perishing afterwards in that War.

The Midianites had also their Kings at times, but commonly mixt with the Moabites; and they held a corner of Land in Nabathes, to the South-East of the Dead Sea. They descended from Madian, Abraham's Son by Cetura. Reguel, sumamed Gergesites or Jethites, faith Joshua, called Jehro in Exodus, Kenie in the first of Judges, the Son of Dathan, the Grand-Child of Jethar, the Jokham, the great Grand-Child of Abraham by Ceturah, was Priest or Prince of the Madianites to the Red Sea, whose Daughter or Nece Moses married; and of whom I have spoken elsewhere more at large. This Jethro, if he were not the same with Hobab, must be his Father: and this Hobab had seven Daughters. He guided Moses in the Wilderness, and became one of the Israelites: of him defended the Kenites, so called of his Father Raguel (surname, of which Kenites was Heber, which had Peace with Jabin the second, even now remembered.

At Jochtime as Saul invaded the Amalekites, he knowing the good Affection of the Kenites to Israel, gave them warning to separate themselves: and yet the Kenites had strong Seats, and lived in the Mountains of the Deserts.

The Kings of the Canaanites, and Madianites, and the Amalekites, as many as I find named were these.

1. Hemor the Hérite of Sichem.
2. Arad of the South parts.
3. Sehon of Effebon.
4. Of of Basan.
5. Admizelek the Jebusite, King of Hierusalem.
6. Hobab of Hebron.
7. Piraim of Jethurim.
8. Jafin of Lachis.
9. Debir of Eglon.
10. Jabin of Hader.
11. Jokab of Medim.
12. Admizelek of Bezek, and
13. Jabin the second King of Hazor.

Of the MADIANITES these.

* Eoi, or Eoi:
Regem or Reem, who built Petra, the Metropolis of Parra, is called by the Greeks: and by one time Eiy cap. 16. ver. 1. and Sela, which is as much as King of Petra: and so also it is called 2 Reg. 14. 7. where it is also called Jokhebel.

Zur, Hur, and Reth, Orab,
Zeb, Zebab, Salmanna.

After the Death of Barac, Jude of Israel, the four last named of these Madianite Kings, vexed like Israel seven Years: till they being put to flight by Gideon, two of them, to wit, Orab and Zeb, were taken and slain by the Ephraimites, at the passage of Jordan, as in the 6th, 7th, and 8th of Judges it is written at large. Afterwards in the pursuit of the rest, Gideon himself laid hands upon Zebab and Salmanna, or Salmanna, and executed them, being Prisoners; in which expedition of Gideon there perished 420000 of the Madianites, and their Confederates. Of the Idumeans, Moabites, and Ammonites, I will speak hereafter in the description of their Territories.

§. III.

Of the Amalekites and Ismaelites.

OF the Kings of the Amalekites, and Ismaelites, I find few that are named; and tho' of the Ismaelites there were more in number than of the rest (for they were multiplied into a greater Nation, according to the Promise of God made unto Abraham) yet the Amalekites, Gen. 17. 20. who together with the Madianites, were numbered among them, were more renowned in Moses's time than the rest of the Ismaelites. So also were they when Saul governed Israel. For Saul pursued them from Sin unto Havilah, to wit, over a great part of Arabia Petraea, and the Desert. The reason to me seemeth to be this: That the twelve Princes which came of Ismael, were content to leave those barren Deserts of Arabia Petraea, called Shur, Paran, and Sin, to the Issue of Abraham by Ceturah, that joyed with them (for so seem the Amalekites to have been, and so were the Madianites;) themselves taking possession of a better Soil in Arabia the happy, and about the Mountains of Galaad in Arabia Petraea. For Nabab, the eldest of those twelve Princes, planted that part of Arabia Petraea, which was very fruitful, though adjoining to the Desert, in which Moses wandered, afterwards called Nabab: the same which neigboureth Judaea on the East side. They also peopled a Province in Arabia the happy, whereof the People were in after-times called Nababites, (b) changed into (p).

Kedar, the second of Ismael's Sons, gave his own Name to the East part of Basan, or Basana, which was afterwards possed by Manasseh, so much thereof as lay within the Mountains Tracora, or Gilead. Which Nation Laupridum calleth Kedar, and Pliny Cedreus.

Adabel sat down in the Desert Arabia, near the Mountains which divided it from the Happy; and gave Name to the Adabens, which Pliny calleth Adabens.

Misban was the Parent of the Mafanathites, near the Mountain Zamath, in the same Arabia the Happy.

The Raabens were of Misban: who joyed to the Orchens, near the Arabian Gulf, where Prothius setteth Zugma.

Of Duma were the Dumeans, between the Adabens and Raabens: where the City Dumath sometimes stood.

Of Massa the Massani; and of Hader, or Chadar, the Athrites, who bordered the Nababians in the same Happy Arabia.

Thema begat the Themaneans, among the Arabian Mountains, where also the City of Thema is seated.

Of Jether the Israens, or Chamaebens; of whom Tobu was King in David's time.

Of Naphra, the Nabrian Arabians; inhabiting Phila, 16. Syria Zoba: over whom Abdaster commanded, c. 22. while David ruled Israel.

Cadma, the last and twelfth of Ismael's Sons, was the Ancestor of the Cadmaeans; who were afterwards called Alfa, because they worshipped the Fire with the Babylonians.

The Amalekites gave their Kings the Name of Agas, as the Egyptians the Name of Pharaoh to theirs, and the ancient Syrians Adad to theirs, and the Arabians, Nababians, Arreus, as Names of Honour.

The Amalekites were the first that fought with Moses, after he past the Red Sea; when of all times they flourished most, and yet were vanquished.

Afterward they joyed with the Canaanites, and beat the Israelites near Cades-borne. After the Government of Orthon, they joyed them with the Moabites; after Barac with the Madianites, and invaded Israel. God commanded that as soon as Israel had Rest, they should root out the Name of the Amalekites; which Saul executed cut in part, when he waited them from the border of Egypt, to the border of Chaldea: from Havilah to Shur.

In David's time they took Ziklag in Simoon: but David followed them, and surprized them, recovering his Prisoners and Spoils. And yet, after David became King, they again vexed him, but to their own loss.

In Hachabab time as many of them as joyed to Edumae, were waited and displyanted by the Children of Simoon.

§. IV.

Of the Institution of Civility in Europe about these times, and of Prometheus and Atlas.

There lived at this time, and in the same Age together with Moses, many Men exceeding famous, as well in bodily Strength, as in all sorts of Learning. And as the World was but even now enriched with the written Law of the living God, so did Art and Civility (bred and fostered far off in the East, and in Egypt) begin at this time to discover a Passage into Europe, and into those parts of Greece, neighbouring Asia and those parts of Armenia, besides his bodily strength, he was chosen King of Armenia, because he taught those People to erect them simple Cottages, to defend them from Rain and Storm: and learned them what to make a kind of Meal, and Bread of Acorus, who before lived for the most part, by Herbs and Roots: we may thereby judge how poor and wretched those times were, and how silly those Nations have vaunted of that their Antiquities, accompanied not only with civil Learning, but with all other kinds of Knowledge. And it was in this Age of the World, as both

Ag. 1. 18. Eschylus and St. Augustine have observed, that Prometheus flourished: Quem propterea sermo de ingenio tribuitur hominibus, quia opinus sapientie Doctor fuisse probatur; Of whom it is reported that he formed Men out of Clay, because he was an excellent Teacher of Wisdom: and so Theophrastus expoundeth the invention of Fire ascribed to Prometheus.

Of this Man's Knowledge Eschylus gives this Testimony.

Eschyl. in Prometheus. Ag. agebant omnia. Ut fors forebat: donec ipse repert

Signorum obitus, ortusque qui moribus sunt uiles: & multitudinem artium. His repert: compere inde literas; Martemque. Majorem aucti-ego memoriam Perseuile cunctis, &c.

But Fortune govern'd all their Works, till when I first found out how Stars did set and rise: A profitable Art to mortal Men: And others of like use I did devise: As Letters to compose in leasned wife I first did teach: and first did amplify The Mother of the Moses Memory.

Africans makes Prometheus far more ancient, and but 94 Years after Ogyges. Porphyry says, c. 3. de Civ. that he lived at once with Imachus, who lived with En. Di. 11. 11.

There lived also at once with Moses, that famous Atlas, Brother to Prometheus, both being the Sons of Japetus, of whom though it be said, that they were born before Moses's days, and therefore are by others esteemed of a more ancient date: yet the advantage of their long Lives gave them a part of other Ages among Men, which came into the World long after them. Besides these Sons of Japetus: Eschylus finds two other, to wit, Ocepus, and Hesperus, who being famous in the West, gave name to the Evening, and so to the Evening-Star. Also besides this Atlas of Lybia or Mauritania, there were others, which bare the same Name: but of the Lybian, and the Brother of Prometheus, it was that those Mountains which cross Africa, to the South of Morocco, Sus, and Hes, with the Sea adjoining took name, which Memory Plato in Critias beflowes on Atlas, the Son of Nephele.

Cicero in the fifth of his Tusculan Questions, affirmeth, that all things written of Prometheus and Atlas, were but by those names to express Divine Knowledge. Nec veri Atlas sustinet Caelum, nor Prometheus affixus Caucasus, nec stellatus Cepheus cum Oxore traderetur, nisi divina cognitio nomen eorum ad errorem fabule tradidisset: Neither should Atlas be said to bear up Heaven, nor Prometheus to be fastened to Caucasus, nor Cepheus with his Wife to be stelled, unless their divine Knowledge had raised upon their Names these erroneous Fables.

Orpheus sometime exprest Time by Prometheus, sometime he took him for Saturn; as Rhee conjunct Atlas Prometheus. But that the Story of Prometheus was not altogether a Fiction; and that he lived about this time, the most approved Historians and Antiquaries, and among them Eschylus and St. Augustine have not doubted. For the great Eschylus Judgment which Atlas had in Astronomy, faith St. Augustine, were his Daughters called by the Names of Confiteles, Pisides, and Ephides: Others attribute unto him the finding out of the Moon's Course, of which Archias the Son of Orchomenus challengeth the Invention. Of this Archias, Archias in Peloponnesus took Name, and therefore did the Archadians vaunt that they were more ancient than the Moon. Et Luna gens prior illa fuit: which is to be understood, faith Atlas Comes, before there had been any observation of the Moon's Course; or of her working in inferior Bodies. And though there be that beflow the finding out thereof upon Endymion: others (as Xenagoras) on Typhon: yet Isaacus Terentius, a curious searcher of Antiquities, gave it Atlas of Lybia: who, besides his gifts of Mind, was a Man of unequalled and incomparable Strength: from from whom Thales the Adelphian, as it is said, had the ground of his Philosophy.

S. V.

Of Deucalion and Phaeton.

AND in this Age of the World, and while Moses yet lived, Deucalion reigned. Thessaly, Crotopus then ruling the Argives. This Deucalion was the Son of Pramethus, faith Herodotus, Apollonius, Hesiodus, and Strabo. Hesiodus gave him Pandora for Mother, the next Clymene: Homer in the fifteenth of his Odysses makes Deucalion the Son of Atmos; for else either Ulysses was some other Deucalion; or he must needs have meant him Atmos, who put the Tale into his millitank, or Homer, who said the Tale into his Mouth. For Ulysses after his return from Troy was Son to this later Deucalion, the Son of Atmos; but this Atmos lived but one Age before Troy was taken: (for Ixionem served in that War) and this Deucalion the Son of Pramethus, who lived at once with Moses, was long before. In the first Deucalion's time happened that great Inundation in Thessaly: by which in effect, every Soul in those parts perished, but Deucalion, Pyrhus his Wife, and some few others. It is affirmed, that at the time of this Flood in Thessaly, those People exceeded in all kind of Wickedness and Villany: and as the Impiety of Men is the forcible attractive of God's Vengeance, by all that Nation, for their foul Sins, perish by all that Nation, as in the time of Noah's Flood, the Corrupti- on and Cruelty of all Mankind drew on them that general Destruction by the Flood Universal. That general Destruction and Pyrhus his Wife, whom God spared, were both of them esteemed to be Lovers of Virtue, of Justice, and of Religion. Of whom Ovid;

*Non ille melior quisquam, nec amantior aequi
Vir fuit: an illa reverentia ulla Deorum.*

No Man was better, nor more just than he:
Nor any Woman godlier than he.

It is also affirmed that Pramethus foretold his Son Deucalion of this overflowing, and advised him to provide for his own Safety; who hereupon prepared himself a kind of Vessel, which Lucian in his Dialogus of Timon calls Ciborium; and others Larnax. And because of these Circumstances, they afterwards add the fending out of the Dove, to discover the Waters fall and decrease. I should verily think that this Story had been but an imitation of Noah's Flood deviled by the Greeks, did not the Times so much differ, and S. Augustine, and others of the Fathers, and Reverend Writers approve this Story of Deucalion. Among other his Children, Deucalion had these two of note, Hellen, of whom Greece had first the Name of Hellen; and Melanho, on whom Neptuno is said to have begot Delfhus, which gave name to Delfos, so renowned among the Heathen, for the Oracle of Apollo therein founded.

And that which was no less strange and marvellous than this Flood, was that great burning and Conflagration which about this time also happened under Phaeton; not only in Aethiopia, but in Africa, a Region in Italy, and about Cume, and the Mountains of Vesuvius: of both which the Greeks, after their manner, have invented many strange Fables.

S. VI.

Of Hermes Trismegistus.

BUT of all other which this Age brought forth among the Heathen, Mercurius was the most famous, and renowned: the fame which was also called Trismegistus, or Tor maximus: and of the Greeks Hermes.

Many there were of this Name: and how to distinguish, and set them in their own Times, both S. Augustinus and Lactantius find it difficult. For that Mercurius which was esteemed the God of Thieves, the God of Wrestlers, of Merchants, and Seamen, and the God of Eloquence, (though all by one Name confounded) was not the same with that Mercurius, of whose many Works some Fragments are now extant.

Cicero, Clement Alexandrinus, Arnobius, and certain of the Greeks reckon five Mercuries: Of which, two were famous in Egypt, and there worshipped; one, the Son of Nilus, whose Name the Egyptians feared to utter, as the Jews did their Tetrachammon; the other, that Mercurius which Hermetus in Greece, and Isis in Egypt, is said to have delivered Literature to the Egyptians, and to have given them Laws. But Diogenes Laertius, firm, that Orpheus, and others after him, brought Learning and Letters out of Egypt into Greece: of which Plato also confirmeth, saying, That Letters Dionysius were not found out by that Mercurius which flew Argus, but by that ancient Mercurius, otherwise Thoth; whom Philo Biblites writeth Tautus; the Egyptians Thoth; the Alexandrines Thoth; and the Greeks (as before) Hermes. And to this Tautus, Sanenathus, who lived about the Year of Argus, gave the invention of Letters. But S. Augustinus making two Mercuries, which were both Egyptians, calls neither of them the Son of Nilus, nor acknowledgeth either of them to have lain Argus. For he finds this Mercurius, the slayer of Argus, was but the Grandchild of that Atlas which lived whilst Moses was yet young. And yet Lactantius upon S. Augustinus seems to understand them to be the same with those, whom Cicero, Alexandrinus, and the rest have remembered. But that Conjecture of theirs, that any Grecian Mercurius brought Letters into Egypt, hath no ground. For it is manifest, (if there be any truth in prophane Antiquity) that all the Knowledge which the Greeks had, was transported out of Egypt, or Phoenicia; and not out of Greece, nor by any Grecian, into Egypt. For they all confess that Cadmus brought Letters first into Beotia, either out of Egypt, or out of Phoenicia: it being true, that between Mercurius that lived at once with Moses, and Cadmus, there were these defense call: Crotopus King of the Argives, with whom Moses lived, and in whose time about his tenth Year Moses died; after Crotopus, Silenus whom he reigned eleven years; after him Danaus fifty Years; after him Lyncus; in whose time, and after him in the time of Midas King of Crete, this Cadmus arrived in Beotia. And therefore it cannot be true, that any Mercurius about Moses his time, flying out of Greece for the slaughter of Argus, brought Literature out of Greece into Egypt. Neither did either of those two Mercuries of Egypt, whom S. Augustinus remembereth, the one the Grandfather, the other the Nephew or Grandchild, come out of Greece. Eusebius and Arrianus note, that Moses found out

Letters;

Letters, and taught the use of them to the Jews; of whom the Phoenicians their Neighbours received them; and the Greeks of the Phoenicians by Cadmus. But this Invention was also ascribed to Moses, for the reason before remembered; that is, because the Jews and the Phoenicians had them first from him. For every Nation gave unto those Men the honour of first Inventors, from whom they received the Profit. Ficinus makes that Mercurius, upon part of whose Works he commenteth, to have been four Descendants after Moses; which he hath out of Virgil, who calls Atlas, that lived with Moses, the maternal Grandfather of the first famous Mercurius, whom others, as Diogenes, call the Councilor and Instructor of that renowned Isis, Wife of Osiris. But Ficinus giveth no reason for his Opinion herein. But that the elder Mercurius instructed Isis, Diogenes Laertius affirmeth, and that such an Inscription was found on a Pillar erected on the Tomb of Isis. Lactantius upon the six and twentieth Chapter of the eighth Book of S. Augustinus de Civitate Dei, conceiveth that Mercurius, whose Works are extant was not the first which was entitled, Tor Maximus, but his Nephew or Grand-Child. Sanenathus, an ancient Phoenician, who lived shortly after Moses, hath other fancies of this Mercurius; affirming that he was the Scribe of Saturus, and called by the Phoenicians, Atis, Taurus; and by the Egyptians Thoth, or Thoy. It may be, that the many Years which he is said to have lived, to three hundred Years, gave occasion to some Writers to find him in one time, and to others in other times. But by those which have collected the grounds of the Egyptian Philosophy and Divinity, he is found more ancient than Moses: because the Inventor of the Egyptian Wisdome, wherein it is said, that Moses was excellently learned.

It is true, that although this Mercurius, or Hermes, doth in his Divinity differ in many particulars from the Scriptures, especially in the approving of Images, which Moses of all things most detested; yet whosoever shall read him with an even Judgement, will rather resolve that these Works which are now extant, where by the Greeks and Egyptian Priests corrupted, and those Fooleries inserted, than that ever they were by the hand of Hermes written, or by his Heart and Wit. For there is no Man of understanding, and Master of his own Wits, that hath affirmed in one and the same Tract, those things which are directly contrary in Doctrine and in Nature. For out of doubt (Moses excepted) there was never any Man of those elder Times that hath attributed more, and in a file more reverend and divine, unto Almighty God than he hath done. And therefore if he wrote two Treatises, now among us; the one converted by Apuleius, the other by that learned Ficinus, had been found in all things like themselves; I think it had not been perilous to have thought with Epulemus, that this Hermes was Moses himself; and that the Egyptian Theologie hereafter written, was deviled by the first, and more ancient Mercurius, which others have thought to have been Joseph the Son of Jacob; whom, after the exposition of Pharaoh's Dreams, they called Sapienter Pharae, which is as much as to say, as Asconditurus Repertor. A finder out of hidden things. But these are over-venturous Opinions. For what this Man was, it is known to God. Envy and aged Time hath partly defaced, and partly worn out the certain knowledge of him: of whom, whosoever he were,

Moses.

L. i. c. 6.
lib. 4.

Lactantius writeth in this sort: Hic scriptis libris

*& quidem multis, ad cognoscendum divinarum rerum penetrantibus, in quibus majestatem summi ac singularis Dei asserit, isdemque nominibus appellat, quibus nos, Deum & Patrem; He hath written many Books, belonging to, or expressing the knowledge of divine things, in which he ascribeth the Majesty of the most High and one God, calling him by the same names of God, and Father, which we do. The same Father also heareth not to number him among the Sybs and Prophets. And so contrary are these his Acknowledgments to those Idolatrous Fictions of the Egyptians and Grecians, as for my self I am perwaded, that whatsoever is found in him contrary thereto, was by Corruption infected. For this much himself confesseth: *Deus omnium Dominus, & Pater, Fons & Vita, Potentia & Lux, & Mens, & Spiritus; & omnia in ipso, & sub ipso sunt. Verbum enim ex ejus ore procedit, perfectissimum existens, & Generator & Opifex, &c. God (saith he) the Lord and Father of all things, the Fountain, and Life, and Power, and Light, and Mind, and Spirit: and all things are in him and under him. For his Word out of himself proceeding being most perfect, and generative, and operative, falling upon fruitful Nature, made it also fruitful and producing. And he was therefore (saith Ficinus) called Tor maximus, quia de Trinitate loquens est: in Trinitate unum esse Deum asserens; Because he spake of the Trinity, affirming that there is one God in Trinity. He runnam (saith Ficinus) prædica præfæ Religionis, hic ortum novæ fidei, the adventum Christi, hic futurum Judicium, Resurrectionem sancti, beatitudinem Gloriam, Aplica seculorum. This Mercurius foretold the Ruin of the old or superstitious Religion, and the Birth of the new Faith; and of the coming of Christ, the future Judgment, the Resurrection, the Glory of the Blessed, and the Torment or Affliction of the wicked or damned.

To this I will only add his two last Speeches reported by Calcidius the Platonist, and by Volaterranus out of Seneca. *Hæc enim ipse pulsus a patria, vix perigrinus & exul, nunc incolam repeto cunq; post paulum à vobis corporeis viniculis absolutus discedere, videtote ne me quasi mortuum lugeatis: Nam ad illam optimam beatamq; Civitatem regressuri; ad quam universi Cives mortis condicione venturi sunt. His namq; solus Deus & summus Princeps: qui Cives suos replet suavitate mística; ad quam her, quam multis citam existimant, mors est parvis decenda quam vita. Hicitero, O Son, being driven from your Country, I have lived a Stranger and banished Man; but now I am repairing home, and again in safety. And when I shall after a few days (or in a short time) by being loosed from these Bonds of Flesh and Blood depart from you, see that you do not bewail me as a Man dead, for I do but return to that best and blessed City, to which all their Citizens (by the condition of Death) shall repair. Therein is the only God, the most high and chief Prince, who filleth or feedeth his Citizens with a sweetness more than marvellous; in regard whereof this being, which others call a Life, is rather to be accounted a Death, than a Life. The other, and that which seemeth to be his last, is thus converted by others, agreeing in sense, but not in words with Seneca. O *Calum magni Dei sapientis opus, regis; O vox patris quam primam emittit, quando universum constituit mundum, adjuro per innocentiam ejus corpus & Spiritum contra comprehendendum, miseriam meam; I adjure thee O Heavens, thou wife Work of the great God, and thee O Voice of the Father, which he first uttered, when he framed the whole World, by his only begotten Word and Spirit, comprehending all things, have Mercy upon me.

But Seneca hath his Invocation in these words. *Obsecro te *Calum magni Dei sapientis opus, obsecro te vocem vocem Patris quam loquutus est primum, cum omnem mundum firmavit, obtestor te per augustum Senonem omnia continentem, propitius, propitius esto. I beseech thee O Heaven, my Work of the great God, I beseech thee, O Voice of the Father, which he spoke first when he established all the World, I beseech thee by the only begotten Word, containing all things, be favourable, be favourable.

§. VII.

Of Jannes and Jambres, and some other that lived about those times.

There were also in this Age both Æsculapim, which after his Death became the God of Physicians, being the Brother of Mercurius, as L. Vices in Vices thinks in his Commentary upon Agrippine, de Civitate Dei, lib. 8. and also those two notorious Sorcerers Jannes and Jambres, who in that impious Art excelled all that ever have been heard of to this day: and yet Moses himself doth not charge them with any Familiarity with Devils, or ill Spirits; words indeed that seldom came out of his Mouth; however by the Septuagint they are called Sophists or Venefici and Incantatores, Sophist Poisoners, and Incantators: By Hierome, Jannes & malicijs, wife Men, and Evil-doers: and so by Parabellus, who also useth the word Magi. The Greek it self seems to attribute somewhat of what they did to natural Magic, calling them εμπεριστατοι, workers by Drugs. The Genevian, Sorcerers and Incantators: Junius Japientes, Præfignatores & Magi. Magicians and Wife-Men here by him are taken in one sense; and Præfignatores are such as dazel Mens Eyes, and make them seem to see what they see not; as false Colours, and false Shapes. But as some Vertues and some Vices are so nicely distinguished, and so resembling each other, as they are often confounded, and the one taken for the other: (Religion and Superstition having one Face and Countenance) so did the Works and Workings of Moses, and of Pharaoh's Sorcerers appear in outward shew, and to the beholders of common Capacities, to be one and the same Art and Gift of Knowledge. For the Devil changeth himself into an Angel of Light: and imitaterh in all he can the ways and workings of the most High. And yet on the contrary, every work which furnourmeth the Wisdom of most Men, is not to be condemned as performed by the Help or Ministry of ill Spirits. For the Properties and Powers which God hath given to natural things, as such as where he alio bestoweth the Knowledge to understand their hidden and best Vertues, many things by them are brought to pass, which seem altogether impossible, and above Nature or Art: Which two Speculations of Works of Nature, and of Miracle, the Cabalists distinguished by these Names; Opus de Berebis, & opus de mercaia: the one they call Sapientiam Naturæ, The Wisdom of Nature: The other Sapientiam Divinitatis: The Wisdom of Divinity: the one Jacob practised in the breeding the pious Lambs in Mesopotamia; the other Moses exercised in his Miracles wrought in Egypt; having received from God the Knowledge of the one in the highest Perfection, to wit, the Knowledge of Nature: of the other so far as it pleased God to proportion him, both which he used to his Glory that gave them; assuming to himself nothing at all, either in the least or most. Alio S. Augustine saith that from the time that Moses left Egypt, to the death of Jefusa, divers other famous Men lived in the World, who after their Deaths, for their eminent Vertues and Inventions, were numbered among the Gods: as Diomifus, otherwise Liber Pater, who taught the Grecians the use of the Vine in Attica: at which time also there were inflicted Musical Plays to Apollō Delphicus; thereby to regain his Favour, who brought Barnabes and Scarcity upon that part of Greece, because they refused not the Attempts of Danaus, who spoiled his Temple and fer it on fire: So did Erithonius institute the like Games to Minerva; wherein the Victor was rewarded with a present of Oil, in memory of her that first prest it out of the Olive.

In this Age also Xanthus ravished Europa, and begat on her Radamanthus, Sarpedon, and Minos, which three are also given to Jupiter by other Historians. To these Saint Augustine addeth Hercules; the fame to whom the twelve Labours are ascribed, Native of Yrithmia a City of Peloponessus: (or, as others say, only nursed and brought up there) who came into Italy, and destroyed many Monsters there; being neither that Hercules, which Eusebius surnameth Delphin, famous in Phœnicia; nor that Hercules, according to Philopstratus, which came to Gades, whom he calleth an Egyptian: Mosistomus fit, non Thebanum Herculem, sed Ægyptium ad Gades pervenisse, & ibi finem statuiffe Terre (saith Philopstratus) It is manifest that it was the Egyptian Hercules, and not the Theban, which travelled as far as the Sirens of Gades, and there detremeth the Bonds of the Earth. In this time alio, while Moses wandred in the Deserts, Dardanus built Dardania.

But whosoever they were, or how worthy forever they were that lived in the Days and Age of Moses, there was never any Man, that was no more than Man, by whom it pleased God to work greater things, whom he favoured more, to whom (according to the appearing of an Infinite God) he so often appeared; never any Man more familiar and conversant with Angels; never any more learned both in Divine and Humane Knowledge; never a greater Prophet in Israel. He was the first that received and delivered the Law of God entire; the first that left to Posterity by Letters, the Truth and Power of one Infinite God, his creating out of nothing the World Universal, and all the Creatures therein; that taught the detestation of Idolatry, and the Punishment, Vengeance, and Eradication which followed it.

Syriacides calleth Moses the Beloved of God and Syriac 45 Men, whose Remembrance is blessed. He made 123 him (saith the same Author) like to the glorious Saints, and magnified him by the fear of his Enemies, made him glorious in the sight of Kings, served him his Glory, caused him to bear his Voice, sanctified him with Faithfulness and Meekness, and chose him out of all Men.

He is remembered among prophane Authors; as by Clearchus the Peripatetic; by Megasthenes and Numenius the Pythagorian. The long Lives which the Patriarchs enjoyed before the Flood, remembered by Moses, Efiesus, Hieronymus, Ægyptius, Hecateus, Elanicus, Ansilauus, Ephorus, and Alexander the Historian, confirm. The Universal Flood which God revealed unto Moses, Berosus, Nicolaus Damascus, and others have testified. The building of the Tower of Babel, and confusion of Tongues, Abydenus, Efiesus, and Syballa have approved. Berosus alio honoureth Abraham. Hecateus wrote a Book of him. Damascenus, before cited, speaketh of Abraham's passage from from Damascus into Canaan, agreeing with the Books of Moses. Eusepiemon writeth the very fame of Abraham which Moses did. For, beginning with the building of Babel, and the overthrow thereof by Divine Power, he saith that Abraham was born in the tenth Generation, in the City called Camerina, or Orion, excelled all Men in Willdom; and by whom the Astrology of the Chaldeans was invented. Isidorus saith that Abraham was the first of the same Author) sic Deo gratias fiat, as Divine Præcepto in Thyrium vultu, ibi; habuitque: For his Justice and Piety he was so pleasing unto God, as by his Commandment he came into Phœnicia, and dwelt there. Likewise Diodorus Siculus in his second Book and fifth Chapter speaketh reverently of Moses. There are many other among prophane Authors, which confirm the Books of Moses, as Eusepiemon hath gathered in the ninth of his Preparatione to the Gospel, Chapter the third and fourth, to whom I refer the Reader. Lastly, I cannot but for some things in it commend this notable Testimony of Strabo, who writeth of Moses in these words. Moses enim affirmabat, docebatque, & Ægyptios non velle sentire, qui bestiarum & pecorum imagines Deo tribuerunt: itemque, Afros & Grecos, qui Divi hominum figuram affixerunt: id vero solum esse Deum, quod nos & Terram & Mare continet, quod Cælum & Mundum, & verum omnium naturam appellamus: cuius profecto imaginem, nemo sine mentis, alicuius cujus verum, quæ penes nos sunt, similem audet effigere. Proinde (omni simulacrorum effigie repudiata) dignum est Templum ac Delubrum constituendum, ac sine aliqua figura colendum. Moses affirmed and taught, that the Egyptians thought amiss, which attributed unto God the Images of Beasts and Cattel: Also that the Africans and Greeks greatly erred in giving unto their Gods the shape of Men; whereas that only is God indeed, which containeth both the Earth and Sea, which we call Heaven, the World, and the nature of all things, whose Image doublet; whose Man will dare to fashion out unto the likeness of those things which are amongst us; That therefore (all dressing of Gods with effigies) a worthy Temple and place of Prayer was to be erected unto him, and to be worshipped without any figure at all therein.

Now concerning the Egyptian Willdome, for which the Martyr Stephen commended Moses, saying, Thas Moses was learned in all the Willdome of the Egyptians, and was mighty in Works and Words; the fame is collected (how truly I know not) by Diodorus, Diogenes Laertius, Jamblicus, Philopstratus, and Eusepiemon Cæsariensis, and divided into four parts, viz. Mathematical, Natural, Divine, and Moral.

In the Mathematical part, which is distinguished into Geometry, Astronomy, Arithmetic, and Musick, the ancient Egyptians excelled all others. For Geometry, which is by Interpretation, measuring of Grounds, was useful unto them; because it consisting of infallible Principles, directed them certainly in bounding out their proper Lands and Territories, when their Fields and Limits, by the Inundations of Nilus, were yearly overflowed and confounded; so as no Man could know what in right beloged unto him.

For the second part, to wit, Astronomy, the site of the Country being a level and spacious Plain, free and clear from Clouds, yielded them delight with Ease, in observing and contemplating the risings, fallings, and motions of the Stars.

Arithmetic also, which is the knowledge of Numbers, they studied; because without it, in Geometry and Astronomy, nothing can be demonstrated or concluded. But of Musick they made no other account, nor desired farther knowledge, than seemed to them sufficient to serve and magnify their Gods, their Kings, and good Men.

The natural part of the Willdome, which handleth the Principles, Causes, Elements, and Operations of natural things, differs little from Peripatetic Philosophy; teaching that matéria prima is the beginning or all things; that of it all mixt Bodies and living Creatures have their Being; that Heaven is round like a Globe; that all Stars have a certain foveat Heat, and temperate Influences, whereby all things grow and are produced; that Rains proceed and be from mutations in the Air; that the Planets have their proper Souls, &c.

The Divine part of this Willdome, which is called Theology, teacheth and believeth that the World had a beginning, and shall perish; that Men had their first Original in Egypt, partly by means of the temperateness of that Country, where neither Winter with Cold, nor Summer with Heat, are offensive; and partly through the Fertility that Nilus giveth in those places: That the Soul is immortal, and hath Transmigration from Body to Body: That God is one, the Father and Prince of all Gods; and that from this God, other Gods are, as the Sun and Moon, whom they worshipped by the names of Osiris and Isis, and erected to them Temples, Statues, and divers Images, because the true similitudes of the Gods is not known; That many of the Gods have been in the estate of Mortal Men, and after Death, for their Vertues, and benefits bestowed on Mankind, have been deified. That those Beasts, whose Images and Forms the Kings did carry in their Arms when they obtained Victory, were adored for Gods; because under those Ensigns they prevailed over their Enemies. Moreover, the Egyptian Divines had a peculiar kind of writing, mystical and secret, wherein the highest points of their Religion and Worship of God, which was to be concealed from the vulgar sort, were obscured.

Cheremus distributed the whole sum of this latter Egyptian Learning into three several sorts, viz. Epiphora, which is used in writing common Epistles; Sacerdotal, which is peculiar to their Priests; and Sacred, which Sacred containeth Scripture of two kinds; the one proper, which is expressed by Letters alphabetical in obscure and figurative Words; as for Example, where it is written, The Isis by the Beetle participateth the Beauty of the Hawk; which is read thus: The Moon doth by the Sun borrow part of the Light of God; because Light is an Image of Divine Beauty. The other symbolical; or by Signatures, which is threefold, viz. Imitative, Tropical, and Ænigmatical; Imitative, which designeth things by Characters, like to the things signified; as by a Circle, the Sun; and by the Horns of the Moon, the Moon it self: Tropical or Transfèrent, which applies the divers forms and figures of Natural Bodies or Creatures, to signify the Dignities, Fortunes, Conditions, Vertues, Vices, Affections, and Actions of their Gods and Men. So with the Egyptian Divines, the Image of an Hawk signifieth God; the figure of the Beetle signifieth the Sun; the picture of the Bird Isis signifieth the Moon; by the form of a Man, Prudence and Skillfulness; by a Lion, Fortitude; by a Horse, Liberty; by a Crocodile, Impudency; by a Fish, Hatred is to be understood. Ænigmatical, is a composition or mixture of Images or Similitudes; in which kind, the monstrous Image all Worshippers of Images are, could not challenge the witness of the true God, in whom they believed not. I say therefore, that if every Man might have served himself by any Evail or Distinction, Yahusha might justly have done it. For he needed not in this case the help of Equivocation, or Mental Reservation. For what he swore, he swore in good Faith; but he swore nothing, nor made any Promise at all to the Gibonites. And yet, to the end that the faithless Subtlety of Man should borrow nothing in the future from his Example, who knowing well, that the Promises he made in the name of God, were made to the living God, and not to the dying Man, he held them firm and inviolable, notwithstanding that they to whom he had sworn it, were Worshippers of the Devil.

For it is not as faithless Men take it, that he which swareth to a Man, to a Society, to a State, or to a King, and swareth by the Name of the living Lord, and in his Presence, That this Promise (if it be broken) is broken to a Man, to a Society, to a State, or to a Prince; but the Promise in the Name of God made, is broken to God. It is God that we therein neglect; and therein profess that we fear him not, and that we set him at naught and despise him. If he that without Reservation of Honour giveth a Lie in the presence of the King, or of his Superior, doth in point of Honour give the Lie to the King himself, or to his Superior; how much more doth he break Faith with God, that giveth Faith in the presence of God, promisseth in his Name, and makes him a Witness of the Covenant made?

Out of doubt, it is a fearful thing for a Son to break the Promise, Will, or Deed of the Father; for a State, or Kingdom, to break those Contradictions which have been made in former times, and confirmed by publick Faith. For though it were 400 Years after Yahusha, that Saul, even out of Devotion, slaughtered some of those People defended of the Gibonites: yet God who forgot not what the Predecessors and Fore-fathers of Saul and the Israelites had sworn in his Name, afflicted the whole Nation with a continuing Famine; and could not be appeased, till seven of Saul's Sons were delivered to the Gibonites grieved, and by them hanged up.

And certainly, if it be permitted by the help of a ridiculous Distinction, or by a God-mocking Equivocation, to swear one thing by the Name of the living God, and to reserve in silence a contrary Intent: The Life of Man, the Estates of Men, the Faith of Subjects to Kings, of Servants to their Masters, of Vassals to their Lords, of Wives to their Husbands, and of Children to their Parents, and all Trials of Right, will not only be made uncertain, but all the Chains whereby Freemen are tied in the World, be torn asunder. It is by Oath (when Kings and Armies cannot pass) that we enter into the Cities of our Enemies, and into their Armies. It is by Oath that Wars take end, which Weapons cannot end. And what is it or ought it to be, that makes an Oath thus powerful, but this: That he that swearth by the Name of God, doth assure others that his Words are true, as the Lord of all the World is true, whom he calleth for a Witness, and in whose Presence he that taketh the Oath hath promised? I am not ignorant of their poor Evailings, which play with the Severity of God's Commandments in this kind: But this indeed is the best Answer. That he breaks no Faith, that hath none to break. For whosoever hath Faith and the Fear of God, dares not do it.

The Christians in the Holy Land when they were at the greatest, and had brought the Caliph of Egypt to pay them Tribute, did not only lose it again, but were soon after beaten out of the Holy Land it self: by reason (saith William of Tyre, a Reverend Bishop which wrote that Story) that Americ, the fifth King after Godfrey brake Faith with the Caliph Elabdels, and his Frigerians, the Sultan Samsar; who being suddenly invaded by Americ, drew in the Turk Syracus to their Aid; whose Nephew Seladine, after he had made Egypt his own, beat the Christians out of the Holy Land; neither would the wooden Cross (the very Crofs say they, that Christ died on) give them Victory over Seladine, when they brought it into the Field as their last Refuge; seeing they had forsworn themselves in his Name, that was crucified thereon. And if it be a direction from the Holy Ghost, That he that speaketh Lies, shall be destroyed, and that the Mouth which uttereth lies, slayeth the Soul: How much more perilous is it (if any Peril be greater than to destroy the Soul) to swear a Lie? It was Eugenius the Pope that perfwaded, or rather commanded the King of Hungary after his great Victory over Armas the Turk, and when the said King had compelled him to Peace, the most advantageous that ever was made for the Christians, to break his Faith, and to provoke the Turk to renew the War. And though the said King was far stronger in the Field than ever; yet he lost the Battle with 30000 Christians, and his own Life. But I will say my hand: For this first Volume will not hold the repetition of God's Judgments upon Faith-breakers; be it against Infidels, Turks, or Christians of divers Religions. Lamentable it is, that the taking of Oaths now-a-days, is rather made a matter of Custom than of Conscience.

It is also very remarkable; That it pleased God to leave so many Cities of the Canaanites unconquered by Israel, to scourge and afflict them, by fore-seeing their Idolatry, and as it is said in the Scripture, To be Thorns in their Eyes to prove them, and to teach them to make War. For these Cities hereafter named, did not only remain in the Canaanites possession all the time of Yahusha; but soon after his Death, the Children of Dan were beaten out of the plain Countries, and enforced to inhabit the Mountains, and places of hardest Access. And those of Judah were not able to be Masters of their own Valleys; because, as it is written in the Judges, The Canaanites had Chariots of Iron. And those principal Cities which stood on the Sea-side, adjoining unto Juda, were still held by the remainder of Amorites, or Philistines; as Azazah, Gath, Asdod, out of one of which Cities came Goliath, remembered in Samuel.

Neither did the Children of Manassah over Jordan expel the Geshurites, nor the Maachabites; which inhabited the North parts of Basan, after Traconitis.

Nor the Neghalims possess themselves of Beith-jerusha, nor of Beithanab; but they informed those Canaanites to pay them Tribute. Neither did Asher expel the Zidonians, nor those of Acho, or Acan, Abihah, Achik, Fethlah, Aphek, and Re-hob, nor enforce them to a Tribute.

No more could Zabulon enjoy Kirman, and Nahab, but received Tribute from them. Also the Canaanites dwell in Gazar among the Ephraims; and among the Children of Manassah, on the West of Jordan, the Canaanites held Beith-bean, Taanach, Dor, Ilitani, and Megiddo; yea, Hierusalem it self self did the Yahusha defend above four hundred Years, even till David's time.

Now Yahusha lived one hundred and ten Years, eighteen of which he governed Israel, and then changed this Life for a better. The time of his Rule is not expressed in the Scriptures, which causeth divers to conjecture diversly of the Continuance. Yahusha gives him five and twenty Years; Seder Ollan Rabbi, the Author of the Hebrew Chronology, eight and twenty; and Maffius six and twenty; Adamianus, cited by Maffius, fourteen; Juvenius Lucidus, seventeen; Cyprianus ten; Eusebius giveth him seven and twenty; and so doth St. Augustine; Melanthius two and thirty; Codman five and twenty. But whereas there passed 480 Years from the deliverance of Israel out of Egypt, unto the building of the Temple, it is necessary that we allow to Yahusha only eighteen of them, as finding the rest supplied otherwise, which to me seems the most likely, and as I think, a well approved Opinion.

The same necessity of retaining precisely 480 Years from the departure out of Egypt unto the building of the Temple, convinceth of Error such as have inserted Years between Yahusha and Othomiel, of whom Eusebius finds eight Years, to which Arius Montanus adhereth; and for which he giveth his reason in his four and twentieth and last Chapters upon Yahusha: Bunting reckons it nine Years, Bucheler and Reusner but one, Codman twenty, and Nicephorus no less than three and thirty; whereas following the sure direction of these 480 Years, there can be no void Years found between Yahusha and Othomiel, unless they be taken out of those eighteen ascribed unto Yahusha by the Account already specified. The Prairies and Acts of Yahusha are briefly written in the six and fortieth Chapter of Ecclesiasticus, where, among many other things, it is said of him, Who was there before him like to him, for he fought the Battles of the Lord.

That he wrote the Book called by this name, it was the Opinion of Arius Montanus, because it is said in the last Chapter vers. 26. And Yahusha wrote these words in the Book of the Law of God; which seemeth rather to have been meant by the Covenant which Yahusha made with Israel in Sichem, where they all promised to serve and obey the Lord; which Promise Yahusha caused to be written in the Book of the Law; and of this Opinion were Cajetan and Abulensis: Theodore doth likewise conceive that the Book of Yahusha was collected out of an ancient Volume, intitled Liber Yahusha; remembered by Yahusha himself; and others, that it was the work of Samuel; for whereas Montanus groundeth his Opinion upon these words of the 26th Verse, And Yahusha wrote these words, &c. this place hath nothing in it to prove it; for when the People had answered Yahusha, The Lord our God will we serve, and his Voice will we obey; it followeth that Yahusha made a Covenant with the People, and wrote the same in the Book of the Law of God.

There lived at once with Yahusha, Erichonius in Archie, who taught that Nation to yoke Beasts together, thereby to till the Ground with more ease and speed: And about the same time the fifty Daughters of Danau (as it is said) flew the fifty Sons of Egyptus, all but Lycemus who succeeded Danau, if the Tale be true. There lived also with Yahusha, Phoenice and Cadane, and near the end of Yahusha's Life, Jupiter is said to have ravished Europa the Daughter of Phoenice, (afterwards married to Asterius King of Creta) and begat on her Minos, Radamanthus, and Sarpidon. But St. Augustine reports this Ravishment to be committed by Zeuxippe, and yet they are more commonly taken for the Sons of Jupiter. But it may be doubted whether Minos was Father to Demonax, and Demonax to Idemeneus, who was an old Man at the War of Troy, and Sarpidon was in Person a young or strong Man at the same Trojan War; And so doth Aristotle reckon up in the Council of the Greeks, Troilus and Penthus for Men of Antiquity, and of Ages past: Minos being yet more ancient than any of these. But hereof elsewhere.

CHAP. VII.

Of the Tribes of Israel, that were planted in the Borders of Phoenicia, with sundry Stories depending upon those places.

S. I.

The Proem to the Description of the whole Land of Canaan, with an Exposition of the Name of Syria.

THE Story of the Judges ought to follow that of Yahusha, after whom the Commonwealth of the Jews was governed by Kings, of which so many of them as ruled the ten Tribes, shall be remembered when we come to the Description of Samaria: But because the Land of Canaan, and the borders thereof, were the Stages and Theaters, wherein the greatest part of the Story pass, with that which followeth hath been acted, I think it very pertinent (for the better understanding of both) to make a Geographical description of those Regions; that all things therein performed by the places known, may the better be understood and conceived. To which purpose (besides the addition of the Neighbour Countries) I have bestowed on every Tribe his proper Portion; and do shew what Cities and places of strength were by the Jews obtained; and what numbers it pleased the Lord to leave unconquered; by whom he might correct and scourge them, when ungrateful for his many Graces; they at sundry times forgot or neglected the Lord of all Power; and adored those deaf and dead Idols of the Heathen. Divina Bonitas (saith St. Augustine) idem maxime irascitur in hoc seculo, ne irascatur in futuro; & misericordia inter temporalium adhibet severitatem, ne eternam iustitiam interueniat: The Divine Goodness is especially therefore angry in this World, that it may not be angry in the World to come; and doth mercifully give Temporal Security, that it may not justly bring upon us eternal Vengeance.

To the Cities herein described, I have added a short Story of the beginnings and ends of divers Kingdoms and Common-wealths; and to help me fall herein, I have perused divers of the best Authors upon this Subject; among whom, because I find of great disagreement in many particulars, I have rather in such cases adventured to follow mine own Reason, than to borrow any one of their old Patterns.

And because Canaan, with Palestine of the Philistines, and the Land of Og and Sihon Kings of Bashan, and the Arabian Deserts, were by final Provinces of Syria; it shall be necessary, first to divide and bound the general, and so defend to this particular, now called the Holy Land.

Syria, now Syria, according to the latest Description, as it was anciently taken, embraced all those Regions from the Euxine Sea to the Red Sea; and therefore were the Cappadocians, which look into Pontus, called Leucosyriani, or white Syrians. But taking it shorter, and from the Coast of Cilicia, which is the North border, unto Idumea towards the South, Tigris towards the Sun-rings, and the Mediterranean Sea Westward; it then containeth, besides Babylonia, Chaldea, Arabia Deserta, and Arabia Petrea, that Region also which the Greeks call Asyriam; the Hebrews for so Aram-Naharaim is expounded; also Padian Aram, that is, Yugon Syria, because the two Rivers go along in it as it were in a Yoke.

Edessa, sometimes Rages, now Rage, was the Metropolis of this Region of Syria. In Syria, taken largely, there were many small Provinces, as Calosyria, which the Latines call Syria Cava, because it lay in that fruitful Valley between the Mountains of Lybanus and Anti-Lybanus, in which the famous Cities of Antioch, Ladicea, Apamea, with many others were seated. Then Damascena, or Syria Lybanica, taking name of the City Damascus, and the Mountains of Lybanus, the Regal Seat of the Adades, the first Kings of Syria. Adjoining to it was the Province of Syphace; or Syria Soba, Choba, or Zoba; over which Adadecor commanded in Solomon's time. Then Phenicia and the People of Syraphim; and lastly Syria Palestina bordering Egypt; of which Ptolomy maketh Judea also a part; and to that Province which Moses calleth Serai and Edom, Pomponius Mela giveth the name of Syria Judea.

S. II.

Of the Bounds of the Land of Canaan, and of the Promises touching this Land.

BUT that Land which was anciently Canaan, taketh a part of Phenicia, and stretcheth from behind Lybanus to the great Deserts between Idumea and Egypt; bounded by the Midland Sea on the West, and the Mountains of Herman, Gilead and Armon towards the East; the same Hills which Israhel calleth Tramontani or Tympanon Prolong Hipp. The main of Canaan it had from Canaan the Son of Chechem, & Lingua apollonia fuit Canaan; The Language was also called Canaan, both Momani; and after Hebraica of the Hebrews, who took name from Heber, the Son of Sale, according to S. Augustine. But Arius Momani not so well allowing of this derivation, makes it a common name to all those of Noah's Sons, which pass over Euphrates towards the West Sea. For the word Heber, faith he, is as much as transitus, or transitus, of gold or passing over. And because the Children of Abraham had for a long time no certain abiding; therefore, as he thinks, they were by the Egyptians called Heber, as it were passengers, which is also the Opinion of C. Sigebert, and of Enchirion long before them both. It is Enchirion, and had also the name of Judea from Juda, and then afterwards intitled the Holy Land, because therein our Saviour Christ was born, and buried. Now this part of Syria was again divided into four, namely, into Edom, (otherwise Serai, or Edumae), Galilee, Samaritan, and Judea. Galilee is double, the Superior, called Gentium, and the Inferior; and that Galilee and Judea are distinguished, it is plain in the Evangelists, though both of them belong to Phenicia.

Now besides these Provinces of Phenicia, and Palestina (both which the River of Tigris boundeth; having that Phoenicia stretcheth a little more Easterly towards Damascus) that part also to the East of Jordan, and within the Mountains of Herman, Gilead, and Armon, otherwise Traconis, fell to the possession of half Menelech, Gad, and Reuben, and therefore are accounted a part of Canaan also; as well because anciently possessed by the Amorites, as for that they were conquered and enjoyed by the Israelites; which Eastmost parts are again divided into Bajan, or Batanea, unto Gilead, Moab, Midian, Ammon, and the Territories of the Masabi, Geffiri, Argees, Hus. They are known to the later Geographers by the name of Arabia in general; and by the names of Tracemitis, Pieria, Batanea, &c., of which I will speak in their proper places.

But where Moses describeth the Land of Canaan as it is the tenth of Genesis, he maketh no mention of the later Provinces, which fell to Menelech, Gad, and Reuben, for these be his words, *Then the border of the Canaanites was from Zidon, as thou comest to Gerar until Ascalon (which is Gaza) and this was the length of the Country North and South; then it followeth in the Text. And as thou goest unto Sodom and Gomorah; and Admah, and Seboim, even unto Lathai; by which words Moses setteth down the breadth, to wit, from the Dead Sea to the Mediterranean. But in Deuteronomy it seemeth to be far more large: For it is therein written: All the places wherein the sole of your Feet shall tread shall be yours: your Coast shall be from the Wilderness, and from Lebanon, and from the River Perath, unto the uttermost Sea. Now for the length of the Country North and South, this Description agreeth with the former; only Lebanon is put for Zidon: and the Wilderness for Gerar and Ascalon, which make no difference: but for the breadth and extent East and West, if Perath be taken for Euphrates; then the Land promised stretcheth it self both over Arabia Petrea, and the Desert, as far as the border of Babylon, which the Israelites never possessed; as at any time did go much as invade or attempt: And therefore Yadusius doth observe that, by the River Perath, was meant Jordan, and not Euphrates; taking light from this place of Job: *Behold I have divided unto you by lot tribus Nationes, that remain to be an inheritance according to your Tribes from Jordan unto all the Nations that I have destroyed, even unto the great Sea Westward.

And tho it be true, that David greatly enlarged the Territory of the Holy Land; yet Yadusius well noteth, if Perath in the former place be taken for Euphrates, then was it but for gentes in amicitiam receptas. For David did not so any time enter so far to the East as Assyria, or Babylonia. Neither doth the not possessing of all these Countries give advantage to those that would make any irreligious Cavil, as touching the Promise of God to the Israelites unperformed: For when both their Kings, Magistrates, and People, fell from his Worship and service, he showed him self only to incline then within that Territory, which was for so many People exceeding narrow; but therein, and elsewhere, to subvert them unto those idolatrous Nations, whose false and foolish Gods themselves also served and obeyed. And here, the Promise by which the Hebrews claimed the Inheritance of Canaan, and the lasting enjoying thereof, to wit, as long as the Heavens were above the Earth, was tied to those Conditions, both in the Verses preceding, and subsequent; which the Israelites never performed. And therefore they could not hope for other, than all Mankind could or can expect; who know that all sorts of Comforts, from the merciful Goodness of God looked for, as well in this Life as after it, are no longer to be attended, than while we perlive in his Love, Service, and Obedience. So, in the 8th Verse of the 1st of Deuteronomy, the keeping of God's Commandments, was a Condition joined to the Prosperity of Israhel. For therein it is written; Therefore shall ye keep all the Commandments which I command you this day: that ye may be strong, and go in, and possess the Land, whither ye go to possess it. Also that you may prolong your days in the Land which the Lord swore unto your Fathers, &c.

The like condition was also annexed to the enjoying of the Land conquered, and the possession thereof, so long as the Heavens are above the Earth. For if ye keep diligently, faith he, all these Commandments, which I command you to do, that is, to love the Lord your God, &c. then will the Lord cast out all these Nations before you; and ye shall possess great Nations, and mightier than you. And here, tho it be manifest, that by reason of the breach of God's Commandments, and their falling away from the Worship of his All-powerful Majesty, the Idolatry of the Heathen, the conditional Promises of God were absolutely void, as depending upon Obedience unperformed. Yet I cannot mislike that Exposition of Melancthon; For, faith he, offendit promissionem precipuam promisse de hoc Politico Regno; Hic brevis est hic clausus Promissus non est de Civili Regno. To which agrees that Answer, which S. Hieronimus made to a certain Heretic, in his Epistle ad Dardanium, who accused S. Hieronimus, that he overthrew the Reputation of the Jews Story, and brought the Truth thereof in question, by drawing it altogether into an Allegory, and ad illam domat ad scriptum terram que in Calce est; (that is) Only to that Land of the Living which is in Heaven. Quoniam terra Judaeorum Regio adeo angusta sit ambitu, ut vix longitudo habeat 160 miliarium, latitudinem vero 40, & in eis etiam regnantes in aeternum & opuscula sunt plurima, nunquam a Judaeis mutata, sed tantum divina pollicitationis promissa; Because the whole Country of the Jews is so narrow in compass, that it scarce hath 160 miles in length, and 40 miles in breadth; and in these are Countreys, Places, Cities, and many Towns, which the Jews never possess, but were only granted by Divine Promise. In like manner the same Father Peckher upon Ezra, touching the blessings promised unto Hierusalem; where he hath these words; *De quo diffinitum Hierusalem nequaquam in Civitate Regine potendae, quo totius Provinciae deterrima est, & facissimis montibus operatur; & penuriam patitur, quia in eo calidissimum mare parvis, & variis ventis, Continuum Cyclonum extraxione solent; sed in Despectu ad quoniam dicitur Hierusalem stridit: tunc: From whence, faith he, we learn, that Hierusalem is not to be sought in that Region of Palestina, which is the worst of the whole Province, and ragged, with craggy Mountains; and suffering the penury of Thirst: Judas it preferret in that Water, and supplieth the scarcity of Wells, by building Cisterns: but this Hierusalem is in God's hands; to which it is said, Thy Builders have builded: In far S. Hieronimus. Where also, to prevent mistaking, he thus expounded himself, *Nemque hoc dico in fugillationem terra Judeae, ut Hieronymus Synopsum meminit: aut quo asseram historia optatum: quo fundamentum est intelligentia scripturae, sed ut decutiam Superstitionem Judaeorum: qui Synagoga angustius latitudinem Ecclesiae praefertur. Si enim occidentem tantum sequuntur litteras, & non scripturas vivificant: offendunt terram promissionis latitudo, & male equantur: (faith he) say this is a defence the Land of Judea, as the Heretic Synopsum hath bele me) or to take away the truth of the History, which is the Foundation of Spiritual Understanding, but to beat down the pride of the Jews; which enlarge the Straits of the Synagogue, farther than the breadth of the Church: for if they follow only the killing Letter, and not the quickening Spirit, let them then the Land of Promise, flowing with Milk and Honey.

By this it may also be gathered, howsoever it be unlikely (seeing the West bound in the place, Deut. 1. 1. 24. had his truth in the literal sense) that Euphrates or Perath, which is made the East bound, should be taken only in a spiritual sense; yet nevertheless that Hieronimus's Opinion inclineth to this, as if this Perath were not to be understood for Euphrates; and that the Promise it self was never to lapse, much less the Plantation and Conquest of Israhel. And now for a more particular description of this Holy Land, because After, Nephtalim, and Zabulon, held the Northernmost part, and were seated in Phenicia, I will begin with these three, taking After for the first: of which Tribe, yet before I speak, I must admonish the Reader touching the Names of Places in this, and the other Tribes to be mentioned, that he remember that many Names, by reason of the divers Fancies of Translators, are diversely exprest; so that to the unskillful they may seem divers, when they are one and the same: the reason of this diversity (as by those learned in the Hebrew I am taught) is, partly, because the ancient Editions of the Hebrew want Vowels, the old Translators imagined other Vowels than now the Hebrew Editions have; and partly, because the Ancient exprest or omitted divers Consonants, otherwise than the later think fit.

he reads, Forerit, for, in Aphek. Where others convert it, Percuties Syris in Aphek.

The next place along the Coast is Sandalium. first called Schandium by Schander, which we call Alexander, for Alexander Macedon built it, when he besieged Tyre: and for it on a Point of Land which extended itself into the Sea, between Azob and Tyre: which Caille Baldine the Irish rebuilt and fortified, in the year of Christ 1157, when he undertook the recovery of Tyre.

Not much above a mile from this Caille, ariseth that most plentiful Spring of Water, which Solomon remembereth, called the Well of Living Waters: from whence, not only all the Fields and Plains about Tyre, are made fruitful by large Pipes hence drawn; but the same Spring, which hath not above a bow-shot of ground to travel till it recover the Sea, driveth six great Mills in that short Passage, faith Brochard.

Within the Land, and to the East of Azob, Joel 12.20 and Sandalium, standeth Hofa: and beyond it, under the Mountains of Tyre, the City of Achaph, or Azob, or after St Hieron, Achaph, a City of great strength, whose King, amongst the rest, was slain by Jobab, at the Waters of Merom.

¶ VII.

Of Thoron, Gifcala, and some other Places.

Farther into the Land, towards Jordan, was seated the Castle of Thoron, which Hugo de Sancto Abdenario built on the Eastermoft Hills of Tyre, in the year 1107, thereby to restrain the Excursions of the Saracens, while they held Tyre against the Christians; the place adjoining being very fruitful, and exceeding pleasaunt. From this Castle, the Lords of Thoron, famous in the Story of the Wars for the recovery of the Holy Land, derive their Names, and take their Nobility. It had in it a curious Chappel, dedicated to the Blessed Virgin, in which Hampory of Thoron, Confessor to Baldvine the Third, King of Hierusalem, lieth buried: There were five Castles besides this within the Territory of Affer; whereof four are seated almost of equal distance from each other; to wit, Cyfrum Lanferit, Montfort, Indin (or Saron) Cyfrum Regium, and Belfort. The fifth near the Sea, under the Hills of Saron; the next three, to wit, Indin, Montfort, and Regium, stand more within the Land, and belonged to the Brotherhood and Fellowship of the Temonici, or Dutch Knights, (by which they defended themselves, and gave succour to other Christians, at such time as the Saracens possessed the belt part of the upper Galilee) the chief of which Order was in Trolois Acin. The first Fortrefs was, for Beauty and Strength, called Belfort, seated in the high ground upon the River Naar, near the City Rama: of which in this Tribe, Job 19.29. for which the Vulgar reads Horma, making the Article a part of the word, and mistaking the Vowels; from the siege of this Castle of Belfort, the great Saladine, King of Syria and Egypt, was by the Christians Army raised, and with great loss and dishonour repulsed.

To the East of Belfort, is the strong City of Alab (or Achlab) which St Hieron calleth Chalab; one of those that defended themselves against Affer, as Roob (or Rechob) not far thence did.

Towards the South from Roob, they place Gabal, (which Heracl, furnished the Afcalonites rebuilt) making it of the Territory of (habol, Quid Syronum trivna dispicere significat (faith Weissenburg) so called, because Hiram of Tyre, was ill pleased with those twenty Cities, seated hereabout, which Solomon presented unto him in recompence of those Provisions sent him for the building of the Temple. Other think this Chabal, or Cabal, containing a Circuit of those twenty Cities given to Hiram, to have been without the compass of the Holy Land; the bordering Affer on the North side: as it is said, 1 Reg. 9. 11. that they were in Regione limitis; that is, in limit Regions, in the border of the Country: for it was not lawful, say they, to give to Strangers any part of the Possession allotted to the Israelites: howsoever, that after Hiram had refused them, they were peopled by the Israelites, it appears 2 Chron. 8. 14. And it seems they were conquered by David, from Syri Rechobai, whose City Roob, or Rechob, was in these parts.

Almost of equal distance from the Castle of Thoron, they place the Cities of Gifcala, and Gadara: of which Gadara is rather to be placed over Jordan: Gifcala was made famous by John the Son of Levi, who from a mean Estate, gathering together 400 Thieves, greatly troubled all the upper Galilee; at such time as the Romans attempted the Conquest of Judea; by whose practice Josephus, who then commanded in the upper Galilee, was greatly endangered: whereof himself hath written at large, in his second Book of those Wars. This John betraying, in all he could, the City of Gifcala (whereof he was Native) to the Roman State: and finding a resistance in the City, gave opportunity, during the Contention, to the Tyrians and Gadarims, to surprize it; who at the same time forced it, and burnt it to the ground: But being by Josephus's Authority rebuilt, it was afterward rendered to Titus by composition. They find also the Cities of Cana Major, and  Caded* (or Cedela); of the first was that Syro-Phoenician, whose Daughter Christ delivered of the Evil Spirit. Near the other, they say, it was that Demetrius Macedonius overthrew the Army of Jennath.

There are, besides these forenamed Cities within the Tribe of Affer, divers others; as on the South Border, and near the Sea, Misfat, or Misfat: within the Land  Besara*,  Bethadon*, and Bethemer, standing on the South Border, between Affer and Zabulon: on the North side, joining to Syro-Phoenicia, is the City of Hethalon, or Chethalon, the utmost of the Holy Land that way: under which, towards the Sea, is Cheli, and then Enech, supposed to be built by Cain, and named of his Son Enech, but without probability, as I have formerly proved. There are others also besides these, as Ammon, or Chamon, of which Job 19.28. where also we read of Nehil, Rama, Alamelce, and Beton: the Cities of Alcab, or Chelcab, Haddon, and Rechob, and Misfat, which we have already mentioned, were by the Afferites given to the Levites. Of others held by the Canaanites, mention is made Judg. 1.30. to which, out of Jobab, we may add Ebron, Amhad, and others, on which no story dependeth, and therefore I will not pepper the description with them.

¶ VIII.

Of the Rivers and Mountains of Affer.

The Rivers to the North of Affer, are Adonis, afterward Comis, to which Ziegler joyneth Lycens, Prolym, Leontis: both which fall into the Sea near Berytus: which River of Leontis, Montanus draws near unto Zidon: finding his Head notwithstanding, where Prolym doth, between Zidon and Tyre.

Aff. Tab. 4. Tyre. It hath also a River called Fons borvorum Libani, which Abricome, out of Brochard, intruseth Elephrus: for which he saith cithet Pliny; and the first of Macchabei the 11. Chap. but neither of those authorities prove Elephrus to be in Affer: for this River falleth into the Sea at the life of Adonis, not far from Balabita, witness Prolym; and therefore Plinius calleth it Valania, and Postellus, E-Valania: which River boundeth Phoenicia on the North side: to which Strabo also agreeth: but this principal River of Affer, Arias Montanus calleth Gobanus, Chrysiastus Schor, out of the Mouth and Papers of Peter Lucifol (which Laigius in this our Age both viewed and described the Holy Land) calleth the main River, Fons borvorum Libani: and one of the Streams which runneth into it from the North side, Naar; and another from the South-west, Chabul: of the City adjoining of the same name; for Elephrus it cannot be. There is also another River described by Abricome, named Geophus, which I find in no other Author, and for which he, cithet the nineteenth of Jobab, but the word  Ge* which is added there to Geophus is not taken for a River, but for a Valley: and for a Valley the Vulgar, the Geneva, and Arias Montanus turn it. There is also found in Affer, the River of Belus, remembered by Josephus and Tacitus, which is also called Pagidas, faith Pliny: out of the Sands of this River are made the best Glass, which sometime the Zidonians practised; and how the Venerians at Augana. Arias Montanus makes Belus to be a Branch of Chudamin; which it cannot be: for in Golias Belus is known to flow from out the Lake Cadene, as all Cosmographers, both Ancient and Modern, and the later Travellers into those parts witness. It is true, that the River of Chifon, taketh Water from Chudamin; but not in that fashion which Plinius hath described it: neither doth it find the Sea at Ptolomais Acin, according to Montanus, but farther to the South, between Caiphas and Sicath, witness Ziegler, Adrichomius, and which Schrot.

* The word Naar is ambiguous, either for a Valley, or for a River: but this word Ge, is always a Valley, as a Branch of Chudamin; which it cannot be: for in Golias Belus is known to flow from out the Lake Cadene, as all Cosmographers, both Ancient and Modern, and the later Travellers into those parts witness. It is true, that the River of Chifon, taketh Water from Chudamin; but not in that fashion which Plinius hath described it: neither doth it find the Sea at Ptolomais Acin, according to Montanus, but farther to the South, between Caiphas and Sicath, witness Ziegler, Adrichomius, and which Schrot.

* I have understood another Stream, Job 12.3. which running by Petra of Araba, falleth into the Lake Serbonis, and divideth Egypt from the promised Land; whereabout they place Rhinoceros, for which Cyriacus taketh Shichin in that place of Jobab; but howsoever, whether this Shichin, Job 12.3. be a River or a City, it appears that this Name is found, both in the North bound of the Holy Land, Job 19.26. and in the South bound, Job 19.33.

Besides these Rivers, there are divers famous Springs and Fountains, as that of living Waters adjoining to Tyre: and  Mafersphor*, or after St Hieron, Mafersphor, whose Well filled by the flood of the Sea adjoining, (they say) the Inhabitants, by seething the Water, make Salt therewith.

The Mountains which bound Affer on the North, are those of Anti-libanus, which with Libanus bound Calofrya; two great ledges of Hills, which from the Sea of Phoenicia, and Syria, extend themselves far into the Land Eastward, four hundred stadia, or furlongs, according to Strabo: for that thence he giveth to the Valley of Calofrya; which those Mountains inclose: but Pliny gives them 1500 furlongs in length from the Welt (where they begin at Thersiphon, or Des facies, near Tripolis) to the Mountains of Arabia beyond Damascus; where Anti-libanus turneth towards the South. These ledges, where they begin to part Tracometis and Balsam, from the Desert Arabian, are called Herman: which Moses also nameth Sion; the Phoenicians, Syrians, and the Amorites, Sanir; neither is this any one Mountain apart, but a continuation of Hills; which running farther Southerly, is in the Scripture called Galaad, or Gilead: the same being still a part of Libanus, as the Prophet Jeremy proveth; Galaad is mibi caput Libani: noting that this Galaad is the highest of all those Hills of Libanus. Strabo knows them by the Name of Tracometis; and Prolym by Hippus. Arias Montanus calleth these Mountains bordering Affer, Libanus, for Anti-libanus, contrary to all other Cosmographers, but he giveth no reason for his Opinion.

They take the name of Libanus from their white tops; because, according to Tacitus, the highest of them are covered with Snow all the Summer; the Hebrew word Libanus (faith Weissenburg) significeth whiteness. Others call them by that name of the Frankincense which those Trees yield; because Libanus is also the Greek word for that Sassa.

Niger out of Aphrodisia affirmeth, that on Libanus, there falleth a kind of Honey-dew, which is by the Sen coagulated into hard Sugar, which the Inhabitants call Sacchar, from whence came the Latin word Saccharum.

The Rivers which Libanus belittoweth on the Neighbour Regions, are, Chrysiastus, Jordan, Elephrus, Leontis, Lycens, Adonis, Fons borvorum Libani, and others.

The rest of the Mountains of Affer, are those Hills above Tyre, and the Hills of Saron, both exceeding fruitful; but those are but of a low stature, compared with Libanus: for from Nabo, or the Mountain of Abirin, in Ruben, Moses beheld Libanus threecore miles distant.

S. IV.

The Tribe of NEPH TALIM.

¶ I.

Of the Bounds of Naphthalim, and of Helipolis, and Abila.

The next proportion of the Land of Canaan, bordering Affer, was the upper Galilee; the greatest part whereof fell to the lot of Naphthalim, the Son of Jacob by Billa, the Handmaid of Rachel: who while they abode in Egypt, were increased to the number of 53400 Persons, able to bear Arms, numbered at Mount Sinai: all which leaving their Bodies in the Deserts, there entered the Holy Land of their Sons 45400, besides Infants, Women, and Children, under twenty years of Age. The Land of Naphthalim took beginning on the North part from the Fountains of Jordan, and the Hills of Libanus adjoining, as far South as the Sea of Gallilee, bounded on the Welt by Affer, and on the East & South-east by Jordan. On the North side of Libanus, and adjoining to this Territory of Naphthalim, did the Amorites (or Hittites) also inhabit; in which Tract, and under Libanus, was the City of Helipolis; which the height of the Mountains adjoining shadowed from the Sun, the better part of the day. Postellus saith it is called Balber: Niger, Marbech, and Leontavins, in Bealebea.

Of this name of Helipolis, there are two great Cities in Egypt: the first called On, by the Hebrews, and the Chaldeans Paraphat, otherwise Demuth, Bethemer, or after the Latinis, Solis oppidum, Plin 11.1. Domus Solis, The City of the Sun: into which, faith

S. VII.

The half of the Tribe of MANASSEH.

¶ I. Of the Bounds of this half Tribe; and of Scythopolis, Salem, Theria, and others.

The next Tribe which joineth it self to Isachar towards the South, is the half of Manasseh, on the West side of Jordan. Manasseh was the first begotten of Joseph, the 11th Son of Jacob. His Mother was an Egyptian, the Daughter of Putiphar, Priest and Prince of Heliopolis: in which Manasseh, with his Brother Ephraim, the Grand-children of Jacob, were by adoption numbered amongst the Sons of Jacob, and made up the number of the twelve Patriarchs.

Of Manasseh, there were increased in Egypt, as they were numbered at Mount Sinai, 32200 able Men: all which being counted in the Deserts, there entered of their Issue 52700 bearing Arms. The Territory which fell to this one half of Manasseh, was bounded by Jordan on the East and Dora upon the Mediterranean Sea on the West, Jezebel on the North, and Manabana is the South border.

The first and principal City which stood in this Territory, was Beisban, sometime Nysa, faith Pliny, built by Liber Pater, in honour of his Nurse there buried, of the same name, which Solinus confirms. Afterward, when the Syrians invaded Asia the Leis, and pierc'd into the South, to the uttermost of Calvaryia, they built this City anew, and very magnificent: and it had, thereupon the name of Scythopolis, or the City of Syrians given it by the Greeks.

These barbarous Northern People, constrained the Jews to fight against their own Nation and Kindred, by wh. hands when they had obtained victory, they themselves set on the Jews which they loved, and slew them all. Stephanus maketh it the utmost towards the South of Calvaryia: and Siraboe joins it to Galilee. It is feared between Jordan and the Hills of Gilboa, in salone ad montes acrabatene, saith Ziegler. But I find it in the East part of the Valley of Jezebel near Jordan: after that Jordan straiteneth it self again into a River, leaving the Sea or Lake Genezareth. Notwithstanding, Montanus describes it far to the West, and towards the Mediterranean Sea, near Endor, contrary to Stella, Laicifan, Adrichome, and all other the best Authors. This City was the greatest of all those of Decapolis: but the Children of Manasseh could not expel the Inhabitants thereof, and therefore called it Sane, an Enemy, or Beth-san, the House of an Enemy.

Over the Walls of this Bethsan, the Philistines hung the Body of Saul, and his Sons, slain at Gilboa. It had, while the Christian Religion flourished in those parts, an Arch-bishop, who had nine other Bishops of his Diocese numbered by Tyrius, in h. 14. cap. 12. but the same was afterward translated to Nazareth. The later Travellers in those parts affirm, that there is daily taken out among the rubbish and the ruins of that City, goodly Pillars, and other pieces of excellent Marble, which witness the stately buildings and magnificence which it had in elder times, but it is now a poor and desolate Village.

From Bethsan, keeping the way by Jordan, they find an ancient City called Salim: which City, the ancient Rabbins, faith Jerom, do not find to be the same with Jerusalem: there being, in the time of Jerom, and since, a Town of that name, near Scythopolis before-mentioned; which if the place of Scripture, Gen. 13. 18. do not confirm, where the Vulgar readeth transiitque in Salem urbem Sichem

(for which others read, venit incolam ad Civitatem Sichemum, making the word Salem not to be a proper Name, but an Adjective) yet the place John 3. 13. where it is said, that John was baptizing in Enon near Salem, may somewhat strengthen this opinion, and yet it is not unlikely that this Salem of which S. John speaketh, but contracted of Shobalim, of which in the Tribe of Benjamin, 1 Sam. 9. 4. This word Junius maketh to be the plural of Shubal; of which we read, 1 Sam. 13. 17. for as for that which is added out of Cam. 6. 12. of Shulammis, as if it had been as much as a Woman of this Salem, near Enon, it hath no probability.

Not far from thence, where they place Salem, they find Betsech the City of Admichee; Josephus Beeth, by calls it Bala: here it was that Saul alsembled the strength of Israel and Juda, to the number of Jul. 13. 330000, when he meant to relieve Isabel-Gilead, against Nabab the Ammonite, who would give them no other conditions of Peace, than to suffer their right Eyes to be thrust out. Near Betsech, is the City of Babbar, or rather Beth-bar, of which Judg. 7. 24. in the story of Gideon, and then Ephra, or Hophra, wherein Gideon inhabited; in the Border whereof stood an Altar consecrated to Baal: which he pulled down and defaced; and near it that Stone on which Abimelech the Balfard slew his 70 Brothers, (an heathenish Cruelty, practised by the Turks to this day); and not far hence between the Village of Alphon and Jordan, Ptolemus Lathyrus overthrow Alexander King of the Jems; and slaughtered, as Josephus numbeth them, 3000; but according to Timagenes 5000: after which Victory, as Prology past by the Villages of the Jems, he flew all their Women, and cauled the young Children to be fed in great Caldrons, that the rest of the Jems might thereby think that the Egyptians were grown to be Men-eaters, and strike them with the greater terror.

Towards the West, and on the border of Issachar, they place the Cities of  Ener* of the Levites, * 2. 16. 4. A. A. and Abel-Mehola, which Junius, Jud. 7. 22. placeth near Junius in Ephraim; it was the Habitation of Heli the Prophet, numbred among those places, 1 Reg. 4. 12. which were given in charge to Baana by Solemon; to whose charge also Tahanach belonged, a place of great strength, which at the first refused Isachar, to whose King was afterward hanged, and their City given to the Levites.

In the body of this Territory of Manasseh, but somewhat nearer to Jordan than to the Mediterranean Sea, were three great Cities, to wit, Therfa, whose King was one of those that Johna slew; which the Kings of Israel used for their Regal Seat, till such time as Samarra was built. From hence 13 the Wife of Jeroboam went to Asbia to enquire of her Son's health; who knowing her, tho she were disguised, told her of her Son's death.

The second was Thebes near Samarra, of which name there are both in Egypt and Greece, of great fame; in the assault of the Tower of this Town, whereto the Citizens retired, the Balfard Admichee was wounded by a weighty stone, thrown by a Woman over the Wall; who despairing of his recovery, commanded his Page to slay him out-right, because it should not be said that he perished by the stroke of a Woman. But others set this City in Ephraim, near Sichem or Neapolis.

The third is Acraabata, of which the Territory adjoining is called Acraabata, (one of the ten Tetrarchies, or Governments in Juda) for which Jerom, 1 Mac. 5. 3. reads Acraabata; but in the Greeks it is Acraabata: Isidore calls it Acraabata. This City had one of the largest Territories of all Palestine, belonging to the Governor thereof. Josephus remembereth it often, as in his second Book of

of the Jems Wars, c. 11. 25. 28. and elsewhere.

The difference between a Tetrarchie and a Torarchie, was, that the first was taken for a Province, and the other for a City, with some lesser Territory adjoining; and a Tetrarch is the same with Prætor in Latin, and Præfides in English, being commonly the fourth part of a Kingdom, and thereof so called. Pliny nameth 17 Tetrarchies in Syria: the Holy Land had four, and so hath the Kingdom of Ireland to this day, Lemphir, Ulster, Connath, and Mushter.

To the South-west of Acraabata, they place the Cities of Balaam, or Bithan, and Gethremmon of the Levites: but Junius out of John 21. 25. and 1 Chron. 6. 70. gathers, that these two are one; and that Jubilee, John 16. 11. is another name of the same City.

Then is Jezebel a Regal City, set at the foot of the Mountains of Gilboa, towards the South-west: herein Jezebel, by a false accusation, cauled Nabab to be stoned, to the end he might possess his Vineyard joining to the City; which Nabab refused to sell, because it was his Inheritance from his Father. Jerom also was cauld unburied into the same field; for which his Mother Jezebel murdered him.

Toward the Sea, from Jezebel, is the City which they call Gaber: in whose aspect, as Abimelech King of Juda fled from Jehoi, when he had slain Jeram, he was wounded with the shot of an Arrow, of which wound he died at Mageddo adjoining. The Scripture calls this City City of Gaber, Gen. 47. 27.

Then Adadremmon, near unto which the good King Josiah was slain by Necho King of Egypt, in a War unadvisedly undertaken. For Necho marched towards Affria against the King thereof, by the Commandment of God; whom Josiah thought to resist in his Passage: it was afterward called Maximianopolis.

A neighbour City to Adadremmon was Mageddo, often remembered in the Scriptures; whose King was slain among the rest by Joshua; yet they defended their City for a long time against Manasseh. The River which passeth by the Town, may perhaps be the same which Ptolemy calleth Chorfeus: and not that of which we have spoken in Zabulon. For because this name is not found in the Scriptures, many of those that have described the Holy Land delineate no such River. Moore only sets it down in his Geography of the twelve Tribes: but the River which passeth by Mageddo, he understandeth to be but a Branch falling thereinto. Laicifan and Schroet make a great confluence of Waters in this place; agreeable to this Scripture in the fifth of Judges; Then Jungles the Kings of Canaan in Tanaach, by the Waters of Mageddo. But these Authors, and with them Stella, give it no other name than the Torrent so called.

But being that ancient Cosmographers stretch out the bounds of Phœnicia even to Schafte, or Samarra; and Sirab far beyond it on the Sea-coast: And Josephus calls Cæsaria Palestine, a City of Phœnicia: yea, Laurentius Corvinus extendeth Phœnicia as far as Gaza: seeing also Prology sets down Chorfeus for the partition of Phœnicia and Juda, this River running East and West parallel with Samarra: it is very probable that this Torrent called Mageddo, after the name of the City which it watereth, is the same which Prology in his fourth Table of Asia, calleth Chorfeus. The later travellers of the Holy Land call Mageddo Subimere at this day.

¶ II. Of Cæsaria Palestine, and some other Towns.

FROM Mageddo toward the West, and near the Mediterranean Sea, was that glorious City of Cæsaria Palestine: first, the Tower of Sirab: the same which Pliny calls Apollonia: tho Prology sets Apollonia elsewhere, and toward Egypt, between this City and Joppa, to which Vespasian gave the name of Flavia Colonia. It was by Herod rebuilt, who therein laboured to exceed all the works in that part of the World: For besides the edifices, which he reared within the Walls, of cut and polished Marbles, the Theater and Amphitheater, from whence he might look over the Seas far away, with the high and stately Towers and Gates, he forced a Harbor of great capacity, being in former times an open Bay: and the wind blowing from the Sea, the Merchants haunting that Port, had no other hope, but in the strength of their Cables & Anchors. This work he performed with such charge and labour, as the like of that kind hath not bin found in any Kingdom, nor in any Age: which, because the Materials were fetched from far, and the weight of the stones was such, as it exceeded their belief, I have added Josephus own words of this work, which are these: Hanc locum incommensuratum *correctior, circulum portus circumdedit, quantus patere magna classis recipere sufficeret: Et in viginti miliarum profundum, per gradum Asia demisit, quorum plerique gradum quinquecenta longissimi, latitudinis vero octiduum, dividuntur: mox per seipsum quadam extenta majora, minoris alia. To mend this inconvenience of place (saith Josephus) he compass it in a Bay where in a year Fleet might well ride: and to draw great forces, every fathom deep: wherof some were fifty fathoms long, 18 foot broad, and nine foot thick, and some longer, and some lesser.*

To this he added an arm or caule of two hundred foot long, to break the waves: thereto he strengthened with a Stone Wall, with divers stately Towers thereon builded: of which the most magnificent he called Draufus, after the name of Draufus the Son in Law of Cæsar: in whose honour he intitled the City it self, Cæsaria of Palestine: all which he performed in 12 years time. It was the first of the Eastern Cities that received a Bishop: afterward erected into an Archibishopric, commanding twenty others under it, faith Tyrius.

St. Jerom nameth Theophilus, Enochus, Acacius, Euzorius, and Gelasius, to have been Bishops thereof. In this City was Cornelius the Centurion baptized by S. Peter: and herein dwelt Philip the Apostle. S. Paul was herein two years prisoner, under the Præfides Felix: unto the time and government of Porcius Festus: by whom, making his appeal, he was sent to Cæsar. Here, when Herod Agrippa was passing on, to celebrate the Quinquennales, taking delight to be called a God by his flatterers, he was stricken by an Angel unto death, faith Josephus.

To the North of Cæsaria standeth Dora, or Nephth Dor, as some read, John 1. 20. called (saith Adrianus) because it joyneth to the Sea, whose King was slain by Joshua. But Junius for in Nephth Dor, as in tradition Dor: and so the Vulgar, in regnum Dor, although 1 Reg. 4. 11. for the like speech in the Hebrew it readeth omnis Nephth Dor: The Septuaginta in the place of Joshua call it Nephth Dor and in the other of the Kings, Nephth Dor: but the true name by other places (as John 12. 23. Judg. 1. 27.) may seem to be Dor. It was a strong and powerful City, and the fourth in account of thole 12 Principities, or Sirarchies, which Solomon erected. Tymon upon Asac, 15. 11. placeth it between the Hill Carmel, and the mouth of the River Chorfeus: for so some name the River Chorfeus, of which we have before spoken already.

Into this City, for the strength thereof, Tyrius died by Antiochus the Son of Demetrius, where he was by the same Antiochus besieged with 120000 foot-men, and 8000 Horse: the same peridious villain, he received 200 talents for theranion of Jonathan, Macchabeus, whom he had taken by treachery, and then flew him: and after him flew his own Master, usurping for a while the Kingdom of Syria. It had also a Bishops seat of the Diocese of Cæsaria.

From Cæsaria towards the South, they place the Cities of Capernaum, Gaba, and Galgali: for besides that Capernaum famous in the Evangelists, they find in these parts near the West Sea, another of the same name. Of Gaba, Hierome, in locis Hebraicis. But this famous Galgali, or Gilgal, was in Benjamin: but this Gilgal, they say it was, whose King was slain by Joshua.

Then Antipatris, so called of Herod, in honour of his Father: but in the time of the Machabees, it was called Capthasalamas: in the Fields whereof Judas Machabeus overthrew a part of the Army of Nicanor, Lieutenant to Demetrius: an Army drawn into Judea by a traitorous Jew, called Alcinus: who contended for the Priesthood, first under Bacchides, and then under Nicanor. To this was St. Paul carried prisoner from Jerusalem, conducted by 470 Souldiers, to defend him from the fury of the Jews. In aftertimes the Army of Godfrey of Bullioign attempted it in vain; yet was it taken by Baldwin. It was honoured in those days with a Bishops seat; but it is now a poor Village, called Asfar, faith Brochard. Near unto this City the Prophet Jonas was three days preferred in the Body of a Whale.

Into the Land, from Antipatris and Cæsaria, standeth Nabbusa, whereof the Territory taketh name: which Cestius the Roman, wafted with fire and Sword, because the Jews which dwelt at Cæsaria belied them, and carried with them the Books of Moses. Near unto it is the Mountain of Adiab, the Steward of King Achab; wherein he hid an hundred Prophets, and fed them after which he himself is said to have obtained from God the Spirit of Prophecy also.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the Kingdom of Phœnicia.

S. I.

The Bounds, and chief Cities, and Founders, and Name, of this Kingdom: and of the Invention of Letters ascribed to them.

BECAUSE these five Tribes, of Asfer, Nephthim, Zabulon, Issachar, and the half of Manasseh possess the better part of that ancient Kingdom of Phœnicia, to wit, of so much as lay to the South part of Ami Libanus; have therefore gathered a brief of those Kings which have governed therein: at least so many of them as time (which devoureth all things) hath left to posterity: and that the rest perished, it is not strange: seeing so many Volumes of excellent Learning in so long a race and revolution, and in so many changes of Estates, and Conquest of Heathen Princes, have been torn, cast away, or otherwise consumed.

The limits of this Kingdom, as touching the South parts, are very uncertain: but all Cosmographers do in effect agree, that it takes beginning from the North, where that part of Syria, which is called Cæsariote, ends: most of them bounding it by Orthofia, to the North of Tripolis. Prology makes it a little larger, as reaching from the River Eleutherus that falls into the Sea at the Island of Aradus, somewhat to the North of Orthofia, and stretching from thence along the coast of the Mediterranean Sea, as far as the Jews call the Torrent, or River of Maggedda. Pliny extends it further, and comprehends Joppa within it: Corvinus and Bidenus, Joppa and Gaza. Phœnicia aqua prisca appellata (faith Bedeus) que nunc Palaestina Syria dicitur: It was called Phœnicia of old (faith he) which now is called Palaestina of Syria.

Strabo comprehends in this Countrey of Phœnicia all the Sea-side of Judea, and Palaestina, even unto Pelusiump, the first Port of Egypt. On the contrary, Diodorus Siculus foldeth it up in Calosyria, which he boundeth not. But for my self, I take a middle course, and like best of Prology's description, who was seldom deceived in his own Art. It had in these famous Maritimate Cities (besides all those of the Islands) to wit, Aradus, Orthofia, Tripolis, Borrys, Byblus, Berytus, Sidon, Tyre, Ptolemais (or Acon) Dorra, and Cæsaria Palaestina: and by reason of its many Ports and goodly Sea-towns, it antiently commanded the Trade of the Eastern World: and they were absolute Kings of the Mediterranean Sea.

The ancient Regal Seat of those Princes was Zidon, built by Zidon the first Son of Canaan: and the people then subject to that Family were called Zidonians; the same state continuing even unto Joshua's time. For till then, it is probable that there was but one King of all that Region, afterward called Phœnicia: which Procopius also confirmeth in his second Book of Pandora Wars. But in process of time the City of Tyre adjoining, became the more magnificent: yet, according to the Prophet, it was but a Daughter of Zidon, and by them first built; and people.

But after the death of Moses, and while Joshua yet governed Israel, Agenor an Egyptian Thebæ, or a Phœnician bred in Egypt, came thence with his Sons F. 17. Cadmus, Phœnix, Cyrus, and Cilix, (say Cadmus and Curtius) and built and possessed the Cities of Tyre and Zidon, to wit, the new Tyris; and brought into Phœnicia (so called after the name of his second Son) the use of Letters: which also Cadmus in his pursuit after his Sister Europa, taught the Greeks. For Taurus King of Crete, when he surprised Tyre, had stola her thence: of which the Poets devised the fable of Jupiter's transformation into a Bull, by whom that beast was also supposed to be made. Pomponius Sabrinus makes Belus the first King of Phœnicia; and finds Cadmus his Successor, whom he calleth his grand-child: and it seemeth that Belus was the Father of Agenor, and not Neptune: because the Successors of Dido held that name always in reverence, making it a part of their own, as Abdrubal, Hanniball: whose memory Virgil also toucheth in these Verses.

*Hic Regina gravem gemmis auroque poscit, Impletur, mox pater am: quam Belus & omnes
A Belo, solus.*

*The Queen anon commands the weighty Bowl (Weighty with precious stones and massie Gold)
To flow with Wine. This Belus us'd of old,
And all of Belo's Line.*

Whether this Belus were Father or Grandfather to Agenor, the matter is not great. But it seems to me by comparing of times, that Belus was Ancestor to these Phœnicians, and preceded Agenor. For were Belus, or Jupiter Belus, the Son of Neptune by Lithia the Daughter of Epaphus, or were he the Son of Talgamus, according to Eusebius; yet it is agreed that Cecrops then ruled in Attica: and in the end of Cecrops his time, faith S. Augustin, Moses left Egypt: Agenor successful living at once with Joshua. Now that Agenor returned about the same time into the Territory of Zidon, I cannot doubt: neither do I deny, but that he gave that Region the name of Phœnicia, in honour of his Son. But instead of the building of Tyre and Zidon, it is probable that he repaired and fortified both: and therefore was called a Founder, as Semiramis and Nebuchodonosor were of Babylon.

For be it true, that Agenor was of the same Nation, and brought up in Egypt: where he learnt the use of Letters (Egypt flourished in all kind of Learning in Moses's time) or were he by Nation an Egyptian; yet it is very likely that either he came to have his own Territory; or otherwise to defend the coast of Canaan from the Israelites, who were by Moses led out of Egypt, to the great loss and dishonour of that Nation: and by Joshua conducted over Jordan to conquer and possess the Canaanites Land. For though the Egyptians, by reason of the loss which they received by the hand of God in the Red Sea, and by the ten Plagues cast on them before that, and by the slaughter of so many of the male Children at the same time; could not at the first know had so many powerful Nations to defend it; the Deserts inter-jacent, and the strong Edomites, Emorites, and Ammonites their borderers; yet Egypt having such Vessels or Ships, or Gallies, as were then in use, did not in all probability neglect to garison the Sea-coast; or assist Agenor with such forces as they had to spare; and which they might perform with the greater facility, in that the Philistines, which held the shores of Canaan next adjoining unto them, were their Friends and Confederates.

Now, as it appeareth by the course of the story, those Cities of Phœnicia, which Agenor was said to have built (that is, to have fortified and defended against Joshua, and against the Tribes after him, as Zidon, Sor, or Tyre, by Joshua called the strong City Accho, after word Ptolemais, Accho, and Dor) were all that Phœnicia had in those days.

That the Kings of Phœnicia were mighty, especially by Sea, it appears, first by their defence against Israel: Secondly, by this, that David & Solomon could not master them, but were glad of their alliance: Thirdly, that one of their Cities, though they were then but Regulus, defended it self thirteen years against a King of Kings, Nebuchodonosor: and that Alexander the great (who being made victorious by the providence of God, seemed unresistible) spent more time in the recovery of Tyre, than in the conquest of all the Cities in Asia.

Other opinions there are, as that of Berosus found of Josephus, who conceives that Tyre was founded by Tyris the Son of Japhet. And for the Region it self, though Calisthenes derives it, as ab arbore dactylorum; and the Greeks from the word Phœnix of slaughter, because the Phœnicians slew all that came on their coasts; yet for my self, I take it that Phœnix the Son of Agenor gave it that name. But that either Agenor in Phœnicia, or Cadmus his Son in Greece, were the Inventors of Letters it is ridiculous: and therefore the dispute unnecessary.

The Ethiopians affirm, that Atlas, Orion, Orpheus, Linus, Hercules, Prometheus, Cadmus, and others, had from them the first light of all those Arts, Sciences, and civil Policies, which they afterward professed and taught others: and that Pythagoras himself was instructed by the Ethiopians; to wit, from the South and Superior Egyptians: from whom those which inhabited nearer the out-let of Nilus, as they say, borrowed their Divinity and Philosophy; and from them the Greeks, then barbarous, received Civility. Again, the Phœnicians challenge this invention of Letters and Learning, acknowledging nothing from the Egyptians at all; neither do they allow that Agenor and his Sons were Africains; whence Lucan,

*Phœnices primi (fame si credider) ausi,
Monsæran vultus vocem signare figuris.
Phœniciani fuit (if fame may credit have)
In rude Characters dar'd our words to grave.*

Lucan. l. 5.
3.

And that Cadmus was the Son of Agenor, and was a Phœnician, and not an Egyptian, it appeareth by that answer made by Zeno; when he in a kind of reproach was called a Stranger, and a Phœnician.

*Si patria est Phœnix, quid tum; nam Cadmus & ipse Athen. 1.
Phœnix; cui debet Græcia docta libros.* Dign.

If a Phœnician born I am, what then?
Cadmus was so to whom Greece owes
The Books of learned Men.

Out of doubt the Phœnicians were very ancient: and from the Records and Chronicles of Tyre, Josephus the Historian confirms a great part of their Antiquities. The Thurians again subscribe to none of these reports; but affirm constantly, that the great Zamolxis flourished among them, when Atlas lived in Mauritania, Nilus and Vulcan in Egypt, and Oculus in Phœnicia. Yea, some of the French do not blush to maintain, that the ancient Gauls taught the Greeks the use of Letters, and other Sciences. And do not we know that our Bards and Druids are as ancient as those Gauls, and that they sent their Sons hither to be by them instructed in all kind of Learning?

Lastly, whereas others bestow this invention on Moses: the same hath no probability at all; for he lived at such time as Learning and Arts flourished most both in Egypt and Assyria, and he himself was brought up in all the Learning of the Egyptians, from his infancy.

But true it is, that Letters were invented by those excellent Spirits of the first Age, and before the general Flood, either by Seth or Enos, or by whom else God knows; from whom all Wildom and Understanding hath proceeded. And as the same infinite God is present with all his Creatures, so hath he given the same invention to divers Nations; whereof the one hath not had commerce with the other, as well in this as in many other knowledges; for even in Mexico, when it was first discovered, there were found written Books after the manner of those Hieroglyphicks, antiently used by the Egyptians, and other Nations: and so had those Americans, a kind of Heraldry; and their Princes differing in Arms and Scutcheons, like unto those used by the Kings and Nobility of other Nations: For a naturalis communis, & generalis, &c. Natural Laws are common, and general.

S. II.

Of the Kings of Tyre.

BUT whatsoever remaineth of the Story and Kings of Phœnicia (the Books of Zeno, Sachonius, Musæus, and others of that Nation, being now where found) the same is to be gathered out of the Scriptures, Josephus, and Theophilus Antiochenus. Agenor lived at once with Joshua, to whom succeeded Phœnix, of whom that part of Canaan, and so far towards the North as Aradus, took the name of Phœnicia: what King succeeded Phœnix it doth not appear; but at such time as the Greeks besieged Tyre, Phœnis governed Phœnicia.

In Jeremies time, and while Jehoiakim ruled in Juda, the Tyrans had a King apart: for Jeremy speaketh C. 23. v. 3. of the Kings of Zidon, of Tyre, of Edom, &c. as of several Kings.

In Xerxes time, and when he prepared that incredible Army wherewith he invaded about Tyre and Zidon: who commanded, as some Writers affirm, Xerxes's Fleet or rather, as I suppose those 300 Gallies, which himself brought to his aid: for at this time it seemeth, that the Phœnicians were Tributaries to the Perfians: for being broken into Regals, and petty Kings in Terræ time they were subjected by Nebuchadonisor, of whose conquests in the Chapter before remembered, Jeremias prophethed.

Tennes, though not immediately, succeeded Tennamus, remembered by D. Siculus in his fourthenth Book.

Strato, his successor, and King of Zidon, Alexander Macedon threw out, because of his dependency upon Darius, & that his Predecessors had served the East Empire against the Græcians. But divers Kings, of whom there is no memory, came between Tennes and Strato. For there were consumed 130 years, and somewhat more, between Xerxes and Alexander Macedon. And this Man was by Alexander esteemed the more unworthy of retribution, because (saith Curcius) he rather submitted himself by the indignation of his Subjects (who forelaw their utter ruin by resistance) than that he had any disposition thereunto, or bare any good affection towards the Macedonians.

Of this Strato, Abenians, out of Theopompus reporteth, that he was a Man of ill living, and molt voluptuous: also that he appointed certain Games and Prizes for Women-Dancers and Singers, whom he to this end chiefly invited, and assembled: that having beheld the most beautiful and lively among them, he might recover them for his own use and delights. Of the strange accident about the death of one Strato King of these coasts, St. Hieronymus and others make mention: who having heard that the Perfians were near him with an Army too weighty for his strength, and finding that he was to hope for little grace, because of his falling away from that Empire, and his adhering to the Egyptians, he determining to kill himself, wrested the Sword out of his hand, and slew him: which done, the also therewith pierced her own body, and died.

After Alexander was possessor of Zidon, and the other Strato driven thence, he gave the Kingdom to Elephibius to dispose of: who having received great entertainment of one of the Citizens, in whose house he lodged, offered to recompence him therewith: but this Citizen, no less virtuous than rich, desired: Elephibius that this honour might be conferred on some one of the blood and race of their ancient Kings: and presented unto him Balaminus, whom Curcius calls Abdominus; Justine, Abdominus; and Plutarch, Alyonius: who at the very hour that he was called to this regal Estate, was with his own hands working in his Garden, setting herbs and roots, for his relief and sustenance: though otherwise a wife Man, and exceeding just.

These were the chief Kings of Zidon: whose Estate being afterwards changed into Popular or Aristocratical, and by times and turns subjected to the Emperors of the East, there remaineth no further memory of them, than that which is formerly delivered in the Tribe of Asher.

The Kings of Tyre: who they were before Samuels time, it doth not appear: Josephus the Historian, as is said, had many things wherewith he garnished his Antiquities from the Tyrian Chronicles: and out of our Josephus and Theophilus Antiochenus, there may be gathered a defence of some twenty Kings of the Tyrans; but these Authors, though they both pretend to write out of Menander Ephesus, do in no sort agree in the times of their reigns, nor in other particulars.

Abibulus is the first King of the Tyrans, that Josephus and Theophilus remember, whom Theophilus calls Abemulus: the same perchance that the Son of Sirach mentioneth in his forty and sixth Chapter, C. 45. speaking of the Princes of the Tyrans.

To this Abibulus, Suron succeeded: if he be not one and the same with Abibulus. David (saith Justine, P. 1. p. 8. out of Eupolemus) constrained this Suron to pay 120 Tal. his Tribute, of whom also David complaineth, 1. Sam. 8.3.

Hiram succeeded Suron, whom Josephus calls Irom, and Theophilus sometime Hieronimus, sometimes Hieromus, but Tatian and Zonaras, Chiron. He entered into a league with David, and sent him Cedar, with Malons and Carpenters, to perform his buildings in Jerusalem, after he had beaten thence the Philistines. The fame was he that so greatly afflicted Solomon: whom he not only furnished with Cedar, and other Materials towards the raising of the Temple, and with great sums of Money, but also he toyed with him in his enterprize of the East Indage of Ophir: and furnished Solomon with Mariners and Pilots: the Tyrans being of all Nations the most excellent Navigators: and lent him 120 Talents of Gold. Of this Hiram, there is not only mention in divers places of Scripture, but in Josephus's Antiquities, the 7. and 8 Chap. 2. & 3. in Theophilus's third book, in Tatian's his Oration against the Græcians; and in Zonaras, Tome the first. This Prince seemeth to be very mighty and magnificent: and to despise the twenty Towns which Solomon offered him: he defendeth himself against that victorious King David: and gave his Daughter in marriage to Solomon, called the Zidonian: for whose sake he was contented to worship Asherah, the Idol of the Phœnicians. Hiram lived 53 years.

Balazarus, whom Theop. Antiochenus calleth Bathor, succeeded Hiram King of Tyre and Zidon, and reigned seven years, according to Josephus.

Abdasturus the eldest Son of Balazarus, governed nine years, and lived but twenty years according to Josephus: but after Theophilus, he reigned twelve years, and lived 54, who being slain by the four Sons of his own Nurfe, the eldest of them held the Kingdom twelve years.

Asturnus Brother to Abdasturus, recovered the Kingdom from this Usurper, and reigned twelve years.

Asturnus, or Arharinus, after Theophilus, a third Brother, followed Asturnus, and ruled nine years, and lived in all fifty four.

Pheltes the fourth Son of Balazarus, and Brother to the three former Kings, flew Asturnus, and reigned eight Months, and lived fifty years.

Ithobalus (or Ithobalus, in Theophilus) Son to the third Brother Asturnus, who was the chief Priest of the Goddes Astarta, which was a dignity next unto the King, revenged the death of his Father, and slaughtered his Uncle Pheltes: and reigned thirty two years, the same which in the first of Kings chap. 16. is called Ethbaal, whose Daughter Jezabel Abah married.

Badezor, or Bazor the Son of Ithobalus, or Ethbaal, Brother to Jezabel, succeeded his Father, and reigned six years, and lived in all forty five.

Mattinus succeeded Badezor, and reigned but nine years (saith Josephus) he had two Sons, Pycmarion, and Earcus, and two Daughters, Elisa and Anna.

Pycmarion reigned after Mattinus his Father forty Years, and lived fifty six. In the seventh Year of whose reign, Elisa sailed into Africa, and built Carthage, 143 Years and 8 Months after the Temple of Solomon: which by our account was 289 Years after after Troy was taken, and 143 before Rome: & therefore that fiction by Virgil of Aeneas and Dido must be far out of square. For Pycmarion covetous of Sichus his riches, who had married his Sister Elisa, slew him traitorously as he accompanied him in hunting: or if we believe Justine and Virgil, at the Altar: whereupon Elisa fearing to be disposed of her Husband's Treasure, fled by Sea into Africa, as afore said: whom when Pycmarion prepared to pursue, he was by his Mothers tears, and by threats from the Oracle arrested. Barea accompanied his Sister, and afflicted her in the erection of Carthage: and from him sprang that noble Family of the Barea in Africa, so long race descended many famous Captains, and the great Hannibal. Servius interprets this name of Dido by Virago, because of her manlike acts: others from Jedidia, a surname of Solomon.

Eulens succeeded Pycmarion, and reigned thirty six years: the fame that overthrow the Fleet of Salamasser, in the Port of Tyre: notwithstanding which he continued his siege before it on the Land side five Years, but in vain.

After Eulens, Ethobalus governed the Tyrans, who wanted himself to be as wife as David: and that he knew all secrets (saith Eckard) of whom the Prophet writteth at large in his twenty eight Chapter: out of whom it is gathered, that this Prince died, or was slain in that long siege of Nebuchadonisor: who surrounded and attempted Tyre thirteen Years together, ere he prevailed.

Baal followed Ethobalus, and reigned ten Years a tributary, perchance, to Nebuchadonisor: for after his death, it was governed by divers Judges, succeeding each other: first by Ecnibulus, then by Chelbis, Aharis the Priest, Mitonus, and Gerasius, who held it among them some seven Years, and odd Months: after whom Balazarus commanded therein as a King for one Year: after him Merbalus sent from Babylon four Years after him Irom, sent thence also twenty Years. In the seventeenth of whose reign Cyrus began to govern Perfia.

S. III.

Of Bofius his conceit, that the Edumæans inhabiting along the Red Sea, were the Progenitors of the Tyrans, and that the Tyrans from them received and brought into Phœnicia the knowledge of the true God.

Of the great mutations of this Kingdom and State of the Tyrans, mixed with a discourse of divers other Nations, there is one Bozias that hath written a Treatise at large, intitled, De ruinis Genium. And although the great and many alterations found in this and other Cities, yet is all things under Heaven, have proceeded from his ordinance, who only is unchangeable and the same for ever; yet whereas the said Bozias, enforcing here hence, that the prosperity and ruine of the Tyrans were fruits of their embracing or forsaking the true Religion; to prove this his assertion, I suppose the Tyrans to have been Edumæans, descended from Ely Jacob Brother: first it can hardly be believed that Tyre, when it flourished most in her ancient glory, was in any sort truly devout and religious. But to this end (besides the proof which the Scriptures built give of Hiram good affection, when Solomon built the Temple) he brings many conjectural Arguments; whereof the frontlet is their pedigree and descent: being likely in his opinion, that the posterity of Ely received from him by Tradition the Religion of Abraham and Isaac.

That the Tyrans were Edumæans, he endeavours to shew, partly by weak reasons painfully strained from some affinity of names, which are arguments of more deliquit than weight: partly by authority. For Sorabe, Herodotus, Pliny, and others, witness, that the Tyrans came from the Red Sea, in which there were three Islands, called Tyru, Aradus, and Zidon: which very names (as he thinketh) were afterwards given to the Cities of Phœnicia. Considering therefore that all the coast of the Red Sea, was (in his opinion) under the Edumæans: as Elah and Ejofabab, or under the Amalekites, who defended of Amalec the Nephew of Ely, whose chief City was Madian, so called of Madian the Son of Abraham by Ceturah, whose posterity did people it: the consequence appears good (as he takes it) that the Tyrans originally were Edumites: differing little or nothing in Religion from the Children of Israel. Hereunto he adds, that Cadmus and his Companions brought not into Greece the Worship of Astartis the Idol of the Sidamians: That the Parents of Thales and Pherecydes being Phœnicians, themselves differed much in their Philosophy from the Idolatrous customs of the Græks. That in Temas a Town of the Edumæans, was an University, wherein, as may appear by Eliphas the Temanite, who disputed with Job, Religion was sincerely taught.

Such is the discourse of Bozias, who labouring to prove one Paradox by another, deserves but very little credit. For neither doth it follow, that if the Tyrans were Edumæans, they were then of the true Religion, or well affected to God and his people: neither is it true that they were Edumæans at all. In what Religion Ely brought up his Children, it is no where found written: but that himself was a profane Man, and disavowed by God, the Scriptures in plain terms express. That his Posterity were Idolaters, is directly proved in the twenty fifth Chapter of the second Book of Chronicles. That the Edumites were perpetual enemies to the House of Israel, have only when David & some of his race, Kings of Juda, held them in subjection, who knows not? or who is ignorant of David's unfriendly behaviour amongst them, when first they were subdued? Surely, it was not any argument of Kindred or Alliance between Tyru and Mount Sair, that Hiram held such good correspondence with David; even then when Job slew all the males of Edom: neither was it for their devotion to God, and good affection to Israel, that the Edumites were so ill treated. It seemeth that the piety and ancient wildom of Eliphas, the Temanite was then forgotten, and the Edumæans punished, for being such as David in his own days found them. Although indeed the City of Teman whence Eliphas came to reason with Job, is not that in Edumæa, but another of the same name, lying East from the Sea of Galilee, and adjoining to Hu, the Country of Job: and to Swah the City of Bildad the Shu: as both such Chenogaphers who best knew those parts, do plainly shew, and the holy Text maketh manifest. For Job is said to have exceeded in riches, and Solomon in wisdom all the People of the East: not the Inhabitants of Mount Sair, which lay due South from Palestina. True it is, which lay due South from Edom had a Son called Teman: but that Fathers were wont in those days to take name of their Sons, no where find. And Ismael also had a Son called Thema: of whom it is not unlike that Teman in the East had the name: for as much as in the seventh Chapter of the Book of Judges, the Mishmies, Amalekites, and all they of the East are called Ismaelites. He that well considers how great and strong a Nation Ismael was, which durst give battle to the Host of Abrah, wherein were 60000 able men, will hardly believe that such a people were descended from one of Ely his grand-children. For how powerful and numberless must the forces of all Edom have been, if one Tribe of them, yea, one Family of a Tribe had been so great?

greatly surely Mount Seir and all the Regions adjoining could not have held them. But we no where find that Edom had to do with Amalec, or allited the Amalekites, when Saul went to root them out. For Amalec, is no where in Scripture named as a Tribe of Edom: but a Nation of Itself, if distinct from the Ishmaelites. The like may be said of Midian, that the Founder thereof being Son to Abraham by Cetura, doubtless was no Edomite. And thus much in general for all the Seignior of the Red Sea coast, which Bozium imagines the Edomites to have held: if the Edomites in after-times held some places as Elan and Esfangaber on the Red Sea shore, yet in Moses' time, which was long after the building of Tyre, they held them not. For Moses himself saith, that Israel did compass all the borders of Edom: within which limits had Midian stood, Moses must needs have known it: because he had sojourned long in that Country: and there had left his Wife and Children, when he went into Egypt.

But conjectural Arguments, how probable soever are needless in so manifest a case. For in the 83 Palm, Edom, Amalec and Tyre, are named as distinct Nations: yea the Tyrians and Sidonians being one peoples all good Authors shew, and Bozium himself confesseth were Canaanites, as appears Gen. 10. 15, 19. appointed by God to have been destroyed, and their Lands given to the Children of Israel, Jos. 29. because they were ever Idolaters, and of the cursed Seed of Canaan, not Cousins to Israel, nor professors of the same Religion. For though Hiram said, Blessed be God that hath sent King David a wife Sonwe cannot infer that he was of David's Religion. The Turk hath said as much of Christian Princes, his confederates. Certain it is, that the Sidonians then worshipped Astarte, and drew Solomon also to the same Idolatry.

Whereas Hiram aided Solomon in building the Temple, he did it for his own ends, receiving therefore of Solomon great provision of Corn and Oyl, and the offer of twenty Towns and Villages in Galilee. And if we rightly consider things, it will appear that Hiram in all points dealt Merchant-like with Solomon. He allowed him Timber, with which Libanus was, and yet is over-pelted, being otherwise apt to yield Silks as the Andarion Silks which come from thence, and other good Commodities. For Corn and Oyl, which he wanted, he gave that which he could well spare to Solomon. Also Gold for Land: wherein Solomon was the wiser, for who having got the Gold first, gave to Hiram the worst Villages that he had; with which the Tyrian was ill pleased. But it was a necessary Policy, which enforced Tyre to hold League with Israel. For David had subdued Abah, Ammon, Edom, the Amatites, and a great part of Arabia, even to Euphrates: through which Countries the Tyrians were wont to carry and recarry their Wares on Camels, to their Fleets on the Red Sea, and back again to Tyre: So that Solomon being Lord of all the Countries through which they were to pass, could have cut off all their Trade.

But the Israelites were no Seamen, and therefore glad to share with the Tyrians in their Adventures. Yet Solomon, as Lord of the Sea-towns, which his Father had taken from the Philistines, might have greatly distressed the Tyrians, and perhaps have brought them even into subjection. Which Hiram knowing, was glad (and no marvel) that Solomon rather meant as a Man of Peace to employ his Father's Treasure in magnificent Works, than in pursuing the Conquest of all Syria. Therefore he willingly aided him, and sent him cunning Workmen, to increase his delight in goodly Buildings, Imageries, and Instruments of Pleasure.

As these Passages between Solomon and Hiram, are no strong Arguments of Piety in the Tyrians: so those other Proofs which Bozium frames Negatively upon particular Examples, are very weak. For what the Religion of Cadmus was, I think, no Man knows. It seems to me, that having more cunning than the Greeks, and being very ambitious, he would fain have purchased Divine Honours: which his Daughters, Nephews, and others of his House obtained, but his own many Misfortunes beguiled him of such hopes, if he had any. Thales and Pherecydes are but single Examples. Every salvage Nation hath some whose Wisdom excelleth the Vulgar, even of civil People. Neither did the moral Wisdom of these Men express any true knowledge of the true God. Only they made no good mention of the Gods of Greece; whom being newly come thither, they knew not. It is no good Argument to say, that Cadmus and Thales being Tyrians, are not known to have taught Idolatry, therefore the Tyrians were not Idolaters. But this is of force, that Carthage, Urica, Lepus, Cadiz, and all Colonies of the Tyrians (of which, I think, the Islands before mentioned in the Red Sea to have been, for they traded in all Seas) were Idolaters, even from their first beginnings: therefore the Tyrians who planted them, and to whom they had reference, were so likewise.

This their Idolatry, from Solomon's Time onwards, is acknowledged by Bozium, who would have us think them to have been formerly a strange kind of devout Edomites. In which fancy he is peremptory, that he filth Men of contrary Opinion, impious politics, as if it were impertinent to think that God (who even among the Heathen, which have not known his Name, doth favour Vertue, and hate Vice) hath often rewarded moral Honesty, with temporal Happinefs. Doubtless this Doctrine of Bozium, would better have agreed with Julian the Apostate, than with Cyril. For if the Assyrians, Greeks, Romans, and all those Nations of the Gentiles, did then prosper most, when they drew nearest unto the true Religion: What may be said of the foul Idolatry which grew in Rome, as fast as Rome it self grew; and was enlarged with some new Superstition, almost upon every new Victory? How few great Battles did the Romans win, in which they vowed not either a Temple to some new God, or some new Honour to one of their old Gods? Yea, what one Nation, save only that of the Jews, was subdued by them, whose Gods they did not afterward entertain in their City? Only the true God, which was the God of the Jews, they rejected, upbraiding the Jews with him, as if he were unworthy of the Roman Majesty. Shall we hereupon enforce the lead and foolish conclusion, which Heathen Writers used against the Christians in the Primitive Church; That such Idolatry had caused the City of Rome to flourish; and that the decay of those Abominations, did also bring with it the decay of the Empire? It might well be thought so, if Prosperity were a Sign or Effect of true Religion. Such is the blind Zeal of Bozium, who writing against those whom he fallily terms Impious, gives strength to such as are impious indeed. But such infidelity is usually found among Men of his humour; who having once either foolishly imbraced the Dreams of others, or vainly fashioned in their own Brains, any strange Chimeras of Divinity, condemn all such in the pride of their Zeal, as Atheists and Infidels, that are not transposed with the like intemperate Ignorance.

Great

Great pity it is, that such mad Dogs are often-times encouraged by those, who having the command of many Tongues, when they themselves cannot touch a Man in open and generous opposition, will wound him secretly by the malicious virtue of an Hypocrite.

CHAP. IX.

Of the Tribe of Ephraim; and of the Kings of the Ten Tribes, whose Head was Ephraim.

S. I.

Of the memorable Places in the Tribe of Ephraim.

HAVING now past over Phoenicia, we come to the next Territory adjoining; which is that of Ephraim, sometime taken, per excellentiam, for the whole Kingdom of Israel. Ephraim was the second Son of Joseph; whose Issues, when they left Egypt, were in number 45000; all which dying in the Deserts, (Joseph excepted) there entered the Holy Land of their Children, grown to be able Men, 22500, who sat down on the West side of Jordan, between Manasse and Benjamin: who bounded Ephraim by the North and South; as Jordan and the Mediterranean Sea, by the East and West.

The first and chief City which Ephraim had, was Samarra, the Metropolis of the Kingdom of Israel, built by Amri, or Omri, King thereof, and seated on the top of the Mountain Somron, which overlooketh all the bottom, and as far as the Sea-coast. It was afterward called Scheff, or Asyph, in honour of Augustus Caesar. This City is often remembered in the Scriptures: and magnificent it was in the first Building; for as Brochard observeth, the Ruins which yet remain, and which Brochard found greater than those of Hierusalem, tell those that behold them, what it was when it stood upright: for to this day there are found great store of goodly Marble Pillars, with other hewn and carved Stone, in great abundance, among the Rubbish.

It was beaten to the ground by the Sons of Hycan, the High Priest: restored and built by the first Herod, the Son of Antipater; who, to flatter Cesar, called it Scheff. Herein were the Prophets Heliem, and Abdias buried; and so was John Baptist. It now hath nothing but a few Cottages filled with Gracian Monks.

Near Samarra towards the South, is the Hill of Bethel, and a Town of that name; on the top of which Mountain Jerobam erected one of his Golden Calves to be worshipped; with which he seduced the Israelites.

In sight of this Mountain of Bethel, was that ancient City of Sichem; after the Restauration called Neapolis, now Pelusa, and Napalasa: It was destroyed by Simon and Levi, in revenge of the ravishment of their Sister Dina: and after that by Abimelech evened with the Soil. Jerobam raised it up again; and the Damascens a third time call it down.

Under Sichem, towards the Sea, standeth Pharaton, or Pirathon, on the Mountain Amalec, the City of Abdon Judg of Israel. And under it Bethoron of the Levites, built, as it is said, by Sara, the Daughter of Ephraim. Near to this City, Judas Machabeus overthrew Seron and Zylus, Lieutenants to Antiochus. This City had Solomon formerly repaired and fortified.

Between Bethoron and the Sea, standeth Sanir, of which Jos. 10. and Saron, whose King was slain by Josiah: it is also mentioned Alt. 9. 35. And of this Saron the Valley taketh name; which beginning at Casaria Palestina, extendeth it self almost the Coast as far as Joppe, faith Adrichom. Tho indeed the Name Saron is not particularly given to this Valley, but to every fruitful plain Region; for not only this Valley is so called, to wit, between Casaria and Joppe, but that also between the Mountain Tabor and the Sea of Galilee; for so St. Jerome, upon Ezay 35. interprets the word Saron: and so doth the same Father, in his Commentaries upon Abdia, read Saron for Assaron; understanding thereby a Plain near Lidda: which Lidda, in his time, was called Diopolis, or the City of Jupiter, one of the Topharchies of Judea, the fifth in dignity, (or the third after Pliny) where S. Peter (non sua sed Christi virtute) cured Aeneas. Niger calls all that Region, from Amir to Joppe, Saron. This Joppe was burnt to the ground by the Romans, those Ravens and Spoilers of all Estates, disturbers of Common Weals, usurpers of other Princes Kingdoms, who with no other respect led, than to amplify their own Glory, troubled the whole World: and themselves, after murdering one another, became a prey to the most salvage and barbarous Nations.

In Diopolis (faith Will. of Tyre) was S. George of this S. beheaded, and buried: in whose Honour and Memory, Justinian the Emperor caused a fair Church to be built over his Tomb: these be Tyrius his words; Relicta a dextris locis martiris Antipatrides & Joppe, per late patetent planitiem Eleutheriam pertransientes, Liddam que est Diopolis, ubi & egregii Martyrii Georgii ejus; hodie Sepulchrum ostenditur, pervenerunt, ejus Ecclesiam quidem ad honorem ejusdem Martyrii pius & orthodoxus Princeps Romanorum, Augustus Justinianus multo studio & devotione prompta edificari preceperat, &c. They having left (faith he) on the right hand, the Sea Towns Antipatris and Joppe, passing over the great open Plain of Eleutheria, came to Lidda, which is Diopolis; where the sumptuous Tomb of the famous Martyr S. George is at this day shewed: whose Church, when the Gothic and Orthodox Prince of the Romans, High and Mighty Justinian, had commanded to be built, with great earnestness and present devotion, &c. Thus far Tyrius, by whose Testimony we may conjecture, that this S. George was not that Arrian Bishop of Alexandria, but rather some better Christian; for this of Alexandria, was slain there in an uproar of the People, and his Ashes cast into the Sea, as Amianus Marcellinus Reports. And yet also it may be, that this Georgius was a better Christian than he is commonly thought: for his words of the

D Temple

In the time of Ezekiel King of Juda, certain of this Tribe being straitened in their own Territories, pallied to Geder, as it is 1 Chron. 4. 39. (the same place which Josh. 15. 36. is called Gedera and Gederobabaima) which at that time was inhabited by the Ilseu of Cham; where they feared themselves: as also five hundred others of this Tribe, destroyed the Reliques of Amalec in the Mountains of Edom, and dwelt in their places.

The Mountains within this Tribe are few, and that of Samson the chiefest; unto which he carried the Gate-post of Gaza. The Rivers are Bejor, and the Torrent of Egypt called Shebar, as is noted in Affer.

§. III.

The Tribe of Juda.

OF Juda, the four Son of Jacob by Lea, there were multiplied in Egypt 74600; all which (Caleb excepted) perished in the Defarts. And of their Sons, there entered the Land of Canaan 70500 bearing Arms. Agreeable to the greatness of this number, was the greatest Territory given, called afterward Judaea; within the bounds whereof, were the Portions allotted to Dan, and Simoon, included.

And many Cities named in these Tribes, did first, as they say, belong unto the Children of Juda, who had a kind of Sovereignty over them; as Succoth, Carathianim, Lachis, Bejsefmes, Tiglas, Bertheba, and others.

The multitude of People within this small Province (if it be meted by that ground given to this Tribe only) were incredible, if the Witnesses of the Scriptures had not warranted the Report. For when David numbered the People, they were found five hundred thousand fighting Men.

The Cities of Juda were many: But I will remember the chiefest of them; beginning with Arad, or Flarna, which standeth in the entrance of Judaea from Idumaea: whose King first surprized the Israelites, as they passed by the Border of Canaan towards Moab; and took from them some Spoils, and many Prisoners: who being afterward overthrown by the Israelites, the Sons of Ken, the Kinmen of Moses, obtained a Possession in that Territory: who before the coming of the Israelites, dwell between Madian and Amalek.

Following this Frontier toward Idumaea and the South, Afcesu Scorpionis, or Acraabim is placed, the next to Arad; so called, because of Scorpions which are said to be in that place: from which name of Acraabim, Jerom thinks that the name of the Toparchie, called Acraabathena, was denominated; of which we have spoken in Madanes.

On the South side also of Judaea, they place the Cities of Jagar, Dimona, Adada, Cedes, Alpha, Yelmam, and Afor, or Chafzor, most of them Frontier Towns.

And then Ziph: of which there are two places so called: one besides this in the body of Judaea, of which the Defart and Forrell adjoining took name; where David hid himself from Saul.

After these are the Cities of Efron, Adar, Narkah, and Afenona, or Hafson, of no great fame.

Turning now from Idumaea, towards the North, we find the Cities of Danna, Shemab, Amam, the other Afor, or Chafzor, Betoloth, and the two Seches: of all which, see Josh. 15. also Carith, by Josh. 15. 25. called Kerith: whence Judas the Traitor was called Iscariath, as it were a Man of Carith. Then Hethan the abode of Samfon, which Rebubam redified. Beyond these, towards the North border, and towards Elushepropla, is the City of Yether, or Yathir, belonging to the Levites. In S. Jerom's time it was called Yethir, and inhabited altogether with Christians: Near unto this City was that remarkable Battle fought betwixt Asa King of Juda, and Zara King of the Arabians, who brought into the Field a Million of fighting Men; and was notwithstanding beaten and put to flight: Asa following the Victory as far as Gerar, which at the same time he recovered.

Not far from Yether, standeth Jarmuth, whose King was slain by Jehoiada, and the City overturned. Next unto it is Maresa, the native City of the Prophet Micha: Between it and Odalla, Judas Macchabeus overthrew Gorgias; and sent thence 10000 Drygans of Silver to be offered for Sacrifice.

Odalla, or Hadallam it self, was an ancient and magnificent City, taken by Jehoiada, and the King thereof slain. Jonathas Macchabeus beautified it greatly. Then Seila, or Keila, afterward Echela, where David sometime hid himself, and which afterward he delivered from the Assaults of the Philistines: near which the Prophet Abacuc was buried; whose Monument remained, and was seen by S. Jerom.

Near it is Hebron, sometime called the City of Abrah, for which the vulgar hath Carathabre: the reason of this name they give, as if it signified the City of four; because the four Patriarchs, Adam, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, were therein buried; but of Adam it is but supposed; and it is plain by the places, Josh. 14. 14. and 15. 13. and 20. 11. that Abrah here doth not signify four, but that it was the name of the Father of the Giants, called Anakim, whose Son, as it seems, Anak was; and Achimam, Shephai, and Talmai (whom Caleb expelled, Josh. 14. 15.) were the Sons of this Anak, Numb. 13. 23. The name of Anak signifieth Torquema, Chain worn for ornament: and it seems that this Anak, enriched by the Spoils which himself and his Father got, wore a Chain of Gold, and so got this Name: and leaving the Custom to his Posterity, left also the Name: so that in Latin the name of Anakim, may not amiss be expounded by Torquati.

The City Hebron was one of the ancientest Cities of Canaan; built seven years before Taan, or Tana in Egypt: and it was the head and chief City of the Anakims, whom Caleb expelled: to whom it was in part given; to wit, the Villages adjoining, and the rest to the Levites. It had a Bishop in the Christian times, and a magnificent Temple built by Helen the Mother of Constantine.

Not far hence they find Elmushepropla, or the free City, remembered often by S. Jerom. Then Eglon, whose King Dabir associated, with the other four Kings of the Amorites, to wit, of Jerusalem, Joloth, Jarmuth, and Lachis, besieging the Gibeonites, were by Jehoiada utterly overthrown. From hence the next City of fame was Emam, afterward Nicopolis, one of the Cities of Government, or Prefidencies of Judaea. In the sight of this City, Judas Macchabeus (after he had formerly beaten both Apollonius and Seron) gave a third overthrow to Georgias Lieutenant to Antiochus.

In the year 1301, it was overturned by an Earthquake, saith Eusebius. In the Christian times it had a Bishop's Seat, of the Dioceses of Cæ-Broch-Bethsaria of Palestine.

FROM

From Emam towards the West Sea there are the Cities of Nahama, Bethdagon, and Gader, or Gedera, or Gederobabaima, of which, and of Gederobab, * Jos. 15. 26. & 41. Then Secha, to which Jehoiada followed the Slaughter of the five Kings before named, a City of great Strength in the Valley of Jerusalem or Turpinne: As the Vulgar relate, it near unto Suez, and unto Lebna of the Levites. It revolted from the Subjection of the Jews, while Jeram the Son of Jehaphat ruled in Jerusalem: And next unto this standeth Maceda, which Jehoiada utterly spoiled.

On the other side of Emam, towards the East, standeth Bethbar, otherwise Beisjora, and Bethjor; one of the strongest, and most fought for places in all Juda: It is seated on a high Hill; and therefore called Bethjor (the House on the Rock, or the Stronghold). It was fortified by Rebubam, and afterward by Judas Macchabeus. Lysias took it, and Antiochus Eupator by Famine: Jonathas regained it: And it was by Simon exceedingly fortified against the Syrian Kings.

Bethleem is next unto it within fix miles of Jerusalem, otherwise Lehem, sometime Ephrata; which Name, they say, it had of Caleb's Wife, when as it is so called by Moses before Caleb was famous in those parts, Gen. 38. 16. Of this City was Abelam, or Isaac, Judge of Israel, after Jephthah, famous for the thirty Sons, and thirty Daughters, begotten by him. Elimelec was also a Bethleemite, who with his Wife Naomi sojourned in Moab during the Famine of Juda, in the time of the Judge, with whom Ruth, the Daughter-in-Law of Naomi returned to Bethleem, and married Boaz, of whom Obed, of whom Isai, of whom David. It had also the Honor to be the native City of our Saviour Jesus Christ: And therefore shall the memory thereof never end.

In Zabulon of Galilee there was also a City of the same Name; and therefore was this of our Saviour called Bethleem-Juda.

From Bethleem, some four or five miles, standeth Thecoa, the City of Amos the Prophet: And to this place adjoining is the City of Bethsacaria, in the way between Bethsara and Jerusalem; on whose Hills adjoining the glorious guilt Shields of Antiochus shined like Lamps of Fire in the Eyes of the Jews. The City of Betec was also near unto Bethleem, which also Adom-betec commanded; who had, during his Reign, tortured seventy Kings, by cutting off the Joyns of their Fingers and Toes, and made them gather Bread under his Table: But at length the fame end befel himself by the Sons of Juda, after they had taken him Prisoner.

The rest of the Cities in this part (most of them of no great Estimation) we may pass by, until we come to the magnificent Cattle of Heredium, which Herod erected on a Hill, mounting thereunto with 200 Marble Steps, exceeding beautiful and strong. And towards the Dead Sea, and adjoining to the Defart of Jeruel, between it and Tekoa, is that Climax Jerusalem, where in the time of Jehoiada, the Jews stood and look'd on the Moabites, Ammonites, and Edomites, maffacing one another, when they had purposed to joyn against Juda; near which place is the Valley of Blessing, where the Jews the fourth day after, solemnly came and blessed God for so strange Deliverance.

Now the Cities of Juda which border the dead Sea, are these; Aduran beautified by Rebubam and Tjibar, which the Vulgar calleth * Segor; so called, because Lot in his Prayer for it, urged that it was but a little onwhence it was called Tjibar, which signifieth a little one; when as the old name was Belah, as it is Gen. 14. 2. In the Romans times it had a Garrison, and was called (as they say) Pannier: In Herom's time Balezana. Then Engaddi, or Engaddi, first Ajalonchamar; near unto which are the Gardens of Bellamun, the best that the World had called Ophehnamun: The most part of all which Trees, Cleopatra, Queen of Egypt, sent for out of Juda; and Herod, who either feared or loved Antony her Husband, caused them to be rooted up, and preferred unto her; which the replanted near Helipolis in Egypt. This City was first taken by Chaloplaomer and the Amorites thence expelled. It was one of the most remarkable Cities of Judaea, and one of the Prefidencies thereof.

The rest of the Cities are many in the In-land, and among them Jefaz; not that which was the City of Naboth, of which already; but another of the same name, the City of Abichan, the Wife of David, the Mother of that Amnon, whom Abalam slew: Also, as some think, the City of Amale, Abalam's Lieutenant, and the Commander of his Army. But this seemeth to be an Error, grounded upon the nearness of the words, Israel, and Jefaz: And because the 2 Sam. 17. 25. Amale's Father is called a Jefazite, who first of the Chron. 2. 17. is called an Israelite: Indeed the Hebrew Orthography sheweth, that Amale's Father is not said to be of the City Jefaz, but an Israelite in Religion, though otherwise an Israelite.

In this Tribe there were many high Hills, or Mountains, as those of Engaddi upon the Dead Sea, and the Mountains of Juda, which begin to rise by Emam, and end near Tophna; and these part Juda from Dan and Simoon. Of others which stand single, there is that of Hebron: At the Foot whereof, was that Oak of Mambre, where the three Angels appeared to Abraham, which St. Hierome calleth in Fire-tree; and faith, that it stood till the time of Constantine the younger. There is also that Mount, called Collis Achilla on the South side of Ziph; on the Top whereof the great Herod, including the old Cattle, erected by Jonathas Macchabeus, and called Masfada, garnished it with seven and twenty high and strong Towers; and therein left Armor and Furniture for an hundred thousand Men, being, as it seemeth, a place unaccessible, and of incomparable Strength.

In the Valley afterward, called the Dead Sea, or the Lake Asphaltitis: This Country had four Cities, Adama, Sodom, Seboim and Gomorra, destroyed with Fire from Heaven for their unnatural Sins.

§. IV.

The Tribe of Reuben, and his Borders.

† I.

The Seats and Bounds of Midian, Moab, and Ammon, part whereof the Reubenites won from Sehon, King of Heshbon.

ON the other side of the Dead Sea, Reuben the eldest of Jacob's Sons inhabited of whose Children there were numbered at Mount Sina, 46000, who dying with the rest in the Defart, there remained to possess the Land Promisid 47000 bearing Arms. But before we speak of these or the rest that inhabited the East-side of Jordan, something of their Borderers, to wit, Midian, Moab, and Ammon, whose Land in our Writers are confusedly described, and not easily distinguished. And first, we are to remember, that out of Abraham's Kindred came many mighty Families; as by Isaac, and Jacob, the Nation called Israel, and after ward Jesus: By Elsu, or Edom, the Idumeans: By Ismael, the eldest Son of Abraham, the Ismaelites: And by Keturah, his last Wife, the Midianites. And again, by Lot, Abraham's Brother's Son, those two valiant Nations of the Moabites and Ammonites: All which being but Strangers in the Land of Canaan (formerly possessed by the Canaanites, and by the Families of them defended) these Illustrious and Alliances of Abraham, all but Jacob, whose children were bred in Aegypt, inhabited the Frontier Places adjoining.

Elsu and his Sons held Idumea, which bounded Canaan on the South. Ismael took to the South-east part of the Dead Sea: Stretching his Possession over all Arabia Petraea, and a part of Arabia the Desert, as far as the River of Tigris, from Suez to Havilah.

Moab took the left of the Coast of the Dead Sea, leaving a part to Midian; and passing over Arnon, inhabited the Plains between Jordan, and the Hills of Abirim, or Arnon, as far North as Essebon, or Chebon.

Ammon late down on the North-east side of Arnon, and possessed the Tract from Rabbah, afterwards Philadelphia, both within the Mountains of Gilead, and without them as far forth as Arer, though in Moab's Time he had nothing left him in all that Valley: For the Amorites had thrust him over the River of Jabok, as they had done Moab over Arnon. As these Nations compassed sundry parts of Canaan, so the Border between the River of Jabok and Danab was held by the Amorites themselves, with other mixt Nations: All which Territory on the East-side of Jordan, and on the East-side of the Dead Sea, was granted by Moses to the Tribe of Reuben, Gad, and Manasse; whereof that part which Moab had, was first possessed by the Emims, a Nation of Giants, weakened and broken by Chedorlaomer, after expelled by the Moabites, as before remembered. That which the Ammonites held, was the Territory, and ancient Possession of the Zamzumim, or Zurim, who were also beaten at the same time by Chedorlaomer, Amraphel, and the rest; and by them an easy way of conquest was prepared for the Ammonites.

Now where it is written, that Arnon was the Border of Moab, the same is to be understood according to the time when Moses wrote. For then had Sebon, or his Ancestor, beaten the Moabites out of the plain Countries, between Abirim and Jordan; and this happened not long before Moses Arrival upon that Border, when Vabai governed the Moabites. For he that ruled Moab, when Moses past Arnon, was not the Son of Vabai, but his Name was Balaac, the Son of Zippor. And it may be, that those Kings were Elective, as the Idumeans anciently were.

Now all that part of Moab, between Arnon and Jordan, as far North as Essebon, was inhabited by Reuben. And when Israel arrived there out of Aegypt, it was in the possession of Sebon, of the Race of Canaan, by Amorites; and therefore did Jephthah, the Judge of Israel, justly defend the regaining of those Countries against the claim of the Ammonites; because (as he alleged) Moses found them in the Possession of the Amorites, and not in the Hands of Moab, or Ammon, who (saith Jephthah) had three hundred years time to recover them, and did not: Whence he inferreth, that they ought not to claim them now.

And left any should marvel why the Ammonites in Jephthah's time should make Claim to these Countries; whereas Moses in the place, Numb. 21. ver. 26, rather accuses them to have been the ancient Possession of the Moabites than of the Ammonites: It is to be noted, that Deut. 3. 11, Ammonites: It is said, that the Iron Bed of Og was to be seen at Rabbah, the chief City of the Ammonites; it is also signified, that much of the Land of Og, which the Israelites possessed, was by him, or his Ancestors, given to the Ammonites, as much as Sebon's was from the Moabites.

And as the Canaanite Nations were feared so confidently together, that it was hard to distinguish them; so also were the Sons of Moab and Ammon, Midian, Amalek, and Ismael. Yet the Reason seemeth plain enough why Ammon commanded in chief in Jephthah's time: For sometimes the one Nation, sometimes the other of all those Borderers acquired the Sovereignty: And again, that one part of the Land which Gad held, namely within the Mountains of Gilead or Gilead, and as far South as Arer, belonged to the Ammonites. And therefore taking Advantage of the time, they fought to recover it. Yet at such time as Moses overthrew Sebon at Jabok, the Ammonites had lost to the Amorites all that part of their Possession which lay about Arer, Kings of the Amorites, having displaced both Moab and Ammon of all within the Mountains.

For it is written in the one and twentieth of Numb. ver. 24, that Israel conquered the Land of Sebon, from Arnon to Jabok, even unto the Children of Ammon; so as at this time the River of Jabok was the South Bound of Ammon, within the Mountains; whereas anciently they had also Possessions over Jabok, which at length the Gadites possessed; as in the thirteenth Chapter of Joshua, ver. 25, appears.

† II.

Of the memorable places of the Reubenites.

THE chief Cities belonging to Reuben were these, Kedemith, for which the Psalmist, without any Shew of Warren, readeth Jeshth. The Psalmist, or Hereme followed the Septuagint, those two verses 36, and 37, of 21 Jef being wanting in the old Hebrew Copies, and the Septuagint read Kedemith for Kedemith, which Kedon by writing, slip into Jeshth.

This City which they gave to the Levites, imports her Name to the Desart adjoining; from whence Moses sent his Embassage to Sebon. In the same place of Jeshth, where this Kedemith is mentioned, the Psalmist for Beiser or Beiser, reads Beiser in Isoludine Misur, without any Ground from the Hebrew: Whence Adrichomius makes a Town called Misur, in the Border between Reuben and Gad. Farther from Kedemith, near the Dead Sea (for the Country between being Mountainous, hath few Cities) they place two Towns of Note, Lela, or Leshab, of which Gen. 10. ver. 19, the Greeks call it Callitrois; near which there is a Hill, from whence there floweth Springs both of hot and cold, bitter and sweet Water, all which, soon after their Rising, being joined in one Stream, do make a very wholesome Bath, especially for all Contractions of Si-

news: To which Herod the Elder, when he was despatched of all other-Help, repaired; but in vain. Others say, that these Springs arise out of the Hills of Maachurus in this Tribe. The like Fountains are found in the Pyrenes, and in Peru, called, the Baths of the Kings. The other Town is Machurus, the next between Lela and Jordan, of all that part of the World the strongest Inland City and Castle, standing upon a Mountain, every way unaccessible. It was first fortified by Alexander Jannaeus, who made it a Frontier against the Arabians; but it was demolished by Gabinus in the War with Archelaus, (saith Jephthah). It was thither (saith Jephthah) that Herod sent John Baptist, and wherein he was slain: His Army looted after being utterly overthrown by Antas King of Arabia, and himself after this Murder never prospering. Not far from Machurus was Beiser, or Bosra, a Town of Refuge, and belonging to the Levites, and near it Levitas upon Jordan, which Herod built in Honour of Livia, the Mother of Tiberius Caesar.

To the North of Levitas is Setim, or Sittim, where the Children of Israel embraced the Daughters of Midian, or Moab; and where Phineas pierced the Body of Zimri and Cobi, with his Spear, bringing due Vengeance upon them, when they were in the midst of their Sin: And from hence Jesus sent the Discovers to view Jeshth, staying here until he went over Jordan. As for the Torrent Setim, which in this place Adrichomius dreams of, reading Jef. 18. irrigabit Torrentem Setim. The Valgar hath torrentem setimuram; and Junius, callem cedronem; expounding it not for any particular place in Canaan, but for the Church, in which the just being placed, grow as the Cedars, Psal. 62. 13.

The plain Country hereabout, by Moses, called the Plains of Moab, where he expounded the Book of Deuteronomy to the People, a little before his Death, is in the beginning of the same Book precisely bounded by Moses. On the South, it had the great Desert of Paran, where they had long wandered. On the East, it had Chasbun, and Dirabab of which two, the former is that Gazara, of which Proslum in Palaestina, the latter was a Traat belonging to the Nabathaei, in Arabia Petraea, where was * Machab, of which Gen. 16. 29, by the Geographers, called Madava and Medaba. On the West it had Jordan, and on the North, it had Leban (in Junius Edition, by the Fault of the Print, Lamban Deuterom. 1.1) the same which the Geographers call Livias; and some confound it with Lavias, of which even now we speak.

The plain Country hereabout, by Moses, called the Plains of Moab, where he expounded the Book of Deuteronomy to the People, a little before his Death, is in the beginning of the same Book precisely bounded by Moses. On the South, it had the great Desert of Paran, where they had long wandered. On the East, it had Chasbun, and Dirabab of which two, the former is that Gazara, of which Proslum in Palaestina, the latter was a Traat belonging to the Nabathaei, in Arabia Petraea, where was * Machab, of which Gen. 16. 29, by the Geographers, called Madava and Medaba. On the West it had Jordan, and on the North, it had Leban (in Junius Edition, by the Fault of the Print, Lamban Deuterom. 1.1) the same which the Geographers call Livias; and some confound it with Lavias, of which even now we speak.

Of which also we read in the Wars of David against Haron the Ammonites 1 Chron. 19. 7. Also 1 Macc. 9. 36. Esa. 16. 2. See before c. 9. 7.

Also on the same North side, towards the Confines of Callosra, it had Thepel, whereabout sometime Pella of Callosra stood; which was in the Region of Decapolis; and as Stephanus saith, was sometime called Butis. It is also noted in Moses to be over again, or near unto Supb, for which the Valgar hath the Red Sea; as also Numb. 2. 14, it translateth the word Supb in like manner whereas in this place of Deuteronomy, there is no Addition of any word in the Hebrew to signify the Sea; and yet the Scripture, when this Word is so to be taken, useth the Addition of Mara, thereby to distinguish it from the Region of Supb, or Supb, which doubtless was about these Plains of Moab, towards the Dead Sea; where the Country being full of Reeds, was therefore thus called: As also the Red Sea was called Mar Supb, for this reason.

The place in these large Plains of Moab, where Moses made those Divine Exhortations, some say, was Beitabara, where John baptized, which in Jef. 1. 22, the Story of Isaiah, is called Beitabara. Jephthah 1. 22, says, it was where after the City Abila stood, near Jordan, in a place for Abila; which was the same as Abel-shaim, in the Plains of Moab, Numb. 32. 49. (that some call Abel-shaim, and Abel-shaim) which is reckoned by Moses in that part of Numb. 10. 10, 10, 10, and last place of the Israelites encamping in the time of Moses. This place is also called Sittim; in which Word, if we should interpret, we should rather bring it from Cedars than from Thorns, with Adrichomius and others. It was the Wood of which the Ark of the Tabernacle was made.

Towards the East of these Plains of Moab, they place the Cities of Nabo, Baal-Maan, Sibma, and Heshon, the chief City of Sebon and Elial, and Kiriathab, the Seat of the Gittim Enim. Of these two first of Moab, Moses seems to give a Notice, that the Names were to be changed, because they tasted of the Moabites Idolatry. For Nabo (signified of which Junius El. 46. 1, reads Deu. 20. 16) was the Name of their Idol Oracle, and Baal-Maan is the Habitatio of Baal. Of the same Idol was the Hill Nabo in these parts denominated; from whose Top, which the common Translators call Phalgab, Moses, before his Death, saw all the Land of Canaan beyond Jordan. In which Story Junius does not take Phalgab, or Pisgab, for any proper Name; but for an Appellative, signifying a Hill: And so also Vatibab, in some places, as Numb. 21. 20, where he notes, that some call Pisgab that Top which looketh to Jeshth, and Hair, as it looketh to Moab, which Opinion may be somewhat strengthened by the Name of the City of Reuben, mentioned Jef. 12. 29, called Abelab-Pisgab, which is as much as decussus Pisgab, to wit, where the Waters did run down upon Pisgab. In the same place of Jeshth, there is also named Ber-peur, as belonging to Reuben: So called from the Hill Peur, from whence also Baal, the Idol, was called Baal-peur, which, they say, was the same as Prispar; the chief place of whose Worship seems to have been Bamith-Pisgab, of which also Jef. 13, in the Cities of Reuben and Benjamin, Numb. 22. 47, they read the high places hith 29. of Baal (for so the word signifieth) to which place Belak first brought Belshazzar, to curse the Israelites.

† III.

Of divers Places Bordering Reuben, belonging to Midian, Moab, or Edom.

THERE were besides these divers places of Note over Arnon, which adjoined to Reuben; a amongst which they place Gallim, the City of Phalti, to whom Saul gave his Daughter Mical from David: But Junius thinks this Town to be in Benjamin; gathering so much out of Jef. 10. ver. 29, where it is named among the Cities of Benjamin. With better Reason, perhaps, out of Numb. 21. v. 29, we may say, that Mathians and Nababai were in these Confines of Reuben, though which places the Israelites pass after, they had left the Wolf called Beer. Then Dilababam, which the Prophet Jeremias threatened with the rest of the Cities of Moab.

Madian also is found in these parts; the chief of the Madianites in Moab; but not that Midian, or Madian by the Red Sea, wherein Jehro inhabited: For of the Madianites there were two Nations, of which these of Moab became Idolaters, and received an exceeding Overthrow by a Regiment of twelve thousand Israelites, sent by Moses out of the Plains of Moab, at such time as Israel began to accompany their Daughters. Their five Kings, with Balaam the South-fayer, were then slain, and their Royal City, with the rest, destroyed. The other Madianites, over whom Jehro was Prince, or Priest, forgot not the God of Abraham, their Ancestor; but relieved and assisted the Israelites in their painful Travels, through the Deserts, and were in all that Passage their Guides. In the South Border of Moab, adjoining to Edom, and sometime reckoned as the Chief City of Edom, there is that Petra, which in the Scriptures is called Sela, which is as much as rupe or perra. It was called Tadibeth, as appears by the place, 2 Reg. 14. It was built (saith Josaphas) by Rezem, one of those five Kings of whom it was called Rezem. Now they say, it is called Crac and Mosera.

The Soldans of Egypt, for the exceeding Strength thereof, kept therein all their Treasures of Egypt and Arabia; of which it is the first and strongest City. The same, perhaps, which Pliny calleth Nabathæa, whence also the Province adjoining took Name; which Name seems to have been taken at first from Nabathab, the Son of Abraham, by Kezura. For Nabathæa is no where understood for all Arabia Petraea (at least where it is not misunderstood) but it is that Province which is neighboureth Judæa. For Pharan, inhabited by Israel, whose People Prohm called Pharanites, instead of Israelites, and all those Territories of the Cushites, Idumæans, Amalekites, Israelites, Edomites, Idumæans, the Lands of Moab, Ammon, Hur, Sin, and of Og, King of Bashan, were parts of Arabia Petraea; though it be also true, that some part of Arabia the Desert belonged to the Amalekites and Israelites: All which Nations the Scriptures in the first of Chronicles the fifth, calleth Hagarim, of Hagar.

This City Petra, Scavrus besieged with the Roman Army; and finding the place in few impregnable, he was content, by the persuasion of Antipater, to take a Composition of Money, and to quit it. Yet Amalas, King of Juda (after he had slaughtered ten thousand of the Arabians in the Valley called Salimarus) was also this City. St. Hieron finds Ruth the Moabitess, to be natural of this City. In the time when the Christians held the Kingdom of Jerusalem, it had a Latine Bishop, having before been under the Greek Church. It is feared not far from Hor, where Aaron died; and on the other side, towards the North, is the River of Zared, or Zered, by which Moses encamped in the thirty eighth Station. Adrichom describeth the Waters of Memrim, or rather Nemrim, in his Map of Reuben, not far hence, and between Zared and Arnon; and so he doth the Valley of Save: But the Waters of Nimra; or Beth-Nimra (for which it seems Adrichomius writ Nemrim) re-fers the Plains of Moab: And the Confluence of those Waters of Nimra are in the Tribe of Gad. Save also cannot be found in this place, that is, to the South of Arnon, and under Midian. For after Abraham returned from the pursuit of the Assyrians and Perfians Princes, the King of Sodom met him in the Valley of Save, or Shaweb, which is the King's Dale, where Abraham set up his Monument, as it seems, not far from Jerusalem. And at the same time Melchisedec, King of Salem, also encountered him. But Abraham coming from the North, and Melchisedec inhabiting, either near Beilan, otherwise Scythopolis, in the half Tribe of Manasse, or in Jerusalem (both places lying to the West of Jordan) could not encounter each other in Arabia: And therefore Save, which was also called the King's Dale, could not be in these parts.

† IV.

Of the Dead Sea.

Now, because the Sea of Sodom, or the Dead Sea, called also the Lake of Alpharaitis, and the Salt-Sea (in distinction from the Sea of Tiberias, which was fresh Water) also the Sea of the Wilderness, or rather the Sea of the Plains, is often remembered in the Scriptures, and in this Story also; therefore I think it not impertinent to speak somewhat thereof: For it is like unto the Caspian Sea, which hath no Outlet, or Dis-burthening. The length of this Lake Josaphas makes 180 Furlongs (which make two and twenty Miles and a half of ours) and about 150 in Breadth, which make eighteen of our Miles, and somewhat more. Pliny makes it a great deal less. But those that have of late Years seen this Sea, did account it (saith Westfalem) eight Dutch Miles (which is two and thirty of ours) in length, and two and a half of theirs (which is ten of ours) in Breadth. Of this Lake, or Sea, Tacitus makes this Report; *Lacus est immensis ambitus, speciemque saporemque corruptior, gravitate odoris accolis piffior: neque vento impellitur, neque piffis aut fuetas aquis volucres patitur incertum unde suspensa ut silido ferantur, periti imperitque nandi perinde attolluntur. Dicitur quod sit in eo, et (as it were) a Sea of a corrupt Taste; of small infectious, and pestilent to the Borders. It is neither moved, nor raised by the Wind, nor endureth Fish to live in it, or Fowl to swim in it. Those things that are cast into it, and the unskilful of swimming, as well as the skilful, are born up by this Water. At one time of the Year it catcheth up Bismen; the Art of gathering which, Experience (the Finder of other things) hath also taught. It is used in the Trimming of Ships, and the like Business.*

And then of the Land, he speaketh in this sort: "The Fields not far from this Lake, which were sometime fruitful, and adorned with great Cities, were burnt with Lightning; of which the Ruines remain, the Ground looking with a sad Face, as having lost her Fruitfulness: For whatsoever doth either grow, or is set thereon, be it Fruits or Flowers, when they come to Ripeness, have nothing within them, but moulder into Ashes: Thus far Tacitus. And it is found by Experience, that those Pomegranates, and other Apples, or Oranges, which do still grow on the Banks of this cursed Lake, do look fair, and are of good Colour on the Out-side; but being cut, have nothing but Dirt within. Of the Bismen which this Lake catcheth up, it was by the Greeks called Alpharaitis. Velespan, desirous to be satisfied of these Reports, went of purpose to see this Lake, and caused certain Captives to be cast into it, who were not only unskilful in swimming, but had their Hands also bound behind them; and notwithstanding, they were carried on the Face of the Waters, and could not sink.

Of the Kings of Moab, much of whose Country within Arnon, Reuben posselt.

Of the Kings of Moab, whose Country (within Arnon) Reuben posselt (though not taken from Moab, but from Sebon the Amorites) few are known. Junius in the 21. of Numbers, vers 14. nameth Vabek, which seemeth to be the Ancestor, or Predecessor of Balaac, the Son of Zappor, which Balaac sent for Balaam to curse Israel. For, fearing to contend with Moses by Arms, by the Examples of Sebon and Og, he hoped, by the help of Balaam's Cursings, or Enchantments, to take from them all Strength and Courage, and to cast on them some pestilent Diseases. And though Balaam at the first, moved by the Spirit of God, blest Israel, contrary to the Hope and Desire of Moab; yet being desirous in some sort to satisfy him, and to do him Service, he advised Moab to send Midianitish Women among the Israelites; hoping by them, as by it Instruments of Mischief, to draw them to the Idolatry of the Heathen; but in the end, he received the Reward of his falling from God, and of his evil Counsel, and was slain among the rest of the Princes of Midian.

After these times the Kings of the Moabites are not named; saving that we find in the first of Chron. the fourth, that Jokim, and the Men of Chazebai, and Tophai, and Sareph, all being of the Issue of Judab, sometime had the Dominion in Moab: But as it is written in the same Verse, These also are ancient things, to wit, as some expound it, the particulars of these Mens Governments are no where extant, or remaining: Or as others, hee prius fore; these Families of Judab were once thus famous: But now their Posterity chuse rather to abide in Babylon, and be Clay-workers to the King there.

Then we find Eglon King of Moab, who with the Help of Ammon and Amalec, maltreated Israel, and commanded them eighteen Years; which Eglon, Ehud slew in his own Houle, and afterwards ten Thousand of his Nation. What Name the King of Moab had, unto whom David fled, fearing Saul, it doth not appear; or whether it were the same against whom Saul made War, it is not manifest; for neither are named. But in respect that this Moabite was an Enemy to Saul, he received David, and relieved him, knowing that Saul sought his Life.

After this, David himself entered the Region of Moab; but not likely in the same King's time: For he slaughtered two parts of the People, and made the third part tributary: Whereupon it was said of David, Moab is my wash-pot, ever Edom will I cast my Shoe; meaning, that he would reduce them to such an Abjection, and appoint them for base Services: And that he would tread down the Idumæans.

The next King after David's Time, of the Moabites, whose Name liveth, was Mefha; who falling from Judab (perhaps in remembrance of the Severity of David) fastened himself to the Kings of Israel; and paid Tribute to Ahab 100000 Lambs, and 200000 Rams, with the Wool: Who revolting again from Israel, after the Death of Ahab was invaded by Jehoram; with whom joined the Kings of Judab and Idumæa; and being by these three Kings preft and broken, he fled to Kir barelib, as is elsewhere shewed. There is also mention made of the Moabites without the King's Name; when that Nation, assisted by the Ammonites and Idumæans invaded Jehoshaphat. And by reason of some private Quarrels among themselves, the Moabites and Ammonites set upon the Idumæans, and slaughtered them; and then one against another, so as Jehoshaphat had a notorious Victory over them all, without either Blood or Wound. Also in the time of Jeremias the Prophet, there was a King of Moab, which is not named, which was after Mefha of Moab many Decades: For Mefha lived with Jehoram and this Moabite in Zedekias time, fourteen Kings of Judab coming between, who waited three hundred and odd years.

§ V.

Of the memorable Places of the Gadites, and the Bordering Places of Ammon.

The Territory adjoining to Reuben, is that of Gad; whereof all that part which joined to the Mountains, was sometime in the Possession of the Ammonites, as far to the South as Arzor. Of the Children of Gad, the seventh Son of Jacob by Zelpha, the Hand-maid of Leah, there parted out of Egypt, and died in the Deserts 45550. and of their Sons, there entered the Land promised 45000. bearing Arms: From the half Tribe of Manasseh, the River of Jabbok divided them: From Reuben, the Cities of Hebron, Elbeke and Aphek.

The chief City of Gad, was Arzor, which they make to be the same with Ar, or Rabbath-Moab, the great or commanding Moab. But the Learned Junius, attending diligently to those Words of Moses, Deut. 2. 36. Ab Hivahero, que est in ripa fluminis Arnon, or Circuite ipsa que est in flumine; Where the City in the River is distinguished from the City upon the Bank of the River, (as also in like manner, Jof. c. 12. v. 2. and c. 13. v. 9.) thinketh, that Harob, which doubtless belonged to the Gadites, (as Num. 32. 34. it is said, that they built it) was indeed feared near Har of the Moabites; but diverse from it. For that Har was never posselt by Moses, it is plain, Deut. 2. 9. where God, forbidding Moses to touch it, saith, he hath given Har for an Inheritance to the Sons of Lot. Now that this City, which in divers places is said to be within, and in the middle of the River of Arnon (and so distinguished from Harob, which is said in the same places to be on the Bank of Arnon) is Har of the Moabites; the same Junius proveth out of Numb. 21. 15. where Arnon is said to be divided into divers Streams, where, or among which, Har is feared: And the same is confirmed by the place of Jof. 13. 25, where Harob is said to be feared before Rabbath; which Rabbath, as it seems, cannot be the Rabbath of the Ammonites (for they fear not Harob near it, nor in fight of it) and therefore by Rabbath, here we must understand Rabbath of Moab, which they make to be Ar or Har; and so we must needs distinguish it from Harob. And as for Har, (which also gave the Name to the Coast adjoining) it seems it continued in the possession of the Moabites, after they had once expelled the Giant-like people, called Emims, first weakened by Chedorlaomer, and his Associates: But Harob, by the Interchange of Times, suffered many ancient Changes, as being won from the Moabites by Sebon, and from him by the Israelites; and from them, as it seems in the Story of Tephiba, by the Ammonites; and from the Ammonites again, by the Israelites, under the Conduct of Tephiba. In St. Hieron's Time, the greatest part of this City perished by an Earthquake, recovered again much of their lost Possessions and thrust the Sons of Lot over the Mountains, and into the Deserts. And as the Kings, or Captains of Peria and Affrica (remembered in the 14th. of Genesis) made way for Ammon, Moab, and Edom; so by that great Conquest which Moses had over those two Amorites, Og and Sebon, did the Moabites and Ammonites take Opportunity to look back again into those Plains; and when the Reubenites, Gadites, and Manassites forsook the Worship of the living God, and became idolatrous and licentious, they taking the Advantage, invaded them, and cast them out of their Possessions; and were some time their Masters, some time their Tributaries, as they pleased, or displeased God; and according to the Wisdom and Vertue of their Commanders.

In this City of Rabbah, was the Iron Bed of Og found, nine Cubits of Length, and four of Breadth. The City was taken in David's Time, and the Inhabitants slain with great Severity, and by divers Torments. At the first Assault thereof Urias was shot to Death, having been by direction from David, appointed to be employed in the leading of an Assault, where he could not escape: wherein also many of the best of the Army perished, and wherein David so displeased God, as his Affairs had ill Success afterward even to his dying day. From hence had David the weighty and rich Crown of Gold, which the Kings of Ammon wore; or which, as some suppose it, was used to be set on the Head of their Idol, weighing a Talent, which is sixty pound weight after the common Talent. In the time of Christians it had a Metropolitan Bishop, and under him twelve others.

The Mountains which are described within this Tribe, and that of Manasse, with a part of Reuben, are those which Ptolemy calleth the Hills of Hippusa City of Calabria; and Strabo * Trachones, the same which continue from near Damascus to the Deserts of Moab and receive divers names, as commonly Mountains do, which neighbour and bound divers Countries: For from the South part, as far Northward as Ashtarab, the chief City of Og, they are called Galaad, or Gilead; from thence Northward, they are known by the name of Hermon; for so Moses calleth them: The Sidonians name them Sibiron; but the Amorites, Shenir, others Seir; of which name all those Hills also were called, which part Judea and Idumea: And lastly, they are called Libanus; so for the Prophet Jeremias makes them all one, calling the high Mountains of Galaad, the Head of Libanus. These Mountains are very fruitful, and full of good Pastures, and have many Trees, which yield Balfamum, and many other medicinable Drugs. The Rivers of this Tribe are the Waters of Nimrah and Dibon, and the River Jaboc: Others do also fancy another River, which rising out of the Rocks of Ammon, falleth into Jordan.

§ VI.

Of the Ammonites, part of whose Territories the Gadites won from Og the King of Baſan.

This Tribe of Gad, posselt half the Country of the Ammonites, who together with the Moabites, held that part of Arabia Petraea called Nabathea, as well within as without the Mountains of Gilead: though at this time when the Gadites won it, it was in the possession of Sebon and Og, Amorites: and therefore Moses did not expel the Ammonites, but the Amorites, who had thrust the Issues of Lot over the Mountains Trachinon or Gilead, as before. After the death of Orbaid the first Judge of Israel, the Ammonites joyned with the Moabites against the Hebrews, and so continued long. Jephtha Judge of Israel had a great Conquest over one of the Kings of Ammon, but his name is omitted. In the time of Samuel they were at peace with them again.

Afterward we find that cruel King of the Ammonites, called Nabas: who Besieging Jabes Gilead, gave them no other conditions but the pulling out of their right Eyes. The reason why he tendered so hard a Composition, was (besides this desire to bring shame upon Israel) because those Gileadites using to carry a Target on their left Arms, which could not but shadow their left Eyes, should by losing their right, be utterly disabled to defend themselves: but Saul came to their Rescue, and delivered them from that danger. This Nabas, as it may seem, became the Confederate of David, having friended him in Saul's time, though Jephtha thinks that this Nabas was slain in the Battle, when Saul raised the Siege of Jabes, Asa, c. 5. who affirmeth that there were three Kings of the Moabites of that name.

Ammon succeeded Nabas; to whom when David sent to congratulate his Establishment, and to confirm the former friendship which he had with his Father, he most contemptuously and proudly cut off the Ambassadors garments to the knees, and flayed the half of their Beards. But afterward notwithstanding the Aids received from the Aramites Subject to Adadecar, and from Israhel, yet all those Arabians, together with the Ammonites, were over-turned: their chief City of Rabbah, after Philadelphus was taken, the Crown which weighed a Talent of Gold was set on David's head, all such as were Prisoners David exchanged with strange severity, for with Saws and Harrows, he rare them in peices, and cast the rest into Lime-kilns.

Jehoshaphat Governing Juda, they assisted the Moabites their Neighbours against him, and perished together. Osias made them Tributaries, and they were again by Jehoiachim's fort to continue that tribute, and to increase it, to wit, an hundred Talents of Silver, ten thousand measures of Wheat, and ten thousand of Barley: which the Ammonites continued two years.

The fifth King of the Ammonites of whose name we read was Baalis, the Confederate of Zedechias after whose taking by Nabuchodonosor, Baalis fell Israel of the Blood of the King of Juda, to lay Gedaliah, who served Nabuchodonosor.

§ VII.

Of the other half of Manasse.

The rest of the Land of Gilead, and of the Kingdom of Og in Baſan, with the Land of Hes and Argob, or Trachonitis (wherein also were part of the small Territories of * Batanea, Gaulonitis, Gessuri, Machari, and Auramitis) was given to the half Tribe of Manasse over Jordan, of which those three latter Provinces defended themselves against them, for many Ages. But Batanea Ptolemy leaveth farther off, and to the North-East, as a skirt of Arabia the of Eliaz, as it is in the 1 Kings 16. 1. and of Tobias Tob. 1. 2. it lay on the left to the Tribe of Neph on the right hand of it, as in Tob. 1. 2. and was possessed by Colonies of Israelites in the time of Saul, after his Victory over the Amalekites and Philistines in those parts: it is gathered out of the 1 Chron. 10. whence it appears that it was part of Judea, of which Chap. 7. 5. 4. 5, and 6.

Deſer

Deſert: and all these other Provinces before named with Peraa and Juraea, he nameth but as part of Calabria, as far South as Rabbah or Philadelphia; likewise all the rest which belonged to Gad and Reuben, laying the Land near the Dead Sea, he makes part of a Arabia Petraea: For many of these small Kingdoms take not much more Ground than the County of Keni.

Baſan, or after the Septuagint, Baſanitis, stretcheth it self from the River of Jaboc, to the (a) Machari and Gessuri; and from the Mountains to Jordan, a Region exceeding fertile; by reason whereof it abounded in all sorts of Cattel. It had also the goodliest Woods of all that part of the World; especially of Oaks, which bear Malt, (of which the Prophet Zacharias, Hail, O ye Oaks of Baſan) and by reason hereof they bred for many Swine, as (b) 2000 in one Herd were carried head-long into the Sea, by the unclean Spirits which Christ had cast out of one of the Gadarens. It had in it three-score Cities, walled and defended: All which, after Og and his Sons were slain, Jair, descended of Manasse, conquered, and called the Country after his own Name, Avoth Jair, or the Cities of Jair.

The principal Cities of this half Tribe (for I will omit the rest) are these, Pella, sometimes (c) Buza, otherwise Berenice: By Seleucus, King of Syria, it is said to have been called Pella, after the Name of that Pella in Macedon, in which both Philip the Father, and his Son Alexander the Great were born. It was taken, and in part demolished, by Alexander Jannaeus, King of the Jews, because it refused to obey the Jew-Laws; but it was repaired by Pompey, and annexed to the Government of Syria. It is now but a Village, said Niger. Carnaim by the River of Jaboc, taken by (d) Julius Macchabaeus, where he set on fire the (e) Temple of their Idols, together with all those that fled thither for Sanctuary; and near it they placed the Castle of Carnaim, of which 2 Macc. 12. 22. Then the strong City of Ephraim near Tyrus, which refusing to yield him by Assault, (f) Julius Macchabaeus, was forced by him by Assault, and taken, and burnt with great Slaughter.

Jabes Gilead, or Jabes, was another of the Cities of this half Tribe, which being besieged by (h) Nabab, King of the Ammonites, was delivered by Saul, as is (i) elsewhere mentioned. In Memory whereof, the Citizens (k) recovered, embalmed, and buried the Bodies of Saul and his Sons, which hung despitely over the Walls of Bethan or Scythopolis. (l) Gadara, or Gadara, is next to be named, feated by Pliny on a Hill near the River Hermon, which River Orontes seems to think to be Jaboc. At the Foot of the Hill there spring forth also hot Baths, as at Machari. Alexander Jannaeus, after ten Months Siege, wan it, and subverted it. Pompey restored it; and Gabinus (m) made it one of the five Courts of Justice in Palestine. Jerusalem being the First, Gadara the second, Emath, or Amathus the Third, Jericho and Sepphoris in Galilee the fourth and fifth. The Citizens impatiently bearing the Tyranny of Herod, surnamed Ascalonitis, accused him to Julius Caesar of many Crimes; but perceiving that they could not prevail, and that Herod was highly favoured of Caesar, fearing the terrible (n) Revenge of Herod, they slew themselves; some by strangling, others by leaping over high Towers, others by drowning themselves. To the East of Gadara, they place Sebi (o) in which Jephtha, Ant. 5. 13. faith, Jephtha was buried; whence others reading with the Vulgar, Jud. 12. 7. Septulius est in Croitate [sic] Gilead, (for in una Croitate Gilead) imagine Gilead to be the Name of a City, and to be the same with Sebi. In like manner following, the Vulgar; 1 Macc. 5. 26. where it readeth Caphor for Chabon: The same Adrieconis imagineth it to be ampla or firma Gileaditarum Croitate; so of one City, Heison, or Cheson, which they call Elhehon, the chief City of Sebon, in the Tribe of Reuben, he imagineth two more. This Caphor in Manasse, and a City in Gad, which he calleth Cathos, of which we have admonished the Reader heretofore. Of Gamala (so called, because the Hill on which it stood, was in fashion like the Back of a Camel) which Jephtha placeth not far from Gadara, in the lower Golanitis, over against Tarichea, which is on the West-side of the Sea or Lake of Tiberias. See this in Jephtha his fourth Book of the Jewish War, where he describes the place by Nature to be almost invincible; and in the Story of the Siege, sheweth how Vespasian, with much danger of his own Person, entering it, was at first repulsed, with other very memorable Accidents; and how at length, after the coming of Titus, when it was taken, many leaping down the Rocks, with their Wives and Children, to the Number of five thousand, thus perished; besides four thousand slain by the Romans; so that none escaped, save only two Women that hid themselves.

About four Miles West from Gadara, and as much East from Tiberias (which is on the other side of the Lake) Jephtha placeth Hippus, or Hippene, whence Ptolemy gives the Name to the Hills that compass the Plains in which it standeth: So that it may seem to have been of no small Note. It is feated far from the Hill-Country: On the East of the Lake, as also Pliny noteth lib. 5. cap. 15. It was restored by Pompey; after by Augustus ad. Jeph. Bell. desc. to Herod's Tetrarchy: It was wasted by the Jews, in the beginning of their Rebellion: When 19 by many Mallices of their Nation, they were enraged against their Borderers.

The next City of note, but of more ancient fame, is Edrebi or Edras, wherein Og King of Baſan chiefly abode, when Moses and Israel invaded him: And near unto this his Regal City, it was that he lost the Battle and his Life. It stood in S. Hieron's time; and had the name of Ador or Adra. Not far from these Towns near Jordan, in this valley foot Gersa or Gergessa, inhabited by the Gergessites, descended of the fifth Son of Canaan. Of these Gergessites we read Matt. 8. 28. Matt. 9. 28. that Christ coming from the other side of the Lake of Tiberias, landed in their Coasts; where casting the Devils out of the possessed, he permitted them to enter into the Herd of Hogs: In which Story for Gergessites or Gergessins, S. Luke and S. Mark have Gadarens; not as if these were all one (for Gergessa or Gessia is a distinct Town in these parts from Gadara) but the bounds being confounded, and the Cities Neighbours, either might well be named in this story. This City received many changes and calamities; of which Jephtha hath often mention. For besides other adventures, it was taken by L. Annii Lieutenant to Vespasian; and 1000. of the ablest young Men put to the Sword, and the City burnt. In the year 1120. it was re-built by Baldwin King of Damascus; and in the same year recovered by Baldwin de Burgo King of Jerusalem, and by him utterly razed. Near unto Gergessa is the Village of Magadan, or after the Syriac Mageda, or after the Greek Magada, where the Pharisees and Sadducees desired of our Saviour a Sign from Heaven; the same place

CHAP. XI.

The History of the Syrians, the chief Borderers of the Israelites, that dwell on the East of Jordan.

§ I.

Of the City of Damascus, and the divers Fortunes thereof.

DAMASCUS of all other in this Border, and of that part of the World, was the most famous, excelling in Beauty, Antiquity, and Riches, and was therefore called the City of Joy or Gladness, and the House of Pleasures, and is not only remembered in many places of Scripture, but by the best Historians and Cosmographers. The Hebrews, faith Josephus, think it to have been built by Huz the Son of Aram; of which Opinion S. Jerome upon Isaiah seemeth to be; though in his Hebrew Questions he affirmeth that it was founded by Demareus, the Son of Eliezer Abraham's Steward, a thing very unlikely, seeing the City was formerly known by that Name, as appears by Abraham's calling this his Steward Eliezer of Damascus. David was the first that subjected it to the Kingdom of Judea, after the overthrow of Adadecer their King; but in Solomon's time, Rezon recovered it again, though he had no Title at all or Right to that Principality: But David having overthrowen Hadadecer King of Sobeus, (otherwise Syria, Soha or Zohab) Rezon or Rezon with the remainder of that broken Army, invaded Damascus, and possessed Damascus it self, and became an Enemy to Solomon all his Life.

The next King of Damascus was Adad the Edomite, who flying into Egypt from David, and Joab, when they slew all the Males in Edom, was there entertained, and married Taphnei the King of Egypt's Wives Sister, of whom Taphnei in Egypt was to call'd. This Adad returning again became an Enemy to Solomon, all his Life, and (as some Writers affirm) invaded Damascus, and thrust Rezon thence out. In the line of Adad that Kingdome continued nine descents (as hereafter may be shewed in the Catalogue of those Kings of Syria) to whom the Assyrians and then the Grecians succeeded. This City was exceeding strong, compassed with Waters from the Rivers of Abanab, and Parpar; whereof one of them Prophane Writers call Chyrarabon, the Golden River. Jeronimus takes it for Adonia. The Country adjoining is very fruitful of excellent Wines and Wheat, and all manner of excellent Fruits. It had in it a very strong Castle built, as it seems, by the Florentines, after it became Christian: The Lillies being found cut in many Marbles in that Citadel. Against this City the Prophets Amos, Isai, Jeremy, and Zacharias, Prophesied that it should be taken, burnt, demolished, and made a heap of Stones.

In the time of the last Rezon, and tenth King of the Damascenes, Teglatphalassar invited by Achaz King of Judah, carried away the Naturals of Damascus into the East, leaving of his own Nation to inhabit it. After that it was utterly ruined by the Babylonians, faith Jeronimus upon Isai, which thing was performed by Salmesar according to Jeronimus, in his note upon that place, five years after the Prophecie. In time it was restored by the Macedonians, and the Ptolomies; but long after when Syria fell into the Hands of the Romans, it was taken by Metellus and Lollus. In the time of the Christians it had an Archbishop: S. Jerome living, as he affirmeth upon the Acts, it was the Metropolis of the Saracens being taken by Hasmar their King from the Romans, in the year of our Redemption 636. And in the year 1147. Conrad the third, Emperor of Rome, Lewis King of France, Baldwin the third King of Jerusalem, Henry Duke of Austria, Brother to Conrad, Frederick Barbarossa afterward Emperor, Theodorick Earl of Flanders, and other Princes assembled at Prolomius Aem, on the sea coast, determined to recover Damascus; but being betrayed by the Syrians they failed of the Enterprize.

In the year 1262. Hala the Tartar incompassed it, and having formerly taken the King, brought him under the Walls, and threatened extrem torture unto him, except the Citizens rendred the place; but they refusing it, the King was torn asunder before them, and in fine the City taken, Asab the Son of Hala was by his Father made King thereof.

In the year 1400. Tamberlain Emperor of the Partians, invaded that Region, and besieged the City with an Army of 1200000. (if the number be not mistaken.) He entered it and put all to the Sword, filling the Dirch with his Prisoners, those that retired into the Castle, which seem'd a place impregnable, he over-top'd with another Castle adjoining; he forbore the demolishing of the City in respect of the Beauty of the Church, garnished with 40. Gates or sumptuous Porches. It had within it 9000. Lanthorns of Gold and Silver; but while he invaded Egypt they again surprized Damascus. Lastly in his return after three Months Siege he forc'd it; the Mahometans prostrating themselves with their Priests, desired Mercy: But Tamberlain commanding them to enter the Church, he burnt them, and it, to the number of 30000. and did so demolish it, as those that came afterwards to see their Houses, knew them not by the Foundations. And as a Trophy of his Victory he raised three Towers with great Art, builded with the Heads of those whom he had slaughtered. After this it was restored and repopled by the Soldan of Egypt, with a Garrison of Mammalukes. And in the Year 1517. Selimus Emperor of the Turks wrested it out of the hands of the Egyptians; in whose Possession it now remaineth inhabited with Mahometans, and Christians, of all Neighbouring Nations.

§. II.

Of the first Kings of Damascus, and of the growing up of their Power.

NOW be it that Damascus were founded by Huz the Son of Aram, or by Damascus the Son of Eliezer Abraham's Steward, we find no relation of their Kings, or Common-wealth till David's time. For it stood without the Bounds of Canaan; and therefore neglected by Moses, Joshua, and Judges, as impertinent to that Story: But were it to that it had some Reguli, or petty Kings over it, as all the Cities of those parts had, yet none of them became famous for ought that is left to writing, till such time as David overthrow Adadecer Prince of Sobeus or Syria Zoba; the same Nation which Pliny calleth Nubei, inhabiting between Batanes and Euphrates. Now the better to understand the Story of those Syrian Princes, whom from after the Kings of Damascus made their vassals, the Reader may inform himself, That on the North-east parts of the holy Land there were three chief Principalties whereof the Kings or Commanders greatly vexed or disturbed the State or Commonwealth of Israel, namely Damascus or Aram, Sobeus or Syria Zoba, and Chamath, or Chamath Zoba, of which these were the Princes in David's and Solomon's times: Rezon or Rezon of Damascus, Adadecer of Syria Zoba, and Tobu of Chamath. But it seemeth that Damascus was one of the Cities subject to Adadecer when David invaded him, though when Saul made War against Zoba, Damascus was not named. And as Josephus affirmeth the Leader of those Succours, which were levied and sent to Hadad Hezer from Damascus, had the Name of Adad: who was in that Battle slain with 22000. Aramites of Damascus; whereof, as of the overthrow of Adadecer, Rezon the Commander of his Army, taking advantage made himself King of Damascus: Adadecer and Hadad of Damascus being both slain. About the same time Tobu King of Chamath or Iruza, hearing that his Neighbour and Enemy Adadecer was utterly overthrowen, sendeth for Peace to David, and presenteth him with rich Gifts, but in Solo faith S. Hierome; it was craftily done of him. Now to the North of the Holy Land, and to the West of Damascus, the Tyrians and Zidonians inhabited; but they for the most part were in League and Peace with the Judeans and Israelites.

But to return to the Kings of Syria, I mean of Syria as it is taken in the Scriptures, containing Damascus, Soha or Zoba, and Chamath or Iruza, to which I may add Geshur, because it is so accounted in the 2. of Sam. 15. as joining in the Territory to Damascus (for Syria at large is far greater, of which Palestine it self is but a Province, as I have noted in the beginning of this Tract.) It is not agreed among the Historians of former times, nor of our latter Writers, who was the first of those Adads of Syria Zoba, and Damascus.

Some account Rezon, other Adad of Idumea: of whom it is written in the first of Kings, that David having invaded that Region, and left Joab therein to destroy all the Male Children thereof: Adad of the Kings Seed, fled into Egypt, and was there Married to Taphnei the Queens Sister as before; who hearing of David's death, and of the death of his Captain Joab (whom indeed all the bordering Nations feared) he returned again, and as Benising thinketh, this Adad did expel Rezon out of Damascus; and was the first of the Syrian Kings. To me it seemeth otherwise.

For as I take it, Adadecer the Son of Rebo, whom Saul invaded, was the founder of that principality; and the first of Adads, who forsaking his Fathers Name, as he grew powerful, took upon him the title of Adad, the great God of the Assyrians, faith Macrobius, which signified Oneness or Unity. I also find a City called Adada in the same part of Syria: of which whether these Princes took the Name or gave it, I am ignorant. For Adadecer, Ben-adad, Eli-adad were the same Name, with the differences of Ezer, Ben, and Eli, adjoined. And that Adadecer was of greatest power, it appeareth, first because it is against him, that David undertook the War; Secondly because he levied 22000. Aramites out of the Territory of Damascus; as out of his proper Dominions: for had the Damascenes had a King apart, it is probable that the Scriptures would have given us his Name; Thirdly, because Syria Zoba, of the most of which Adadecer was King, was an exceeding large Territory, and contained of Arabia the Desart as far as to Euphrates, according to Pliny, and the greater part of Arabia Petraea according to Niger. Whoever was the first, whether Adadecer, or Adad of Idumea, Rezon was the second: Who was an Enemy to Israel all the days of Solomon. Besides the evil that Adad did, the evil that Hadad did, seemeth to be referred to Hadad of Idumea, lately returned out of Egypt, to wit, 23. years after he was carried thither.

The third King of Damascus, and of Zohab both, was Hecion; to Hecion succeeded Tabremmon, or Tabremmon; to him Benbadad, as is proved in the first of Kings. For Asa King of Judea, the Son of Abiam, the Son of Roboam, the Son of Solomon, being vexed and invaded by Baasas, the Successor of Nadab, the Son of Jeroboam, sent to Benbadad, the Son of Tabremmon the Son of Hecion King of Aram, that dwelt at Damascus, to invade Israel (while Baasas sought to fortifie Ramagaim Asa; thereby to block him up, that he should not enter into any of the Territories of Israel) who according to the desire of Asa, having received his Presents, willingly invaded the Country of Naphtalim, and took divers Cities, and spoils thence: Asa in the mean while carrying away all the Materials, which Baasas had brought to fortifie Ramagaim, and converted them to his own use.

This Benbadad's Father Tabremmon was in League with Asa; and so was his Father Hecion; for Asa requireth the continuance of that friendship from Benbadad, his Son; though it seemeth that the Gold and Silver sent him out of the Temple, was the most forcible argument. And that this Tabremmon invaded Israel, before the enterprize of his Son Benbadad, it is conjectured. For Benbadad when he was prisoner with Achab, spake as followeth. The City which my Father took from my Father, I will restore; and thou shalt make Streets or Keepers of the Borders, for thee in Damascus; as my Father did in Samaria. And herein there ariseth a great doubt (if the Argument it self were of much importance) because Tabremmon was Father indeed to Benbadad which invaded Baasas, at the request of Asa. But this Benbadad that twice entered upon Achab; and was the second time taken Prisoner, was rather the Son of Benbadad, the first of that name, the Confederate of Asa and Abiam, as before, than the Son of Tabremmon. For between the Invasion of Benbadad the first, in Baasas's time, and the siege of Samaria, and the overthrow of Benbadad by Achab, there past 49. years, as may be gathered out of the Reigns of the Kings of Israel. So that if we allow 30. years of Age to Benbadad, when he invaded Baasas, and after that 49. years, ere he was taken by Achab, which make eighty lacking one, it is unlikely that Benbadad, at such an Age, would make War. Besides all this, the first Benbadad came with no good pump, but the second Benbadad vaunted, that he was followed with 32. Kings; and therefore I resolve that Benbadad the Son of Tabremmon invaded Baasas and Omri, and Benbadad the second invaded Achab, at whose Hands this Benbadad received two notorious Overthrows; the first at Samaria, by a Sally of 700 Israelites; the second at Aphec, where with the like Number in effect, the Israelites slaughtered 100000 of 1 Reg. 20. the Armaties, besides 27000, which were cruſt by the Fall of the Wall of Aphec. and this Ben-hadad, Achab again ſeteth at Liberty; to whom he rendreth thoſe Towns, that his Father had taken from the Predeceſſor of Achab; but being returned, he refuseth to ſurrender Ramoth-Gilead, a Frontier Town, and of great Importance. Now three years after (for ſo long the League laſted) Ramoth not being delivered, Achab invadeth Gilead, and affliggeth the City, being aſſiſed by Tebſopbat. The Armaties came to ſuccor and fight, in which Achab is wounded and dieth that night.

2 Reg. 5- After this, Benhadad fentheth the Commander of 1 Reg. 6- his Forces, called Naaman, to Joram the Son of Achaz, to be healed of the Leprosy; and though Elishaeus had healed him, yet he picketh Quarrel against Joram: And when Joram, by Elishaeus his Intelligence, had escaped his Plot, he sent Men and Chariots to take the Prophet, as is afore-2 Reg. 6- said.
After Benhadad begetteth Samaris again, and 3 Reg. 7- sacrifices there, his first Wife, Jezebel, and become a fickeness, and fentheth Achaz to depart.
3234- Home a fickeness, and fentheth Achaz with great Gifts to Elishaeus, to know his Estate, if he might live. Achaz returning, fmothereth him. Zemarais and Cedreus call this Benhadad, Adar, the Son of

§. III.

Of the later Kings, and Decay, and Overthrow of their Power.

AFTER Hazael, Bembadad the Second, or rather the Third of that Name, the Son of Hazael reigned in Damascus, who fought against Israel with ill Success: For Joaz, King of Israel, the Son of the unhappy Joachaz, as he was foretold by Elisha the Prophet, beat Bembadad in three several Battels; and he lost all those Cities to Israel, which his Father Hazael had taken violently from Joachaz.

Afterward this Benbadad, the Son of Hamezel, then succeeded three others of the same Name, of whom the Stories are lost; only Nicholau Da- masenus: cited by Joseph, makes mention of them: And in one of these King's Times it was, that Jeroboam the Second, the Son of Joaz, recovered Damascus it self, to Judah, saith the Ge- nevis; but better in Jonius, uxque recuperatus that is, Damascum, & Camatham Jebusa, pro Jerusalem: that is,
And how he recovered for Israel, Damascus, and Camatha of Judaea: For these Cities sometimes conquered by David, did of right belong to the Tribe of Juda.

And it is likely that this Conquest upon the Adams was performed; the first of these three Adams: then living, of whom there is no Story. For when as Jehoa the King of the ten Tribes had thrice overcome the Syrians in the time of Benbadad, the Son of Hazael, and had recovered the Cities which Hazael had won from Jffael; and so left his Kingdom to his Son, Jeroboam the Second: It seemeth, that this Jeroboam, without delay, and having nothing else left for him to enterprise, instantly followed his Father's good Fortune, and invaded Damascus.

Razim, or Rezin, after Jezebel Rafes, after Zorana Euzim! In the 10th. Abad, maketh League with Pekah, or Phacek, King of Israel, against Abazak, King of Juda : Both carry away a great number of Prisoners. After this they both behead Abazak in Jerusalem; but in vain. Then Abad alone invadeth Eloth; and beating out the Jews, maketh it a Colony of Syrians. Wherefore Abad brought Togelaphasser against Rezin, who took him, and beheaded him, and won Damascus; with whom ended the Line of the Adadis; and the Kingdom of Damascus; the Assyrians becoming Masters both of that and Israel. These Adadis, as they rejoined in order, are thus reckoned :

1. Adadexer, the Son of Rebob.
2. Razin, the Son of Eliadad, or Razin.
3. Hexion.
4. Tabremmon.
5. Bembadad, who invaded Baalsha.
6. Babal, the Second, taken Prisoner.

6. Benbadad the Second, taken prisoner by Achab, whose Elifha foretold with Tears, of his Adversity; the fame who overthrew Joram; King of Jisrael, at Ramoth Gilead. And that there was a second Hazeel, which preceded Benbadad the Third, it is not improbable, because that Hazeel which took Gad, and compounded the War with Joab, made the Expedition thirty Years, and perhaps more, after the first Hazeel Joram the Son of Achab, King of Jisrael. For Joab began to reign in the seventh Year of Joash King of Jisrael; and after he had reigned twenty three Years, the Temple was not yet repaired after

XL. of the Kings

after which (and how long we know not) it is said, that Hazeel took Geib, and turned his Face towards Jerusalem. It is also some Proof, that Hazeel which took Geib, was not the same with Hazeel that murdered Bendadad, because he could not at that time but be of good Years, being, as it seemeth, the Second Person in the Kingdom, and Commander of Bendadad's Men of War. To which Hazeel, be he the first or second, succeeded,

8. Benbadad the Third, who Joash, King of Israel, thrice overthroweth.

9. Rezin, or Rezin the last, who joyned with Pekah, King of Israel, against Juda, at which time Achaz, King of Juda, waged for his defence Tiglatpalsar.

Now between Benbadad the Third, and Rezin the last, Nicholas Damascenus finds three other Kings of the Adads, which make twelve in all.

§ IV.

Of other lesser Kingdoms of the Syrians, which being brought under the Assyrians, never recovered themselves again.

Of Gellur we find two Kings named to wit, Talmi, and his Father Ammurib. To Talmi, whose Daughter David married, it was that Aylalo, who was his Maternal Grandfather. Of the Kings of Sephora, or Syria, Soba, or Calofria, there are two named, Rabob, or Rechob, the Father of Adadeer, and Adadeer himself; and it is plain, that after his Death, the Seat of the Kings of Soba, was transferred to Damascus, a City better fitting their Greatness. After, Rezin became Lord of both Principalties. And the Race of these Kings of Syria, (which became so potent, and joynted Soba, Damascus, Emath, and the Defeat of Arabia, with other Provinces, into one, under Rezin the second of Assyria, as it began with David, to it ended with Rezin) at once with the Kingdom of Israel. For when King of Judea, waged the Afflyrians against Tadmor, King of Israel, and against Rezin, the last King of Damascus, which Teglati first invading Pado, King of Israel, and the Region of Soba, and took Damascus it self; and did put to Death Rezin the last, carrying the Inhabitants Captive. This was the second time that the Afflyrians attempted Israel: For first, Pbul Belochus entered the Borders thereof (Menahem governing Israel) who stop'd the Enterprize of Pbul, with a thousand Talents of Silver: For this Phul Belochus, whose Pedigree we will examine hereafter, being faineate warm as yet in his Seat at Babylon, which he, with the help of his Companion Arbaces, had wrested from Sardanapalus; having besides this King of Syria in his way, who seemed to be a great and stirring Prince, was content to take the Composition of a thousand Talents of the King of Israel, for that purpose time. But his Son Teglab, following the purview of his Father's Beliefs, and finding to excellent an occasion, as the War begun between Israel and Juda, Pekah commanding in the one, and Achaz in the other, his Neighbour Razin being also warring at that War and waited in favour thereby, did willingly accept the offer of Achaz, King of Juda, his Impreit and Entertainment. So, first attempting Damascus, which lay in his Path towards Israel, he carried it (as before remembred) and then with great Ease posselt himself of the Cities of Nephthelim, leading with him a great part of the People Captive. And his Son Salmansar, whom Prohm calleth Nabonazar, after the Revolt of Hofa, forced Semaria, and rent that Kingdom afunder. So as the Line and Race of Ninus in Sardanapalus, whom Belochus supplanted; the Race and Monarchy of Syrian Adams in Rezin, whom Teglab slaughter'd; the Kingdom of Israel in Hefsa, whom Salmansar overturned, happened near about a time; that of Ninus in the days of Belochus and the other two in the days of Teglabphallair, and Salmansar his Son. For Sardanapalus perished, Adas ruling Juda; and the other two Kingdoms were dissolved, Achaz, yet living.

Lastly, the Kingdom of Juda it self, being attempted by Sinnacerib, the Son of Salmanser, in vain, and preferred for the time by God, miraculously, was at length utterly overturned. Jerusalem and the Temple burnt, an hundred thirty two years after the Captivity of Israel and Samaria; the Destruction of Israel being in the ninth Year of Hofaz; that of Juda in the eleventh of Zababab. Now the Temples of Affyr and Babelyn, in the Kingdom of Syria, from the eighth year of Salmanser, to the last of Babylony, whom Herodotus calleth Labyrinth; in the last about two hundred Years. After these, the Persians, from Cyru to Darius their last King, held Syria about two hundred Years.

Then Alexander Macedon took this among other Provinces of the Persian Empire; and his Successors the Seleucia reigned therein, till it became subject to the Power of the Romans, from whom it was wrested long after by the Saracens, and remaineth now in Possession of the Turks. The first to be shewn upon this Plate, is that of the Nations bordering upon the Jafraites, with whom we have most to do, both in War and Peace, being the only People, whose History in those antient Times, carried an assured Face of Truth.

CHAP. XII.

Of the Tribe of Benjamin, and of Jerusalem.

§ I.

Of divers memorable Places in the Tribe of Benjamin, whereof Jericho, Gilgal, Mizpa, Bethel, Rama, Gohah and Gibba.

OF the Tribe of Benjamin, the Twelfth and youngest Son of Jacob, whom he had by Rachel, there were numbered at Mount Sinai, Thirty five thousand able Bodies; all which perishing in the Deserts, there entered the Holy Land of their Inheritances, Forty five thousand, fit to bear Arms: And these had their Territory on this side Jordan, between Judea and Ephraim. The Cities within this Tribe, nearest Jordan, are Lod, Hadid and Ono; of which Lod and Ono were built by Shemud, a Benjaminite: They were all three re-inhabited with Benjaminites after the Return out of Captivity, as is mentioned, Nehemiah 11. 35, and Esdras 2. 35, where Adrichomius reading Lod, Hadid, Ono, makes besides Hadid in Nehemiah, a City called Lodhadid. This Hadid, or Chadiid, was rebuilt by Simon Machabeus.

Samar, or Tisamar, named of Tisamar, one of the Sons of Canaan, was another of their Cities; and further into the Land Iudath Jericho, one of the Tiberides, and the last of Judea; seated in a most fruitful Valley, adorned with many Palm trees; and therefore elsewhere called the City of Palms. From the Time of Joshua, who utterly destroyed it, it lay waste until the Time of Ahab; in whose days Chiel of Bethel laid the new Foundation of it, in the Loos of Ahab's son Elidef, and built the Gates of it in the Loos of his youngest Son Segub, according to the Curse of Joshua; in which, and other respects, Hosea 12. 14. calleth Joshua a Prophet. In after times it was destroyed by Vespasian, and re-built by Adrian.

To the South east of Jericho, stood a Hamlet of the Levites, of which Jos. 21. 18. To the South, Betharaba, of which Jos. 15. and c. 18. Then that Gilgal, of which there is so much mention in the Scripture, where Joshua first eat of the Fruits of the Land; circumscribed all those born in the Deserts, and celebrated the Passover.

The Reason of the Name, or rather a memorable Application of the Etymology of this Name, (for it seems by the place Deut. 11. 30. that the Name was known before the coming of the Israelites into Canaan) is noted Jos. 9. Of Jericho, which is noted Jos. 9. Of Jericho, because their Forefathers (the People being there circumscribed) were tumbled down the Hill; which from thence was called Collis Præcipitum. This Gilgal was also called Galiath, as appears by comparing the places, Jos. 15. 7. & 18. 17. For it was in the Borders of Jordan, of which Jos. 22. 13. and Galiath signifieth Borders. It stood (though in some distance) directly Eastward, over against the two Hills, Garizim and Hebal; upon the one of which the Blessings, and on the other the Cursings were to be read to the People, both being the Mountains of Ephraim. Further, for the Situation of this Gilgal, it is to be noted, that both it, and Mizpa of Benjamin (of which also we read in the Scripture) were seated about the middle of the length of the Land of Canaan; For which reason Samuel chose these two places, to either of which he came yearly to give Judgment to the Israelites; of which two (Gilgal as is said) was near Jordan on the East side of this Tribe; and Mizpa near the West Sea, towards the Land of the Philistines.

The Third place, which is named with these two, whither also Samuel used yearly to come, is Bethel; which also was seated in this Tribe of Benjamin. But to return to Gilgal which was the first place, where the Ark rested, after they pass over Jordan (from whence it was carried to Silo, and thence to Kiriat jeharim, and at length to Jerusalem) here in Gilgal it was that Josiah pitched up the twelve stones, which were taken out of the Channel of Jordan when it was dry, that the Israelites might pass over it by which Story, as it is set down Jos. 4. it appears, that the same day that they passed over Jordan, they lodged at Gilgal. At the same Gilgal, to omit many other memorable things, it was that Samuel hewed Agag the King of the Amalekites in pieces. And as for Mizpa, whither also Samuel came yearly to give Judgment, there also were often the greatest meetings held, as that for the revenge of the Levites wife against Gibba, and the Benjaminites, Jud. 20. 1. and another against the Philistines, 1 Sam. 7. 12. Thither also Judas Machabeus gathered the Jews (when Jerusalem was possessed by the Heathen) as it is Mac. 3. 47. in which place this reason of their meeting is added; Quia locus Oratiæ fuerat Mizpa antea Israeli. Touching this Mizpa, to avoid confusion, it is to be remembered, that the Scriptures mention four places of this name: Mizpa of Judea, of which Jos. 15. 38. Mizpa of Gilead, of which we have spoken already in the Tribe of Gad: Mizpa of the Moabites, where David for a while held himself, commending his Parents to the King of Moab, 1 Sam. 22. 3; and lastly, this chief Mizpa of the Benjaminites. And as in this place the chief Meetings were held, both before Jerusalem was recovered from the Jebusites, and also in the time of the Machabees (as we have said) when Jerusalem was held by the wicked under Antiochus, so also in the time of Jeremias, after the destruction of the Temple by the Chaldees, Gedaliah, whom Nabuchodonosor left in Jeremias, Governor over those that were left in the land, held his abiding in this place; until (to the great hurt of the Jews) he was slain by the Treason of Izedab, one of the Royal Blood of Judea, as it is Jeremias 41.

It was no other than this Mizpa of Gilead, of which Jos. 11. 8. as appears by that which is added, Versu Orientem: For Joshua notes the three quarters North, West and East, to which he followed the Canaanites; whereof Adrichomius, and others, out of this place, imagine a Mizpa, or Mizpa (as they write it) in the Tribe of Affer.

Near unto this Mizpa (the Scripture mentioneth) 1 Sam. 7. Beth-car, after called Aben-Hezer, that is, the stone of help: where Samuel pitched up the Pillar of Stone, for a Trophy against the Philistines.

Touch

Touching Bethel, which (as it seems) was the third place where Samuel held his chief Meetings for the ministering of Justice, that it was anciently called Luz, and how it was taken by the Hittites of Joseph (though it belonged to the Portion of Benjamin, as it is Nehemiah 11. 31. and Joshua 18. 22.) and how another story called Luz, near adjoining to it, was built by the Man of the City, which showed the Entrance to the Spies, as it is Joshua 2. and of the occasion of the Name from Josiah's Vision; and how Jeroboam, by erecting one of his Calves here, of Bethel (which signifieth the House of God) made it (a) Beth-aven, that is, the House of Vanity, Hos. 4. 15. and to 5. as also other memorable things of this place; they are so well known out of the Histories of the Scripture, that we may well pass them over.

The Territory of Bethel, which at the first belonged to the Kingdom of the ten Tribes, from the time of the great Victory of Abia against Jeroboam (of which 2 Chron. 14.) was taken from them, and adjointed to the Kingdom of Juda; and to it continued, as appears by the Story of Josiah, which performed the Prophecies against the Altar of Bethel, 2 Reg. 23. whence those Coasts, 1 Mac. 11. 34. are called Apherama, which Greek Word signifieth as much as, A thing taken away, to wit, from the ten Tribes. It was one of the three Segimities, or Prefectures, which Demetrius, in his Epistle mentioned, as added by him to the Dition of the Jews, out of the Samaritan Country. A part of it, as appears, a Chron. 13. 19. was Ephraim, which Jos. 18. 23. is called Ephraim, belonging to this Tribe of Benjamin.

Not far from this Bethel, in this Tribe, we find three other Cities often mentioned in the Scriptures, Rama, Gibba and Gebah. Of the Name Rama, (b) it is noted already in the Description of Bethel, that there were many Towns so called, because of their high Situation: But where as they find out Rama in the Tribe of Juda (as it seems, because Matthew 2. it appears that it bordered Bethlehem) and also out of Brechard and Breidenbach, make Silo to have been called Rama, and find yet another Rama in Zabulon; and these three have no Warrant in the Scripture. Of Rama, in the Tribe of Affer, as it seems, we have Testimony, Jos. 19. 29. and of another in Nephthali, Jos. 19. 36. of a third Rama, where Samuel dwelt in Mount Ephraim, 1 Samuel 25. 1. which more often is called (c) Ramatha, and 1 Samuel 1. Ramathaim Tophim; for which the Septuagint have Aramatthaim; taking the Aride added in the beginning, for a part of the word, whence they think Josiah of Arimathea, Matthew 27. 57. was denominated.

The Jews out of the County of Samaria; this lying toward the East to Jericho, and Juda toward the West; and Apherama (of which even now we speak) lying in the midst, between the two other. A sixth name it seems there was in the Tribe of Simeon, toward the South, and which Jos. 19. 6. 7. called Ramath of the South, and otherwise it is called Ram.

Of a fourth Rama, we read 2 Reg. 8. 29. which is Ramoth in Gilead. The first, which is most often mentioned, is Rama of Benjamin, seated, as we said, near Bethel, the uttermost South-border of the Kingdom of the Ten Tribes; for which Cause Baasha, in the time of Aza, King of Juda fortified it, to hinder those that he did fly from him to Aza. Of this Rama, or Ramatha, I should rather think that Josiah was, that buried Chusai, because it was nearer to Jerusalem, and after the Captivity belonged to Juda, as it appears, Esd. 2. 26. where in that it is joined with Gebah, it is plain, that he speaks of that Rama, with whose Stones (after Baasha had ceased to build it) Aza (as it is 1 Reg. 23. 22.) built Gebah adjoining to it, both being in Benjamin. And as Rama was the South border of the Ten Tribes, so was Gebah the North-border of the Kingdom of Juda; whence 2 Reg. 23. 8. we read, that Josiah, through all his Kingdom, even from Gebah, which was the North border to Beer Sheva, which was the South-border, destroyed the places of Idolatry.

The third City Gibba, which was the City of Sael (the Wickiades of which City, in the time of the Judges, had almost utterly rooted out this Tribe) Adrichomius confounds with Gebah, making one of two (as they are evidently distinguishing, Josiah 10. 27. of which word (d) Gibba, in another form Gibbath, he imagineth Gabaath, another City in this Tribe, making two of one. The Vicinity of this City also to Rama of Benjamin, appears, Jude 19. 13. where the Levite with his Wife, not able to reach to Rama, took up his Lodging near at Gibba. By that place of 1 Samuel 22. 6. it seems, that there was in this Gibba some Tower or Citadel, called Rama, where Junius reads, in for which cause, for in Rama; but it may be, that the Name of the King's Palace in this City was Rama, (for this word is oft-times an Appellative, signifying a Hill) but not placing it in Benjamin, where the words adjoining upon this Text, and which was in the Mountains of Ephraim.

as it seems, that in Rama of Samuel, the Name of the chief place where Samuel with the Colledge of Prophets abode, was Naath. The great City of Haa, overthrow by Joshua, which Jos. 7. 2. is placed near Beth-aven, upon the East of Bethel, was in this Tribe, as is proved, Nehemiah 7. 10. 30. though it be not named by Josiah, chap. 18. for it was burned by him, and laid waste, as it is, Josiah 8. 28. In Josiah's time in turremulum perpetuum. Another City of chief Note, reckoned, Josiah 18. 25. in this Tribe, was Gibbon, the chief City of the Hevites, whose Cunnings, to bind the Israelites by Oath to save their Lives, is set down, Josiah 9. whence they were reckoned among the Netimim, or Proselytes, and were bound to certain public Services in the House of God; which Oath of saving their Gibonites, broken in part after by Saul, was by God punished by a Famine, as 2 Samuel 21. 1. This Gibbon, or Gibbon, with Admon and Jethai (of both which we have spoken) were 2 Samuel 1. Ramathaim Tophim; for which the Septuagint have Aramatthaim; taking the Aride added in the beginning, for a part of the word, whence they think Josiah of Arimathea, Matthew 27. 57. was denominated.

fore it was destroyed by Saul, which was of Nob, which is noted, Josiah 8. 28. and in Josiah, Nehemiah 9. 31. and though in the time of Sael, the residing place of the Ark was in Kiriat jeharim, yet by the lamentable Tragedy of Blood shed, which Saul raised in this place (as it is set down, 1 Samuel 27. and 22.) in the Judgment of Junius, it is proved, that the Tabernacle was there for a time.

Micmas also in this Tribe, Nehemiah 9. 31. was a place of Fame, of which Josiah 10. 28. where also he nameth Gallim and Migron in this Tribe. In Micmas, Saul had his Camp, 1 Samuel 13. 2. (when he left Gibba to Jonathan) and there also was Jonathan Machabeus his Abode, 1 Mac. 9. 73. Of Gileala in Galilee, Josephus often maketh mention; but of any here in Benjamin, which they

The word Netimim, or Netimim, is a Hebrew word, which signifies Proselytes, or Strangers, and is used in the Scriptures to denote those who were converted to the Jewish Religion.

they make the Natal Place of St. Paul, whence (they say) when it was taken by the Romans, he failed with his Parents to Thauris: Of this I find no good Warrant. Other Places of less Importance I omit, and come to the City of Jerusalem, and the Princes and Governors of this City; a great part whereof was in the Tribe of Benjamin, whence, Joshua 18. 28. it is named among the Cities of Benjamin.

§ II.

Of divers memorable things concerning Jerusalem.

See in the higher part of Manasse.

At what time Jerusalem was built (which afterward became the Princess of all Cities) it doth not appear. Some there are, who imagine, that Melchisedec was the Founder thereof in Abraham's Time. But according to others, that City out of which Melchisedec encountered Abraham (in his return from the Overthrow of the Assyrian and Perjan Kings or Captains, when Lot was made Prisoner) flandeth by the River of Jordan, in the half Tribe of Manasse; bordering Zabulon, which was also called Manasse, and by the Greeks, Solima.

Jerusalem, (whenever, or by whom built) was a Principal City in Joshua's Time; yet not so renowned as Hazer the Metropolis (in those Days, and before) of all the Canaanites. Admolech (whom Joshua slew) was then King of Jerusalem. That it was belonging to the Jebusites it is manifest: For how long soever they held it before Moses his Time, they were Masters and Lords thereof almost four hundred Years after him, even till David wan it; and therefore in all likelihood, it was by the Jebusites (the Children of Jebus, the Son of Canaan) built; after whom it was called Jebus. And to much did that Nation rely on the Strength of the Place, as well as upon its Name. And so much did that Nation attempt it, they bragg'd, that their Lame, and Blind, and impotent People should defend it.

David, after he had, by God's Assistance, possessed it, and turned out the Jebusites, gave it an exceeding great Encrease of Circuit; strengthened it with a Citadel or Castle, and beautified it with many Palaces, and other Buildings, changing the Name from Jebusalem, the City of the Jebusites, to Jerusalem, which the Greeks call Hierosolima. After David's Time, Solomon amplified, beautified, and strengthened it exceedingly: For, besides the Work of the Temple, which was no less admirable than renowned among all Nations; the Palaces, Gates and Walls, could not anywhere in the World be exempl'd: And besides that it had an Hundred and fifty thousand Inhabitants, the Women and Children not accounted. The Ditch had Sixty Foot of Depth, cut out of the very Rock, and Two hundred and fifty Foot of Breadth, whereof the like hath seldom been heard of either since or before.

After the Death of Solomon, and that the Kingdom of the Jews was cut asunder, Shishac, King of Egypt, and his Predecessor, having lived for that purpose Adad the Idumean, and Jerobam, Solomon's Servant; and both married to Egyptians; the State by the one disturb'd, by the other broken, Shishac first invaded the Territory of Juda, entered Jerusalem, and sack'd it; and became Master, not only of the Riches of Solomon, but of all those Spoils which David had gotten from Adad, Tebu, the Ammonites, and other Nations. It was again sack'd, and a part of the Wall thrown down by Joa King of Israel, while Amalek the twelfth King thereof governed Juda. 2 King 14.

Not long after, Achaz, the Fifteenth King of Juda, impoverished the Temple, and presented Teglaballazar with the Treasures thereof. And Manasse, the Son of Ezekiah, the Son of Achaz, by the Vaunts made by Ezekiah to the Embassadors of Meredach, lost the Remain, and the very Bottom of their Treasures. It was again spoiled by the Babylonians, Juchin then reigning. But this ungrateful, idolatrous, and rebellious Nation, taking no warning by these God's gentle Corrections and Afflictions; but persisting in all kind of Impiety, filling the City even to the Mouth with innocent Blood, God raised up that great Babylonian King Nebuchadnegar, as his Scourge and Revenger, with making this Glorious City and Temple, with all the Palaces therein, and the Walls, and Towers which embraced them, even and level with the Dust, carried away the Spoils with the Princes and People; and crush't them with the heavy Yoke of Bondage and Servitude full seventy years; inasmuch, as Sion was not only become a torn, and plow'd up Field, Jerusalem a Heap of Stone and Rubble, the Mountain of the Temple as a Grove, or Wood of Thorns and Briars; but (as Hierom speaketh) even the Birds of the Air scorn'd to fly over it, or the Beasts to tread on that defiled Soil.

Then seventy Years being expired, according to the Prophecy of Daniel, and the Jews, by the Grace of Cyrus, returned, the Temple was rebuilt, though with Interruption and Difficulty enough, and the City meanly inhabited, and without Walls, or other Defences, for some Sixty and odd Years, till Nebuchadnegar, by the Favour of Artaxerxes, rebuilt them. Then again was the Temple and City spoiled by Babylas, or Vagabul, the Lieutenant of Artaxerxes; after, by Prismasus the First; then by Anisochus Epiphane; and again by Apollonius his Lieutenant. By Pompey it was taken long after, but not destroyed, nor robbed; though Craesus in his Parthian Expedition, took as much as he could of that which Pompey spared.

But the Damages which it sustained by the Violence of Sacrilegious Tyrants, were commonly recompensed by the Industry or Bounty of good Princes, the voluntary Contribution of the People, and the Liberality of Strangers. Before the Captivity, the People of the Land, through the Exhortation of Godly Kings, made many and large Offerings to repair the Temple of Solomon. The Wrong done by Prismasus Legi to the second Temple, was requited by the Bounty of his Son Prismasus Philadelphus. The Mischief wrought by Anisochus Epiphane, and his Followers, was amended partly by the great Offerings which were sent to Jerusalem out of other Nations. Finally, all the Losses, which either the City, or Temple had endured, might well seem forgotten in the Reign of Herod, that usurping and wicked, but magnificent King, who amplified the City, new built the Temple; and with many impetuous Works, did to adorn them, that he left them far more stately and glorious, than they had been in the Days of Solomon.

§ III.

§ III.

Of the Destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans.

IN this flourishing Estate, it was, at the coming of our Saviour Christ Jesus; and after his Death and Ascension it to continued about four Years: But then did Titus the Roman, being stirr'd up, by God, to be the Revenger of Christ his Death, and to punish the Jews sinful Ingratitude, encompass it with the Roman Army, and became Lord thereof. He began the Siege at such time as the Jews, from all parts, were come to the Celebration of the Passover; so as the City was then filled with many hundreds of thousands of all sorts, and no manner of Provision or Store for any such Multitudes. An extreme Famine, with the Civil Dissention, oppress't them within the Walls; a forcible Enemy assail'd them without. The Idumeans also, who lay in wait for the Destruction of the Jews Kingdom, thrust themselves into the City, of purpose to betray it, who also burnt the Temple, when Nebuchadnegar took it. And to be short, there perished of all sorts, from the first besieging, to the Consummation of the Victory, Eleven hundred thousand Souls; and the City was to beaten down, and demolished, as those which came afterward to see the Desolation thereof, could hardly believe that there had been any such Place or Habitation. Only the three Herodian Towers (Works most magnificent, and overtopping the rest) were spared, as well for Lodgings for the Roman Garrison, as that thereby their Victory might be the more Notorious and Famous: For by those Buildings of strength and State remaining, after ages might Judge what the rest were; and their Honour be the greater and more shining that there once became Victorious.

After this, such Jews as were scattered here and there in Judea, and other Provinces, began again to inhabit some part of the City; and by degrees to rebuild it, and strengthen it as they could, being then at Peace, and Tributaries to the Roman State; but after Sixty Five years, when they again offered to Revolt, and Rebel, Aluis Adrianus the Emperor slaughtered many Thousands of them, and overturned those Three Herodian Towers, with all the rest, making it good which Christ himself had foretold; That there shall not stand one Stone upon another, of that ungrateful City. Afterward, when his Fury was appeas'd, and the Prophecy accomplished, he took one part without the Wall, wherein stood Moran Calvary, and the Sepulchre of Christ, and enclosing of the rest the greatest portion, he again made it a City of great Capacity, and called it after his own name, Antia Capitolina. In the Gate toward Bethel, he caus'd a Sow to be cut in Marble, and fix in the Front thereof, which he did in despite of the Jews Nation; making an Edict, that they should not from thenceforth ever enter into the City, neither should they dare to much as to behold it, from any other high place overtopping it.

But the Christian Religion flourishing in Palestina, it was inhabited at length, by all Nations, and especially by Christians; and so it continued 500. years.

It was afterward in the 636. year after Christ, taken by the Egyptian Saracens, who held it 500. and odd years.

In the year 1099. it was regained by Godfrey of Bouillon, by assault, with an exceeding slaughter of the Saracens, which Godfrey, when he was Elected King thereof, refus'd to be Crowned with a Crown of Gold, because Christ, for whom he fought, was therein Crowned with Thorns. After this recovery, it remained under the Successors of Godfrey Eighty Eight years: till in the year 1197. it was regained by Saladin of Egypt: And lastly, in the year 1517. in the time of Selim; the Turks call our the Egyptians, who now hold it, and call it Constantinople, or the Holy City. Neither was it Jerusalem alone, that hath so often times been beaten down and made desolate, but all the great Cities of the World have with their Inhabitants, in several Times and Ages, suffered the same Shipwreck. And it hath been Gods just Will, to the end others might take Warning, if they would; not only to punish the impiety of Men, by Famine, by the Sword, by Fire, and by Slavery; but he hath revenged himself of the very places they possess; of the Walls and Building, yea of the Soil, and the Beasts that fed thereon.

For, even that Land, sometime called Holy, hath in effect, lost all her Fertility, and Fruitfulness; Witness the many Hundreds of Thousands, which it fed in the days of the Kings of Juda and Israel; it being at this time all over, in effect, exceeding Stony and Barren. It also pleased God, not only to consume with Fire from Heaven, the Cities of the Sodomites; but the very Soil it self hath felt, and doth feel the Hand of God to this day. God would not spare the Beasts that belonged to Amalek, nor any small number of them, to be Sacrific'd to himself; neither was it enough that Abom himself was stoned, but that his Moveables were also consumed and brought to Ashes.

§ IV.

Of the Vain and Malicious Reports of Heathen Writers, touching the Ancient Jews.

OF the Original of the Jews, prophane Writers have conceived diversely and injuriously. Quintilian speaks infamously of them, and of their Leader; who (saith he) gathered together a pernicious Nation. Diodore and Strabo make them Egyptians. Others affirm that while Isis Govern'd Egypt, the people were so increased, as Jeropolymus, and Judas led thence a great Multitude of that Nation, with whom they planted the Neighbour Regions; which might be meant by Moses and Aaron: for the name of Moses was accidental, because he was taken up and saved out of the Waters. But Justin, of all other most Malicious, doth derive the Jews from the Syrian Kings; of whom, Damascus, saith he, was the first; and to him succeeded Abraham, Moses, and Isaac. He again supposeth (somewhat contrary to himself) that Isaac had Ten Sons, among whom he divided the Land of Juda; so called of Judas his Eldest, who had the greatest Portion. The youngest of the Sons of Isaac he calleth Joseph; who being brought up in Egypt, became Learned in Magical Arts, and in the Interpretations of Dreams, and Signs prodigious, and this Joseph (saith he) was Father to Moses: who with the rest, by reason of their foul Diableness, and least they should infect others, were Banished Egypt. Further, he telleth how these Men thus Banished, when in the Deserts they suffered extream Thirst and Famine, and therein found relief the Seventh day; for this cause ever after observed the Seventh day, and kept it Holy; making it a Law among themselves, which afterward became a Branch of their Religion. He addeth also, that they might not Marry out of their own Tribes, lest discovering their uncleanness, they might also be expelled by other Nations, as they were by the Egyptians. These and such like Fables hath Jos. f. 17.

Cornelius Tacitus, doth as grossly belye them in affirming, That in the inmost Oratory of their Temple, they had the Golden Head of an As, which they adored. But herein Tacitus forgetteth himself, having in the fifth Book of his own History truly confessed of the Jews, that they worshipped one only God: And thought it most prophane to represent the Deity by any Material Figure, by the shape of a Man, or any other Creature; and they had therefore in their Temples, no Image or Representation, no not so much as in any City by them inhabited. Somewhat like this hath Alexander Polyhistor, in Stephanus; who also makes Judas with Lamea, the first Parents of the Jews.

Cited by Stephanus
in Judas.

Claudius Iolas draws them from Judeus, whose Parents were Spartan and Thebis; whence it came, that the Spartans, or Lacedemonians, challenged kindred of the Hebrews: but they did it as descended of Abraham, saith Jos. f. 18. Some of these reports seem to have been gathered out of divine Letters; though wrested and perverted, according to the Custom of the Heathen. For so have they obfuscated and altered the Story of the Creation, of Paradise, of the Flood; and given new Names to the Children of Adam in the first Age; to Noah and his Sons, in the Second; and so to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, Moses, and the rest of the Fathers, and Leaders of the Hebrews; all which fainings, as touching the Jews and their Originals, Jos. f. 19. Tertullian have sufficiently answered. For that the Hebrews were the Children of Arphaxad and Heber, no man doubteth: And so Chaldeans Originally, taking name either of Heber, the Son of Sale, or else (saith Montanus) of wandering, as is before remembred. And therefore doth Stephanus, the Greek Grammarian, derive the Hebrews or Jews, from Abraham; having mistaken the name of Abraham, who was the Son of Heber, in Caleb, f. 63. the Sixth descent. Their ancient Names were first changed by the two Grand-Children of Abraham; for after Jacob, otherwise Israel, the chief part were called Israel, another part after Esau or Edom, Edomites; at length the remnant of Jacob, being most of the Tribe of Juda, honoured the Name of Judas, the Son of Jacob, and became Judeans or Jews; as also for a time in the Name of Ephraim the Son of Jos. f. 20. Jos. f. 20. the chief of the Patriarchs of the Ten Tribes; the rest of the Ten Tribes were comprehended, but were first rooted out when the Kingdom of Israel fell. The Judeans continued their Names, though they suffered the same Servitude not long after, under Nabuchodonosor.

The Government which this Nation underwent, was First paternal: which continued till they served the Egyptians. They were Secondly ruled by their Captains and Leaders, Moses and Josua, by a Policy Divine. Thirdly, they subjected themselves to Judges. Fourthly, they desired a King, and had Saul for the first: Of whom and his Successors, before we intreat, we are first to speak of their Government under Judges, after the death of Josua; with somewhat of the things of Fame in other Nations about these times

CHAP. XIII.

Of the memorable things that happened in the World, from the Death of Joshua, to the War of Troy; which was about the time of Jephtha.

§. I.

Of the Inter-Regnum after Joshua's Death: and of Othoniel.

WHEN Josua was now dead, who with the advice of the 70. Elders, and the High Priest, held Authority over the People, and ordered that Common-Wealth: It pleased God to direct the Tribe of Juda (in whom the Kingdom was afterward established) to undertake the War against the Canaanites, over whom (with Gods favour, and the assistance of Simeon) they became Victorious.

In the first attempt which they made, they not only slew ten thousand, but made Adonibezek Prisoner; the Greatest and Cruellest Commander, both of the Canaanites and Perizzites. This Tyrants Cruelty, as elsewhere hath been signified, they returned in the same kind upon his own head: and so by the Torments which he now felt in his own person (before no otherwise known unto him, but by his malicious imagination) made him confess and acknowledge Gods just Judgment against himself.

The Tribes of Juda and Simeon did also master and possess, during this inter regnum (or as some think, before the death of Josua) the Cities of Azotus, Ashalon, Ekeron, and Jersalem, which they burnt, and the Iebusites afterward re-edified. They took also the Cities of Hebron, Debir, or Kiriathsepher, and Zephath, afterwards Horma. And although it be not set down in exprets words, that any one Person commanded in Chief over the people, as Moses and Josua did; yet it seemeth, that Caleb was of greatest Authority amongst them, and that he with the advice of Phinees directed and ordered their Wars. For if any think that they proceeded without a Chief, the good success which followed their undertakings witnesseth the contrary. And it was Caleb, even while Josua Governed, as appears Jos. 10. 39. that propounded the attempt of Debir, to the rest of the Captains; for the performance of which enterprize, he promised his Daughter Achisab: which he performed to Othoniel his younger Brother ther after the conquest: whose behaviour in that Service was such, as (next unto the ordinance of God) it gave him the greatest Reputation among them, and may be esteemed the second cause of his Preferment and Election for their first Judge soon after. But while those of Juda made War with their Borderers, from whom they only recovered the Mountainous Countries (for they could not drive out the Inhabitants of the Vallies, because they had Chariots of Iron.) The rest of the Tribes fought also to enlarge and establish their own Territories; in which War they laboured with variable Success: for as the house of Jesse recovered Bethel or Luz, from the Hittites, so did the Amorites recover from Dan all the plain Countries; and forced them to save themselves in the Mountains. And now the Israelites un mindful of Gods benefits, and how often he had miraculously afore-time defended them, and made them Victorious over their Enemies (the Elders being also confirmed, who better advised them in the Interregnum) did not only joyn themselves in Marriage with the Heathen Nations; but (that which was more detestable) they served the Idols of Baal, and Astarte, with other the dead Gods of the Canaanites and Amorites. And therefore did the Lord God whom they had provoked with their Idolatry, deliver them into the hands of the Aramites of Mesopotamia; whom Chusban Rishathaim at that time commanded. But after they had felt the smart of Gods displeasure against them eight years, it pleased him to have compassion on his People, and to raise up Orbaniel to be their Judge and Leader; who by God assisted, delivered his Brethren from oppression, and enforced the Aramites to return into their own Deserts, and into Mesopotamia adjoining; after which the Israelites had peace Forty years, during all the time of Orbaniel's Government. This Orbaniel is thought by Tyrtamus to have been the younger Brother of Caleb, for as much as in the Book of Judges he is twice called Orbaniel the Son of Cenaz, Caleb's younger Brother. Others do rather interpret those Words (Caleb's younger Brother) as if they signified the meanest of his kindred. Indeed it is not likely, that Caleb's Daughter should Marry with her own Uncle; yet it follows not therefore, that Orbaniel should have been the meanest of the Kindred. Wherefore we may better think, that he was the Nephew of Caleb (as some learned men expound it) and as the very Words of Scripture seem to enforce. For Caleb was the Son of Jephunneh, and Orbaniel the Son of Cenaz, Caleb's younger Brother; that is, he was not Brother to Caleb, but his younger Brothers Son; to whom it was not only lawful, but commendable to Marry with his Cousin German Caleb's Daughter.

How long it was from the Death of Jesse, to the Government of Orbaniel, it cannot be found; but it seems to have been no short time: For many Wars were made in that space against the People of the Land. Laili was then taken (as is thought) by the Danites; and the best Writers are of Opinion, that between the times of Jesse and Orbaniel, that Civil-War broke out, between the Benjaminites and the rest of Israel; for the forcing to Death of the Levite's Wife. For it is written, that in those Days there was no King in Israel, but every Man did that which was good in his own Eyes. And as Juda led the People against the Canaanites, during the Inter-regnum, so was he commanded to do against Benjamin, even by the Lord God, whose direction they craved, as wanting a Judge to appoint what should be done, which sheweth it to have been when Jesse was Dead, and before the Government of Orbaniel; especially, considering, that all other times wherein they wanted Governours, were spent under such Oppression of Strangers, as would have given them no leave to have attended such a Civil-War; if their Power had been as great, as it was in the managing of this Action, wherein they so weakened the Body of their Estate, by Effusion of Blood, that in many Ages, they could not bring into the Field such numbers, as formerly they had mustered against their Bordering Enemies.

§. II.

Of the Memorable things of this Age, in other Nations; And of the difficulty in the Computation of times.

Here lived in this Age of Orbaniel's Pandion, or Pandarus, according to Homer, the Fifth King of Athen; who began to Rule in the Twentieth Year of Orbaniel, and Governed Forty Years. He was Father to Erichon: his Daughters were Progne and Philemela, so greatly mentioned in Fables.

Cadmus also about this time obtained Thebes; of whose Daughter Semele was Born, Dionysius or Liber Pater; under whom Linos the Musician lived. In his time also the Cities of Mela, Paphos, and Tharso were built.

Ila and Dactylus flourished in this Age, who are said to have found out the use of Iron: but Genfis hath taught us the contrary, and that Tubal-Cain long before wrought cunningly both in Iron and Brass. Not long after this time, Amphion and Zethus Governed Thebes; whom divers Chronologers find in Ehud's time. But St. Augustine making a Repetition of these Fables, which were deviled among the Grecians, and other Nations, during the Government of the Judges, begins with Triptolemus, of whose Parentage there is a little Agreement. Vives upon the Thirteenth Chapter of St. Augustine de Civitate Dei, and the Eighteenth Book, hath gathered all the Opinions of this Man's Progeny, where he that desires his Pedigree may find it. Laetantius and Ensebius make him Native of Attica: and the Son of Elenfus King of Elenfus; which Elenfus, by careful Industry, had fed the People of that Territory, in the time of a great Famine. This, when upon the like Occasion Triptolemus could not perform, fearing the fury of the People, he fled thence by Sea in a kind of Galley or long Boat, which carried in her Prow an Engraven or Carved Serpent; who because he made exceeding great speed to return, and to relieve his People with Corn, from some Neighbour Nation; it was fained by the Poets, that his Coach was carried by Serpents through the Air.

Whether the times of these Kings, which lived together with Orbaniel, and after him with the rest of the Judges, and Kings of Israel and Juda, be precisely set down, I cannot avow; for the Chronologers, both of the former and latter times, differ in many particulars; to examine all which, would require the whole time of a long Life; and therefore, I desire to be excused, if in these Comparisons I err with others of better Judgement. For whether Ensebius, and all that follow him, or his Opposites (who made themselves to Conserver with these Ancient Kings, and with the very Year when they began to Rule) have have hit the mark of time, of all other the least doubt off, and most defaced, I cannot but greatly doubt. First, because the Authors themselves, from whom the Ancientest Chronologers have borrowed Light, had nothing for the warrant of their own works, but Conjecture: Secondly, because their own Disagreement and Contention in those elder Days, with that of our own Age among the Labourers in times, is such, as no Man among them hath yet so edified any Man's Understanding, save his own, but that he is greatly distracted, after what Pattern to erect his Buildings.

This Disagreement is found not only in the Reigns of Heathen Kings and Princes; but even in Computation of those times, which the indisputable Authority of Holy Scripture hath summed up, as in that of Abraham's Birth; and after in the times of the Judges, and the Oppressions of Israel, in the times from the Egression, to the Building of Solomon's Temple, in the Persean Empire, the seventy Weeks; and in what not? Wherefore the account of times may suffer Examination, the Arguments are opposite, and Contentions are such, as for ought that I see, men have fought by to many ways to uncover the Sun, that the days thereby are made more dark, and the Clouds more condense than before. I can therefore give no other warrant, than that other Men have done in these Computations; and therefore that such and such Kings and Kingdoms took beginning in this or that year, I avow it no otherwise, than as a borrowed Knowledge, or at least a private Opinion; in which I submit to better Judgements. Nam in Priscis rebus Veritas non ad Unguem querenda. In Ancient things we are not to require an exact Narration of the Truth, says Diondre.

§. III.

Of Ehud's time, and of Proserpina, Orithya, Tereus, Tantalus, Tityus, Admetus, and others that lived about those times.

After the Death of Orioniel, when Israel fell back to their former Idolatry, God incouraged Moab to invade and suppress them; to perform which, he joined the Forces of Ammon, and Amalek unto his own, and so (as all kind of Misery readily findeth out those whom God hath abandoned, or for a time with-drawn his help from, thereby to make them feel the difference between his Grace and his Displeasure) these Heathen Neighbouring Nations, had an easy Conquest over Israel; whom God himself exposed to those Perils; within which they were so speedily folded up. In this miserable Estate they continued full Eighteen Years, under Eglon King of the Amorites, and his Confederates. Yet as the Mercies of God are infinite, he turned not his Ears from their crying Repentance; but raised up Ehud the Son of Gera to deliver them; by which their Man, though stamined in his Right-hand, yet confident in the Justice of his Quarrel; and fearing that the Israelites, were so few in numbers, to contend with the Head of those Valiant Nations; he resolved to attempt upon the Person of Eglon, whom if he could but extinguish, he assured himself of the following Victory; especially giving his Nation no time to re-establish their Government, or to choose a King to command, and direct them in the Wars. According to which Resolution, Ehud went on as an Ambassador to Eglon, laden with Presents from the Israelites, as to appease him, and obtaining private Access upon the pretence of some Secret to be revealed; he pierced his Body with a Poniard; made of purpose, with a double Edge; and shutting the Doors of his Closet upon him, escaped.

It may seem that being confident of his good success, he had prepared the strength of Israel in readiness. For suddenly after his return, he did re-pass Jordan, and invading the Territory of Moab, overthrew their Army consisting of 10000. able and strong Men; whereof not any one escaped. After which Victory, and that Sanger his Successor had miraculously slain 600. Philistines with an Oxe Goad; the Land and People of Israel lived in Peace, unto the end of four score Years, from the Death of Orioniel; which term expired in the Worlds Year 2691.

In the days of Ehud, Naomi with Elimelech her Husband, and with her two Sons, travelled into Moab; and so the story of Ruth is to be referred to this time. About the beginning of the Four score Years which are given to Ehud, it was that Orion King of the Molossians, otherwise Plato, stole Proserpina, as he walked to gather Flowers in the Fields of Hippodamium in Sicilia; or (according to Pausanias) by the River Cephissus, which elsewhere he calleth Chloris, if he mean not two distinct Rivers. This Steal being made known to Pyrrius, with whom Hercules and Theseus joined themselves, they agreed together to recover her; but Plato or Orion (whom others call Aidoneus) had (as they say) a very huge Dog, which fastened upon Pyrrius, and tore him in pieces, and had also worried Theseus, but that Hercules speedily rescued him; and by strength took and mastered the Dog Cerberus; whereof grew the Fable of Hercules his delivering of Theseus out of Hell. But Zetes, as I take it, hath written this story, somewhat more according to the truth. For Theseus and Pyrrius, faith he, attempted to steal Proserpina Daughter to Aidoneus, King of the Molossians, who had Ceres to Wife, the Mother of Proserpina. Proserpina being a general Name also for all fair Women. This purpose of theirs being known to Aidoneus, Theseus and Pyrrius were both taken; and because Pyrrius was the principal in this Conspiracy, and Theseus drawn on by a kind of Affection or Inforcement, the one was given for Food to Aidoneus his great Dog Cerberus, the other held Prisoner; till Hercules by the Intigation of Eurydice delivered him by a strong hand. The Molossians which Stephanus writes with a single (S) were a People of Epirus, inhabiting near the Mountains of Pindus; of which Mountains, Oeta is one of the most Famous, where Hercules burnt himself. The River of Acheron (which the Poets describe to be in Hell) riseth out of the same Hills. There is another Nation of the Molossians in Thessaly; but these are Neighbours to the Calapaei, faith Plutarch in his Greek Questions.

The Rape of Orithya the Daughter of Erichon, King of Athens; taken away by Boreas of Thrace, is referred to the time of Ehud. The Poets ascribe this rape to the North-wind, because Thrace is situate North from Athens. In his time also Tereus ravished Philomela, of which the Fable was devised of her conversion into a Nightingale. For Tereus having Married her Sister Progne, conducting Philomela from Athens to see her Sister, forced her in the passage, and withal cut her Tongue that she might not complain; perwading Progne that his Wife, that Philomela died in the mid-way; all which her Brother-in-law's merciless Behaviour towards wards her, Philomela expressed by her Needle upon Cloth, and sent it Progne. In revenge whereof Progne caused her only Son Tis to be cut in pieces, and set before Tereus her Husband, so direct as it appeared to be some ordinary Food; of which when he had eaten his fill, he caused his Head, Hands, and Feet, to be presented unto him; and then fled away with such speed towards Athens, where her Father Pandion yet lived, as the Poets fained, that he was turned into a Swallow. The place where it was performed, Strabo finds to be Daulis in Phocis; and the Tomb of Tereus, Pausanias hath built near the Rocks Megi, in the Territory of Athens. By which, as also by the Name Daulis, where these things are supposed to have been done (whence also Philomela is called Daulis) it appears that it is true, which Thucydides notes by way of digression in his Peloponnesian War, that this Tereus was not King in that which is now called Thracia, or in Odryse, (as the Poets call him Odryseus) but that Phoen a Country in Greece not far from Attica, a City whereof is called Daulis, was in Pandion's time inhabited by Thracians; of which this Tereus was King: whence Pandion to have amity with his Neighbours, made him his Son in law; so it is good to believe, faith Thucydides, that Pandion King of Athens, made that Alliance with a Neighbour King from whom he might have succour rather than with any Tereus, that should have held the Kingdom of Odryse, which was greatly distant from thence. The occasion that the Poets chose a Swallow for Progne to be turned into, may seem to have been, partly because, as Pausanias says: Daulide nec nidificant, nec habitant in ea circum regine Hirundines; As if a Swallow remembering the wrong that was there done to her, and to her Sister, did for ever hate that place.

Near this time Melampus (who is said to have understood the voices of Birds and Beasts) flourished, being also esteemed for an excellent Physician. He restored to their former health the Daughters of Prætes King of the Argives, who (as the Poets please) were made Mad by Juno; and thinking themselves to be Kine, fled into the Woods, fearing to be confined a to the Plough; for in those Countries, where the Ground was light, they did use often to Plough with Kine.

In the Forty Seventh year of Ehud, Tro began to Reign in Dardania, and gave it his own Name; about which time Phlegon, the chief Priest of Apollon Delphos, devised the Horacal Verse. Of the same date was Tantalus, King of Lydia; whom Erichon makes King of Phrygia; and also of that part of which the People were anciently Mæones. Of Tantalus was devised the Fable, that some Poets have applied to the passion of Love; and some to the Covetous that dare not enjoy his Riches. Erichon calls this Tantalus the Son of Jupiter, by the Nymph Plata, Dionysius and Diadmus in Zetes, give him another Mother. He was said to be the Son of Jupiter, as some will have it; because he had that Planet in his Ascendant, brokering Widom and Riches. It is said that when he made a Feast to the Gods, having nothing more precious, he caused his own Son to be slain and drest for the Banquet; of whom Ceres eat part of one of the Shoulders; whereby was signified, That those men which seek after divine Knowledge, prefer nothing on Earth before it; no not the care of their own Children, of all else the most dear. And where it was devised, that he had always Water and Fruit offered to his Lips, and yet suffered the Torment of Hunger and Thirst, it was meant thereby, That though he abounded (by reason of his Riches) in all delicacy of the World, yet his mind being otherwise, and to higher desires transported, he enjoyed no pleasure at all by the rest. Of whom Ovid:

Quærit aquas in aquis, & poma fugacis ceptat
Tantalus, hoc illi garrula lingua dedit.

Here Tantalus in Water seeks for Water and doth miff,
The fleeting Fruit he catcheth at:
His long Tongue brought him this.

This punishment, they say, was inflicted upon him, for that he discovered the Secrets of the Gods: That is, because he taught Widom and Virtue to Mortal Men; which Story Cornelius Gallus hath elegantly exprest in Verse. Others expound this Fable otherwise and say, That Tantalus, though he excelled in Riches, being Thirsty of more abundance, was never satisfied. Of whom Horace against Cato saith,

Tantalus à labris fletum fugientis ceptat Flumina, quod vides? mutato vultu de te Fausta narratur.

The Thirsting Tantalus doth catch at Streams that from him flee.
Why laughst thou? the Name but chang'd,
the Tale is told of thee.

Others conceive, where it is fained of Tantalus, that he gave the Nectar and Ambrosia of the Gods to vain and unworthy men, that he was therefore by them in that sort punished. Of which Natalis out of Pindarus.

Immortalitatem quid furatam,
Cæcitas conviciis
Nectar Ambrosiaque dedit.

Because that stealing Immortality,
He did both Nectar and Ambrosia give
To guests of his own age to make them live.

Whereby it was meant, That the Secrets of Divinity, ought not to be imparted to the unpure Vulgar. For as the cleaneft Meats in a foul Stomack, are therein corrupted; so the most high and reserved Mysteries are often perverted, by an unclean and defiled Mind.

To you it is given (faith Christ in Mark) to know the Mystery of the Kingdom of God, but unto them that are without all things, he doeth in Parables. So is it fained of him, that he expended all things to his Disciples apart. And therefore doth Gregory Nazianzen infer upon a place of St. Paul. Quod si Paulo licuisset esseri ea, quorum ipse cognitionem celum terram, & aquas ad illud progressu suspenderat, fortasse de Deo nobis aliquid amplius confiteretur: If Paul might have uttered the things, the knowledge, whereof the third Heaven; and his going thither did bring unto him, peradventure we might know somewhat more of God.

Pythagoras, faith Reclius, thought it not the part of a wife-man, Assio lyram exponere, et mysteria, quæ ita reperiunt, ut sui tubam, & silem gratularetur, & unquam a Scytharum arcu silentium indicat discipulis, ne vulgo divinum artem patefcerent, quæ mediando facilius, quàm loquendo apprehenduntur. To set an Ass to a Harp, or to teach a Mystery, which he would handle as a Swain doth a Trumpet, or as a Jay a Vial, or Scythians with unlearned Elite, for an Ornament. Wherefore he commended silence to his Disciples, ciples; that they should not disclose Divine Mysteries to the common sort, which are after learn by Meditation then by Babeling. And therefore did the Egyptians Communicate their Mysteries among their Priests in certain Hieroglyphick Letters, to the end that their Secrets might be hidden from the Vulgar; and that they might bestow the more time in the Contemplation of their covered meanings.

But to proceed with the Contemporaries of Aod, or Ehad, with him it is also said, that Tityus lived whom Apollo loved, because he fought to force his Mother Leteo. Esoporus hath it thus, that Tityus was the Son of Elara, the Daughter of Orchomenus; which Elara being beloved of Jupiter, to avoid Juno's revenge, he hid Elara in the Earth, where she was delivered of Tityus; whose Mother dying, and himself therein nourished, he was therefore called the Son of the Earth. Pausanias speaking of the Grave of this Giant, affirms that his Body occupied the third part of a furlong. But Thallus had a louder lye of his stature out of Homer.

Hom. Od. 11. Ποσειδάωνος νέον Τίτυρον παρ' Ἰγέρτα Τέρτα. Ἀλκίαν ἀνὰ κίστερ' ἔπεισε Δέω.

Nine Furlongs stretch'd lies Tityus, who for his wicked Deeds
The hungry Birds with his renewing Liver daily feeds.

This Strabo doth thus expound; that Apollo killing this cruel and wicked Tyrant of Pampeia, a City in Phoeia, it was fabled by the Poets to the terror of others, that he was still eaten in Hell by Birds, and yet still lived, and had his Flesh renewed.

Admetus King of Thessaly lived also in this Age, whom it is said that Apollo first served as a Herdman, and afterward for his Excellent Wit was by him advanced; but having slain Hyacinthus he crost the Hellespont, saving with Neptune, where together with Neptune, he was entertained by Laomedon, and got his Bread by working in Bricks, for building of the Walls of Troy, not by making the Bricks leap into their places by playing on his Harp; according to him in Ovid which saith;

Ilion officios, formataque turribus alio Mœnia Apollinea struunt Camore Iyca.

Strong Ilium thou shalt see with Walls and Towers high Built with the Harp of Wife Apollo's Harmony.

Thus the Poets; but others, that he laboured with his Hands, as hired in this work. And that he also laboured at the building of the Labyrinth in Greece, all the Megarians Witness, faith Pausanias.

In these days also of Ehad, or (as some find it) in the days of Deborah, lived Perseus the Son of Jupiter and Danae, by whose Soldiers (as they failed out of Peloponnesus) to seek their adventure on Africa side. Medusa the Daughter and Successor of Phorcus, being weakly accompanied as the Hunted, near the Lake Triton, was surpris'd and slain; whose Beauty when Perseus beheld, he caused her Head to be imbalanced, and carried into Greece: the Beauty whereof was such, and so much admired, and the Beholders so astonished which beheld it, as therefore grew the Fiction, that all that looked on Medusa's Head, were turned into Stones.

Cecrops the second King of that name, and 7. King of Athens, and Acrisius the 12, or after Eusebius, the 14. King of the Argives, began also his Reigns, as it is said, in the time of this Judge; of which the first Ruled 40. Years, and the 16. English in Chron. being the Son of Glaucon, the Son of Sisyphus, who initiated by Danae or Salmakia the Wife of Perseus of the Argives, to accompany her, but refusing it, she accused him to her Husband that he offered to force her: Whereupon Perseus sent Bellerophon into Lycia, about some Affairs of Weight, between him and his Son-in-law Phobates; giving secret Order to Phobates to dispatch him: But Phobates thinking it dishonourable to lay violent Hands on him; imposed him against Chymæra, a Monster, vomiting or breathing Fire. Now the Gods (as the report is) pitying his Innocency, sent him the winged Horse Pegasus, sprung up of the Blood of Medusa, formerly slain by the Souldiers of Perseus in Africa, to transport him; a Horse that none other could Master or Bridle but Minerva: Upon which Beasts Bellerophon overcame Chymæra, and performed the other Services given him in Charge; which done, as he returned toward Lycia, the Lycian law in Ambush to have slain him; but being Victorious also over all those, he arrived to Iobates in safety; whom Iobates for his eminent Vertues honoured, first with one of his Daughters, and afterward with his Kingdom: After which he grew so insolent, as he attempted to fly up to Heaven upon his Pegasus; whose Pride Jupiter disdainful, caused one of his stinging Flies to vex Pegasus, as he cast off Bellerophon from his Back, into the Valley of Cilicia, where he died Blind; of which Burthen Pegasus being discharged (as the Fable goes) flew back to Heaven; and being fed in Jupiter's own Stable, Aurora begg'd him of Jupiter to ride on before the Sun. This Tale is diversely expounded, as first by some, that it pleased God to relieve Men in their innocent, and undeserved Adversity, and to cast down those which are too high-minded: According to that which is said of Bellerophon; that when he was exposted to extrem Hazard, or rather certain Death, he found both Deliverance and Honour; but waxing over-proud and Presumptuous in his Glorious Fortunes, he was again thrown down into the extremity of Sorrow, and ever-during Misery. Secondly by others, that under the name of Chymæra, was meant a cruel Tyrant of the Lycians, whose Ship had in her Prow a Lyon, a Goat in the mid-Ship, and a Dragon in the Stern, of which three Beasts this Monster Chymæra was said to be compounded, whom Bellerophon purified with a kind of Galley of such Swiftness, that it was called the flying Horse; to whom the Invention of Sails (the Wings of a Ship) are also attributed. Many other Explications are made of this Tale by other Authors; but it is not unlikely, that Chymæra was the name of a Ship, for Virgil calleth one of the greatest Ships of Æt.

The invasion of India by Liber Pater, is by some related to happen in this age: But St. Augustine makes him far more ancient; placing him between the coming out of Egypt, and the death of Joshua.

About the end of the 80. years, ascribed to Ehad, and Samgar, Pelops flourished: who gave name to Peloponnesus in Greece, now called Morca.

§. IV.

Of Deborah and her Contemporaries.

AFTER Israel had lived in peace and plenty to the end of these 80. years, they again began to forget the Giver of all goodness, and many of those being worn out, which were witnesses of the former misery, and of Gods deliverance by Ehad, and after him by Samgar, the rest began to return to their former neglect of Gods Commandments. For as Plenty and Peace are the Parents of idleness Security; so is Security as fruitful in beggering and bringing forth both Danger and Subversion; of which all Estates in the World have tasted by interchange of times. Therefore when their Sins were again ripe for Punishment, Jabin King of Hazor, after the death of Ehad, invaded the Territory of Israel, and having in his Service 900. Iron Chariots, besides the rest of his Forces, he held them in subjection twenty years, till it pleased God to raise up Deborah, the Prophetess, who encouraged Barac to levy a Force out of Nephthaliim, and Zabulon, to encounter the Canaanites. That the Men of Nephthaliim were more forward than the rest in this Action, it may seem to have proceeded, partly from the Authority that Barac had among them, being of the same Tribe; and partly from their feeling of the common Grievance, which in them was more sensible, than in others, because Hazor and Harosheth the chief holds of Jabin, were in Nephthaliim. So in the days of Joshua, the Gileadites took the greatest care, because the Ammonites with whom the War was, pressed most upon them, asking their Borders. Now as it pleased God by the left hand of Ehad to deliver Israel from the Ammonites; and by the Counsel and Courage of a Woman, to free them from the yoke of Canaan, and to kill the Valiant Sisera by Jael the Kenite's Wife: So was it his Will at other times, to work the like great things by the weakest means. For the mighty Assyrian Nebuchodonosor, who was a King of Kings, and resolute, he overthrew by his own imaginations, the causers of his Brutish Melancholy; and changed his matchless Pride into the base humility of a Beast. And to approve that he is the Lord of all power, he sometime punished by invisible strength, as when he slaughtered the Army of Sennacherib by his Angel; or as he did the Egyptians in Moses's time: sometime by dead Bodies, as when he drowned Pharaoh by the Waves of the Sea; and the Canaanites by Hail-stones in the time of Joshua: Sometimes by the Ministry of Men, as when he overthrew the four Kings of the East, Chedorlaomer, and his Companions, by the Hostile Servants of Abraham. He caused the Edomites and Ammonites to set upon their own Confederates the Army of the Edomites; and having slain them to kill one another in the fight of Jahazaphar; and of the like, to these a Volume of examples may be gathered. And to this effect did Deborah the Prophetess speak unto Barac in these words: But this journey that thou takest, shall not be for thine Honour for the Lord shall sell Sisera into the hands of a Woman. In which Victory all the strength of the Canaanites Jabin fell to the ground, even to the last man: in the end of which War it seemeth that Jabin himself also perished, as appeareth by the last Verse of the Fourth of Judges.

After all which Deborah giveth thanks to God, and after the acknowledgement of all his Powerfulness, and great Mercies, she sheweth the weak estate whereto Israel was brought for their Idolatry by the Canaanites, and other bordering Nations in these words: Was there a Shield or spear seen Jabin among Forty Thousand of Israel? Sie also sheweth, how the Israelites were fervered and amazed, some of them confined over Jordan, and durst not join themselves to the rest; as those of Reuben in Gilead; that the Amorites kept the Sea-coast, and forlook their habitations towards the Land; and the Children of Dan who Neighbour'd the Sea, crept into their Ships for safety, shewing thereby that all were disperfed, and all in effect lost. She then curseth the Inhabitants of Ramoth, who dwelling near the place of the Battle (belike fearing the success) came not out to assist Israel, and then blest Jael the Wife of Hader the Kenite, who killed Sisera in her Tent; shewing the Ancient affection of that race to the Israelites. For though the Family of Hader were enforced in that miserable time of Subjection, to hold correspondence with Jabin the Canaanite; yet when occasion offered them means, they witnesseth their Love and Faith to their ancient Friends. Lastly, she denideth the Mother of Sisera, who promised her Son the Victory in her own hopes; and fancied on her self, and described the spoils both of Garments and Maidens by him gotten. For conclusion, she directeth her praises and thanks to God only Victorious.

From the beginning of Jabin's oppression, to the end of that peace which Deborah and Barac purchased unto Israel, there passed 40. years. In which time the Kingdom of Argos, which had continued 144. years, was Translated to Mycena: The Translation of this Kingdom Vices out of Pausanias writeth to this effect: After Demaus, Lynceus succeeded in Argos, after whom the Children of Abas the Son of Lynceus divided the Kingdom; of which Acrisius being eldest held Argos; it fell: Prætor his Brother possit Epiphora or Corimb, and Trymbis, and other Cities, with all the Territory towards the Sea, there being many Monuments in Trymbis, which witness Prætor's possession, faith Pausanias.

Now Acrisius was foretold by an Oracle, that he should be slain by the Son of his Daughter Danae; whereupon he caused her to be inclosed in a Tower; to the end that no man might accompany her. But the Lady being exceeding fair, it is fained that Jupiter turned himself into a Golden Shower, which falling into her lap, begat her with Child: The meaning whereof was, That some Kings Son, or other Worthy man, corrupted her Keepers with Gold; and enjoyed her, of whom Perseus was Born; who when he grew to mans estate, either by chance (faith Cræsus) or in shewing his Grandfather the invention of the Distaff, or leaden Ball, flew him unwillingly. After this Perseus, to avoid the infancy of Parricide in Argos, changed Kingdoms with his Uncle Prætor; and Built Mycena. This imprisonment of Danae, Sophocles reporteth otherwise: and that she was inclosed in a Brazen Vault, under the Kings Hall with her Nurse and Keepers. Upon this close Custody Horace hath this witty observation.

The first Kings of the Argives were these,

Inachus the first King, who began to reign in the first Year of Jacob, and the Sixty-first of Isaac; from which time, to the end of Sthenelus; Caesar mis-reckoneth 400 years. This Kingdom before the Translation, Eusebius accounteth to have flood 544 years, others but at 417. It was the Daughter of this Inachus, whom the Egyptians called Isis.

The Contemporaries of Barac and Debra, were Midas who reigned in Phrygia; and Las who built Ilium; with others mentioned in our Chronological Table, as Contemporaries with Debra.

§. V.

Of Gideon, and of Dadalus, Sphinx, Minos, and others that lived in this Age.

Debra and Barac being dead; the Midianites afflicted by the Amalekites infested Israel. For when under a Judge, who had held them in the fear of the Lord, they had enjoyed any Quiet or Prosperity; the Judge was no sooner Dead, than they turned to their impious Idolatry. Therefore now the Neighbouring Nations did to Israel in a short time (the Hand of God being withheld from their Defence) as to save themselves, they crept into Caves of the Mountains, and other the like Places of hardest access: their Enemies possessing all the Plains and fruitful Valleys; and in Harvest time by themselves, and the multitude of their Cattle destroying all that grew up, covering the Fields as thick as Grass-hoppers; which servitude lasted Seven Years.

Then the Lord by his Angel stirred up Gideon the Son of Joash, afterward called Jerubbaal; whose fear and unwillingness, and how it pleased God to hear him in his Enterprize, it is both largely and precisely set down in the holy Scriptures: As also how it pleased God by a few select Persons, namely 300. out of 120000. Men, to make them know that he only was the Lord of Hosts: Each of these 300. by Gideon's Appointment carried a Trumpet, and Light in a Pitcher, Instruments of more Terror than Force, with which he gave the great Army of their Enemies an Alarm; who hearing so loud a Noise, and seeing (at the crack of so many Pitchers broken) to many lights about them, esteemed the Army of Israel to be infinite, and stricken with a sudden Fear, they all fled without a stroke stricken; and were slaughtered in great Numbers, two of their Princes being made Prisoners and slain. In his return the Ephraimites began to quarrel with Gideon, because he made War without their Assistance, being then greedy of Glory, the Victory being gotten; who (if Gideon had failed and fallen in the Enterprize) would no doubt have held themselves happy by being neglected. But Gideon appealing them with a mild answer followed after the Enemy, in which pursuit being tired with Travel, and weary even with the slaughtering of his Enemies, he desired relief from the Inhabitants of Succoth, to the end that (his Men being refreshed) he might overtake the other two Kings of the Midianites, which had saved themselves by flight. For they were four Princes of the Nations which had invaded and wasted Israel; to wit, Oreb and Zeeb, which were taken already, and Zeeb and Salmanna which fled.

Gideon being denied by them of Succoth, sought the like relief from the Inhabitants of Peniel, who in like sort refused to succour him. To both of these Places he threatened therefore the Revenge, which in his return from the Prosecution of the other two Princes he performed; to wit, that he would tear the Flesh of those of Succoth with Thorns and Briars, and destroy the Inhabitants and City of Peniel: Now why the people of these two Cities should refuse relief to their Brethren the Israelites, especially after so great a Victory, if I may presume to make conjecture; it seems likely, first that those Cities set over Jordan, and in the way of all invasions to be made by the Moabites, and Ammonites, and Midianites, into Israel, had either made their own peace with those Nations; and were not spoiled by them: or else they knowing that Zebo and Salmanna were escaped with a great part of their Army, might fear their revenge in the Future. Secondly, it may be laid to the condition and dispositions of these men, as it is not rare to find of the like humour in all Ages. For there are Multitudes of Men, especially of those which follow the Wars; that both envy and maligne others, if they perform any praiseworthy Actions, for the Honour and Safety of their own Country, though themselves may be assured to bear a part of the smart of contrary Success. And such Malicious Hearts can rather be contented, that their Prince and Country should suffer hazard, and want, than that such Men as they dislike, should be the Authors or Actors of any Glory or Good to either.

Now Gideon, how or wherefore it were that he refreshed himself, and his weary and hungry Soldiers, yet he followed the opportunity, and pursued his former Victory to the utmost; and finding Zebo and Salmanna in Karkor (suspecting no farther attempt upon them) he again surprised them, and slaughtered those 15000. remaining; having put to the Sword in the former attempt 120000. and whilst he took Zebo and Salmanna Prisoners; whom because themselves had executed Gideon's brethren before at Tabor, he caused them both to be slain: or (as it is written) at their own request flew them with his own hands: His Son, whom he first commanded to do it, refusing it; and in his return from the consummation of this Marvellous Victory, he took revenge of the Elders of Succoth, and of the Citizens of Peniel; forgiving no offence committed against him, either by strangers or by his Brethren the Israelites. But such mercy as he shewed to others, his own Children found soon after his death, according to that which hath been said before. The debts of Cruelty and Mercy are never left unsatisfied; for as he flew the Seventy Elders of Succoth with great and unusual Torments, so were his own Seventy Sons all, but one, Murdered by his own Bar-bard Abimelech. The like Analogy is observed by the Rabbin, in the greatest of the Plagues which God brought upon the Egyptians, who having caused the Male Children of the Hebrews to be slain, others of them to be cast into the River and drowned: God rewarded them even with the like measure, destroying their own First-born by his Angel, and drowning Pharaoh and his Army in the Red Sea. And hereof a World of Examples might be given, both out of the Scriptures and other Histories.

In the end so much did the People reverence Gideon in the present for this Victory, and their own Deliverance, as they offered him the Sovereignty over them, and to establish him in the Government; which he refused, answering; I will not Reign over you, neither shall my Child Reign over you, for the Lord shall, &c. But he desired the People that they would bestow on him the Golden Ear-rings, which every man had gotten. For the Israelites, neighbours, and mix with the Midianites used to wear them: the weight of all which was a Thousand and Seven Hundred Shekels of Gold, which makes of ours, 2380.

pounds, if we follow the account of the Shekles Vulgar. And because he converted that Gold into an Ephod, a Garment of Gold, Blew Silk, Purple, Scarlet, and fine Linen belonging to the High-Priest only, and set up the same in his own City of Ephra or Ephra, which drew Israel to Idolatry, the same was the destruction of Gideon and his House.

There was another kind of Ephod besides this of the High-Priests which the Levites used, and so did David when he chased the Am; and Samuel while he was yet young, which was made of Linen only.

Now if any Man demand, how it was possible for Gideon with 300. Men to destroy 120000. of their Enemies; and afterward 15000. which remained, we may remember that although Gideon with 300. gave the first alarm, and put the Midianites in rout and disorder: yet all the rest of the Army came into the slaughter, and pursuit, for it is written; That the men of Israel being gathered together out of Nephthali, and out of Asher, and out of Manasse, pursued after the Midianites: For this Army Gideon left in the Tents behind him, when he went down to view the Army of his Enemies, who with the noise of his 300. Trumpets came after him to the Execution.

There lived with Gideon Agens the Son of Pandion, who Reigned in Athens; Euristheus King of Mycene, Atreus and Thyestes the Sons of Pelops, who bare dominion over a great part of Peloponnesus, and after the death of Euristheus, the Kingdom of Mycene fell into the hand of Atreus. This is that Atreus who holding his Brother in Jealousy, as an Accompter both of his Wife and Crown, flew the Children of Thyestes, and causing their flesh to be dreid did therewith Fealt their Father. But this cruelty was not unrevengeed. For both Atreus and his Son Agamemnon were slain by a base Son of Thyestes, yes the Grand-Children, and all the lineage of Atreus died by the same Sword.

In Gideon's time also those things were supposed to have been done, which are written of Dadalus and Icarus: Dadalus they say, having slain his Nephew Atreus, fled to Minos King of Crete for succour, where for his excellent workmanship he was greatly esteemed, having made for Minos a Labyrinth like unto that of Egypt. A reward he was faine to have framed an artificial Cow for Pasiphae the Queen, that she, being in Love with a fair Bull, might by putting her self into the Cow fastise her lust, a thing no less unnatural than incredible, had not that shameless Emperor Domitian exhibited the like beastly spectacle openly before the People of Rome in his Amphitheatre; of purpose as may seem to verifie the old Fable. For so it appears by those Verses of Martial, wherein the flattering Poet magnifieth the abominable Show as a goodly Pageant in those vicious times.

Junctam Pasiphaen Diis credite Tauris
Vidimus, accepit fabula prisca fidem.
Nec se miratur Cælar longæva venisæ
Quicquid fama canit, donat arena tibi.

But concerning that which is reported of Pasiphae, Servius makes a less unhoneit construction of it, thinking that Dadalus was of her Counsel, and her Pandar for the enticing of a Secretary of Minos called Taurus, which signifieth a Bull, who begat her with Child, and that she being delivered of two Sons, the one resembling Taurus, the other her Husband Minos, it was faine that she was delivered of the Menster Minotaur half a Man, and half a Bull. But this practice being discovered, and Dadalus appointed to be slain, he fled out of Crete to Cos King of Sicily; in which passage he made such Expedition, as it was feigned that he fashioned Wings for himself, and his Son to transport them. For whereas Minos pursued him with Boats, which had Oars only, Dadalus framed Sails both for his own Boat, and for his Sons, by which he out-went those that had him in chase. Upon which new Invention, Learn bearing himself over-bold was over-born and drowned.

Hh 2 and

It is also written of Dadalus, that he made Images that could move themselves, and go, because he carved them with Legs, Arms and Hands; whereas those that preceded him, could only present the Body and Head of those Men, whom they cared to counterfeit, and yet the Workmanship was esteemed very rare. But Plutarch, who had seen some of those that were called the Images of Dadalus, found them exceeding rude.

With Gideon also flourished Linus the Theban, the Son of Apollo, and Tersibolus who instructed Thamirus, Orpheus, and Hercules. He wrote of the Creation, of the Sun and Moon's Course, and of the Generation of living Creatures, but in the end he was slain by Hercules his Scholar with his own Harp.

Again, in this Age those things spoken of Sphinx and Odipus are thought to have been performed. This Sphinx being a great Robber by Sea and Land, was by the Corinthian Army led by Odipus overcome. But that which was written of her propounding of Riddles to those whom she mastered, was meant by the Rocky and inaccessible Mountain near Thebes which she defended, and by Odipus dissolving her Problem, his Victory over her. She was painted with Wings, because exceeding Swift, and with the Body of a Lyon for her Cruelty. But that which Palæphatus reports of Sphinx were more probable, did not the time improve it, for he calls her an Amazonite, and the Wife of Cadmus; who when by her help he had cast Draco out of Thebes (neglecting her) he married the Sister of Draco, which Sphinx taking in despiteful part, with her own Troop she held the Mountain by Thebes, from whence she continued a sharp War upon the Thebans, till by Odipus overthrow. About this time did Minos thrust his Brother out of Crete, and held sharp War with the Megarians, and Athenians, because his Son Androgeus was slain by them. He sought himself of Megara by the Treason of Scylla, Daughter of Nisus the King. He was long Master of the Sea, and brought the Athenians to the tribute of delivering him every Year seven of their Sons; which tribute Thebes released, as shall be shewed when I come to the time of the next Judge Thala. In the end he was slain at Camērion or Camicus in Sicilia by Cocalus the King, while he pursued Dadalus; and was esteemed by some to be the first Law-giver to those Islands.

To this time are referred many deeds of Hercules, as the killing of Anteus the Gyant, who was said to have 60. and odd Cubits of length, which though Plutarch doth confirm, reporting that there was such a Body found by Sertorius the Roman in Lybia, where Hercules slew Anteus; yet for my self I think it but a low lye. That Anteus was of great strength, and a cunning Wrestler, Eusebius affirmeth; and because he cast so many Men to the Ground, he was feigned to be the Son of the Earth. Pliny saith, that he inhabited near the Gardens Hesperides in Mauritania. S. Augustine affirms, that this Hercules was not of Greece; but of Lybia; and the Hydra also which he overcame, Esopi in Plato expoundeth to be a fabel Sophister. Ch.

VI.

Of the Expedition of the Argonauts.

About the Eleventh Year of Gideon, was that Famous Expedition of the Argonauts; of which many Fabulous Discourses have been written, the Summ of which is this.

Pelias the Son of Neptune, Brother by the Mother's side to Asius, who was Jafon's Father, reigning in Iolcus a Town of Thessaly, was warned by the Oracle of Apollo to take heed of him that wore but one Shoe. This Pelias afterward sacrificing to Neptune, invited Jafon to him, who coming hastily, lost one Shoe in passing over a Brook: Whereupon Pelias demanded of him what course he would take (supposing he were able) against one of whom an Oracle should advise him to take heed? To which question, when Jafon had briefly answered that he would find him to Colchis, to fetch the Golden Fleece, Pelias immediately commanded him to undertake that Service. Therefore Jafon prepared for the Voyage, having a Ship built by Argus, the Son of Phryxus, by the Counsel of Pallas: wherein he procured all the bravest Men of Greece to Sall with him: As Typhus the Master of the Ship, Orpheus the Famous Poet, Caistor and Pollux the Sons of Tyndarus, Telemachus and Peleus, Sons of Æacus, and Fathers of Ajax and Achilles, Hercules, Theseus, Zetes and Calais the two winged Sons of Boreas, Amphicrates the great South-layer, Mylæus of Calidius that slew the great Wild-Boar; Acalophus and Jaleonum or Almenus the Sons of Atreus, who were afterwards at the last War of Troy, Latrus the Father of Ulysses, Atalanta a Warlike Virgin, Idas and Lyncus the Sons of Aphareus, who afterwards in fight with Caistor and Pollux slew Caistor, and wounded Pollux, but were slain themselves: Lyncus by Pollux, Idas by Jupiter with Lightning.

These and many other went with Jafon in the Ship Argo; in whose Prow was a Table of the Beech of Dodona, which could Speak. They arrived first at Lemnos; the Women of which Island, having slain all the Males, purposing to lead an Amazonian Life, were nevertheless contented to take their Pleasure of the Argonauts. Hence they came to the Country about Cyzicus, where dwelt a People called Doliones, over whom then reigned one Cyzicus, who entertained them friendly; but it so fell out, that looting thence by Night, they were driven by contrary Winds back into their Port, neither knowing that it was the same Haven, nor being known by the Doliones, to be the same Men; but rather taken for some of their Bordering Enemies, by which means they fell to blows, inflicting much that the Argonauts slew the most part of the Doliones, together with their King Cyzicus: which when by day-light they perceived, with many Tears they solemnized his Funeral. Then departed they again and arrived shortly in Mysia, where they left Hercules and Polyphemus the Son of Elates, who went to seek Hydra the Darling of Hercules, that was ravished by the Nymphs.

Polyphemus built a Town in Mysia, called Cius, wherein he reigned. Hercules returned to Argo: From Mysia the Argonauts sailed into Bythinia, which then was peopled by the Bithyrians the Ancient inhabitants of the Country, over whom Amicus the Son of Neptune was then King. He being a trusting man, compelled all Strangers to fight with him, at Whod-batts, in which kind of fight he had slain many, and was now himself slain by Pollux. The Bithyrians in revenge of his death flew all upon Pollux, but his companions rescued him, with great slaughter of the people. They sailed from hence to Salmysus, a Town in Thrace (somewhat out of their way) wherein Phineus a South-layer dwelt, who was blind and vexed with the Harpies. The Harpies were said to be a kind of Birds, which had the Faces of Women and foul long Claws, very filthy Creatures, which when the Table was furnished for Phineus came flying in, and devouring or carrying away the greater part of the Victuals, did so defile the rest, that they could not be endured.

When therefore Phineus craved his advice, and direction for their Voyage: You shall do well (saith he) first of all to deliver me from the Harpies, and then afterwards to ask my Counsel. Whereupon they caused the Table to be covered, and Meat set on; which was no sooner set down, than that presently in came the Harpies, and played their accustomed pranks; when Zetes and Calais the winged Young Men saw this, they drew their Swords, and pursued them through the Air; some say that both the Harpies and the Young Men died of weariness in the fight, and pursue. But Apollonius saith, that the Harpies did covenant with the Yobites, to do no more harm to Phineus, and were thereupon dismissed. For this good turn Phineus gave them informations of the way, and advised them what of the dangerous Rocks, called Symplegades, which by force of Winds running therrup, did shut up the passage; wherefore he willed them to put a Pigeon before them into the passage; and if that passed safe, then to adventure after her, if not then by no means to hazard themselves in vain. They did so, and perceiving that the Pigeon had on his bill a piece of other Tail, they observed the next opening of the Rocks and then rowing with all their might, passed through safe, only the end of the Poop was bruised.

From thence forward, (as the Tale goeth) the Symplegades have: Good Will; for the Gods; say they, had decreed that after the passage of a Ship, they should be fixed. Thence the Argonauts came to the Marianthi, a people inhabiting about the Mouth of the River Partholus, where Lycus the King entertained them courteously. Here Blindus a South-layer of their Company was slain by a Wild Boar; also here Triphis died, and Atreus undertook to fear the Ship. So they passed by the River Thermodon, and Mount Caucasus; and came to the River Phrygius, which runs through the Land of Colchis. When they were entered the Haven, Jafon went to Æetes the King of Colchis, and told him the Commandment of Pelias, and cause of his coming; desiring him to deliver the Golden Fleece, which Æetes, as the Fable goeth, promised to do, if he alone would yoke together two Brazen-footed Bulls, and plowing the Ground with them, sow Dragons Teeth, which Minerva had given to him, being part of those which Cadmus did sow at Thebes. These Bulls were great and fierce, and breathed out Fire; Vulcan had given them to Æetes.

Whilst Jafon was in a great perplexity about this task, Medea the Daughter of Æetes, fell in to a most vehement Love of him, so far forth, that being excellent in Magic, she came privily to him, promising her help, if he would assure her of his Marriage. To this Jafon agreed, and confirmed his promise by Oath. Then gave he to him a Medicine, wherewith the bad him to annoint both his Body and his Armor, which would preserve him from their violence; further the told him, that Armed Men would arise out from the Ground, from the Teeth which he should sow, and set upon him. To remedy which inconvenience, the bad him throw Stones amongst them, as soon as they came up together, whereupon they would fall together to blows, in such wise that he might easily slay them. Jafon followed her Counsel; whereto when the event had answered, he again demanded the Fleece. But Æetes was so far from approving such his desire, that he devised how to destroy the Argonauts, and burn their Ship; which Medea perceiving, went to Jafon, and brought him by Night to the Fleece, which hung upon an Oak in the Grove of Mars, where they lay it was kept by a Dragon, that never slept. This Dragon was by the Magic of Medea cast into a sleep: so taking away the Golden Fleece, the went with Jafon into the Ship Argo: having with her, her Brother Ablyrtus.

Æetes understanding the practices of Medea, provided to pursue the Ship; whom when Medea perceived to be at hand, she flew her Brother, and cutting him in pieces she scattered his Limbs in divers places; of which Æetes finding some, was fain to seek out the rest, and suffer his Daughter to pass: the parts of his Son he Bured in a place, which thereupon he called Toni; the Greek word signifieth Drooping. Afterwards he sent many of his Subjects to seek the Ship Argo, threatening that if they brought not back Medea, they should suffer in her stead. In the mean while the Argonauts were driven about the Seas, and were come to the River Eridanus, which is Poin Italy.

Jupiter offended with the slaughter of Ablyrtus, vexed them with a great Tempest, and carried them they knew not whither; when they came to the Ilands Ablyrtides, there the Ship Argo (that there might want no incredible thing in this Fable) spake to them, and said, That the anger of Jupiter should not cease, till they came to Ausonia, and were cleansed by Cora, from the Murder of Ablyrtus. Now they thereupon Sailing between the Coasts of Lybia and Gallia, and passing through the Sea of Sardinia, and along the Coast of Eubœa, came to the Ile of Ætea, wherein Circæ dwelt, who cleansed them: Thence they Sailed by the coast of the Syrens, who sung to allure them into danger; but Orpheus on the other side sung so well that he befayed them. Only Butes swam out unto them, whom Venus ravished, and carried to Lyliæum in Sicily to dwell.

Having past the Syrens, they came between Scylla and Charybdis, and the Stragling Rocks which seemed to cast out great force of Flares and Smoak. But Theseus and the Nereides, conveyed them safe through at the appointment of Juno. So they coasted Sicily where the beeves of the Sun were, and touched at Coryra the land of the Phæaces, where King Alcinous reigned. Mean while the Men of Colchis, that had been sent by Æetes in quest of the Ship Argo, hearing no news of it, and fearing his anger if they fulfilled not his Will, betook themselves to new habitations; some of them dwell in the Mountains of Coryra, others in the Ilands Ablyrtides, and some coming to the Phæaces, there found the Ship term, and was the first that gathered the Athenians, from being dispersed in thin and ragged Villages: in recompence whereof, and for devising them Laws to live under, and in order, he was by the beggerly, mutable, and ungrateful Multitude, in the end banished. Some say Polycrates, by the Law of Lots, or names written on Shells, which was a device of his own.

Jud. 10.2

He stole Helen (as they say) when she was Fifteen Years Old, from Aphidna, which Cypris and Pollux over-turned, when they followed after Thebes, to recover their Sister. Erasistratus and Pausanias write, that Thebes begat her with Child at Argos, where she erected a Temple to Lucina; but her Age makes that Tale unlikely to be true, and so doth Ovid, Non tamen ex factis fructum tulit ille petunt, &c. The Rape Eusebius finds in the first of Isis, who governed Israel Twenty two Years, to whom succeeded Jephthah or Jephthah Six Years, to whom Ishmael, who ruled Seven Years, and then Habdon Eight Years; in whose time was the fall of Troy. So as, if Thebes had a Child by her: in the first of Isis, (at which time we must count her no less than Fifteen Years Old; for the Women did not commonly begin to young as they do now,) she was then at least two and Fifty Years old, at the Destruction of Troy; and when she was stolen by Paris eight and thirty; but herein the Chronologers do not agree. Yet Eusebius and Bunsing with Halicarnassus do in effect consent, that the City was entred, and burnt in the first year of Demophon King of Athen; the Successor of Menestheus, the Successor of Thebes, Seventeen days before the Summer Tropic; and that about the Eleventh of September following, the Trojans crost the Hellepont into Thrace, and wintered there; and in the next Spring that they navigated into Sicilia, where wintering the second year, the next Summer they arrived at Laurentum, and builded Levinum. But S. Augustine hath it otherwise, that when Polypides governed Sicyon, Menestheus Athen, Tautanes Affria, Habdon Israel, then Aeneas arrived in Italy, transporting with him in twenty Ships the remainder of the Trojans; but the difference is not great; and hereof more at large in the story of Troy at hand.

In Sicyona Phaestus the two and twentieth King, reigned eight years, beginning by the common account in the time of Thebes. His Successors, Adrastus who reigned four Years, and Polypides who reigned thirteen, are accounted to the time of Isis; so is also Menestheus King of Athen, and Aeneas, who held a great part of Peloponnesus. In Affria, during the Government of these two peaceable Judges, Mitres, and after him Tautanes, reigned. In Egypt Amenophis, the Son of Ramses, and afterwards Ammenesis.

§ VII.

Of the War of Thebes which was in the Age.

IN this Age was the War of Thebes, the most Ancient that ever Greek Poet or Historian wrote of. Wherefore the Romane Poet Lucretius, affirming (as the Epicures in this point held truly against the Peripateticks) that the World had a beginning, urgeth them with this Objection.

— Si nulla fuit genitalis origo
Rerumque & mundi, semperque aeterna fuere,
Cur supra bellum Thebanum, & funera Trojae,
Non alias alij quocunque creatae post.

If all this World had no Original,
But things have ever been as now they are:
Before the siege of Thebes or Troy's last Fall,
Why did no Poet sing some elder War.

It is true, that in these times Greece was very Salvage, the Inhabitants being often chased from place to place, by the Captains of greater Tribes; and no Man thinking the ground whereon he dwelt his own, longer than he could hold it by strong hand. Wherefore Merchandize and other Intercourse they used little, neither did they Plant many Trees, or sow more Corn than was necessary for their Sustainance. Money they had little or none, for it is thought that the name of Money was not heard in Greece, when Homer did write, who measures the value of Gold and Brass by the worth in Cattle; saying that the Golden Armour of Glaucus, was worth 100. Bees, and the Copper Armour of Diomedes worth nine.

Robberies by Land and Sea were common and without shame, and to steal Horses or Kine was the usual Exercise of their great Men. Their Towns were not many, and thereof those that were walled were very few, and not great. For Myrae the Principal City in Peloponnesus was a very little thing, and it may well be thought that the rest were proportionable; briefly, Greece was then in her Infancy, and though in some small Towns of that half Ile of Peloponnesus, the Inhabitants might have enjoyed quietness within their narrow Bounds; as likewise did the Athenians, because their Country was so barren, that none did care to take it from them; yet that the Land in general was very rude, it will easily appear to such as consider, what Thucydides, the greatest of their Historians, hath written to this effect, in the Preface to his History. Wherefore, as in these latter times, idle Chroniclers use when they want good matter, to fill whole Books with reports of great Frights, or dry Summers, and other such things which no Man cares to read; so did they, who spake of Greece in her beginnings, remember only the great Ruins which were in the times of Ogyges, and Deucalion; or else rehearse Fables of Men changed into Birds, of strange Monsters of Adultery committed by their Gods, and the mighty Men which they begat; without writing ought that favoured of Humanity, before the time of the War of Thebes; the brief whereof is this: Oedipus the Son of Laius King of Thebes, having been cast forth when he was an Infant, because an Oracle foretold what evil should come to pass by him, did afterwards in a narrow passage contending for the way, slay his own Father, not knowing either then or long after, who he was. Afterward he became King of Thebes, by Marriage of the Queen Jocasta, called by Homer Epicaste; on whom, not knowing her to be his Mother, he begat two Sons, Eteocles and Polynices. But when in process of time, finding out by good circumstances, who were his Parents, he understood the grievous Murder and Incest he had committed, he tore out his own Eyes for grief, and left the City. His Wife and Mother did hang her self. Some say, that Oedipus having his Eyes pulled out, was expelled Thebes, bitterly cursing his Sons, because they suffered their Father to be cast out of the Town, and aided him not. Howsoever it were, his two Sons made this Agreement, that the one of them should Reign one Year, and the other another Year; and so by course interchangeably; but this appointment was ill observed. For when Polynices had after a Years Government resigned the Kingdom to his Brother; or (according to others) when Eteocles had Reigned the first year, he refused to give over the Rule to Polynices. Hereupon Polynices fled unto Argos, where Adrastus the Son of Talaus then Reigned, unto whose Palace coming by Night, he was driven to seek Lodging in an Out-House, on the Backside.

There he met with Tydeus the Son of Oeneas, who was fled from Caldon; with whom striving about their Lodging, he fell to blows. Adrastus hearing the noise, came forth and took up the quarrel. At which time perceiving in the Shield of Tydeus a Boar, in that of Polynices a Lion, he remembered an old Oracle, by which he was advised to give his two Daughters in Marriage to a Lion and a Boar; and accordingly he did bestow his Daughter Ergia upon Tydeus, and Deiroke upon Polynices, promising to restore them both to their Countries. To this purpose levying an Army, and assembling as many Valiant Captains as he could draw to follow him, he was desirous among others to carry Amphiarus, the Son of Oicleus, a great Sooth-sayer, and a Valiant Man, along with him. But Amphiarus, who is said to have foreseen all things, knowing well that none of the Captains should escape, save only Adrastus, did both utterly refuse to be one in that expedition, and periwaded others to stay at home. Polynices therefore dealt with Eryphile the Wife of Amphiarus, offering unto her a very fair Bracelet, upon condition that she should cause her Husband to assist him. The Sooth-sayer knowing what should work his destiny, forbade his Wife to take any Gift of Polynices. But the Bracelet was in her Eyes so precious a Jewel, that she could not refuse it. Therefore whereas a great controversy, between Amphiarus and Adrastus, was by way of Compromise put unto the decision of Eryphile, either of them being bound by Solemn Oath to stand to her appointment: She ordered the matter so, as a Woman should, that loved a Bracelet better than her Husband. He now finding that it was more difficult to foresee than avoid Destiny, fought such comfort as Revenge might afford; giving in charge to his Sons, that when they came to full age, they should kill their Mother, and make strong War upon the Thebans.

Now had Adrastus assembled all his Forces, of which, the Seven chief Leaders were, himself, Amphiarus, Capanus, and Hippomedon (instead of whom some name Merchus) all Argives, with Polynices the Theban, Tydeus the Aetolian, and Parthenopaeus the Aetolian, Son of Melaeger and Asiantia. When the Army came to the Nemeas Wood, they met a Woman, whom they desired to help them to some Water, the having a Child in her Arms, laid it down, and led the Argives to a Spring; but e're she returned, a Serpent had slain the Child. This Woman was Hippyle the Daughter of Thoas the Lemnian, whom the would have faved when the Women of the Isle flew all the Males by Conspiracy, intending to lead an Amazonian Life. For such her piety, the Lemnian Wives did sell her to Pyrras, and the Pyrras to Lycurgus Lord of the Country about Nemea, whose young Son Ophelet or Archemorus, the did nurse, and lost as is shewed before. When upon the Childs Death he hid her self for fear of her Master, Amphiarus told her Sons where they should find her; and the Argives did both kill the Serpent, which had slain the Child, and in Memory of the chance, did institute Solemn Funeral Games called Nemeas, wherein Adrastus won the prize with his Swift Horse Arion, Tydeus with Whorl-bats, Amphiarus at Running and Quoting, Polynices at Wrestling, Parthenopaeus at Shooting, and one Ladaeus in Darting. This was the first Institution of the Nemeas Games, which continued after Famous in Greece for very many ages. There are who think, that they were ordained in Honour of one Opheletus, a Lacedaemonian. Some say by Hercules, when he had slain the Nemean Lion: But the common Opinion agrees with that which is here set down.

From Nemea the Argives marching onwards, arrived at Cithaeron, whence Tydeus was by them sent Embassadour to Thebes, to require of Eteocles the performance of Covenants between him and Polynices. This message was nothing agreeable to Eteocles, who was thoroughly resolved to hold what he had, as long as he could: which Tydeus perceiving, and intending partly to get honour, partly to try what merite was in the Thebans, he made many Challenges, and obtained Victory in all of them, not without much Envy and Malice of the People, who laid Fifty Men in Ambush, to intercept him at his return to the Army, of which Fifty he slew all but One, whom he sent back to the City as a Reporter and Witness of his Valour. When the Argives understood how revolved Eteocles was, they presented themselves before the City, and encamped round about it. Thebes is said to have had at that time Seven Gates, which belike stood not far asunder, seeing that the Argives (who afterward when they were very far stronger, could scarce Muster up more Thousand than Thebes had Gates) did compels the Town. Adrastus quartered before the Gate Homolidae, Capanus before the Oggian, Tydeus before Crenus, Amphiarus, at Proetia, Hippomedon at Anchusa, Parthenopaeus at Electra, and Polynices at Hippisla. In the mean Season, Eteocles having Armed his Men, and appointed Commanders unto them, took Advice of Tiresias the Sooth-sayer, who promised Victory to the Thebans, if Menaeus the Son of Creon a Principal Man of the City, would vow himself to be slain in Honour of Mars the God of War. So full of Malice and Pride is the Devil, and so envious at his Creator's Glory, that he not only challenge Honours due to God alone, as Oblations and Sacrifices with a Divine Worship, but commandeth us to offer our selves, and our Children unto him, when he hath sufficiently clouded Mens Understandings, and bewitched their Wills with Ignorance and blind Devotion. And such abominable Sacrifice of Men, Maids, and Children hath he exacted of the Syrians, Carthaginians, Gauls, Germans, Cyprians, Egyptians, and of many other, if not of all Nations, when through Ignorance or Fear they were most filled with Superstition. But as they grew more wise, so did he wax less impudent in Cunning, though not less malicious in deferring the continuance of such barbarous Inhumanity. For King Diphilus in Cyprus without advice of any Oracle, made the Idol of that Country reit contented with an Oxe instead of a Man. Theribon forbade human Sacrifices in Africk; and crucified the Priests in that Groves where they had prafticed them. Hercules taught the Italians to drown Men of Hay instead of the living, yet among the Salvages in the West Indies their cruel Offerings have been prafticed of late Ages; which as it is a sufficient Argument, that Satan's Malice is only covered and hidden by this subtilty among civil People: So may it serve as a probable Conjecture of the Barbarians then reigning in Greece. For Menecius as soon as he understood, that his Death might purchase Victory to his People, bestowed himself (as he thought) upon Mars, killing himself before the Gates of the City. Then was a Battle fought, wherein the Argives prevailed so far at the first, that Capaneus advancing Ladders to the Walls, got up upon the Rampart; whence, when he fell or was cast down, or (as Writers have it) was stricken down by Jupiter with a Thunder-bolt, the Argives fled. Many on each part were slain in this Battle, which caused both sides to desire that Ereclus and Polynices might try out the quarrel in single fight; whereto the two brethren according, flew each other.

Another Battle was fought after their Deaths, wherein the Sons of Athacus behaved themselves very valiantly: Ismarus one of the Sons flew Hippomedon, which was one of the seven Princes; Parthenopaeus being another of the seven (who was said to have been so fair, that none would hurt him when his Face was bare) was slain by Ambidicus, or as some say, by Periclymenus the Son of Nepeme; and the Valiant Tydeus by Menalippus; yet ere Tydeus died, the Head of Menalippus was brought unto him by Amphiarus, which he cruelly tore open and swallowed up the Brains. Upon which fact, it is said, that Pallas who had brought from Jupiter that remedy for his Wound, as should have made him immortal, refused to bestow it upon him; whereby perhaps was meant, that his Honour, which might have continued immortal, did perish through the beastly Rage, that he shewed at his death.

The Host of the Argives being wholly defeated, Adrastus and Amphiarus fled; of whom Amphiarus is said to have been swallowed quick into the Earth, near to the River Ilmenus, together with his Chariot, and to loit out of Mens sight, being peradventure overwhelmed with dead Carcasses or drowned in the River; and his Body never found, nor greatly sought for. Adrastus escaped on his good Horse Arian, and came to Athens; where sitting at an Altar called the Altar of Mercy, he made Supplication for their Aid to recover their Bodies. For Creon having obtained the Government of Thebes, after the Death of Ereclus, would not suffer the Bodies of the Argives to be buried; but caused Antigone, the only Daughter then living of Oedipus, to be buried quick, because she had fought out and buried the Body of her Brother Polynices, contrary to Creon's Edict. The Athensians condescending to the request of Adrastus, did lend forth an Army under the Conduct of Thesius, which took Thebes, and restored the Bodies of the Argives to Sepulture; at which time Ecadene the Wife of Capaneus, threw her self into the Funeral Fire, and was burnt willingly with her Husband. But it little contented the Sons of those Captains which were slain at Thebes, that any less revenge should be taken of their Fathers Death, than the ruine of the City; wherefore ten years after having levied Forces, Aegialeus the Son of Adrastus, Dymodes of Tydeus, Promachus of Parthenopaeus, Sthenelus of Capaneus, Thersander of Polynices, and Eurypius of Meistheus, marched thither under the conduct of Alcmaeon the Son of Amphiarus; with whom also went his Brother Ambidicus. Apollo promised Victory if Alcmaeon were their Captain, whom afterward by another Oracle he commanded to kill his own Mother.

When they came to the City, they were encountered by Laodamas the Son of Ereclus, then King of the Thebans, (for Creon was only Tutor to Laodamas) who though he did valiantly in the Battle, and slew Aegialeus, yet was he put to the worst, and driven to fly, or (according to Apollodorus) by Alcmaeon. After this disaster the Citizens began to desire Composition; but in the mean time they conveyed themselves with their Wives and Children away from thence by Night, and so began to wander up and down, till at length they built the Town called Ephica. The Argives when they perceived that their Enemies had quieted the Town, entering into it, sacked it, threw down the Walls, and laid it waste; howbeit it is reported by some, that the Town was saved by Thersander, the Son of Polynices, who causing the Citizens to return, did there reign over them. That he saved the City from utter Destruction, it is very likely, for he reigned there, and led the Thebans to the War of Troy, which very shortly after ensued.

§. VIII

§. VIII.

Of Jephtha, and how the Three hundred Years which he speaks of, Jud. 11. vers. 28. are to be reconciled with the places, A. C. 1. 20. 1. Reg. 6. 1. together with some other things touching Chronology about these times.

AFTER the Death of Jair (near about whose times these things happened in Greece, and during whose Government, and that of Tholo, Israel lived in peace and in order) they revolted again from the Law, and Service of God, and became more wicked and Idolatrous than ever. For whereas in the former times they worshipped Baal and Asteroth, they now became followers of all the Heathen Nations adjoining, and embraced the Idols of the Aramites, of the Zidonians, Mosabites, and Ammonites; with those of the Philistines. And as before it pleased God to correct them by the Aramites, by the Amalekites, and Midianites; so now he scourged them by the Ammonites, and afterward by the Philistines.

Now among the Israelites, those of Gilead being most oppressed, because they bordered upon the Ammonites, they were inforced to seek Jephtha, whom they had formerly despised and cast from them, because he was base Born; but he (notwithstanding those former injuries) participating more of Godly Compassion, than of devilish Hatred and Revenge, was content to lead the Gileadites to the War, upon Condition that they should establish him their Governour after Victory. And when he had disputed with Ammon for the Land, disproved Ammon's Right, and fortified the Title of Israel by many Arguments, the same prevailing nothing, he began the War; and being strengthened by God, overthrew them; and did not only beat them out of the Plains, but forced them over the Mountains of Arabia, even to Emath, and Abel of the Vineyards, Cities exprest heretofore in the description of the Holy-Land. After which Victory it is said, that he performed the vain Vow, which he made, to Sacrifice the first living Creature he encountered, coming out of his House to meet him; which happened to be his own Daughter, and only Child, who with all patience submitted herself, and only desired two Months time to bewail her Virginity on the Mountains of Gilead; because in her the Issues of her Father ended; but the other opinion that she was not offered, is more probable, which Borrows and others prove sufficiently.

After these things the Children of Israel, of the Tribe of Ephraim, either envious of Jephtha's Victory, otherwise making way to their future Calamity, and to the most grievous Slavery that ever Israel suffered, quarrelled with Jephtha, that they were not called to the War, as before time they had contended with Gideon. Jephtha hereupon inforced to defend himself against their Fury, in the encounter slew of them Two and Forty Thousand, which so weakened the Body of the Land, as the Philistines had an easie Conquest of them all not long after: Jephtha after he had Judged Israel Six years died; to whom succeeded Izraan, who Ruled Seven years. After him Eloa was their Judge Ten years: in all which time Israel had Peace. Eusebius finds not Eloa, whom he calleth Adon, for in the Septuagint, approved in his time, this Judge was omitted.

Now before I go on with the rest, it shall be necessary upon the occasion of Jephtha's Account of the times Jud. 11. 28. (where he says that Israel had then possessed the East side of Jordan 300. years) to speak somewhat of the times of the Judges, and of the differing opinions among the Divines and Chronologers: there being found three places of Scripture, touching this point, seeming repugnant, or disagreeing: The first is in this dispute between Jephtha and Ammon, for the right and possession of Gilead: the second is that of St. Paul Act. 13. the third that which is in the First of Kings. Jephtha here challenge the possession of Gilead for 300. years: Saint Paul giveth to the Judges, as it seems, from the end of Jehua, to the last of Heli, 450. years. In the first of Kings it is taught, that from the departing of Israel out of Egypt, to the foundation of Solomon's Temple, there were consumed 480. years. To the first Berosus findeth Jephtha's 300. years to be but 266. years, to wit, 18. of Jehua, 40. of Orthoniel, 80. of Adad and Sangar, 40. of Deborah, 40. of Gideon, 3. of Abimelech, 2. of Tholo, and 22. of Jair: But Jephtha (faith Berosus) putteth or propoth a certain number, upon an uncertain: Sic ut dicat annum aq. propi. tr. centesimum, ex quo nullus Isem ea de re movetur Israel: So he speaks (faith he) as meaning, that then it was about or well nigh the Three Hundredth years, since Israel possessed these Countries, no man making question of their right. Codeman on the contrary finds more years than Jephtha named by 67. to wit, 367. whereof 71. were spent in Israel's Captivity, at several times, of which (as Codeman thinketh) Jephtha forbore to repeat the whole Sum, or any great part, lest the Ammonites should have justly objected, that 71. of those years, the Israelites were in Captivity and Vassals to their Neighbour Princes, and therefore knowing that to name Three Hundred years, it was enough for Prefcription, he omitted the rest.

To justify this account of 367. years, besides the 71. years of Captivity or Affliction, to be added to Berosus his 266. he addeth also 28. years more, and so maketh up the Sum of 367. These 28. years he findeth out thus; 20. years he gives to the Seniors between Jephtha and Orthoniel; and where Berosus alloweth but 18. years to Jephtha his Government, Codeman accounts that his rule lasted 26. according to Jephtha; whereas St. Augustine and Eusebius give him 27. Melancthon 32. The Truth is, that this addition of 28. years, is far more doubtful than the other of 71. But though we admit not of this addition, yet by accounting of some part of the years of Affliction (to wit, 34. years of the 71. if we add them to the 266. years of Berosus, which reckon none of these, we have the full number of 300. years. Neither is it strange, that Jephtha should leave out more than half of these years of Affliction: seeing, as it is already said, the Ammonites might except against these 71. years, and say that during these years, or at least a good part of them, the Israelites had no quiet possession of the Countries in question. Martin Luther is the Author of a third opinion, making those 300. years remembered by Jephtha, to be 306. which odd years, faith he, Jephtha omitted. But because the years of every Judge as they reigned, cannot make up this number of 306. but do only compound 266. therefore doth Luther add to this number, the whole time which Moses spent in the Deserts of Arabia Petraea; which Forty years of Moses, added to the number which Berosus findeth of 266. make indeed 306.

But I see nothing in the Text to warrant Luther's judgment herein; for in the dispute between Jephtha and Ammon for the Land of Gilead, it is written hour to let down the course of time exactly (a thing no way concerning his purpose) but only to shew that God, who had chosen Israel to be his People, delivered them out of Bondage, and ruled them by Judges, and Prophets, unto the time of Saul; did raise up our Lord Jesus Christ out of the seed of David the King, in whose Succession the Crown was established, and promise made of a Kingdom that should have no end. Now in rehearsing briefly thus much, which tended as a Preface to the Declaration following (wherein he sheweth Christ to have been the true Messias) the Apostle was so far from labouring to make an exact Calculation of Times (the History being so well known, and believed of the Jews to whom he preached) that he spake as it were at large of the 40. years consumed in the Wilderness, whereof no man doubted; saying, that God suffered their manners in the Wilderness about 40. years. In like manner he proceeded, saying, that from the division of the Land unto the days of Samuel the Prophet, in whose time they required to have a King, there passed about 450. years. Neither did he stand to tell them, that an 100 and 11. years of Bondage mentioned in this middle while, were by exact Computation to be included within the 339. years of the Judges; for this had been an impertinent Digression from the argument which he had in hand. Wherefore it is a work not so needful as laborious, to search out of this place, that which the Apostle did not here intend to reach, when the Sum of 480. years is so expressly and purposely set down.

Now that the Words of St. Paul (if there be no fault in the Copy through error of some Scribe) are not so curiously to be examined in matter of Chronology, but must be taken as having reference to the memory and apprehension of the Vulgar, it is evident by his ascribing in the same place 40. years to the reign of Saul; whereas it is manifest, that those years were divided between Saul and Samuel, yea that far the greater part of them were spent under the Government of the Prophet, howsoever they are here included in the reign of the King. As for those that with so much Cunning forfake the general Opinion, when it favoured not such Exposition, as they bring out of a good mind, to help where the need is not over great; I had rather commend their Diligence, than follow their Example. The Words of St. Paul were sufficiently justified by Berwaldus, as having reference to a common Opinion among the Scribes in those days, that the 111. years of Servitude were to be reckoned apart from the 339. years ascribed to the Judges; which account the Apostle would not in this place stand so contradict, but rather chose to speak as the Vulgar, qualifying it with a quasi, where he saith, quasi quadringentis & quinquaginta annis; as it were four hundred and fifty years. But Codoman being not thus contented, would needs have it to be so indeed; and therefore diffuses the members to make the account even. In so doing he dalheth himself against a notable Text, whereupon all Authors have builded (as well they might and ought) that purposely and precisely doth call up the years from the departure out of Egypt, unto the building of Solomon's Temple, not omitting the very month it fell.

Now (as commonly the first Apprehensions are strongest) having already given faith to his own Interpretation of St. Paul, he thinketh it more needful to find some new Exposition for that, which is of it self most plain, than to examine his own Conjecture upon a place that is full of Controversie. Thus by expounding, after a strange method, that which is manifest by that which is obscure, he loofeth himself in those ways, wherein before him never man walked. Surely if one should urge him to give reason of these new Opinions, he must needs answer, That Orbital could not govern above 25. years, because then was the taking of Lailah, at which time there was no King in Israel: That the Danites must needs have taken Lailah at that time, because else we could not reckon backwards, from the Foundation of the Temple, to any Action that might be termed the Coming of Israel out of Egypt, without excluding the years of Servitude; And that the years of Servitude must needs be included, for that otherwise he himself should have spent his time vainly, in seeking to pleasure St. Paul with an Exposition. Whether this ground be strong enough to uphold a Paradox, I leave it to the Decision of any judicious Reader.

And now to proceed in our story. To the time of Jephtha are referred the Death of Hercules, the Rape of Helen by Paris; and the Provisions which her Husband Menelaus, reigning then in Sparta, and his Brother Agamemnon King of Mycene, made for her recovery. Others refer this Rape of Helen to the fourth year of Ibsan; from which time, if the War of Troy (as they suppose) did not begin till the third of Alen or Elen, yet the Greeks had six years to prepare themselves; the rule holding not true in this War, longa preparatio Belli celerem offert Victoriis; That a long Preparation begets a speedy Victory; for the Greeks consumed ten years in the attempt; and Troy as it seems was entered, sacked and burnt in the third year of Habdon.

Three years after Troy was taken, which was in the sixth year of Habdon, Aeneas arrived in Italy. Habdon in the eighth year of his rule died, after he had been the Father of 40. Sons and 30. Grand-Children. And whereas it is supposed, that the 40. years of Israel's Oppression by the Philistines (of which Jud. 13. v. 1.) took beginning from the ninth year of Jair, and ended with that Opinion, Habdon; I see no great reason for that Opinion. For Ephraim had had little cause of quarrel against Jephtha, for not calling them to War over Jordan. Jephtha, for he held them in servitude in their own Territories; and if Ephraim could have brought 40.000. armed Men into the Field, it is not likely that they were then oppressed; and had it been true that they were, who will doubt but that they would rather have fought against the Philistines, with so powerful an Army, for their own deliverance, than against their own Brethren the Israelites? But Ammon being overthrown, it seemed at that time, that they feared no other Enemy. And therefore these 40. years must either be supplied elsewhere, as in the time of Samson, and afterwards; or else they must be referred to the interregnum between the death of Habdon, and the deliverance of Israel by Samson, such as it was.

Of the Genealogy of the Kings of Troy, with a note touching the ancient Poets how they have observed Historical Truth.

THE War at Troy, with other Stories hereupon depending, (because the ruins of this City, by most Chronologists is found in the time of Habdon, Judge of Israel, whom in the last place I have mentioned) I rather chose here to intreat of in one intire Narration, beginning with the lineal Descent of their Princes, than to break the Story into pieces, by rehearsing a-part in divers years the diversity of Occurrences.

The History of the ancient Kings of Troy is uncertain, in regard both of their Original, and of their Continuance. It is commonly held that Tenor and Dardanus were the two founders of that Kingdom. This is the Opinion of Virgil; which if he (as Remonius thinks) took from Bersius, it is the more probable; if Amnius borrowed it from him, then it rests upon the Authority of Virgil, who saith thus.

Encl. 3.

*Crete Jovis magni medio jacet insula Ponto:
Mons Idaeus ubi, & gentis canabula nostra.
Centum Urbes habitum magnas, uberrima Regna:
Maximus undae Pater (sic ut audis recorder)
Teucrus Rhodæ primum eff advenit ad ora:
Operatque locum Regno. Nondum Ilium & aene
Pergamæa petierat; habitabant quilibet omni.
Hinc Mater Cebryx Cybele, Corymbiaque ara, Ideumque nemus.*

In the main Sea the Isle of Crete doth lie:
Where Troes was born, thence is our progeny.
There is mount Ida; there in fruitful Land
An hundred great and goodly Cities stand, Thence (if I follow not mistaken fame)
Tenor the eldest of our Grand-fires came
To the Rhætan shores; and raigned there Ere yet fair Ilium was built, and ere
The Towers of Troy; their dwelling-place they sought In lowest Vales. Hence Cybel's rights were brought:
Hence Corymbian Cymbales did remove:
And hence the name of our Idæan Grove.

Thus it seems by Virgil, who followed surely good Authority, that Tenor first gave name to that Country, wherein he raigned ere Troy was built by Dardanus; of which Dardanus in the same Book he speaks thus.

*Est locus Helperiam Graii cognomine dicunt:
Terra antiqua, potens Armis atque ubere glebe.
Oenotrii culere viri, nunc fama minores
Italiam dixisse, duci de nomine, gentem.*

Hæ nobis propria sed, hinc Dardanus ortus: Tefulque Pater, genus a quo Prinsepz nostrum.

Helperia the Graecians call the place;
An ancient fruitful Land, a War like Race.
Oenotrians held it, now the latter progeny
Gives it their Captain's name, and calls it Italy.
This seat belongs to us, hence Dardanus,
Hence came the Author of our stock, Ilium.

*Atque equidem memini (fama est obscurior annis) Aeneas ita ferre senex, bis ortus ut agros
Dardanus Idæus Phrygiæ penetravit ad urbes, Troiciamque Somum, quæ nunc Samolracia fertur.
Hinc Ilium Corythi Tyrrhenâ ab lide profectum Aeneas nunc (sic stellantis regia celi) Accipit, &c.*

Some old Aununcians, I remember well (Though time have made the Fame obscure) would tell
Of Dardanus, how born in Italy;
From hence he into Phrygia did flee.
And leaving Troisfame (where he earlt had place)
With Corytus did fall to Samsthrace;
But now inthron'z'd the stars on high,
In Golden Palace of the flarry skie.

But contrary to this, and to so many Authors, approving and confirming it, Remonius thinks that these names, Troes, Tenax, and Thracæ, are derived from Tiras or Thiras the Son of Japhet; and that the Dardanians, Myfians, and Alcarians, mixt with the Trojians, were German Nations, descended from Alphenax, the Son of Gomer: of whom the Country, Lake, and River of Alcanis in Asia took Name. That Alphenax gave name to those places and people, it is not unlikely; neither is it unlikely that the Alcani, Dardani, and many others, did in after-times pass into Europe; that the name of Tenor came of Tar, the conjecture is somewhat hard. Concerning Tenor, whereas Halicarnassus maketh him an Athenian, I find none that follow him in the same opinion. Virgil (as is before shewed) reporteth him to be of Crete, whose Authority is the more to be regarded, because he had good means to find the Truth, which is probable that he carefully sought, and in this did follow; seeing it no way concerned Augustus (whom other-whiles he did flatter) whether Tenor were of Crete or no. Remonius doth rather embrace the opinion of Diodorus and others, that think him a Phrygian, by which report he was the Son of Scamander and Ida, Lord of the Country, not Founder of the City and his Daughter or Niece Batis, was the second Wife of Dardanus, Founder of Troy. Remeas further thinks, that Atlas reigned in Samos, and gave his Daughter Electra to Corus, or Coriis; and that these were Parents to Chryse, first Wife to Dardanus. Virgil holds makes Dardanus the Son of Electra by Japhet, which Electra was the Daughter to whom the bare Falsus, Annius out of his History finds the name of Camboislacon, to whom he gives the addition of Coris, as a Title of Dignity, making him Father of Dardanus and Jafus; and further telling us very particularly of the Faction between these Brethren, which grew to such heat, that finally Dardanus killed his Brother, and thereupon fled into Samos. The obliquity of the Hiltory gives leave to Annius of saying what he list. I thar love not to use such liberty, will forbear to determine any thing herein. But if Dardanius were the Son of Jupiter, it must have been of some elder Jupiter than the Father of those that lived about the War of Troy.

 So is it likewise probable, that Atlas the Father of Electra, was rather an Italian than an African, which also is the opinion of Boccaccio. For (as hath often been said) there were many Jupiters, and many of almost every name of the Gods; but it was the Custom to ascribe to some one the Acts of the rest, with all belonging to them. Therefore I will not greatly trouble my self, with making any narrow search into these fabulous Antiquities, but far down the Pedigree according to the general fame; allowing to Tenor such Parents as Dionorus gives, because others give him none, and carrying the Line of Dardanius in manner following,

Atlas

Concerning the beginning and continuance of the Trojan Kingdom, with the length of every Kings Reign, I have choſen good Authors to be my guides, that in a Hiſtory, whereon depends the moſt ancient computation of times among the Greeks, I might not follow uncertainties, ill cohering with the conſent of Writers, and general paſſage of things elſewhere done. And firſt for the deſtruction of Troy, which was of greater note than my accident befalling that City whilſt it ſtood, it is reckoned by Diadorni to be 750 years more ancient than the beginning of the 941th Olympiad. Whereas therefore 372.2 days paſſed between the beginning of the Olympiads, and the firſt year of the 941th, it is manifeſt that the remainder of 750. that is 408. years went between the deſtruction of Troy, and the firſt inſtitution of thoſe games of Iſpion. Diad. in. Pref. if the authority of Diadorni be good proof, which elſewhere tells us, that the return of the Heraclids, which was eighty Years after the fall of Troy, was three hundred twenty eight years before the firſt Olympiad. Herod.

Hereunto agrees the authority of Dionysius Halicarnassensis, who placing the foundation of Rome in the first of the seventh Olympiads, that is four and twenty years after the beginning of those Games, accounts it 432 later than the fall of Troy. Solinus in express words makes the institution of the Olympiads by Iphitus, whom he calleth Iphiclus, 408. years later than the destruction of Troy. The fumm is easily collected by necessary inference out of divers other places in the same Book. Hereunto doth Enchiridion reckoning exclusively agree: and Eratosthenes (as he is cited by Clemens Alexandrinus) makes up out of many particulars, the same total sum, wanting but one year, as reckoning likewise exclusively.

The other Collections of divers Writers that are cited by Clemens in the same place, do neither cohere any way nor depend upon any collateral History, by which they may be verified.

The destruction of Troy being in the year before the Olympiads four hundred and eight, we must seek the continuance of that from the beginning to the end out of Enchiridion, who leads us from Dardanius on-wards through the Reigns of four Kings, by the space of two hundred and five and twenty years, and after of Priamus, with whom also at length it ended. As for the time, which passed under Iunonia, we are fain to do, as others have done before us, and take it upon trust from Annus his Authority, believing Manetho so much the rather, for that in his account of the former Kings Reigns and of Priamus, he is found to agree with Enchiridion, which may give us leave to think that Annus hath not herein corrupted him.

But in this point we need not to be very scrupulous: for seeing that no History or account of time depends upon the Reign of the former Kings, but only upon the ruin of the City under Priamus, it may suffice that we are careful to place that memorable accident in the due year.

True it is that some objections appearing weighty, may be alleged in maintenance of different Computations, which with the answers I purposefully omit, as not willing to dispute of those years, wherein the Greeks knew no good form of a year; but rather to make narration of the actions which were memorable, and acknowledged by all Writers, whereof this destruction of Troy was one of the most renowned.

The first enterprise that was undertaken by general consent of all Greece was the last War of Troy, which hath been famous even to this day, for the numbers of Princes and valiant Commanders there assembled: the great Battels fought with variable success: the long endurance of the Siege; the destruction of that great City; and the many Colonies planted in sundry Countries, as well by the remainder of the Trojans, as by the victorious Greeks after their unfortunate return. All which things with innumerable circumstances of especial note, have been delivered unto posterity, by the excellent wits of many Writers, especially by the Poems of that great Homér, whose Verses have given immortality to the Action, which might else perhaps have been buried in Oblivion, among other worthy Deeds done both before and since that time. For it is true which Horace faith;

Vixere fortes ante Agamemnona
Muli, sed omnes ilacrimabiles
Orceunt, ignotique longa
Noct: carent quia vate sacro.

Many by valour have deserv'd renown
Ere Agamemnon: yet lye all opprest
Under night, unwept for and unknown:
For with no sacred Poet were they blest.

Yet so it is, that whilst these Writers have with strange fables, or (to speak the best of them) with Allegories far strained, gone about to enlarge the commendations of those noble undertakers: they have both drawn into suspicion that great virtue which they fought to adorn, and filled after-ages with almost as much ignorance of the History, as admiration of the persons. Wherefore it is expedient that we seek for the knowledge of such actions, in Histories; teaching their qualities who did manage them of Poets, in whole works who both profit and delight: yet small profit to those which are delighted overmuch, but such as can either interpret their fables, or separate them from the naked truth, shall find matter in Poems, not unworthy to be regarded of Historians. For those things excepted which are gathered out of Homér, there is very little, and not without much disagreement of Authors, written of this great War. All Writers confess with Homér, that the rape of Helen by Paris the Son of Priamus, was the cause of taking Arms: but how he was hereunto emboldened, it is doubtful.

§. II.

Of the Rape of Helen: and strength of both sides for the War.

Herodotus fetcheth the cause of this Rape from very far: saying, That whereas the Phoenicians had ravished Io, and carried her into Aegypt, the Greeks to be revenged on the Barbarians, did first ravish Eupora whom they brought out of Phoenicia into Creta, and afterward Medea, whom they fetcht from Colchos, denying to restore her to her Father, till such time as they might be satisfied for the Rape of Io. By these deeds of the Greeks, Paris (as the same Herodotus affirms) was emboldened to do the like; not fearing such revenge as infused. But all this narration seems frivolous. For what had the King of Colchos to do with the injury of the Phoenicians? or how could the Greeks, as in revenge of Io, plead any quarrel against him, that never had heard the name of Phoenicians? Thucydides a writer of unquestionable Sincerity maketh it plain, that the name of Barbarians was not used at all in Homér's time, which was long after the War of Troy; and that the Greeks themselves were not then called all by one name Hellenes, as afterwards. So that it were unreasonable to think, that they should have fought revenge upon all Nations as barbarous, for the injury received by one: or that all people else should have esteemed of the Greeks, as of a people opposed to all the World; and that even then whereas the Greeks had not yet one common name among themselves. Others with more probability say, that the Rape of Helen was to procure the re-delivery of Hesperia, King Priamus his Sister, taken formerly by Hercules, and given to Telamon. This may have been true. For Telamon (as it seems) was a cruel Man, seeing his own Son Twece durst not come in his sight, after the War of Troy, but fled into Cyprus, only because his Brother Ajax (which Twece could not remedy) had slain himself. Yet, were it so that Hesperia was ill treated by Telamon, it was not therefore likely, that Priamus her Brother would seek to take her from from her Husband, with whom she had lived about thirty years, and to whom she had born Children which were to succeed in his Dominion. Whereupon I think that Paris had no regard either to the Rape of Eupora, Medea, or Hesperia: but was merely incited by Venus, that is by his lust, to do that which in those days was very common. For not only Greeks from Barbarians, and Barbarians from Greeks, as Herodotus discurreth, but all people were accustomed to steal Women and Cattel, if they could by strong hand or power get them; and having gotten them, either to sell them away in some far Country, or keep them to their own use. So did Thelus and Phrygians attempt Proserpina; and so did Thelus (long before Paris) ravish Helen. And these practices, as it appears in Thucydides were so common, that some durst inhabit near unto the Sea, for fear of piracy, which was accounted a trade of Life no less lawful than Merchandize: wherefore Tyndarus the Father of Helen, considering the beauty of his Daughter, and the Rape which Thelus had made, caused all her Woovers who were most of the principal Men in Greece, to bind themselves by solemn Oath, that if he were taken from her Husband, they should with all their might help to recover her. This done, he gave free choice of a Husband to his Daughter, who chose Menelaus Brother to Agamemnon. So the cause which drew the Greeks unto Troy in revenge of Helen's Rape, was partly the Oath which so many Princes had made unto her father Tyndarus. Here unto the great power of Agamemnon was not a little helping; for Agamemnon besides his great Dominions in Peloponnesus, was Lord of many Islands: he was also rich in money, and therefore the Archadians were well contented to follow his pay, whom he embarked for Troy in his own Ships, which were more than any other of the Greek Princes brought to that Expedition.

Thus did all Greeks, either as bound by Oath, or led by the reputation and power of the two Brethren, Agamemnon and Menelaus; or desirous to partake of the profit and honour in that great enterprise; take Arms against the Trojans. The Greek Fleet was (by Homér's account) 1200. sail or thereabouts: but the Vessels were not great: for it was not then the manner to build Ships with Decks; only they used (as Thucydides faith) small Ships, more for robbing on the Sea; the least of which carried fifty Men, the greatest 120, every Man (except the Captains) being both a Mariner and a Soldier. By this proportion it appears that the Greek Army consisted of 100000 Men or thereabout. This was the greatest Army that ever was raised out of Greece: and the greatness of this Army, doth well declare the strength and power of Troy, which in ten whole years did stand out against such forces: yet were the Trojans which inhabited the City not the sixth part of this number, as Agamemnon said in the second of Homér's Iliads; but their followers and aids were very many and strong. For all Phrygia, Lycia, Mysia, and the greatest part of Asia the less, took part with the Trojans, the Assians also brought them succour. And Rhesus out of Thrace, and Memnon out of Affrica (though some think out of Aethiopia) came to their defence.

§. III.

Of the Grecians journey, and Embassage to Troy; and of Helen's being detained in Aegypt; and of the Sacrificing of Iphigenia.

Wherefore the Greek, unwilling to come to trial of Arms, if things might be accomplished by Treaty, sent Menelaus and Ulysses Em-bassadors to Troy; who demanded Helen and the goods were taken with her out of Menelaus his house. What answer the Trojans made hereunto it is uncertain. Herodotus from the report of the Aegyptians Priests makes it very probable that Helen was taken from Paris before his return to Troy. The sum of his Discourse is this.

Paris in his return with Helen, being driven by foul weather unto the Coast of Aegypt, was accused for the Rape of Helen by some Bondmen of his, that had taken Sanctuary. Protesilaus then King of Aegypt, finding the accusation true by examination, detained Helen, and the Goods taken with her, till her Husband should require them: dismissing Paris without further punishment, because he was a Stranger. Wherefore the Greeks demanding Helen had answer, that she was in Aegypt: they thought themselves deluded, and thereupon made the War, which ended with the ruin of Troy. But when after the City taken, they perceived indeed she had not been there, they returned home, sending Menelaus to ask his Wife of Protesilaus. Homér and the whole Nation of Poets (except Eurypides) vary from this History, thinking it matter more magnificent and more graceful to their Poems, for the retaining of a fair Lady, than that they endured all by force, because it lay not in their power to deliver her. Yet in the fourth of his Odysseys Homér speaks of Menelaus his being in Aegypt, before he returned home to Sparta; which voyage it were not easily believed, that he made for pleasure: and if he were driven thither by contrary winds, much more may we think that Paris was likely to have been driven thither by foul weather. For Paris immediately upon the Rape committed, was enforced to fly, taking such winds as he could get, and rather enduring any storm, than to commit himself to any Haven in the Greek Seas; whereas Menelaus might have put into any Port in Greece, and there have remained with good entertainment, until such time as the wind had come about, and served for his Navigation.

One great argument Herodotus brings to confirm the laying of the Aegyptians Priests, which is, that if Helen had been at Troy, it had been utter madness for Priamus to see so many milieis bettal him, during the War, and so many of his Sons slain for the pleasure of one, who neither was Heir to the Kingdom (for Hektor was elder) nor equal in virtue to many of the rest. Besides, it may seem that Lucius spake not more pleasantly than truly, when he said that Helen, at the War of Troy, was almost as old as Queen Hebe, considering that she had been ravished by Thelus the companion of Hercules, who took Trojanus Priamus was very young; and considering further, that she was Sister to Cassius and Polixus (he and Polixus being said by some to have been Twins) who failed with the Argonauts, having Telamon the Father of Ajax in their company before the time that Hesperia was taken; on whom Telamon begat Ajax, that was a principal Commander in the Trojan War. But whether it were so, that the Trojans could not, or would not restore Helen, so it was that the Embassadors returned ill contented, and not very well intreated; for there wanted not some that advised to have them slain. The Greeks therefore incensed, made all hast towards Troy: at which time Calchas (whom some say to have been a runagate Trojan, though no such thing be found in Homér) filed the Captains and all the Host with many troublesome answers and divinations. For he would have Agamemnon's Daughter sacrificed to appease Diana, whose anger he said withstood their passage. Whether the young Lady were sacrificed, or whether (as some write) the Goddess was contented with a Hind, it is not needful here to be disputed of. Sure it is that the malice of the Devil which awaits for all opportunities, is never more important than where mens ignorance is most. Calchus also told the Greeks, that the taking of Troy was impossible till some fatal impediments were removed: and that till ten years were past, the Town should hold out against them. All which notwithstanding the Greeks proceeded in their enterprise; under the command of Agamemnon, who was accompanied with his Brother Menelaus, Achilles the most valiant of all the Greeks, his friend Patroclus, and his Tutor Phenias; Ajax and Teucer the Sons of Telamon; Iamennus, and his companion Meriones; Nestor, and his Sons Anticlusius, and Thraesimedes; Ulysses; Menestheus the Son of Petrus, Captain of the Athenians; Diomedes the Son of Tydeus; a Man of singular Courage; the wife and learned Palamides; Alcaphus, and Ialmene, the Sons of Mars, who had sailed with the Argonauts; Phidantes also the Son of Pean, who had the Arrows of Hercules, without which Calchus said that the City could not be taken; Ajax the Son of Oileus, Pemelus, Thois, Eumelus, Islandrus, Eurypius, Athamas, Sihelatus, Troilemus the Son of Hercules; Podagyrus, and Machyon, the Sons of Ayulapius; Epeus who is said to have made the wooden Horse, by which the Town was taken; and Protesilaus, who first leapt on shore, neglecting the Oracle that threatened death to him that landed first.

K k 2 write)

§. IV.

Of the Aids of the Grecians at the Siege.

THebe and many other of less note, arriving at Troy, found such sharp entertainment, as might easily persuade them to think that the War would be more than one years work. For in the first encounter they lost Protesilaus, whom Hector slew, and many other, without any great harm done to the Trojans: save only that by their numbers of Men, they won ground enough to incamp themselves in, as appeareth in Thucydides. The principal impediment which grew upon them by reason of victuals, and the smallness of their Vessels, wherein they could not carry necessaries for such an Army. Hereupon they were compelled to send some part of their men, to labour the ground in Chersonese: others to rob upon the Sea for the relief of the Camp. Thus was the War protracted nine whole years, and either nothing done, or if any skirmishes were, yet could the Town receive little loss by them, having equal numbers to maintain the Field against such Greeks as continued the Siege, and a more safe retreat, if the Enemy got the better.

Wherefore Ovid saith, that from the first year till the tenth, there was no fighting at all: and Heraclides commands as very credible the report of Heraclides; That the Greeks did not lie before Troy the first nine years: but only did beat up and down the Seas, exercising their men, and enriching themselves, and so by wasting the enemies Country, did block up the Town, unto which they returned not until the fatal time drew near, when it should be subverted.

This is confirmed by the enquiry which Priamus made, when the Greek Princes came into the Field, the tenth year, for he knew none of them, and therefore sitting upon an high Tower (as Homer tells) he learned their names of Helen: which though it is like to be a fiction, yet could it not at all have been supposed that he should be ignorant of them, if they had shewed themselves before the Town so many years together. Between these relations of Thucydides and Heraclides, the difference is not much, the one saying that a few of the Greeks remained in the Camp before Troy, whilst the rest made purveyance by Land and Sea: the other that the whole Army did spend the time in wasting the Sea-coasts. Neither do the Poets greatly disagree from these Authors: for they make report of many Towns and Islands wasted, and the people carried into Captivity; in which actions Achilles was employed, whom the Army could not well, nor would have spared if any service of importance had been to be performed before the City. Howsoever it was, this is agreed by general consent, that in the beginning of that Summer, in which Troy was taken, great booties were brought into the Camp, and a great Pestilence arose amongst the Greeks: which Homer saith that Apollo sent in revenge of his Priests Daughter, whom Agamemnon had refused to let go, for any Ransom: but Heraclides interpreting the place, saith that by Apollo was meant the Sun: who raised pestilent Fogs, by which the Army was infected, being lodged in a Moorish piece of ground. And it might well be that the Camp was over-pestered with those, who had been abroad, and now were lodged all close together: having also grounded their Ships within the Fortifications.

About the same time arose much contention between Agamemnon and Achilles about the booty, whereof Agamemnon, as General, having first chosen for his part a captive Woman, and Achilles in the second place chosen for himself another, then Ajax, Ulysses, and so the rest of the Chieftains in order: When the Southsayer Calchus had willed that Agamemnon's Woman should be restored to her Father, Apollo's Priest, that so the Pestilence might cease, then did Agamemnon greatly rage and say that he alone would not lose his part of the spoil, but would either take that which had been given to Achilles, or that which had fallen to Ajax, or to Ulysses. Hereupon Achilles defied him, but was fain to suffer all patiently, as not able to hold his Concubine by strong hand, nor to revenge her loss, otherwise than by refusing to fight, or to send forth his Companies. But the Greeks, encouraged by their Captains, presented themselves before the City without him and his Troops.

The Trojans were now relieved with great succours, all the neighbour Countries having sent them aid: partly drawn to that War by their Commanders, who assisted Priamus for money, wherewith he abounded when the War began (as appears by his words in Homer); or for love of himself and his Sons, or hope of marriage with some of his many and fair Daughters; partly also (as we may well guess) incited by the wrongs received of the Greeks, when they wasted the Countries adjoining unto Troy. So that when Hector issued out of the Town, he was little inferior to his Enemies in numbers of Men, or quality of their Leaders. The principal Captains in the Trojan Army, were Hector, Paris, Deiphobus, Helenus and the other Sons of Priamus: Eneas, Antenor, and his Sons, Polydamus, Sarpedon, Glaucus, Aim, and the Sons of Pantheus, besides Rhesus, who was slain the first night of his arrival, Aeneas, Queen Pembesilea, and others who came towards the end of the War. Between these and the the Greeks were many Battles fought: the greatest of which were, that at the Tomb of King Ilius upon the Plain; and another at the very Trenches of the Camp, wherein Hector brake through the Fortifications of the Greeks, and began to fire their Ships; at which time Ajax, the Son of Telamon with his Brother Teucer, were in a manner the only Men of note that remaining unwounded, made head against Hector, when the state of the Greeks was almost desperate.

Another Battle (for so Antiquity calls it) or rather the same renewed, was fought by Patroclus, who having obtained leave, drew forth Achilles's Troops, relieving the weary Greeks with a fresh supply. Agamemnon, Diomedes, Ulysses, and the rest of the Princes, though fore wounded, yet were driven to put on Armour, and with help of Patroclus, repelled the Trojans very hardly. For in that fight Patroclus was lost, and his Body, with much contention recovered by his friends, was brought back into the Camp: the Armour of Achilles which he had put on, being torn from him by Hector. It was the manner of those Wars, having slain a Man, to strip him and hale away his Body, strewing it without Ransom, if he were one of mark. Of the vulgar little reckoning was made: for they fought all on foot, slightly armed, and commonly followed the success of their Captains; who rode not upon Horses, but in Chariots, drawn by two or three Horses, which were guided by some trusty followers of theirs, which drove up and down the field, as they were directed by the Captains, who by the swiftness of their Horses presenting themselves where need required, threw first their Javelins, and then alighting fought on foot, with Swords and Battel-axes, retiring into the ranks of the footmen, or else returning to their Chariots when they found cause, and so began again with a new dart as they could get it, if their old were lost, or broken. Their Armes defensive were Helms, Breast-plates, Boots of Brais or other Metal, and Shields commonly of Leather, plated over. The offensive were Swords and Battel-axes at hand; and Stones, Arrows or Darts when they fought at any distance. The use of their Chariots (besides the swiftness) was to keep them from weariness, whereto the Leaders were much subject, because of their Armour, which the fringed and hooped were heaviest: also that from them they might throw their Javelins downwards, with the more violence. Of which weapon I find not that any carried more than one or two into the Field: wherfore they were often driven to return to their Tents for a new one, when the old was gone. Likewise of Armour they had little change or none; every Man (speaking of the chief) carried his own complete, of which if any piece were lost or broken; he was driven to repair it with the like if he had any fitting, taken from some Captain whom he had slain, and stripped: or else to borrow of them that had by such means gotten some to spare. Whence therefore Achilles had lost his Armour which Hector (as is said before) had taken from the body of Patroclus, he was fain to await the making of new; ere he could enter the fight: wherof he became very desirous, that he might revenge the death of Patroclus his dear Friend.

At this time Agamemnon reconciled himself unto Achilles, not only restoring his Concubine Briseis, but giving him very great gifts, and excusing former matters as well as he might. In the next Battel Achilles did so behave himself, that he did not only put the Trojans to the worst, but also slew the valiant Hector, whom (if Homer may herein be believed) he chased three times about the Walls of Troy. But great question may be made of Homer's truth in this narration. For it is not likely that Hector would fly alone without the City (as Homer doth report of him) when all the Trojans were fled into it: nor that he could leap over the Rivers of Xanthus and Simois, as he must have done in that flight: nor that the Trojans perceiving Hector in such an extremity, would have forbore to open some of their Gates and let him in. But this is reported only to grace Achilles, who having (by what means soever) slain the Noble Hector, did not only carry away his dead body, as the custom then was, but boring holes in his feet, and thrusting leathern thongs into them, tyed him to his Chariot, and dragged him shamefully about the Field, selling the dead Body to his Father Priamus for a very great ransom. But his cruelty and covetousness were not long unrevealed; for he was shortly after slain with an Arrow by Paris, as Homer says, in the Scæan Gate, or as others in the Temple of Apollo, whither he came to have married Polyxena the Daughter of Priamus, with whom he was too far in love, having slain so many of her brethren, and his body was ransomed (as Lycophron saith) at the self same rate that Hector's was by him sold for. Not long after this, Pembesilea Queen of the Amazonians arrived at Troy; who after some proof given of her valour, was slain by Pyrhus the Son of Achilles.

§. V.

Of the taking of Troy, the wooden Horse, the Book of Dares and Dictys, the Columes of the reliques of Troy.

Finally after the death of many worthy persons, on each side, the City was taken by night, as all Writers agree: but whether by the Treason of Eneas and Antenor; or by a wooden Horse, as the Poets, and common fame (which followed the Poets) have delivered, it is uncertain. Some write that upon one of the Gates of Troy called Scæa, was the Image of a Horse, and that the Greeks entering by that Gate, gave occasion to the report, that the City was taken by an artificial Horse. It may well be that with some wooden Engine, which they called an Horse, they either did batter the Walls, as the Romans in after-times used to do with the Ram: or scaled the Walls upon the sudden, and so took the City. As for the hiding of Men in the hollow body of a wooden Horse, it had been a desperate adventure, and serving to no purpose. For either the Trojans might have perceived the deceit, and slain all those Princes of Greece, that were inclosed in it (which also by such as maintain this report they are said to have thought upon) or they might have left it a few days without the City (for it was unlikely, that they should the very first day both conclude upon the bringing it into the Town, and break down their Walls upon the sudden to do it) by which means they who were thus into it, must have perished for hunger, if they had not by issuing forth unseasonably discovered the invention. Whereas further it is said, that this Horse was built so high and great, that it could not be brought into the Town through any of the Gates, and that therefore the Trojans were fain to pull down a part of their Wall, to make way for it, through which breach the Greeks did afterwards enter: it is hereby manifest that the inclosing of so many principal Men was altogether needless, considering that without their help there was way sufficient for the Army, so that the surprising of any Gate by them was now to no purpose.

John Baptista Gramay in his History of Asia, discoursing of this War, saith that the Greeks did both batter the Wall with a City by Antenor, at the Scæan Gate: the Townsmen sleeping and drinking without fear or care, because the Fleet of the Grecians had hoisted Sail, and was gone the day before to the Isle of Tenedos, thereby to bring the Trojans into security. That the City was betrayed, the Books of Dares and Diliys must prove, which whether we now have the same that were by them written, it may be suspected; for surely they who have made mention of these Writers in ancient times, would not, as they did, have followed the reports of Homer and others quite contradictory in most points to these two Authors, without once taking notice of the opposition, which they having served in that War made against the Common report: had it not been that either those Books were eyes in those times thought frivolous; or else contained no such repugnancy to the other Authors as now is found in them.

Also concerning the number of Men slain in this War which Dares and Diliys say to have been above 600000 on the Trojan side, and more than 800000 of the Greeks, it is a report merely fabulous; forasmuch as the whole Fleet of the Greeks was reckoned by Homer, who extolled their Army and Deeds as much as he could, to be somewhat less than 1200 Sail, and the Army therein transported over the Greek Seas, not much above 100000 Men according to the rate formerly mentioned. But it is the common fashion of Men to extol the Deeds of their Ancients: for which cause both Homer magnified the Captains of the Greeks, that served in the War; and Virgil with others were as diligent in commending and extolling the Trojans and their City, from which the Romans descended. Yea the Athenians long after in the War which Xerxes the Persian King made against all Greece, did not forbear to vaunt of the great cunning which Meneſſeus the Son of Peleus had shewed, in marshalling the Grecian Army before Troy: whereupon, as if it had been a matter of much consequence, they were so proud, that they refused to yield unto Gelm King of almost all Sicily, the Admiralty of their Seas, notwithstanding that he promised to bring 200 good fighting Ships, and 30000 Men for their defence.

The like vanity possessed many other Cities of Greece; and many Nations in these parts of the World, which have thriven to being their descendent from some of the Princes, that warred at Troy: all difficulties or unlikelihooods in such their Pedigree notwithstanding. But those Nations which indeed, or in most probability came of the Trojans, were the Athenians in Italy; and from them the Romans, brought into that Country by Æneas: the Venetians still seated in Padua, and the Country adjoining by Antenor: the Chaonians planted in Epirus by Heleus, the Son of King Præmæus. To which Hellenians addeth that the Posterity of Heleus did resemble such of the Trojans as were left, and Reigned over them about Troy.

§. VI.

Of the distress and dispersions of the Greeks returning from Troy.

Concerning the Greeks; they talked as much misery as they had brought upon the Trojans. For Thucydides notes that by reason of their long abode at the Siege, they found many alterations when they returned: so that many were driven by their borderers from their ancient seats; many were expelled their Countries by faction: some were slain anon after their arrival: others were debased from the Sovereignty among their people, by such as had staid at home. The cause of all which may seem to have been the dispersion of the Army which weakened much by the calamities of that long War, was of little force to repel injuries, being divided into so many pieces under several Commanders, not very well agreeing. For (besides other quarrels arising upon the division of the Booty, and the like occasions) at the time when they should have let fall, Agamemnon and his Brother fell out, the one being desirous to depart immediately, the other to stay and perform some Sacrifices to Menerva. Hereupon they fell to hot words, half the fleet remaining with Agamemnon, the rest of them failing to the Isle of Tenedos; where when they arrived, they could not agree among themselves, but some returned back to Agamemnon; others were dispersed, each holding his own course. But the whole Fleet was fore vexed with tempests: for Pallas (as Homer saith) would not be persuaded in half.

They who returned safe were Nestor, and Pylarchus, whom Orestes afterwards slew: also Idomeneus and Philoctetes, who nevertheless, as Virgil tells, were driven foon after to seek new seats: Idomeneus among the Salentine, and Philoctetes at Perila in Italy. Agamemnon likewise returned home, but was forthwith slain by his Wife and by the adulterer Aegisthus, who for a while after usurped his Kingdom. Menelaus wandering long upon the Seas, came into Egypt, either with Heleus, or (as may rather seem) to fetch her. Ulysses, after ten years, having lost all his company, got home in poor Edage, with much ado recovering the Mastership of his own house. All the rest either perished by the way, or were driven into exile, and fain to seek out new habitations.

Æneas the Son of Oilus was drowned; Tener fled into Opyrus; Dionides to King Damius, who was Lord of the Lappes in Asia; some of the Locrians were driven into Africa, others into Italy, all the East part whereof was called Magna Græcia, by reason of so many Towns which the Greeks were driven to erect upon that Coast. Finally it appears in Homer that the Grecian Ladies, whose husbands had been at the War of Troy, were wont to call it. The place where the Greeks suffered misery, and the unlucky City not to be mentioned, and how much for Troy and those that warred there: the overthrow of which City, as hath been said, happened in the time of Helenus Judge of Iffach, whom Samson after a vacancy or Interregnum for certain years succeeded.

Of Samson, Eli, and Samuel.

§. I.

OF SAMSON.

§. II.

Of Eli, and of the Ark taken, and of Dagons slain, and the sending back of the Ark.

THE Story of Eli the Priest, who succeeded Samson, is written in the beginning of Samuel; who foretold him of the destruction of his House, for the wickedness of his Sons, which he suppressed not, neither did he punish them according to their deserts: whose sins were horrible, both in abusing the Sacrifice, and prophaneing and polluting the holy places: though Levi Ben Gerson to extenuate this filthy offence of forcing the Women by the Sons of Eli, hath a contrary opinion. In this time therefore it pleased God to call the Israelites under the Swords of the Philistines; of whom there perished in the first encounter 4000 and in the second battle 30000 Footmen; among whom the Sons of Eli being slain, their Father (bearing the lamentable success) by falling from his Chair, brake his Neck. He was the first that obtained the High-Priesthood of the flock of Ithamar the Son of Aaron. before whose time it continued successively in the Race of Elezazar the eldest Brother of Ithamar: for Aaron was the first, Elezazar the second, Phineas the Son of Elezazar the third, Abiſue the Son of Phineas the fourth, his Son Becei the fifth, Ozi the Son of Becei the sixth, and then Eli, as Tophus and Lyranus out of divers Hebrew Authors have continued. In the Race of Ithamar the Priesthood 2. 27. and continued after Eli to the time of Salomon who call t Chron. 6. out Abiathar, and established Sadoek and Achimais and their Successors. The Ark of God which Israel brought into the Field, was in this battle taken by the Philistines. For as David witnesseth, God greatly abhorred Israel, so that he forsook the habitation of Shilo: even the Tabernacle where he dwelt among men, and delivered his power into captivity, &c.

Now as it pleased God at this time, that the Ark whereby himself was represented, should fall into the hands of the Heathen, for the offences of the Priests and people: so did he permit the Chaldeans to destroy the Temple built by Salomon; the Romans to overthrow the second Temple; and the Turks to overthrow the Christian Churches in Asia and Europe. And had not the Israelites put more confidence in the Sacrament, or representation which was the Ark, than in God himself, they would have observed his Laws, and served him only: which whenever they did, they were then victorious. For after the captivity they had no Ark at all, nor in the times of the Assyrians, and yet for testimony of their piety it pleased God to make that family as victorious, as any that guarded themselves by the sign in stead of the substance. And that the Ark was not made to the end to be carried into the Field as an Ensign; David witnesseth when he fled from Abſolon. For when the Priests would have carried the Ark with him; he for- 2 Sam. 19. b3d

THE Birth and Acts of Samson are written at large in the 13, 14, 15, and 16. of Judges; and therefore I shall not need to make a repetition thereof. But these things I gather out of that Story. First that the Angel of God forbade the Wife of Meneah the Mother of Samson, to drink Wine or strong Drink, or to eat any unclean meat, after she was conceived with Child, because those strong Liquors hinder the strength, and as it were wither and shrink the Child in the Mothers Womb. Though this were even the counsel of God himself, and delivered by his Angel, yet it seemeth that many Women of this Age have not read, or at least will not believe this precept; the most part forbearing not drinks, nor meats, how strong or unclean soever, filling themselves with all sorts of Wines, and with artificial drinks far more forcible: by reason whereof, so many wretched feeble bodies are born into the World, and the Racks of the able and strong Men in effect decayed.

Secondly, it is to be noted, that the Angel of God refused the sacrifice which Meneah would have offered him, commanding him to present it unto the Lord: and therefore those that profess divination by the help of Angels, to whom also they sacrifice, may assuredly know that they are Devils who accept thereof, and not good Angels, who receive no worship that is proper to God.

Thirdly, this Samson was twice betrayed by his Wives, to wit, by their importunity and deceitful Tears: by the first he lost but a part of his Goods: by the second his life. Quem nulla vi superare possunt, vulgus occidit; Whom no force could overcome, Vulgus himself overcometh.

Fourthly, we may note, that he did not in all deliver Israel from the oppression of the Philistines; though in some sort he revenged, and defended them: for notwithstanding that he had slain 30 of them in his first attempt, burnt their Corn in harvest time, and given them a great overthrow instantly upon it: yet so much did Israel fear the Philistines, as they assembled 3000 Men out of Judea, to besiege Samson in the Rock or Mountain of Etam, using these words: Knowest thou that the Philistines are Rulers over us? &c. After which they bound him, and delivered him unto the Philistines, for fear of their revenge; though he was no longer loomed, but he gave them another overthrow and slew 1000 with the Jaw-bone of an ass.

Lastly, being made Blind, and a Prisoner by the Treason of his Wife, he was content to end his own life, to be avenged of his Enemies, when he pulled down the pillars of the House at the Feast whereto they sent for Samson, to deride him, till which time he bare his affliction with patience: but it was truly said of Seneca; Patientia sepe laſa vertitur in furorem, Patience often wounded is converted into fury: neither is it at any time so much wounded by pain and loss, as by derision and contumely.

bad it, and caused it to be returned into the City, using these words. If I shall find favour in the eyes of the Lord, he will bring me again: if not, let him do to me as seemeth good in his eyes.

The Trojans believed that while their Palladium or the Image of Minerva was kept in Troy, the City should never be overturned: so did the Christians in the last fatal Battle against Saladin carry into the field, as they were made believe, the very Cross whereon Christ died, and yet they lost the Battle, their Bodies and the Wood. But Chrysostom upon Saint Matthew (if that be his work) giveth a good judgment, speaking of those that were a part of Saint John's Gospel about their necks, for an amulet or preservative. Si tibi ea non proficiunt in auxilio, quomodo poterunt in collo? If those words do not profit Men in their Ears (to wit, the hearing of the Gospel preached) how should it profit them by hanging it about their necks? For it was neither the wood of the Ark, nor the wood of the Cross, but the reverence of the Father that gave the one for a memory of his Covenant: and the Faith in his Son, which shed his blood on the cross for redemption, that could or can profit them as, either in this life or after it.

The Philistims returning with the greatest Victory and Glory which ever they obtained, carried the Ark of God with them to Azotus, and set it up in the house of Dagon their Idol: but that night the Idol fell out of his place, from above to the ground, and lay under the Ark. The morning following they took it up, and set it again in his place. And it fell the second time, and the Head brake from the Body, and the Hands from the Arms, shewing that it had no power nor understanding in the presence of God: for the Head fell off, which is the seat of reason, and knowledge, and the Hands (by which we execute strength) were sundred from the Arms. For God and the Devil inhabit not in one House, nor in one Heart. And if this Idol could not endure the representation of the true God, it is not to be marvelled, that at such time as it pleased him to cover his only begotten with flesh, and sent him into the World, that all the Oracles wherein the Devil derided, and operation at the instant. For when that true light which had never beginning of brightness, brake through the clouds of a Virgins Body, shining upon the Earth which had been long obscured by Idols, all those foul and stinking vapours vanished. Pharaoh reberleth a memorable accident in that Age concerning the death of the great God Par, as he stileth him; where (as ignorant of the true cause) he searcheth his Brains for many reasons of so great an alteration: yet finds he none out but frivolous. For not only this Idol Devil did then as he supposed, but all the rest, as Apollo, Jupiter, Diana, and the whole rable became speechless.

Now while the Philistims triumphed after this Victory, God strook them with the grievous Disease of the Hamorrhoids of which they perished in great numbers. For it is written that the Lord destroyed them. It was therefore by general consent ordered that the Ark should be removed from Azotus to Gath or Geth another of the five great Cities of the Philistims; to prove, as it seemeth, whether this disease were fallen on them by accident, or by the hand of God immediately: but when it was brought to Gath and received by them, the plague was yet more grievous and mortal. For the hand of the Lord was against the City with a very great destruction, and he smote the men of the City both small and great, &c. And being not yet satisfied, they sent the Ark to Ekron or Accaron, a third City of the Philistims: but they also felt the same smart, and cried out that themselves and their people should be slain thereby; For there was a destruction and death throughout all the City. In the end, by the advice of their Priests, the Prince of the Philistims did not only resolve to return the Ark, but to offer gifts unto the God of Israel, remembering the plague which had fallen on the Egyptians, when their hearts were hardened to hold the people of God from their Inheritance, and from his Service by strong hand. Wherefore confessing the power of the God of Israel to be Almighty, and that their own Idols were subject thereto, they agreed to offer a sin-offering, using these words; So ye shall give glory to the God of Israel that he may take his hand from you, and from your Gods and from your Land. And what can be a more excellent witnessing, than where an Enemy doth approve our cause? according to Enim forte; Putschum est testimonium, qui noster probatur ab hostibus. So did Pharaoh confess the living God, when he was plagued in Egypt: and Nebuchodonosor, and Darius, when they had seen his miracles by Daniel.

This council therefore of the Priests being imbraced, and the golden Hamorrhoids, and the Golden Mice prepared, they caused two milch kine to be chosen, such as had not been yoked, and a new Cart or Carriage to be framed: but they durst not drive or direct it to any place certain, thereby to make trial whether it were indeed the hand of God that had stricken them. For if the Ark of God were carried towards Bethshemesh, and into the Territory of Israel: then they should resolve that from God only came their late destruction. For the Philistims knew that the milch Kine which drew the Ark, could not be forced from their Calves, but that they would have followed them wheresoever; much less when they were left to themselves, would they travel a contrary way. For in the darkest night in the World if Calves be removed from their Dams, the Kine will follow them through Woods, and Defarts by the Foot, till they find them. But the Kine travelled directly towards Bethshemesh: and when they came into the fields thereof, to wit, of one Jotham of the same City, they stood still there; which when the Princes of the Philistims perceived, they returned to Ekron: After which, God spared not his own people the Bethshemites, in that they presumed to look into the Ark. And because they knew God and his commandments and had been taught accordingly: He strook them more grievously than he did the Heathen, for there perished of them fifty thousand and seventy. From hence the Ark was carried to Kiriat-jearim and placed in the house of Abinadab; where it is written that it remained twenty year in the charge of Eleazar his Son, until David brought it to Jerusalem.

Now whereas it is said, that in the mean while the Ark was in Nob, Mishpa and Gath, it was 6. or 7. years, as the Tabernacle, which was at this time severed from the Ark: or at least, it was for the present occasion brought to these places, and anon returned to Kiriat-jearim.

§. III.

§. III.

Of Samuel and of his Government.

These Tragedies overpast and ended, Samuel, to whom God appeared while he was yet a child, became now Judge and Governour of Israel. He was defended of the Family of Ephraim, or Kerach. For Levi had three Sons; Gerson, Cheath, and Merari: Cheath had Amram, and Eleazar: of Amram came Moses and Aaron; of Eleazar, Choro: and of the Family of Choro, Samuel. His Father Eleazar a Levite, was called an Ephraimite, not that the Levites had any proper inheritance, but because he was of Mount Ephraim, like as Jesse, David's Father was called an Ephraimite, because born at Ephrata, or Bethlehem. Hannah his Mother being long fruitless, obtained him of God by Prayers and Tears: it being an exceeding shame to the Jewish Women, to be called barren in respect of the blessing of God both to Abraham that his Seed should multiply, as the Stars of Heaven, and the flocks of the Sea, as in the beginning to Adam, increase and multiply, &c. and in Deseremmy the seventh; There shall be neither male nor female barren among you.

Samuel was no sooner born, but that his Mother according to her former vow dedicated him to God, and his service, to which the delivered him even from the Uterus. For as the first-born of all that were called Nazaries, might be redeemed till they were five years old for five Shekles; between five years and twenty for twenty Shekles: so was it not required by the Law that any of the race of the Levites should be called to serve about the Tabernacle, till they were five and twenty years old.

Saint Peter reckons in the Acts the Prophets from Samuel, who was the first of the Writers of holy Scriptures, to whom usually this name of a Prophet was given, and yet did Moses account himself such a one, as in the 18. of Deuter. The Lord thy God will raise up unto thee a Prophet like unto me, &c. But he is distinguished from those that preceded him, who were called Seers; as, Before time in Israel, when a Man went to seek an answer of God, thus he spake; Come and let us go to the Seer.

For he that is now called a Prophet, was in old time called a Seer. And although it pleased God to appear by his Angels to Moses, as before to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob: yet in the time of Eli, there was no manifest vision; not that God had altogether withdrawn his Grace from Israel: but as the Chaldean Perapraeth hath it, those revelations before Samuel's time, were more clouded and obscure. The places wherein Samuel judged were Mizpah or Mizpa, seated on a Hill in Benjamin near Jaba: also Gath, and Bethel, of which we have spoken elsewhere.

The Philistims taking knowledge of the assembly and preparation for War at Mizpah in the beginning of Samuel's Government, gathered their Army and marched towards the City: at whose approach the Israelites stricken with fear, and with the memory of their former slaughters and servitude, belonged Samuel to pray to God for them: who was then performing his sacrifice when the Philistims were in view.

But God being moved with Samuel's prayers (as he was by those of Moses, when Israel fought against the Amalekites at their first entrance into Arabia) it pleased him with Thunder and Tempest to disperse and beat down the Army of the Philistims, according to the prophecy of Hannah, Samuel's Mother. The Lords adversaries shall be destroyed, and out of Heaven shall be thunder upon them, &c. Josephus affirms that a part of the Philistims were swallowed with an Earth-quake: and that Samuel himself led the Israelites in the prosecution of their Victory. After which Samuel erected a Monument in memory of this happy success obtained by the miraculous hand of God, which Josephus called Lapidum fortum: Samuel, Ebenezer, or the stone of assistance: and then following the opportunity and advantage of the Victory, the Israelites recovered divers Cities of their own formerly lost, and held long in possession of the Philistims, who for a long time after did not offer any invasion or revenge. And the better to attend their purposes, and to withstand any of their attempts: the Israelites made peace with the Amorites, or Canaanites, which lay on their backs, and to the North of them, that they might not be assailed from divers parts at once; having the Philistims towards the West and Sea-coast, the Canaanites towards the North and East, and the Idumites to the South. The Estate being thus settled, Samuel for the ease of the people gave audience and judgment in divers places by turns, as hath been elsewhere said.

Of SAUL.

§. I.

Of the deliberation to change the Government into a Kingdom.

But when age now began to overtake Samuel, and that he was not able to undergo the burthen of so careful a Government, he put off from himself the weight of the affairs on his Sons, Joel and Abijah, who judged the people at Beerseba, a City, the very utmost towards the South of Judaea. And as the place was inconvenient and far away, so were themselves no less removed from the justice and virtue of their Father. For the thirst tions were; who might also lead them to the War and defend them against their enemies. For after the ill and lamentable success which followed the rule of Elu his Sons, when those of Samuel by their first Blossoms promised to yield fruit no less bitter, they saw no way to put the Government from out his race, whom they so much revered, but by the choice of a King.

In a cause of so great consequence and alteration, Samuel sought counsel from God: which surely he did not for the establishing of his own Sons; who being as they were, God would not have approved his election. Now as it appears by the Text, this speech or motion displeasing him, he used his best arguments to dehont them, which when he perceived to be over-feeble, he delivered unto them from Gods revelation, the inconveniences and miseries which should befall them. And yet, all which he fore-foreshed was not intolerable, but such as hath been born, and is so still by free consent of the Subjects towards their Princes. For first he makes them know that the King will use their Sons in his own service to make them his Horse-men, Charioteers, and Foot men; which is not only not grievous, but by the vassals of all Kings according to their birth and condition desired: it being very agreeable to Subjects of the best quality to command for the King in his Wars; and to till the ground, to do so proper and appertaining to their station, and to be as they are brought up, so to be likewise the offices of Women-servants to dress meat, to bake Bread, and the like. But whereas immediately it is threatened: He will take up your Field, and your Vineyards: and your best Olive-Trees, and give them to his Servants; with other oppressions; this hath given, and gives daily occasion to such as would be ruled by their own discretion, to affirm that Samuel describeth here unto them the power of a King, governed by his own affections, and not a King that feareth God. But others upon further examination confute this Text far otherwise, as teaching us what Subjects ought with patience to bear at their Sovereigns hand. The former ner of the King that shall rain over you. God thereby fore shewing what power fevered from piety, (because it is accountable to God only) will do in the future. And hereof we find the first example in Achab, who rook from Naboth both his Vineyard and his life, contrary to the trust which God had put in him, of governing well his people. For God commanded, That his people should be judged with righteous judgment. Wherefore though the King had offered unto Naboth composition, as a Vineyard of better value, or the worth in Money which he refused: yet because he was fallily accused and unjustly condemned (though by colour of Law) how grievously Achab was punished by God, the Scriptures tell us. Neither was it a plea sufficient for Achab against the all-righteous God, to say that it was done without his content, and by the Elders of Israel. For God had not then left his people to the Elders, but to the King, who is called a living Law, even as David testifieth of himself, Pulsavi me in causa gentium: For this of S. Augustine is very true. Simulata innocentia non est innocentia: simulata equitas non est equitas: sed duplicatur peccatum in quo est iniquitas & simulatio; Feigned innocence, and feigned equity are neither the one nor the other: but the fault or offence is there doubled in which both is iniquity and dissimulation. Such in effect is their disposition wherewith this place to contain the description of a Tyrant. But the arguments on the contrary side, as they are many and forcible, so are they well known to all; being excellently handled in that Princely discourse of The true Law of free Monarchies, which Treatise I may not presume to abridge, much less here to infer. Only thus much I will say, that if practice do show the greatness of authority, under the best Kings of Juda and Israel were not so tied by any Laws, but that they did whatsoever they pleased in the greatest things; and commanded some of their own Princes, and of their own brethren to be slain without any trial of Law, being sometime by Prophets reprehended, sometime not. For though David confessed his offence for the death of Uriah, yet Salomon killing his elder brother and others, the same was not imputed unto him as any offence.

That the State of Israel should receive this Change of Government, it was not only foretold by Moses in Deuteronomy, but prophesied of by Isaiah in this Scripture: The Scepter shall not depart from Judah, &c. It was also promised by God to Abraham for a Blessing. For it was not only assured that his issues should in number equal the Stars in Heaven, but that Kings should proceed of him. Which state feeling it is framed from the Pattern of his sole ruler, who is Lord of the Universal : and the excellency thereof in respect of all other Governments, may justly be said to be the most glorious and proved, I shall not need to over-paint that which is garnished with better colours already, than I can lay on.

In the time of the Judges every Man hath observed what civil War Israel had: what outrageous slaughter they committed upon each other: in what miserable servitude they lived for many years: and when it fared best with them, they did but defend their own Territories, or recover some parts thereof formerly lost. The Canaanites dwelt in the belt valleys of the Country. The Amorites held much of Gilead over Jordan: the Philistines the Coasts: and the Jebusites Hermopolis Gilead: till David King of Israel did not only conquer and establish, but he mastered and subjeed all the Neighbour Nations and Kings, and made them his tributaries and vassals. But whether it were for that the Israelites were moved by those reasons, which allure the most of all Nations to live under a Monarch, or whether by this means they sought to be cleared from the Sins of Samuel, they became deaf to all the persuasions and threats which Samuel used, inflicting upon this point that they would have a King, both to judge them and defend them: whereunto when Samuel had warrant from God to consent, he sent every Man to his own City and abiding.

§. II.

Of the election of Saul.

After that Samuel had dismissed the assembly at Mizpah, he forbore the election of a King, till such time as he was therein directed by God; who fore-told him the day before, that he would present unto him a Man of the Line of Benjamin, whom he commanded Samuel to anoint. So Samuel went unto Ramath Saphir, to make a feast for the entertainment of Saul (whom yet he knew not, but knew the truth of Gods promises) and Saul, also having wandered divers days to seek his Fathers Affliction, at length by the advice of his servant trailedd towards Ramath, to find out a Seer or Prophet, hoping from him to be told what way to take, to find his Beasts. In which journey it pleased God (who doth many times order the greatest things by the simplest passages and persons) to elect Saul, who fought an Ais, and not a Kingdom: like as formerly it had pleased him to call Moses, while he fed the sheep of Jethro, and after to make choice of David the youngest of eight Sons, and by the Scriptures called a little one, who was then keeping of Beasts, and changed his sheep-hook into a Scepter, making him of all other the most victorious King of Juda and Israel, so Yshai and Isaac were taken from casting their nets, to become Fishers of Men, and honoured with the titles of Apóstles, a dignity that died not in the grave, as all worldly Honours do: but permanent and everlasting in Gods endless Kingdom.

When Samuel was entered into Ramoth, he prepared a banquet for the King, whom he expected and staid his arrival at the gate. Not long after came Saul, whom God shewed to Samuel, and made him know that it was the same whom he had foretold him of, that he should rule the people of God. Saul finding Samuel in the gate, but knowing him not, though a Prophet and Judge of Israel, much less knowing the Honour which attended him, asked Samuel in what part of the City the Seer dwelt. Samuel answered that himself was the Man he sought, and prayed Saul to go before him to the high place, where Samuel setting him according to his degree, aboveall that were invited, conferred with him afterwards of the affairs of the Kingdom, and of Gods graces to be bestowed on him, and the morning following anointed him King of Israel.

After this he told him all that should happen him in the way homeward; that two Men should encounter him by Rachel's Sepulcher, who should tell him that his Affes were found; and that his Fathers cares were changed from the fear of losing his Beasts, to doubt the loss of his Son: that he should then meet three other Men in the plain of Tabor; then a company of Prophets: and that he should be partaker of Gods Spirit and Prophecy with them: and that thereby his condition and disposition should be changed from the vulgar into that which became a King elected and favoured by God.

But the Prophets here spoken of, Men indued with spiritual gifts, were not of the firm and most revered number, who by divine revelation foretold things to come, repented without fear the errors of their Kings, and wrought miracles; of which number were, Moses, Joshua, Samuel, and after them Gad, N. dan, Zebulun, Elias, Elisha, Ihy, Jeremy, and the rest; for these Prophets, saith St. Chrysostom, Omnia percurrunt, praeterita, praesentia, futura; 1 Cor. 1. 14. who enriched with spiritual gifts expounded the Scriptures and the Law.

At Megph Saul assembled the people that he might present Saul to them, who as yet knew nothing of his election: neither did Saul acquaint his own Uncle therewith, when he asked him what had pass between him and Samuel: for either he thought his estate not yet altered; or else that it might be dangerous for him to reveal it, till he were confirmed by general consent. When the Tribes were assembled at Megph, the general opinion is, that he was chosen by lot. Chimbi thinks by the answer of Crim and Toummon: to this, is the answer of the Priest, wearing that mystic y upon his breast when he asked counsel of the Lord. But the casting of lots was not only much used among the Jews, but by many others, if not by all Nations. The Land of promise was divided by lot: God commanded lots to be cast on the two Goats, which should be sacrificed, and which turned off a figure of Christs suffering, and our deliverance, for whole garments the Tens also cast lots. ¶ Citeros, Plaucus, ¶ Fausimais, and others have remembered divers sorts of lots, used by the Romans, Gracians, and other Nations: as in the division of Grounds or honours; and in things to be under-taken: the two first kinds were called divinity; the third divinatory; and into one of these three all may be reduced: all which kinds however they may seem chancelous, yet ordered and directed by God: as in the Proverbs. The lot is cast into the lap, but the whole disposition is of the Lord. And in like sort fell the Kingdom of Israel on Saul, not by chance, but by Gods ordinance, who gave Samuel former knowledge of his election: to which election Saul withdrew himself in modesty, as both Isopson confute it, and as it may be gathered by his former answers to Samuel, when he acknowledged himself the least of the least Tribe. But Samuel enlightened by God, found where Saul was hidden, and brought him among the people, and he was taller than all the rest by the shoulders. And Samuel made a new king that was the choice King of Israel, whereupon all the multitude saluted him King, and prayed for him; yet yet there were some that envied his glory (as all others there are such) who did not acknowledge him but offering him Presents as the manner was: of Amnon Said, to avoid Edition; took no notice.

§. III.

Of the establishing of Saul by his first victories.

NO sooner was Saul placed in the Kingdom, but that he received knowledge that Nabab King of the Ammonites prepared to besiege Jabes Gilead: which Nation since the great overthrow given them by Yaphia, never durst attempt any thing upon the Israelites, till the beginning of Saul his rule. And although the Ammonites did always attend upon the advantage of time, to recover those Territories which first the Amorites, and then Israel dispossessed them of: which they made the ground of their invasion in Yaphia's time; yet they never periwaded themselves of more advantage than at this present. For first they knew that there were many of the Israelites that did not willingly submit themselves to this new King: secondly, they were remembered that the Philistines had not long before slain 40000. of their Men of War: and besides had used great care and policy that they should have no Smiths to make them Swords or Spears: neither was it long before that of the Bethshemites and places adjoining, there perished by the hand of God more than 50000. and therefore in these respects, even occasion it self invited them to enlarge their Dominions upon their borders: Jabes Gilead being one of the nearest. Besides it may further be conjectured that the Ammonites were emboldened against Jabes Gilead in respect of their weakness, since the Israelites destroyed a great part of them, for not joining with them against the Benjamites: at which time they did not only slaughter the Men and Male-children, but took from them their young Women, and gave them to the Benjamites: and therefore they were not likely to have been increased to any great numbers: And if they had recovered themselves of this great calamity, yet the Ammonites might flatter himself with the opinion, that Israel having for long time been disarmed by the Philistines, was not apt to succour those whom they had so deeply wounded and destroyed. But contrariwise when the tidings came to Saul of their danger, and that the Ammonites would give them no other condition to ransom themselves, but by pulling out their right eyes, by which they should be utterly disabled for the War, as elsewhere hath been spoken: Saul, both to value himself in his first years reign, and because perchance he was defended of one of those 400. Maids taken from the Gileadites, and given to the Benjamites, gave order to assemble the forces of Israel: hewing a yoke of Oxen into pieces, and sending them by messengers over all the Coasts, protesting thus. That whoever came not forth after Saul and after Samuel, so would his Oxen be served: threatening the people by their Goods, and not by their lives at the first. Seven days had Saul to assemble an Army, by reason that the Gileadites had obtained the respite of these seven days to give Nabab the Ammonite an answer: who, could they have obtained any reasonable condition, were contented to have levered themselves from Israel, and to become Vassals and Tributaries to the Heathen. In the mean while Saul assembled the forces, which repaired unto him at Beze, near Jordan, that he might readily pass the River; which done he might in one day with a speedy march arrive at Jabes, under the Hills of Gilead.

The Army by Saul led consisting of three hundred and thirty thousand: he returned an answer to those of Jabes, that they should assure themselves of succour by the next day at noon. For as it seemeth Saul marched away in the latter part of the day, and went on all night; for in the morning watch he surprized the Army of Nabab the Ammonite. And to the end that he might set on them on all sides, he divided his force in three parts, putting them to the Sword, until the heat of the day, and the weariness of Saul's troops, inforced them to give over the pursuit. Now the Ammonites were become the more careless and secure, in that those of Jabes promised the next morning to render themselves and their City to their mercy. After this happy success the people were so far in love with their new King, that they would have slain all those Israelites that murmured against his election, had not himself forbidden and resisted their resolutions. Such is the condition of worldly Men, as they are violent lovers of the prosperous, and base vassals of the time that flourisheth: and as despicable and cruel without cause against those, whom any misadventure, or other worldly accident hath thrown down.

After the Army removed, Samuel summoned the people to meet at Gilgal, where Saul was now a third time acknowledged, and as some Commenters affirm, anointed King: and here Samuel used an exhortation to all the assembly, containing precepts, and a rehearsal of his own Justice during the beginning of his government to that day. After Saul had now reigned one year before he was established in Gilgal or Galgala, he strengthened himself with a good guard of 3000. chosen Men, of which he assigned 1000. to attend on Jonathan his Son at Gibeah, the City of his nativity: the rest he kept about his own person in Micmas; and in the Hill of Bethel.

§. IV.

Of Saul's disobedience in his proceedings in the Wars with the Philistines and Amalekites, which caused his final rejection.

Jonathan with his small Army or Regiment, that attended him, taking a time of advantage, surprized a Garrison of Philistines: the same, as some think, which Saul pass by, when he came from Rama where he was first anointed by Samuel, which they think to have been Cariath-jearim: because a place where the Philistines had a Garrison 1 Sam. 10. is called the Hill of God, which they understand of Cariath-jearim: but Junius understands this Garrison to have been at Gibeah, in Benjamin near Gibba where Jonathan abode with his thousand followers. Powsoever by this it appeareth that the Philistines had some strong places, both in the times of Samuel, and of Saul, within the Territory of Israel: and now being greatly incensed by this surprize they assembled 30000. armed Men, riots, and 6000. Horse, wherewith they invaded Judea, and incamped at Maclmas or Micmas: a City of Benjamin, in the direct way from Samarita to Hirufalem, and in the middle of the Land between the Sea and Jordan. With this sudden invasion the Israelites were it waken in so great a fear, as some of them hid themselves in the caves of the Mountains, other fled from Jordan into Gad and Gilead: Saul himself with some 2000. men of ordinary, and many other people, staid at Galgala in Benjamin, not far from the passage of Yaphia when he led Israel over Jordan. Here Saul by Samuel's appointment was to attend the coming of Samuel seven days: but when the last day was in part spent, and that Saul perceived his forces to diminish greatly, he presumed (as some expound the place 1 Sam. 13. 9.) to exercise the office which appertaintained not unto him, and to offer a burnt-offering and a peace-offering unto God, contrary to the Ecclesiastical Laws of the Hebrews, and God's Commandments: others expound the word, obstinat, in this place, by obstinat per Sacerdotem, and to make the sin of Saul not to have been any intrusion into the Priests office, but first a disobedience to Gods Commandment, in not staying according to the appointment 1 Sam. 10. 8. secondly a diffidence or mistrust in Gods help, and too great relying upon the strength of the people, whose departing from him he could not bear patiently; and lastly a Contempt of the Holy Prophet Samuel, and of the help which the prayers of so godly a Man might procure him. But whatsoever was his sin, notwithstanding his excuses, he was by Samuel reprehended most sharply, in terms unfitting his estate, had not extraordinary warrant been given to Samuel so to do, from God himself, at which time also Samuel feared not to let him know, that the Kingdom should be conferred to another (a Man after Gods own heart) both from Saul and his Posterity.

After this Samuel and Saul returned to Gibeah, where Saul when he had taken view of his Army found it to consist of 600. Men: for the most were fled from him and scattered, yea and among those that staid, there was not any that had either Sword or Spear, but Saul and his Son Jonathan only. For the Philistines had not left them any Smith in all Israel, that made weapons; besides they that came to Saul came hastily, and left such weapons and armour as they had, behind them in the garisons: for if they had had none at all, it might be much doubted how Saul should be able the year before, or in some part of this very year, to succour Jabes Gilead with 300. and thirty thousand Men, if there had not now been any Iron weapon to defend themselves withal, save only in the hand of Saul and Jonathan his Son. But howsoever, all the rest of the people were formerly disarmed by the Philistines and all those craftsmen carried out of the land that made weapons: there being left unto the Israelites only files to sharpen and amend such stuff as served for the plough, and for nought else: yet that they had some kind of arms it is manifest, or else they durst not have attempted upon the Philistines as they did. And it is not said in the Text that there was not any Sword in all Israel, but only that there was not any found amongst those 600. Souldiers which staid with Saul after Samuel's departure: and it seemeth that when Samuel had publicly reprehended Saul that his own guards forsook him, having but 600. remaining of his 3000. ordinary Souldiers, and of all the rest that repaired unto him, of which many were fled from him before Samuel arrived.

With this small troop he held himself, to his own City of Gibeah, as a place of more strength and better assured unto him, than Gilgal was. Neither is it obscure how it should come to pass that the Philistines should thus disarm the most part of the Israelites, howsoever in the time of Samuel much had been done against them. For the victories of Samuel were not got by Sword or Spear, but by Thunder from Heaven: and when these craftsmen were once rooted out of the Cities of Israel, no marvel if they could not in a short peace under Samuel, be replanted again. For this tyranny of the Philistines is to be understood, rather of the precedent times, than under Samuel: and yet under him it is to be thought that by their crafts they proceeded in the policy, not suffering their artificers to teach the Israelites, and so even to the times of Saul kept them from having any store of armour. The same policy did Nabuchodonosor use after his Conquest in Judea, Dionysius in Sicily, and many other Princes elsewhere in all ages. But these lost weapons in part the Israelites might repair in Gilead, for over Jordan the Philistines had not invaded. The rest of their defences were such as antiquity used, and their present necessity ministered unto them; to wit, Clubs, Bows, and slings. For the Benjamites exceeded in casting stones in slings; and that these were the natural weapons, and the first of all Nations, it is manifest; and so in the first of Chronicles the twelfth Chapter, it is written of those that came to succour David against Saul; while he lurked at Siklag. That they were weaponed with bows, and could use the right and the left hand with slings; and with a sling it was, that David himself slew the Giant Goliath.

While the State of Israel stood in these hard terms, the Philistines having parted their army into three troops, that they might spoil and destroy many parts at once; Jonathan strengthened by God, and followed with his Elquire only, scaled a Mountain, wherupon a company of Philistines were lodged: the rest of their Army (as may be gathered by the success) being incamped in the Plain adjoining. And though he were discovered before he came to the Hill top, and in a kind of derision called up by his enemies: yet he so behaved himself, as with the assistance of God he flew twenty of the first Philistines that he encountered. Whereupon the next companies taking the alarm, and being ignorant of the cause, fled away amazed altogether. In which confusion, fear, and jealousy, they slaughtered one another in stead of enemies: wherupon those Hebrews which became of their party, because they feared to be spoiled by them, took the advantage of their destruction, and slew of them in great numbers. And lastly Saul himself taking knowledge of the rout and disorder, together with those Israelites that brooded themselves in mount Ephraim, fell upon them, and obtained (contrary to all hope and expectation) a most happy and glorious victory over them. Here was that Prophecy in Deuteronomy fulfilled by Jonathan, That one of those which feared God, should kill a thousand, and two of them ten thousand.

This done, the small army of Israel made retreat from the pursuit. And though Saul had bound the people by an oath not to take food till the evening, yet his Son Jonathan being infieebled with extreme labour and emptiness, tasted a drop of Honey in his passage: for which Saul his Father would have put him to death, had not the people delivered him from his cruelty.

The late miraculous victory of Saul and Jonathan seems to have reduced unto the Philistines remembrance their former overthrow likewise miraculous in the days of Samuel; so that for some space of time they held themselves quiet. In the mean while Saul being now greatly encouraged, undertook by turns all his bordering enemies; namely the Machites, Ammonites, Edomites, and the Arabians of Zobab, against all which he prevailed. He then assembled all the forces he could make, to wit, 210000. Men, and receiving the commandment of God by Samuel, he invaded Amalec, waiting and destroying all that part of Arabia Petraea, and the Deserts, belonging to the borderer Aegypt; in which War he took Ayag their King prisoner. But whereas he was: fructified by Samuel to follow this Nation without compassion, because they first of all other attempted Israel, when they left Aegypt in Moses's time: he notwithstanding did not only spare the life of Ayag, but reserved the best of the beasts and spoil of the Country, with pretence to offer them in sacrifice to the living God. Therefore did Samuel now a second time make him know, that God would cast him from Thus were the Iones driven out of Peloponnesus, and compelled to remove into Africa, from whence after a while they failed into Asia, and peopled the Western Coast thereof, on which they built twelve Cities, inhabited by them, even to this day, at the least without any universal or memorable transmigration. This expedition of the Iones into Asia hath been mentioned of all which have written of that Age, and is commonly placed 140. years after the War of Troy, and 60. years after the defeat of the Heracleids into Peloponnesus. These Heracleids were they of whom the Kings of Sparta issued; which race held that Kingdom about 700. years. Of their Father Hercules many strange things are delivered unto us by the Poets, of which some are like to have been true, others perhaps more allegorically understood: But the most approved Writers think that there were many called Hercules, all whose exploits were by the Greeks ascribed to the Son of Alcmena, who is said to have performed these twelve great labours.

First, he slew the Nemean Lion: secondly, he slew the Serpent Hydra, which had nine Heads, whereof one being cut off, two grew in the place: The third was the over-taking a very swift Hart: The fourth was the taking of a wild Bore alive, which haunted Mount Erymanthus in Arcady: The fifth was the cleansing of Augeas his Ox-stall in one day, which he performed by turning the River Alpheus into it: The sixth was the chasing away of the Birds from the Lake Stymphalia: The seventh was the fetching a Bull from Crete: The eighth was the taking of the Mares which Diomedes King of Thrace fed with humane flesh: The ninth was to fetch a Girdle of the Queen of the Amazons: The three last were, to fetch Geryon's Bees from Gades, the Golden Apples of the Hesperides; and Cerberus from Hell. The Mythological interpretation of these I purposely omit as both over-long to be here set down; and no less perplexed than the labours themselves. For some by Hercules understand Fortitude, Prudence, and Constancy; interpreting the Monsters, Vices. Others make Hercules the Sun, and his travels to be the twelve signs of the Zodiac. There are others who apply his works historically to their own conceits; as well assured, that the explication cannot have more unlikelihood, than the fables: That he took Elis, Pylos, Oechalia, and other Towns, being assailed by such as either admired his virtues, or were beholding unto him. Also that he slew many Thieves, and Tyrants, take to be truly written, without addition of Poetical vanity. His travels through most parts of the World are, or may seem, borrowed from Hercules Lybicus. But sure it is that many Cities in Greece were greatly bound to him: for that he (bending all his endeavours to the common good) delivered the Land from much oppression. But after his death no City of Greece (Athens excepted) required the virtue and Defects of Hercules, with constant protection of his Children, persecuted by the King Eurytheneus. This Eurytheneus was Son of Siheneus, and Grandchild of Perseus; he reigned in Aegene, the mightiest City then in Greece. He it was that imposed those hard tasks upon Hercules, who was bound to obey him (as Poets report) for expiation of that Murder, which in his madness he had committed upon his own Children, but as others say, because he was his Subject and Servant: wherefore there are who commend Eurytheneus for employing the strength of Hercules to go good a purpose. But it is generally agreed by the best writers, that Hercules was also of the flock of Perseus, and holden in great jealousy by Eurytheneus, because of his virtue, which appeared more and more in the dangerous services, wherein he was employed, so that he grew great in reputation and power through all Greece, and had by many Wives and Concubines above three score Children. These Children Eurytheneus would fain have got into his power, when Hercules was dead; but they died unto Ceryx King of Thracina, and from him (for he durst not withstand Eurytheneus) to Athen. The Athenians not only gave them entertainment, but lent them aid, wherewith they encountered Eurytheneus. Iolus the brothers Son of Hercules, who had assisted him in many of his travels, was captain of the Heracleids. It is said of him, that being dead, he obtained leave of Pluto to live again till he might revenge the injuries done by Eurytheneus: whom when he had slain in battle, he died again. It seems to me, that whereas he had led Colonus into Sicily, and abode there a long time forgotten: he came again into Greece to assist his Colinus, and afterwards returned back. When the Peloponnesians understood that Eurytheneus was slain, they took Arcem the Son of Phelus to their King: for he was rich, mighty, and favoured of the people. Against him the Heracleids marched under Hyllus the Son of Hercules. But to avoid effusion of blood, it was agreed, that Hyllus should fight with Echeus King of the Tegetea a people of Arcadia, who assisted Arcem, with condition that if Hyllus were victor, he should peaceably enjoy what he challenged as his right: otherwise the Heracleids should not enter Peloponnesus in 100. years. In that combat Hyllus was slain, and the Heracleids compelled to forsook their Country, till the third generation: at which time they returned under Arifodemus (as the best authority shews, though some have said, that they came under the conduct of his Children) and brought with them the Doria, whom they planted in the Country, as is before shewed, having expelled the Achaes, over whom the issue of Pelops had reigned after the death of Eurytheneus four generations.

§. VII.

Of Homer and Hesiod, and many changes in the World, that happened about this age.

About this time that excellent learned Poet Homer lived, as many of the best Chronologers affirm. He was by race of the Maones, descended (as Eusebius* imagineth) of Berofus his Anaxandros, who gave name to that people. But this Eusebius imagineth Homer the Poet to have been long after these times, rashly framing his Era* according to Archilochus* in the tract, or rather fragment of temperibus; and makes even more of this name to have flourished in divers Cities in Greece. Whence, perhaps, spring the diversity of opinions, both of the time and of the native City of Homer. According to this Archilochus, Eusebius finds Homer about the time of Manasse King of Juda, and Numa of Rome. He was called Melisseus from the place of his birth, and at length Homer, because blind Men follow a guide, which signification among others, is in the verb homer: for this Homer in his latter time was blind. Clemens Alexandrinus* recites many different opinions touching the question of the time when Homer lived. So also Julius Gellius*, and Tatianus Africus* in his Oration ad gentes. Paterculus reckons that Homer flourished 950. years before before the Consulship of Marcus Vinius: which Marcus calleth up in the Worlds year 3046. and after Troy taken, about 260. years; and about 250. years before the building of Rome; making him to have flourished about the time of Yehoshaphat King of Juda. But Clemens Alexandrinus and Tatianus above named, mention Authors that make him much ancients. The difference of which Authors in this point is not unworthy the Readers consideration, that by this one influence he may guess of the difficulty, and so pardon the errors in the computations of ancient time: seeing in such diversity of opinions a Man may hardly find out what to follow. For Crates the Grammarian (as Clemens Alexandrinus reports) gave being to Homer about 80. years after Troy taken, near the time that the Heracleids returned into Peloponnesus: and Eratosthenes* after Troy 100. years. Theopompus 500. years after the Army of Greece failed into Phrygia for the War of Troy. Euphorion makes him contemporary with Gyges, who began to Reign in the 18. Olympiad (which was 45. years after Rome was built) and Sophonis saith, that he was 90. years before the first Olympiad: which he seeks to prove by the times of Charillus and his Son Nicanor; Philostratus placeth him 180. after Troy: Arifarchus 140. in the time of the seating of the Colonus in Ionia. Apollodorus affirms that he lived while Aegleus governed Lacedaemon; and that Lycurgus in his young years, about 160. years after the Lomian Plantations, came to visit him, near 240. years after Troy taken. Herodotus finds Homer flourishing 622. years before Xerxes enterprise against the Graecians: which Herodotus accounteth at 168. years after the Trojan War. Eusebius seems to make him to have been about the time of Joas King of Juda 124. years before Rome built: though elsewhere in his Chronology he notes, that some place him in the time of Samuel, and others in the end of David, and others in other ages. In his Evangelical preparation where out of Tatianus Africus he citeth sundry opinions touching the time when Homer lived, he reckoneth many other Greek Writers more ancient than Homer; as Lisus: Philomachus, Epimenides, Pheonius, Arifarchus, Orpheus, Alfesus, Thamyris, Amphion and others.

Now whether Homer or Hesiodus were the Elder, it is also much disputed. Anulus Gellius reports that Philochorus and Xenophanes affirm, that Homer preceded Hesiod: and on the contrary, that Lac. Accius the Poet, and Ephorus the Historian make Hesiod of an elder time than Homer. Varro leaves it uncertain which of these learned Fablers was first born: but he finds that they lived together some certain years, wherein he confirms himself by an Epigram, written up on a Trevis, and left by Hesiod in Helicon.

Cornelius Nepos reports that they both lived 160. years before Rome built: while the Silvius Reigned in Alba, about * 140. years after the fall of Troy. Eusebius* finds them both 200. * This years after Troy taken, in the time of Acastus the Son of Pelias, King of Theffaly. For my self, I am not much troubled when this Poet lived; neither would I offend the Reader with these opinions, but only to shew the uncertainty and disagreement of Historians, as well in this particular, as in all other questions and dispute of time. For the curiosity of this Mans age is no less ridiculous; than the Inquisition why he began his Iliads with the word Menin, as perhaps containing some great mystery. In description whereof Lucan feigning himself to have been in Hell, and to have spoken with Homer, there asked him the cause why he began his Book with that word? who answered, That he began in that fort, because it came in his head so to do.

It seemeth that Sergius, or after Macrinus Severinus, ruled Aegypt at this time: for Temperibus was his successor who preceded Vapores, Father-in-Law to Salomon.

About the end of Sau's government, or in the beginning of David's time according to Cassiodorus, the Amazons with the Cymmerians invaded Asia, Latusius Sylvius then ruling in Italy. And besides the overthrow of that famous State of Troy (which fell 103. years before David's time) there were many other changes in the middle part of the World, not only by reason of those Northern Nations: but there sprung up, somewhat nearly together, six Kingdoms into greatness not before erected. In Italy, that of the Latines: in the South part of Greece, those of Lacedaemon, Corinth, and the Achaes. In Arabia, Syria, Saba, and Damascus; the Adams made themselves Princes, of which there were ten Kings, which began and ended with the King of Israel in effect: and somewhat before these, the State of the Israelites having now altered their form of Government, began to flourish under Kings, of which David, in a few years, became Master of all those neighbouring Nations, who by interchange of times had subjected the Judeans, corrupted their Religion, and held them under in a most abject, and grievous slavery; to wit, the Edomites, Moabites, Ammonites, Midianites, Israhelites; and the rest of the Arabians, with the Philistines, Jebeustites, Geshurites, Maachabites, all which acknowledged David for their Sovereign Lord, and paid him tribute.

CHAP. XVII.

OF DAVID.

§. I.

Of David's estate in the time of Saul.

THE bazzards which David ran into while he was yet only designed King, and living as a private Man, expected the Empire, were very many. The first personal act of fame, was his killing of Goliath in the view of both Armies, whereby he became known to Saul, and so highly affected of Jonathan the Son of Saul, that he loved him as his own Soul: In so much as when Saul sought to perwade his Son, that David would assuredly be the ruin of his House, and Estate, and offered him violence when he pleaded his cause, Jonathan could never be perwaded, never forc'd, nor ever wearied from the care of David's life, and well doing. It was not long after this signal act of David's, but that Saul became exceedingly jealous of him, though he were become as his household Servant, and his Esquire, or Armour-bearer. Saul being vexed with an evil spirit, was advised to procure some cunning Musician to play before him upon the Harp; whereby it was thought that he might find ease, which came to pass accordingly. He entertained David, for this purpose, and began to favour him, giving him a place of Command among the Men of War. But the jealous Tyrant soon waxed weary of his good affections, and sought to kill David, being thereunto moved only through envy of his virtue. This passion first brake forth in the midst of his raving fit, at which time he threw a Spear at David that was then playing on his Harp to do him ease.

Conforsius remembreth one Aclepius a Physician, who practised the curing of the Frenzy, by the like Music: and tempered thereby those diseases which grew from passion. That Pythagoras did also the like by such a kind of harmony, Seneca in his third Book of Anger witnesseth. But the madnels of Saul came from the cause of causes, and was thereby incurable, howsoever it sometimes left him, and yielded unto that music, which God had ordained to be a mean of more good to the Musician than to the King.

Saul having failed in such open attempts, gave unto David the Commandment of 1000. Soldiers, to confront the Philistines withal. For he durst not trust him as before, about his person, fearing his revenge. Now the better to cover his hatred towards him, he promised him his Daughter Megib to Wife: but having married her to Abner, he gave to David his younger Daughter Michol, but with a condition, to present him with an hundred foreskins of the Philistines: hoping rather (in respect of the valour of that Nation) that the Philistines would take David's head, than that he their fore-skins. This hope failing, when as now David's victories began new fears and jealousies in Saul, he practised with Jonathan, and afterwards with his own hands attempted his life, but his purposes were still frustrated. After all this he sought to murder him in his own House, but Michol his Wife delivered him. So David fought Samuel at Ramah, and being pursued by Saul, fled thence unto Nob in Benjamin, then to Atimilech, then to Achis the Philistines, Prince of Geth: where to obfure himself, he was forc'd to counterfeit both simplicity and diffraction. But being ill assured among the Philistines he covered himself in the Cave of Adullam: and after conveying such of his kinsfolks as were not fit to follow him into Moad, he hid himself in the desert of Ziph, Maon, and the Hills of Engaddi, where he cut off the lap of Saul's garments, and spared his life: as he did a second time in the desert of Ziph, after his pällage with Nabal and Achis. After which he repaired to Achis of Geth the second time, and was kindly entertained in regard of the hatred, with which his Master Saul was known to persecute him.

Of Achis David obtained * Siklag in Simcon: pretending to invade Judea: but he bent his forces another way and strook the Amalekites, with other enemies of Israel, letting none live to claim upon him. Achis supposing that David had drawn blood of his own Nation, thought himself assured of him: and therefore preparing to invade Israel, summoneth David to assist him, who dissembling his intent, seemeth very willing thereto. But the rest of the Philistine Princes knowing his valour, and doubting his disposition, liked not his company, and therefore he withdrew himself to Siklag. At his return he found the Town burnt, his two Wives with the Wives and Children of his people taken by the Amalekites: Hereupon his fellows mutilated, but God gave him comfort, and assurance to recover all again: which he did.

This Army of the Philistines commanded by Achis, encountered Saul at Gilboa, in which he and his three Sons were slain. The news with Saul's Crown and Bracelets were brought to David, at Siklag, in his return from being victorious over Amalech, by a Man of the same Nation, who avowed (though falsely) that himself at Saul's request had slain him. David, because he had accused himself, made no scruple to cause him to be slain at the instant: and the sooner, because the probabilities gave strong evidence withal. Otherwise it followeth not that every Man ought to be believed of himself to his own prejudice. For it is held in the Law; Confessio reorum non habenda est pro ex- plicato crimine, nisi approbatio alia instruat Religio- nem conscientiam. The prisoners confession must not be taken for an evidence of the crime, unless some other proof inform the Conscience of the Judge. For a Man may confess those things of himself, that the Judge by examination may know to be impossible. But because it is otherwise determined in the case of causidici reorum l. si confessus, & in cap. de paric. l. qui sententiam, therefore doth the Gloss reconcile these two places in this sort. Si quis in iudicio sponte de seipso confiteatur, & postea maneat in confessione, id est falsi. If any Man in judgement confess himself, of his own accord, and after doth persevere in his confession, it is enough. That David greatly bewailed Saul it is not improbable, for death cutteth asunder all competition: and the lamentable end that that befell him, being a King, with whom in effect the strength of Israel also fell, could not but stir up sorrow and move compassion in the heart of David.

The Victory which the Philistines had gotten was so great, that some Towns of the Israelites, even beyond the River of Jordan, were abandoned by the Inhabitants, and left into the Enemy, who took possession of them without any resistance made. Wherefore it may seem strange, that a Nation so warlike and ambitious as were the Philistines, did not follow their fortune with all diligence, and seek to make the Conquest entire. Most like it seems, that the Civil War immediately breaking out between David and the house of Saul, wherein Juda was divided from the rest of Israel, gave them hope of an easie Victory over both; and thereby caused them to attempt nothing at the present, left by so doing they should enforce their disagreeing enemies to a necessary reconciliation; but rather to permit that the one part should consume the other, by which means, both the victors, and the Vanquished, would become a prey to the violence of such as had beaten them, when their forces were united.

§. II.

Of the beginning of David's Reign, and the War made by Abner for Ithobotheth.

AFTER the death of Saul, Abner, who commanded for Saul in the War, sought to advance Ithobotheth (or Ithobath according to Josephus) though he had no right to the Kingdom of Israel: for Amphibeth the first Son of Jonathan lived. Against this Abner, and Ithobotheth, David made a defensive War, till Abner pass'd Jordan, and entered the border of Judea: at which time he sent Joab with such forces as he had, to resist Abner: Ithobotheth remaining in Gilead, and David in Hebron. The Armies encountered each other near Gibson, where it seemeth, that Abner made the offer to try the quarrel by the hands of a few; like to that Combat between the Lacedaemonians, and the Argives, remembreth by Herodotus, 300. being chosen of each Nation, of which number three persons were only left unslain. The like trial by a far less number was performed by the Horatii and Curatii for the Romans; and Leinæi. The same challenge Goliath the Philistine made, whom David slew a custom very ancient. Edward the Third offered the like trial in his own person to the French King; and Francis the French King to Charles the Emperor. There were twelve chosen of each part, in this War of David with the House of Saul, whose force and valour was so equal, as there survived not any one to challenge the Victory. But the quarrel laid not here; for the Army of Juda press'd Abner in gross, and brake him. Three hundred and sixty Men of Abner's Companions were slain, and but twenty of Juda; whereof Asahel the Brother of Joab was one: who when he would needs pursue Abner, and by Abner's persuasions could not be moved to quit him, he was forced to turn upon him, wounding him to death, with the stroke of his Spear. Forasmuch Asahel was an excellent Footman, and as it is written in the Text, as light as a wild Roe, and as Josephus reporteth, contented not only with Men, but with Horses; and hoped to have gotten great fame, if he could have mastered Abner: (who as Asahel persuaded himself, had by being overthrow and flying away lost his courage) yet here it fell out true; That the Race is not to befall the first.

That this Civil War lasted two years, we find it written in the second of Samuel the second Chapter; though in the beginning of the third it is again made probable, that this contention dur'd longer; and therefore the matter resteth still in dispute, and some of the Rabbins conceive that Ithobotheth had then reigned two years, when this was written, the War as yet continuing a longer time. For Abner held for the party of Ithobotheth after this, and till such time as there grew jealousie between him and Ithobotheth for Saul's Concubine: neither did the death of Ithobotheth instantly follow; but how long after the murder of Abner it happened, the same doth not certainly appear.

§. III.

Of the death of Abner slain by Joab, and of Ithobotheth by Rechab and Baanah.

Abner, reconciled to David, was anon by Joab murdered; for Joab could not endure a companion in David's favour, and in the commandment of his Forces, by which he was grown so powerful, as David forbore to call him to account; for this much he confesteth of himself: I am this day weak, and these men the Sons of Zeruiah be too hard for me. In this sort David complained after Abner's death, and to make it clear that he hated this act of Joab, he followed him with this publick imprecation; Let the blood fall on the head of Joab, and on all his Fathers' house: and let them be subject to Ulcers, to the Leprosie, to lameness, to the sword, and to poverty, &c. For could any thing have withstood the Ordinance of God, this murder committed by Joab might greatly have indangered David's Estate, Abner being the mouth and trull of all the rest of the Tribes, not yet reconciled. This malice therefore David openly bewailed, so that all Israel perceived him to be innocent of that fact. The place which Abner held being General of the Men of War, was of such importance, that the Kings themselves were fain to give them great respect, as hath been already shewed more at large. This Office Joab held in the Army of Juda, and thought himself worthy to hold the place entire, if once his Lord might obtain the whole Kingdom. For he was near to David in Kindred, and had been partaker of all his adversity; wherefore he did not think it meet, that an old enemy should in reward of new benefits, be made his partner. Indeed he was by nature so jealous of his dignity and place, that he afterward slew Amasa his own Kinsman, and the Kings, upon the same quarrel, taking it in high disdain to see him joyous with himself as Captain of the Host of Juda; much less could he brook a superior, and such a one as had slain his Brother, and been beaten himself in battle. But howsoever Joab did hate or dispise Abner, David esteemed highly of him as of a Prince, and a great Man in Israel, excusing the oversight by which he might seem to have perished, by affirming that he did not like a fool, nor a Man vanquished, but as a Man fallen before wicked men, so (said he) diddest thou fall. And certainly it is no error of Wit, nor want of Valour and Vertue in him whom a stronger hand destroyeth unawares, or whom subtilty in free trust bringeth to confusion. For all under the Sun are subject to worldly miseries and misadventures. Howsoever Ithobotheth meant to have dealt with Abner, yet when place no less distant from Damascus, towards the North-east, than Hierusalem was towards the South-west. Now David (speaking humanely) might with the more confidence go on towards Esperates (which was the farthest-off Journey that ever he made) because he was now Lord of Damascus, which lay in the mid-way. He also posselt himself of Thadmor or Palmyrena, which Salomon afterward strongly fortified, and this City was but one days Journey from Hidon, and the River Euphrates. So had he two safe Retreats, the one to Thadmor, and the next from thence to Damascus. In this encounter between David and the Syrians, they lost 40000. Horsemen, and 700. Chariots, together with Shobach General of their Army. The Chronicles call these 40000. Souldiers Footmen, and so Yimus converts it, and so it is very probable. For the Army of Israel consisting of Footmen, could hardly have slaughtered 40000. Horsemen, except they quirted their Horse and fought on Foot. So are the Chariots taken in this Battle, numbered at 7000. in the first of Chron. the 9. in which number, as I conceive, all the Souldiers that served in them with the Conductors are included: so as there died of the Syrians in this War against David before he forc'd them to Tribute, 100000. Footmen, besides all their Horsemen and Waggoners, and besides all those that Joab slew, when they fled at the first encounter, together with the Ammonites before Rabbah. Notwithstanding all which, the Adads in following ages gathered strength again, and afflicted the Kings of Juda often: but the Kings of Israel they impoverished, even to the last end of that State.

David having now beaten the Arabians and Mezopotamians from the Party and Confederacy of Ammon: He sent out Joab the Lieutenant of his Armies to forrage and destroy their Territory, and to besiege Rabbah, afterward Philadelphia, which after a while the Israelites maltreated and posselt. The King's Crown which weighed a Talent of Gold, garnished with precious Stones, David set on his own Head, and carried away with him the rest of the Riches and Spoil of the City. And though David layed at Hierusalem, following the War of Uriah his Wife, till such time as the City was brought to extremity, and ready to be entered: yet Joab in honour of David forbore the last assault, and entrance thereof, till his Masters arrival. To the People he used cruellest rigor (if we may to it call it being exercised against Heavens Idolaters) for some of them he tare with Harrows, some he sawed alunder, others he cast into burning Kilns, in which he baked Tile and Brick.

§. VII.

Of David's Troubles in his Reign, and of his Forces.

BUT as Victory begetteth security, and our present worldly felicity a forgetfulness of our former miseries, and many times of God himself in the giver of all goodnes: so did these Changes, in the Fortune and State of this good King, change also the zealous care which formerly he had to please God in the precise observation of his Laws and Commandments: For having now no dangerous apparent Enemy (against whom he was wont to ask Counsel from the Lord) he began to be advised by his own humane affections and vain desires. For he was not only satisfied to take Uriah's Wife from him, and to use her by stealth: but he imbrodered his Adultery with Uriah's Raughter, giving Order to his trusty Servant Joab to marshal him in the front or point of those Israelites, 2 Sam. 11. 15. which gave an assault upon the Suburbs of Rabbah. And that which could no less displease God than the rest, he was content that many others of his best Servants and Souldiers should perish together with Uriah, hoping thereby to cover his particular ill intent against him. After which he began by degrees to fall from the height of Happiness; and his days then to come were filled with joys and woes interchangeable, his trodden down sorrows began again to spring; and those perils which he had pulled up by the roots (as he hoped) gave him an after-harvest of many cares and discontentments. And if it had pleased God to take the witness of David's own mouth against him, as David himself did against the Amalekites, which pretended to have slain Saul, he had then appeared as worthy of reprehension as the other was of the death he suffered. For when Nathan the Prophet propounded unto him his own error, in the person of another, to wit, of him that took the poor Man's Sheep that had none else, the bereaver being Lord of many: He then vowed it to the living Lord, that such a one should die the death. And hereof, although it pleased God to pardon David, for his life, which remission the Prophet Nathan pronounced: yet he delivered him God's Justice together with his Mercy in the Tenour following; Now therefore the Sword shall never depart from thy House, &c. Because thou hast taken his Wife to be thy Wife, and hast slain Uriah with the Sword of the Children of Ammon. Soon after this David lost the Child of Adultery which he begot on Bersabee. Secondly, his own Son Annon being in Love with the half Sister Thamar, by the advice of his Cousin German the Son of Shimeah David's Brother, posselt her by force: which when he had performed, he thrust her from him in a careless and despitful manner. Two Years after which foul and incestuous act, Asalem caused him to be murdered, at the Feast of his Sheep-hearing; not perchance in revenge of Thamar's Ravishment alone; but having it in his Heart to usurp the Kingdom; in which, because he could not in any sort be assured of Annon, he thought his Affair greatly advanced by his destruction. So the one Brother having ravished his own Sister, and then despitful her; the other after a long dissembled malice, first, made his own Brother drunken, and then slaughtered him; which done he fled away and lived under the safeguard of Talmas King of Goffur, near Damascus, who was his Grandfather by the Mother, but a Heathen King. Thirdly, when Asalem by the invention of Joab, (but chiefly because of the great affection of David towards his Son) was brought again: first to the King's favour, and then to his presence. He began instantly to practise against David's Father, seeking by the pretence of common Justice, and by lowly and familiar manner to all Men, and by detracting from his Father's Equity, to win unto himself a popular Reputation. Here began the great affliction, threatened by the Lord as a punishment of David's sin.

The company which Asalem gathered at the first were but 200. Men: which he carried with him from Hierusalem to Hebron; pretending, though impiously, the performance of a Vow to God. There when Achishophel repaired unto him, and many troops of People from all places, he proclaimed himself King, and was by the People (whose Hearts God had turned from their lawful Prince) accepted to readily, that David doubting to be set upon on the sudden, durst not trust himself in his own City of Hierusalem, nor in any other walked

Town

Town for fear of surprize: but incamped in the Fields, and Defarts with some 600. of his guards, and few else. The Priests he left in Hierusalem, with the Ark of God, from whom he desired to be advertised of those things that chanced, to whom he directed Hushai his trusty friend, and Servant, praying him to make himself in all his outward actions and counsels of Asalem's party and confederacy, thereby the better to discover unto him the purposes of Achishophel, a revolted Counsellor, whose practices he greatly doubted. And now when Treason was in fashion, Ziba also sought to betray his master Mephibosheth the Son of Jonathan: And Shimei of the house of Saul (the fire of whose hatred David's prosperity had smothered, but his adversity lightened) holding himself upon the advantage of a Mountain side, cast stones at David, and most despitfully cursed him to his face: but David attending no private revenges, forbade Ahijah to pursue him for the present, yet left him among others in the roll of his revenge, to his Son Salomon. Asalem being now posselt of Hierusalem, was advised by Achishophel to use his fathers Concubines in some such publick place, as all Israel might assure themselves, that he was irreconcilable to his Father: whereof being persuaded they would then resolutely adhere to Asalem and his cause, without fear of being given up upon a reconciliation between them. This salvage and impious (though crafty counsel) Achishophel indeed urged for his own respect, as fearing that this rebellion might take end to his destruction; who most of all other inflamed Asalem against his Father. And now was it fulfilled that Nathan had directly foretold David: *I will raise up evil against thee out of thine own house, and will take thy Wives before thine eyes, and give them unto thy neighbour, and he shall be with thy Wives in the sight of the Sun: for thou didst it secretly, but I will do this thing before all Israel, and before the Sun.* He also gave advice to Asalem, that himself with an army of 12000 Men might be employed at the instant for the surprizing of David, which had willingly been embraced by Asalem, had not Hushai David's faithful Servant given counter-advice, and swayed it: persuading Asalem, that it was fitter and more safe for him with all the strength of Israel, to pursue his Father: than by such a troop, which David's valour, and those of his attendants, might either endanger or resist. This delay in Asalem, and advantage of time gained by David, was indeed, after God, the loss of the one and delivery of the other. Whereupon Achishophel rightly fearing (by the occasion fore-shewed) the success which followed, disposed of his own estate, and then forsook both the party and the care of Asalem, and of his own life.

David being advertised of this enterprize against him, marched away all night, and past Jordan, posseling himself of Mahanaim in the tribe of Gad: the same wherein Isobabebeth, himself in the War against David after Saul's death feasted himself. To which place there repaired unto him Shobi, the Son of Nahash the Ammonite, whom David loved, the same which Josephus calleth Shephar. And though it be greatly disputed, what this Shobi was, yet the most general and probable opinion makes him a second brother to Hannan, whom David for his Fathers sake established in the Kingdom, after Hannan's overthrow. In thankfulness whereof he believed David in this his extremity. There came also to David's assistance Machir of Endaber, Guardian in former times to Mephibosheth, and among others

Barzilai the Gileadite, who willingly fed David and all his company.

In the mean time both the King and Asalem prepared to fight; Asalem made Amasa Commander of the Army of Israel, the same place which Joab held with David; an office next the King himself, like unto that of the Majors of the Palace anciently in France. David, perfwaded by his company, stayed in Mahanaim, and disposed the forces he had to Joab, Ahijah, and Itai, giving them charge in the hearing of all that issued out of the port of Mahanaim; that they should spare the life of Asalem. But Joab, besides that he was very cruel by Nature, remembered that Asalem had lately disposed of his Government to Amasa, and therefore the victory being obtained, and news brought him that Asalem hung by the hair of his head on a Tree, when he could not perfwade the messenger to return and kill him, he himself with his own Servants disparted him. It appeared also by the sequel that Joab affected Adonijah whom he afterward acknowledged, David yet living; and fearing the disposition of Asalem, he embraced the present advantage offered.

Hereof, together with news of the victory, when knowledge was brought to David, he mourned and sorrowed, not only as a Man that had lost a Son, but as one that had outlived all his worldly joys, and seen every delight of life interred. For he lo himself from his people, as those which hoped for honour and reward after so great a victory, covered themselves also in the City, as if they had committed the greatest offences, and had rather deserved death than recompence. Whereupon Joab presenting himself before David, perfwaded him to dissemble his sorrow for the present, and to shew himself to the Army. For first he told him that he had discountenanced his faithful Servants, who had that day preserved his life; insinuating that nothing could be more dangerous to a King, than not only to not acknowledge so great a love and contancy in his people, who being but few in number, did yet resolutely expose themselves to great perils for his sake: but on the contrary grieve and lament at their good success. For, no doubt, they might all have bought their peace of Asalem at an easy rate. Secondly, he urged that it was generally believed, that he loved his enemies and hated his Friends, and that he witnessed by this his mourning, that he had not any respect of his Princes, and others his faithful Servants, but would more have joyed if they had all perished, and Asalem lived, than in the victory by their faithfulness and approved valour gotten.

Lastly he used this prevalent argument, that if the King came not out and shewed himself publicly to his Men of War, that they would all that very night abandon him, and return: concluding with this fearful threatening: And that will be worse unto thee than all the evil that fell on thee from thy youth hitherto. By these overbold and arrogant speeches (though perchance uttered with a good intent) Joab raised David from his bed of sorrow, and brought him to the gates of the City among the people, whom he assured of his love and affection, especially Amasa who commanded the Army of Asalem, to whom he promised the office of Lieutenantship; the same which Asalem had given him, and which Joab now enjoyed. For David doubted that if Amasa were not satisfied, he might draw from him a great part of the strength of Israel, now under his commandment.

This

This done, the King marched towards Jordan homeward, where in his passage he pardoned Shimei, who had lately reviled him to his face; but this remission was but external, as appeared afterwards. He also accepted of Mephibosheth his excuse, whom Ziba had formerly falsely accused and betrayed.

He also intreated Barzillai the Gileadite, his late liberal host, to follow him to Jerusalem, that he might reward his service done him; who excusing himself by his age, appointed his Son Chimham to attend the King.

At Gilgal on this side Jordan, all the Tribes assembled, and after some contention which of them ought to have most interest in David, the Army brake, and David returned to Jerusalem. But Sheba, the Son of Bichri a Benjaminite of the faction of the House of Saul, finding some discontent among the Israelites, withdrew them from David, as from a stranger in whom they had no interest; and it seemeth that many of the People of the out-tribes, and in effect of all but Juda, bare still a good affection to the issues of their first King. David employed his reconciled Captain Amasa, to give him contentment, and to witness his truth, as also because he conceived that Amasa had interest in those revolts of Israel more than Joab had. He received commandment from David to assemble the Army within three days, which he forewore: but being onward on his way, Abishai Joab's Brother, was sent after him, with David's Guard and best Soldiers, whom also Joab accompanied: and overtaking Amasa near Gibson, pretending to embrace him, gave him a wound, whereof he fell dead, being no less jealous of Amasa than he was of Aner, whom he murdered in the same manner, and out of the same impatient ambition. This done he pursued Sheba, and finding him inclosed in Aral, assaulted the City with that fury, that the Citizens by the persuasions of a wife Woman there inhabiting, cut off Sheba his Head, and flung it to Joab over the Walls: which done, he retreated his Army to Jerusalem, and commanded as before all the Host of Israel.

The next act of David's, was the delivery of Saul's Sons or Kinsmen to the Gibionites, whom those Citizens hung up in revenge of their Fathers cruelty. David had knowledge from the Oracle of God, that a Famine which had continued on the Land three Years, came by reason of Saul and his House; to wit, for the slaughter of the Gibionites: and therefore he willingly yielded to give them this satisfaction, both because he had warrant from God himself, as also, if we may judge humanly, to rid himself of Saul's Line, by whom he and his might, as well in the present as in the future, be greatly molested and endangered; only he spared Mephibosheth the Son of Jonathan, both for the love he bare to his Father, as for his Oath and vow to God.

Now where it is written in the Text; The King took the two Sons of Rizpah whom he bare unto Saul, and the five sons of Michol the daughter of Saul, whom he bare to Adriel, and delivered them to the Gibionites.

Junius calls this Michol the Sister of her that was David's Wife, the whom Saul married to Phaltiel; but Michol being named Adriel to her Husband: the same which is named Meraab in the first of Samuel the eighteenth, who was first promised to David, when he flew Goliath in the Valley of Rephaim: and because it is written that Michol loved David, which perchance Meraab did not, whether David had any human respect in the delivery of her Children, it is only known to God.

Now whereas the Geneva nameth Michol for Meraab the Wife of Adriel: the better translation were out of the Hebrew word here used, having an e-clipsis or defect, and signifieth, as I am informed, one of the same Kindred, as in the 19. verse of the same 21. Chapter it is said of Goliath, whose Spear was weighty as a Weavers Beam, when as by the same Eclipsis it must be understood by the Brother of Goliath: Goliath himself being formerly slain.

As by the death of Saul's Children God feared the House of David, leaving no head unto Rebellion; so did he strengthen both the King and Nation against Foreign Enemies, by the valour of many brave Commanders, the like of whom, for number and quality, that People of Israel is not known to have had at any time before or after. Thirty Captains of thousands there were, all Men of mark, and great reputation in War. Over these were six Colonels, whose valour was so extraordinary, that it might well be held as miraculous. These Colonels had some difference of place and honour, which seemeth to have been given upon mere consideration of their virtue. For Abishai the Brother of Joab, who in the War against the Ammonites and Aramites was Lieutenant and commanded half the Army, could not attain to the honour of the first Rank, but was fain to rest contented with being principal of the three Colonels of the second order, notwithstanding his nearness in Blood unto the King, the flourishing estate of his own House, and his well approved services. All these Colonels and Captains, with the Companies belonging to them, may seem to have been such as were continually retained, or at the least kept in readines for any occasion, considering that the numbers which were mustered and drawn out, if need required, unto the Field, very far exceeded thirty thousand, yea or thirty times as many. They were most of them such as had followed the King in Saul's time, and been hardened with his adventures. Others there were very many, and principal Men in their several Tribes, that repaired unto him after the death of Saul; but these Captains and Colonels, (who with Joab, that was General of all the Kings Forces, make up the number of 37.) were the especial Men of War, and reckoned as David's worthies. The long Reign of David, as it is known to have consumed many of these excellent Men of War, so may it probably be guessed to have waisted the most of those whose deaths we find no where mentioned. For the Sons of Zerui, who had been too hard for David, were worn away, and only Joab left in the beginning of Salomon's reign, who wanted his Brother Abishai to stand by his side in his last extremity.

By the actions forepassed in the time of David, it is gathered that he had reigned now 33 years, or thereabout, when the Posterity of Saul was rooted out, so that he enjoyed about seven years of entire quiet and security, wherein it pleased God to remove all impediments that might have troubled the succession of Salomon in his Fathers Throne. In this time also David having established all things in Juda and Israel, and the borders thereof, he again displeased God by numbering the People, as in ostentation of his Power: in which he employed Joab with other Captains of his Army, who after nine Months and twenty days travel, returned with the Account and Register of all the People, able and fit to bear Arms, and they amounted to the number of thirteen hundred thousand, besides Levi and Benjamin; whereas in Juda and the Cities thereof five hundred thousand;

thousand, and in Israel eight hundred thousand.

For this, when by the Prophet Gad he was offered from God the choice of three punishments, whereof he might submit himself to which he pleased; to wit, seven Years famine; three Months War, wherein he should be unprosperous in all attempts, and be chased by his enemies; or a general Pestilence to last three days: David made choice to bow himself under the hand of God only, and left himself subject to that cruel disease, which hath no compassion or respect of persons, of which there perished seventy thousand. And hereby he hath taught all that live, that it is better to fall into the hands of God than of Men; whereof he giveth us this Divine reason,

2 Sam. 14. For his mercies are great.

§. VIII.

Of the last acts of David: Adonijah's fall: the revenge upon Joab and Shimei.

LASTLY, when he grew weak and feeble, and past the acts and knowledge of Women, he was yet advised to lie in the Arms of a young and well complexioned Maiden, to keep him warm. In this his weak estate of body, when he was in a manner bed-ridden, Adonijah his eldest Son (Amnon and Shephom being now dead) having drawn unto his party that invincible, renowned and feared Joab, with Abiathar the Priest, began manfully to prepare for his establishment in the Kingdom after his Father. For being the eldest now living of David's Sons, and a Man of a goodly personage, Salomon yet young and born of a Mother formerly attainted with adultery, for which her name was omitted by S. Matthew (as Beda, Hugo, Thomas, and others suppose) he presumed to carry the matter without reluctance. Hereof when David had knowledge by Benishai the Mother of Salomon, who did put him in mind of his faithful promise, that Salomon her Son should reign after him (Nathan the Prophet affirming the same thing unto the King, and seconding her report of Adonijah's presumption) the King calling unto him Zadok the Priest, Nathan the Prophet, and Benishai the Captain of his Guard, gave charge and commission to anoint Salomon, and to let him on the Mule whereon himself used to ride in his greatest state: which done, Salomon attended and strongly guarded by the ordinary and choice Men of War, the Cherethiers and Peltashiers, shewed himself to the people. Those tydings being reported to Adonijah, he presently abandoned his Assistants, and for the safety of his life he held by the horns of the Altar, whom for the present Salomon pardoned. After this, David had remaining two especial cares, whereof he was desirous to discharge his thoughts; the one concerning the peace of the land, which might be disturbed by some rebellion against Salomon's the other concerning the building of the Temple, which he sought by all means to advance, and make the business publick. To bring these intentions to good effect he summoned a Parliament, consisting of all the Princes of Israel, the Princes of the several Tribes, all the Captains and Officers, with all the mighty, and Men of power; who repaired unto Jerusalem.

In this Assembly the King stood up, and signified his purpose of building the Temple, shewing how the Lord had approved the motion. Herein he took occasion to lay open his own title to the Crown, shewing that the Kingdom was by Gods ordinance due to the Tribe of Juda (as Jacob in his blessing prophetically bequeathed it) and that God himself was pleased to make choice of him among all his Fathers Sons. In like manner he said that God himself had appointed Salomon by name to be his Successor: whereupon he earnestly charged both the people and his Son, to conform themselves unto all that God had commanded, and particularly to go forward in this work of the Lords house which Salomon was chosen to build. Then produced he the pattern of the work according to the form which God himself had appointed; and so laying open his own preparations, he exhorted all others to a voluntary contribution.

The Kings proposition was so well approved by the Princes and people, that whereas he himself had given three thousand talents of gold, and seven thousand of Silver, they added unto it seven thousand of Gold, and ten thousand of Silver, besides Brass, Iron and Jewels, heartily rejoicing in the advancement of foreigners a work. This business being well dispatched, a solemn feast with great Sacrifice was made, at which time Salomon was again anointed King, and received fealty of all the Princes and people of the land, and of all the Princes his brethren the Sons of King David. Salomon being thus established King, his Father David finding himself even in the hands of death, first exhorted his Son to exercise the same courage and strength of mind, which himself had done in all his attempts, and to the end that a happy end might follow the beginning of all his enterprises, he uttered these mighty words; Take heed to the charge of the Lord thy God, to walk in his ways, and keep his statutes and his commandments, and his judgments, and his testimonies, as it is written in the Law of Moses, &c. to the performance of which God hath promised the succession, and prosperity of his issues. For this done (saith God himself) Thou shalt not want one of thy posterity to sit upon the throne of Israel.

Secondly, he advised him concerning Joab, who out of doubt had served David from the first assault of Jerusalem to the last of his Wars, with incomparable valour and fidelity, saving that he fastened himself to Adonijah (his master yet living) and thereby vexed him in his feeble age. But as God hath never left cruelty unrevengeed, so was it his will that Joab should drink of the same cup, whereof he had enforced other Men to taste, and suffer the same violence which himself had unjustly stricken others with all, quo gladio percussit, gladio percipit: for he had bereaved Aner and Amasa of their lives, having against the one the presence only of his brothers slaughter, whom Aner had slain in the time of War, and could not avoid him: against the other but a meer jealousy of his growing great in the favour of David. And though Joab assured himself that Aner and Amasa being dead, there was none left either to equal him or supplant him, yet God (deriding the policies of wicked Men) raised up Benishai the Son of Tehojadab, to pull him from the Sanctuary, and to cut him in pieces. For David giveth this cause to Salomon against Joab, that he slew the Captains of the host of Israel, and shed Blood of battle in peace; and to this apparent and just cause, it is not improbable but that David remembered the ill affection of Joab towards Salomon, which Joab made manifest by the untimely setting up of Adonijah, David yet living. Some other offence Joab had committed against David, of which in their words he put his Son Salomon in mind; Thou knowest also what Joab the Son of Zeruiah did to me, &c. 1 King 2: Now

Now whether this were meant by the killing of Abfalom: contrary to the King's desire, or by the proud words used to him when he mourned in Mahaneim for Abfalom; or whether it were the publishing of David's Letter unto him for the killing of Uriah: thereby to disgrace Salomon as delinquent of such a Mother, the Scriptures are silent. True it is that those great Men of War do oftentimes behave themselves exceeding insolently towards their Princes, both in respect of their Service done, as also because they flatter themselves with an opinion, that either their Masters cannot mislead them, or that they dare not offend them. But this kind of pride hath overthrowed many a worthy Man otherwise deserving great honour and respect.

He also gave order to Salomon, to rid himself of Shimei, who not long before had cast Stones at David and cursed him to his face. And albeit by reason of his oath and promise David spared Shimei all the time himself lived, yet being dust and in the grave he flew him, by the hand of Salomon his Son. Hence it seemeth that King Henry the seventh of England had his pattern, when he gave order to Henry the eighth to execute Poulas soon as himself was buried, having made promise to the King of Spain when he delivered Paul unto him, that while he lived he would never put him to death, nor suffer violent hands to be laid upon him.

And yet did not the execution of Yash yield unto Salomon any such great profit or allowance as he hoped for. For he found a young Adad of Idumea, and Rezin of Damascus to vex him: who, as the Scriptures witness, were emboldened to enterprize upon Salomon, hearing that David slept with his Fathers, and that Yash the Captain of the host was dead. Now when David had reigned in all forty years, to wit, in Hebron seven years, and in Jerusalem three and thirty, he died.

For his person, he was of small stature, but exceeding strong. For his internal gifts, and graces he so far exceeded all other Men, as putting his humane frailty apart, he was said by God himself to be a Man according to his own heart. The Psalms which he wrote witness his piety, and his excellent learning; of whom Hieronymus to Paulinus. David Simonides nofter, Pindarus & Alceus, Flaccus, quoque Catullus, & Serenus, Christum lyra personas, & in decachordo Psalterium ab inferis hijocit refurgentem. David (saith he) our Simonides, Pindarus, Alceus, Horace, Catullus and Serenus, be playeth Christ on his harp, and on a ten-stringed Psalter he taught him up rising from the dead. And being both a King and a Prophet, he foretelleth Christ more lightomely and lively than all the rest.

The book of the Psalms, saith Glycas, were divided, ordered and distinguished, by Ezechias: but whether all the Psalms were written by David it is diversly disputed. For a Athanasius, Cyprian, Lycranus, and others conceive divers authors, answering the titles of the several Psalms, as Moses, Salomon, and thereof beareth named, and thatorily 73. Psalms were composed by David himself, namely those which are intitled ipsius David. For the 50. and 72. with the ten that follow are beflowed on Alaph the Son of Bathaschia, eleven other on the Sons of Korah, and eleven are ascribed to Moses, to wit, the 80. and the 100. following, and so they are intitled in the old Hebrew copies, though the Vulgar and Septuagint (three excepted) file them otherwise. The supposed nine authors of these Psalms which David wrote not, Sicut Brenzia nameth as followeth; Salomon, Moses, whom Aben Ezra contrary to Hierome, maketh one of David's Singers) Alaph, Ethan, Ezarias, Emas, Esaias, Idithun, and the three Sons of Chore. But S. Chrysostome makes David the sole author of all the Psalms, and so doth S. Augustine, reasoning in this manner. Although (saith he) some there are that ascribe those Psalms only unto David, which are over written ipsius David, and the rest intitled ipsi David to others, this opinion (saith he) Vox Evangelica salutem ipsius refutatur, quia quid ipse David in Spiritu Christi dixerit esse sum Dominum, quoniam Psalms 109. sic incipit: Dixit Dominus dominus meus, Sede a dextris meis, &c. The voice of the Gospel refutes this opinion, where it saith, that David himself in the Spirit called Christ his Lord, became the 109. Psalms begins thus, The Lord said unto my Lord, Sit thou at my right hand, &c. Lastly, his testimonies are used both by Christ and the Apostles, and he was as a pattern to all the Kings and Princes that succeeded him.

His Story and all his particular actions, were written by the Prophets, Samuel, Nathan and Gad, as it is in the first of Chron. 29. ver. 19. For the several parts of the books of Samuel which intreat chiefly of David, were as it seems written by these three Holy Men.

Constantine Mandellus hath an opinion, that the 15. Trojan during the time of the siege, fought for 6. years, succour from David, and that he stayed neither in his life in that War. But it seemeth that Mandellus did mistake the time twixt David and the Trojan War. For it is generally received that Troy fell between the times of Abdon and Samsen Judges of Israel, about the Worlds year 2845. and David died in the year 2991.

Of the treasures of David and Salomon.

HIS Treasures were exceeding great. For it is written in the 22. of the first of Chronicles, Prof. 14. that he left Salomon for the building of the Temple a hundred thousand talents of Gold, and a thousand thousand talents of Silver, and of brass and iron passing all weight, which is more than any King of the World possit besides himself, and his Son to whom he left it. For it amounteth to three thousand three hundred thirty and three cartload and a third of a cartload of Silver, allowing two thousand weight of Silver or six thousand pound sterling to every cartload, besides threecore and seventeen Millions of French Crowns, or of our Money twenty three Millions and a thousand pound: a matter but for the testimony of the Scriptures, exceeding all belief. For that any riches were left him it doth not appear; seeing that the Judges had not any treasure, nor any sovereign power to make levies: but when they went to the Wars, they were followed by such Volunteers as the several Tribes by turns gave them: seeing also that Saul who was of a mean parentage, and perpetually vexed and invaded by the Philistines, could not in all likelihood gather great riches (if any at all) in his territories being exceeding narrow, and thereof the better part possit by his enemies.

Therefore it were not amiss to consider how David within the space of not very many years, might amass up such mighty treasures. For though patrimony be it self a great revenue, yet needs there must have been other great means. It seems that he made the uttermost profit of all that he had, that was profitable. Eusebius in his ninth book book and last Chapter de preparatione Evangelica, citeth the words of Eusebius, who reporteth that David among other preparations for the Temple, built a Navy in Melanis (or as Vil-lalpandus corrects it Achanis) a City of Arabia, and from thence sent Men to dig for Gold in the Island Urphe, which Orelus thinks, was Ophir, though Eusebius in his place of Eusebius (erring perhaps in this circumstance) saith that this Island is in the Red Sea; from whence saith this Eusebius, they brought Gold into Jury. Pindus lib. 4. dextris Salomonis c. 1. thinks that David did this way also enrich himself, and citeth this testimony of Eusebius: and yet certainly David had many other ways to gather great riches. Much land doubtless he gained by conquest, from the Canaanites and Philistines, besides those fruitful valleys near Jordan in Tracoonis and Bajan, and the best of Syria, and other Countries bordering the Israelites. These Demains belike he kept in his own hands, and with his infinite number of Captives, which he took in his Wars, which were not able to redeem themselves, husbanded them not able to his greatest advantage. For it is grounds for his greatest advantage. For it is written 1 Chron. 12. that Yehonathan was over his Treasures in the Cities, in the Villages, in the Cities, in the Towns; that Ezer was over the labourers that tilled his ground; Simes over the Vineyards; and Sabab over the Store of the Wine; Beal Hanan over the Olive Trees, and Yash over the Store of the Oyl, also that he had Herdmen that had charge over his cattle, both in the high lands, and in the Plains, over his Sheep, Camels and Ases. And this custom of enriching themselves by husbandry and Cattle the ancient Kings every where held, both before and after David's time. For we read of Pharaoh that he spake to Joseph to appoint some of his brethren or of their Servants, to be Rulers over his Cattel. We read of Uzzia, that he loved husbandry, had much cattle, and ploughmen, and dressers of Vines: likewise we read it in all Greek Poets, that the wealth of the ancient Kings did especially consist in their Herds and flocks, whereof they were needful to cite Augustinus and Admetus or any other for examples, the rule holding true in all. Now concerning David it is not unlikely, but that those captives which were not employed in husbandry, were many of them used by him in all sorts of gainful professions, as the ancient Romans in like manner used their slaves.

To these profits (besides the Tributes and impositions which doubtless were great, and besides the innumerable Presents which yearly were brought him, or extraordinarily sent him, by Tebu and others) we may add the great spoils which he found in the Cities and Countries which he conquered: also the head-money which was gathered per legem captivitatis; By the law of captivation or head-money, every Man rich or poor paying half a Sickle of the Sanctuary, which is about as much woodrout sum in that Kingdom: wherein one thousand thousand five hundred and seventy thousand fighting Men were numbered by Yash. Now although this Law of captivation be thought by some very learned not to have been perpetual (which opinion of theirs nevertheless they confess is against the Hebrew expositions) yet David upon this occasion is not unlikely to have put it in practice. And by these means might he be able to leave those huge Treasures to Salomon. Yet it may seem that of this great mass of Gold and Silver left by David, the least part was his own in private, and so will it appear the less wonderful that he left so much. Of his own liberality we find, that he gave to the building of the Temple three thousand Talents of Gold, and seven thousand Talents of Silver, a great sum: but holding a very small proportion to the other. Wherefore we are to consider, that the Treasures of the Sanctuary it self were exceeding great, as needs they must have been, having received continual encroachment, without any loss or diminution ever since the time of Moses and Jehoa. The revenues of the Sanctuary (besides all manner of tithes and oblations, which defrayed the daily expenses, and maintained the Priest and Levites) were partly raised out of the head-money before mentioned; partly out of the spoils gotten in War. For all the booty was divided into two parts, whereof the Soldiers had one, and the People which remained at home, had the other half; whereby all the Country received benefit of the Victory, yet so that the Soldiers had a far greater proportion than the rest, as being fewer, and therefore receiving more for every single share.

Out of this purchase was deducted the Lords tribute, which was one in fifty, of that which the people received, and one in five hundred, of that which was given to the Soldiers; namely one hundred and one thousand part of the whole booty. So in the spoil of Midian, thirty two thousand Women being taken, the Army had sixteen thousand of them for slaves, and the Congregation had other sixteen thousand; but out of the sixteen thousand given to the Army were exempted two and thirty for the Lords tribute. Out of the peoples number were taken three hundred and twenty. By this means the lesser that the Army was which had exposed it self to danger, the greater profit had every Soldier; but when it consisted of many hands, they who remaining at home were fain to undergo more than ordinary travel in domestic affairs, did receive by so much the greater portion. But the Lords tribute was always certain, yea many times it was increased, either by some special commandment, as when all the Gold, and Silver, and other metals found in Jericho, were consecrated unto God; or by thankfulness of the Rulers and People, as when af. Jos. 6. 19. after the victory obtained against the Midianites without the loss of one Man, all Jewels, Bracelets, Ear-rings, and the like, were offered up, as vo: Nam. 31. 50. luntary Presents.

Now howsoever the Israelites were many times oppressed, and trodden down by other Nations, yet were not these Treasures robbed or spoiled; for the enemies never got possession of the Tabernacle that was in Shilo. Wherefore it cannot otherwise be, than that the wealth of the Sanctuary must have been exceeding great; as containing above one hundred part of all the money and other goods found by the Israelites in the whole Land of Canaan; and of all that was purchased by so many victories, as they obtained against the bordering Nations. Or that this Treasury was not defrauded of the due portion, it is evident; seeing that before the time of David, and his Lieutenant Yash it is recorded that Saul and Abner, and before them Sanneh, had used to dedicate of the spoils obtained in War, to maintain the house of the Lord: the like whereof may be well presumed of the former Judges and Captains in other Ages. Certain it is, that the Conquest of David brought into the Land far greater abundance of riches, than any former victories had purchased, though of Jehoa perhaps excepted: but these vast sums of an hundred thousand Talents of Silver, may seem rather to have been made up, by the addition of his winnings and liberality, to the treasures laid up in many former Ages, than to have been the meer fruits of his own industry.

Now concerning the riches of Salomon, it is more manifest how he gathered them; for he received yearly Revenues with his Tributes fix hundred fixty Talents of Gold, besides the Customs of Spices. He had also fix Returns from the East India, which greatly increased his store. For his Ships performed that Voyage every three years, and he began that trade in the two and twentieth year of his Reign, and ruled forty years. Besides this, all Judea and Israel were now mastered to his hands; all the Arabians his borders, the Syrians of Zobab, of Damascus, of Palmyra, of Iurra; all of Idumea, Moab, and Ammon, paid him Tribute; as likewise did the Hittites, who with the Philistines, Hivites, Jebusites, and other races of the Canaanites, were not as yet extinguished, though subdued.

Into this flourishing Estate was the Kingdom of Israel reduced by David, who after forty years Reign, and seventy years of life, died in a good age, full of days, riches, and honour, and was buried in the City of David. It is written by Josephus that there was hid in David's Tomb a marvelous quantity of Treasures, in so much as Hircanus (who first of the Chasmanis, or race of the Macabees, called himself King) one thousand and three hundred years after, drew thence three thousand Talents, to rid himself of Antiochus then besieging Jerusalem, and afterward Herod opening another Celi, had also an exceeding Mass of Gold and Silver therein. And it was an ancient custom to bury Treasure with the Dead. So the Persians and other Americans did the like, which being discovered by the Spaniards, they enriched themselves by nothing so much in their first Conquest. That Salomon did bury so much Treasure in his Fathers Grave, it would hardly be believed, in regard of the great exactions with which he was fain to burthen the People, notwithstanding all the riches which he got otherwise, or which were left unto him: were it not without considered that his want of Money grew from such magnificent employments. Particularly of the Sepulcher of David the Scriptures have no mention, but only the Sepulchres of the Kings of Juda, as of an honourable place of Burial. Yet the Monuments of those Kings, as (by Relation of the Duke of Uitka) they remained within their thirty years, and are like to remain still, are able to make any report credible, of the cost bestowed upon them.

S. X.

Of the Philistines, whom David absolutely mastered: and of sundry other contemporaries with David.

OF the Philistines, whose pride David was the first that absolutely mastered, in this conclusion of David's time somewhat here may be spoken.

They defended of Casloim, who according to Isidore and Josephus, was one of the Sons of Misraim, and was surnamed Philistim, as Esaú was surnamed Edom, and Jacob Israel. There were of them five Cities of petty Principalities; namely, Ascatu or Aldod, Gaza or Accaph, Ascalon, Geth or Gath, and Accaron. It seemeth that Casloim was the first founder of this Nation, because of his Kindred on either hand, the Canaanites and the Egyptians.

The first King of these Philistines, which the Scriptures have named, was that Athimelech which Gm. 20. loved Sara, Abraham's Wife. The second Athimelech lived at once with Isaac, to whom Isaac repaired in the time of Famine, Athimelech then residing at Gerar in the border of Idumea, which Athimelech fancied Isaac his Wife: Gm. 26. as his Father had done Sara.

After Athimelech the second, the Philistines Kings are not remembered in the Scriptures, till David's time: perhaps the Government was turned into Archevscatrical. For they are afterwards named Princes of the Philistines, howsoever Achis be named King of Gath, the same to whom David fled, and who again gave him Siklag to inhabit in Saul's time.

After him we read of another Achis who lived with Salomon, to whom Shimei travelled to fetch back his fugitive Servant, what time the seeking of his Servant was the loss of his Life. Jeremy the Prophet speaketh of the Kings of Philistines or Philistines. Amos nameth the King of Ascalon: Zacharias, a King of Gaza. The rest of the Wars of the Philistines are remembered in the Catalogue of the Judges, of Saul and David, and therefore I shall not need to collect the particulars in this place.

There lived at once with David, the third of the Silvini King of Alba called Latus Silvius, who is said to have ruled that part of Italy fixty years. And about his fourteenth year Cadmus the last King of the Athenians died, to whom succeeded the first Prince of those, who being called after Medon, Medonides, without regal name governed Athen during their life.

The reasons which moved the Athenians to change their Government, were not drawn from any inconvenience found in the rule of Sovereignty, but in honour of Cadmus only. For when the Gracians of Doris, a Region between Phocis and the Mountain Ossa, fought counsel from the Oracle, for their success in the Wars against the Athenians, it was answered that then undoubtedly they should prevail and become Lords of that State, when they could obtain any Victory against the Nation, and yet preserve the Athenian King living. Cadmus by some intelligence being informed of this answer, withdrew himself from his own forces, and putting on the habit of a common Soldier, entered the Camp of the Dorians, and killing the first he encountered, was himself forthwith cut in pieces.

Empet the 31. King of Affrica, which others account but the 30. began to rule that Empire, about the 13. year of David, and held it 38. years.

Near the same time began Ision the second King of the Heracleids, the Son of Euryphantes in Corinth; and Agis the second of the Heracleids in Lacedaemon: in honour of which Agis, his Succellours were called Agides, for many years after. He restored the Laconians to their former liberty: He overcame the Citizens of Helos in Laconia, who had refused to pay him Tribute: He condemned them and theirs to perpetual slavery; whereof it came, that all the Messenians, whom at length they brought into the like bondage, were after called Helones.

In like fort from the Sclavi came the word Slave. For when that Nation issuing out of Sarmatia, now called Russia, had seized upon the Country of Illyria and made it their own by Conquest, their victory pleased them so highly, that thereupon they called called themselves by a new name, Slaves, which is in their language Glorious. But in after-times (that warmer Climate having thawed their Northern hardiness, and not ripened their Wits) when they were trodden down, and made Servants to their Neighbours; the Italians which call many of them in Bondage began to keep all their bondmen Slaves, using the word as a name of reproach: in which sense it is now current through many Countries.

Other Chronologers make this Agis, the third King of Sparta, and somewhat later, about the 23. year of David, and say that Acheferatus was the fourth King of this Race, the same whom Eusebius calls Labote, and sets him in the thirteenth year of Salomon.

In the tenth year of Acheferatus Androclus the third Son of Cadmus afflicted by the Jones, built Ephesus in Caria, who after the adjoining of the life of Samos to his Territory was slain by the Carians whose Country he usurped. He was buried (saith Pausanias) in one of the Gates of Ephesus called Magnetis, his armed Statue being let over him. Strabo reports that after Androclus had subdued the Ionians (the next Province to Ephesus on the Sea Coast of Asia the less) he enlarged his Dominions upon the Eoles, which joined to Ionis: and that his Posterity governed the Cities of Ephesus and Erythra by the name of Basilida in Strabo his own time. Of the expedition of the Jones how they came hither out of Peloponnusus, I have * spoken already upon occasion of the return of the Heracleids into Peloponnusus, wherein with the Dores, they expelled the Achais, and inhabited their places in that Land: though this of the Jones succeeded that of the Heracleids 100. years.

The City of Ephesus became exceeding famous: First, for the Temple of Diana therein built: which had in length 425. foot, and 220. in breadth, furnished with 127. Pillars of Marble, of 70. foot high: whereof 27. were most curiously graven, and all the rest of choice marble polish, the work being first set out by Ctesiphon of Grossus. Secondly, it became renowned by being one of the first that received the Christian Faith, of which Timothy was Bishop: to whom, and to the Ephesians Saint Paul wrote his Epistles so intitled. The other City posited by Androclus in Aolis was also universally spoken of by reason of Sibylla, surnamed Erythraea: who lived seven hundred and forty years before Christ born. Saint Augustin avoweth that a Roman Proconsul shewed him in an ancient Greek Copy certain verses of this Prophetess: which began (as Saint Augustin changed them into Latin) in these words: Jesus Christus Dei filius Salvator. Jesus Christ Son of God the Saviour.

About the time that Joab belched Rabeca in Moab, Naphres began to govern in Egypt, the same that was Father-in-Law to Salomon, whose Epistles to Salomon, and his to Naphres, are remembered by Eusebius out of Polemon. In the 21. of David, was the City of Magnesia in Asia the less founded, the same which is seated upon the River Meander, where Scipio gave the great overthrow to Antiochus. In this Territory are the best Horses of the lesser Asiabred, whereof Lycan.

Et Magnetis equis, Magna gens cognita remis.

About the same time Cuma in Campania was built by the inhabitants of Chalcis in Euboea, according to Strabo, with whom Strabo joyneth the Come-Strabo ans of Eolis, saying that to the one of these 5. people the government was given, with condition that the other should give name to the City. Of this Cuma was Ephorus the famous Scholar of Ilocrate.

Eusebius and Cassiodor find the building of Carthage at this time, to wit, in the 31. year of David, but much mistaken. For the Father of David was Meinim the Son of Badezor Brother to Jezabel, who married Achab King of Israel; and between the death of David, and the first of Achab, there were waited about 95. years.

In this time also Acasius lived, the second of the Athenian Princes after Cadmus, of which there were thirteen in descent before the State changed into a Magistracy of ten years. Some Writers make it probable that the Asians led by Gyram, the Grand nephew of Oristes, who possessed the City and Island of Lesbos about this time. In the 32. year of David, Hiram began to Reign in Tyre, according to Josephus, who saith that in his twelfth year Salomon began the work of the Temple. But it is a familiar error in Josephus, to misreckon times, which in this point he doth so strangely, as if he knew not how at all to cast any Account. For it is manifest that Hiram sent Messengers, and Cedars to David, soon after his taking of Jerusalem, which was in the very beginning of David's reign over Israel, when as yet he had Reigned only seven years in Hebron, over the House of Juda. Wherefore it must needs be that Hiram had Reigned above 30. years before Salomon; unless more credit should be given to those Tyrian Records which are cited by Josephus, than to the plain words of Scripture contradicting them. For that it was the same Hiram which lived both with David and with Salomon, the Scriptures make it plainly manifest.

CHAP. XVIII.

OF SALOMON.

§. I.

Of the establishing of Salomon : of birth-rights, and of the cause of Adonijah's death, and of Salomon's Wisdom.

Salomon, who was brought up under the Precept Nathan, began to Reign over Juda and Israel, in the year of the World 2391. He was called Salomon by the appointment of God : he was also called Jedaidia : or Theophilus, by Nathan, because the Lord loved him.

Hiram King of Tyre, after Salomon's anointing, dispatched Embassadors toward him, Congratulating his establishment : a custom between Princes very ancient. Whence we read that David did in like fort salute Hannan King of the Ammonites, after his obtaining the Kingdom.

The beginning of Salomon was in blood, though his Reign were peaceable. For soon after David's death, he caused his Brother Adonijah to be slain by Benaiah the Son of Jehoiada, taking occasion from Adonijah's desiring by Bertheba, that the young Maid Achizah, which lay in David's bosom in his latter days, to keep him warm, might be given him. Whatsoever he pretended, it was enough that Adonijah was his elder Brother, and fought the Kingdom contrary to the will of David, whom God inclined towards Salomon. And yet it is said that a word is enough to the wife, and he that fees but the Claw, may know whether it be a Lion or no : so it may seem that to the quick-fighted wisdom of Salomon, this motion of Adonijah's, was a demonstration of a new Treason. For they which had been Concubines to a King, might not after be touched but by a King : whence Achizah withheld Abshalom to take his Fathers Concubines as part of the Royalty. And David after that wrong determining to touch them no more, did not give them to any other, but shut them up, and they remained widowed until their death. And this it seems was the depth of Isbosheth's quarrel against Aner, for having his Fathers Concubine. And some figification of this custom may seem too in the words of God by Nathan to David : I have given thee thy masters house, and thy masters wives. And in the words of Saul, upbraiding Jonathan that he had chosen David to the flame of the nakedness of his Mother. Hereunto perhaps was some reference in this purpose of Adonijah, to marry with her that was always present with David in his latter days, and who belike knew all that was past, for the conveying of the Kingdom to Salomon. There might be divers farther occasions, as either that he would learn such things by her as might be for the advantage of his ambition, or that he would perfwade her to forge some strange tale about David's last Testament, or any thing else that might prejudice the title of Salomon.

As for the right of an elder Brother which Adonijah pretended, though generally it agreed both with the Law of Nations, and with the customs of the Jews : yet the Kings of the Jews were so absolute, as they did therein, and in all else what they pleased. Some examples also they had (though not of Kings) which taught them to use this paternal authority in transferring the birthright to a younger Son : namely of Jacob's inheriting Reuben, and giving the birth-right (which was twice as much as any Portion of the other Brethren) to Joseph : of whom he made two Tribes. And that it was generally acknowledged that this power was in David, it appears by the words of Bertheba and Nathan to David, and of Jonathan to Adonijah. For as for popular election, that it was necessary to confirm, or that the refusal of the people had authority to frustrate the elder Brothers right to the Kingdom, it no where appears in the stories of the Jews. It is said indeed that the people made Saul King at Gilgal : that is, they acknowledged and established him. For that he was King long before no Man can doubt. In like manner elsewhere the phrase of choosing or making the King, is to be expounded : as where in the prohibition, that they should not make themselves a King, it is said, Thou shalt make him King whom the Lord shall chuse.

But to proceed with the Acts of Salomon : at the same time that he put Adonijah to death, he rid himself also of Joab, and three years after of Shimei, as David had advised him : he displaced also the Priest Athabaz, who took part with Adonijah against him : but in respect of his office, and that he followed David in all his afflictions, and because he had born the Ark of God before his Father, he spared his life. And thus being established in his Kingdom, he took the Daughter of Vaphres King of Egypt to Wife : for Jo Eusebius out of Eusepius calls him. He offered a thousand sacrifices at Gibson, where God appearing unto him in a dream, bad him ask what he would at his hands ; Salomon chooseth wisdom, which pleased God. And God said unto him, Because thou hast asked this thing, and hast not asked for thy self long life, neither hast thou asked riches for thy self, nor hast asked the life of thine enemies, behold, I have done according to thy words : by which we may inform our selves what desires are most pleasing to God, and what not. For the coveting after long life, in respect of our selves, cannot but proceed of self-love, which is the root of all impiety : the desire of private riches is an affection of covetousness which God abhorreth : to affect revenge, is as much as to take the Sword out of Gods hand, and to distrust his Justice. And in that it pleased God to make Salomon know that it liked him, that he had not asked the life of his Enemies, it could not but put him in mind of his Brothers slaughter, for which he had not any warrant either from David, or from the Law of God. But because Salomon desired wisdom only, which taught him both to obey God, and to rule Men, it pleased God to give him without that which he desired. And I have also given thee (saith God) that which thou hast not asked, both riches and honour. This gift of Wisdom our Commentators stretch to almost almost all kinds of Learning : but that it comprehended the knowledge of the nature of Plants and living Creatures the Scripture testifieth, though no doubt the chief excellency of Salomon's wisdom, was in the knowledge of governing his Kingdom : whence, as it were for an example of his wisdom, the Scripture telleth how soon he judged the Controversie between the two Harlots.

§. II.

Of Salomon's Buildings and Glory.

He then entred into League with Hiram, King of Tyre, from whom he had much of his Materials, for the King's Pallace and the Temple of God : for the building whereof he had received a double charge, one from his Father David, and another from God. For like as it is written of David that he called Salomon his Son, and charged him to build a House for the Lord God of Israel : so doth Tofmas give the force of a divine Precept to these words, Behold ; a Son is born unto thee, &c. He shall build an House for my Name.

He began the Work of the Temple, in the beginning of the fourth Year of his Reign, at which time also he prepared his Fleet at Esfongaber to trade for Gold in the East Indies, that nothing might be wanting to supply the charge of so great a Work. For that the Temple was in building, while his Fleets were passing to and fro, it is manifest. For the Pillars of the Temple were made of the Abnagim Trees brought from Ophir. Of this most glorious Building, of all the particulars (whereof the Form and Example was given by God himself) many learned Men have written, as Salomon, Montanus, Ribera, Berradas, Acarius, Villalpandus, Fineas, and others, to whom I refer the Reader.

For the cutting and squaring of the Cedars which served that Building, Salomon employed thirty thousand Carpenters, ten thousand every Month by Course : he also aided eighty thousand Masons in the Mountain, and seventy thousand Lasons, boursers that bare Burdens, which, it is conceived, he selected out of the Profelytes, besides three thousand three hundred Makers of his Work, so as he paid and employed in all one hundred eighty three thousand and three hundred Men, in which number the Zidonians which were more skillful in hewing Timber than the Israelites, may (as I think) be included. For Hiram caused his Servants to bring down the Cedars and Firs from Libanon to the Sea, and thence sent them in Rafts to Typp or the next Port to Hierusalem. For in the second of Chronicles the second Chapter, it is plain that all but the thirty thousand Carpenters, and the Overseers, were Strangers, and as it seemeth the Vassals of Hiram, and of Vaphres King of Egypt. In recompence of all this Timber and Stone, Salomon gave Hiram twenty thousand Measures of Wheat, and twenty Measures of pure Oyl yearly. Eusebius out of Eusepius in the ninth Book of his Preparation the last Chapter, hath left us a Copy of Salomon's Letter to Saron (which was the name as Hiram or Hiram) King of Tyre in these words.

REX Salomon Saroni, Tyri, Sydoniis, atque Phoeniciæ regi, Amico paterno salutem. Scia me a Deo magno David patris mei regnum accepisse, cumque mihi pater precepisset templum Deo, qui terram creavit, condere, ut etiam ad te scriberem preceptum : Scribo igitur, & peto a te ut arifices atque fabros ad edificandum Templum Dei mittere velis.

King Salomon to King Saron, of Tyre, Sydon, and Phoenicia King, and my Father's Friend, I greet thee. Thou mayest understand that I have received of the great God of my Father David, the Kingdom : and when my Father commanded me to build a Temple to God which created Heaven and Earth, he commanded also that I should write to you. I write therefore to you, and beseech you, that you would be pleased to send me Artificers and Carpenters to build the Temple of God.

To which the King Saron made this Answer.

Saron, Tyri, Sydoniis, & Phoeniciæ rex, Salomon regi salutem. Lætiis literis gratias ego Deo, qui tibi regnum patris tradidit : & quoniam scribis fabros ministrisque ad condendum Templum esse tibi mittendos, misit ad te milia hominum octoginta, & Architectum Tyrium hominem ex matre Juæa, virum in rebus architectare mirabilem. Carabis igitur ut necessarios non egam, & Templo Dei condito ad reddeam.

Saron of Tyre, Sydon, and Phoenicia King, to King Salomon greeting : when I read your Letters, I gave God thanks, who hath infilled you in your Father's Kingdom. And because you write, that Carpenters and Workmen may be sent to build God's Temple, I have sent unto you fourscore thousand Men, and a Master Builder a Tyrian, born of a Jewish Woman, a Man admirable in Building. You will be careful that all Necessaries be provided for them, and when the Temple of God is built, that they come home to us.

The Copies of these Letters were extant in Josephus's his time as himself affirmeth, and to be seen, faith he, in nostris quam in Tyriorum annalibus, as well in our own as in the Tyrian Annals. But he delivereth them somewhat in different terms, as the Reader may find in his Antiquities. But were this intercorde between Salomon and Hiram either by Message or by Writing, it is somewhat otherwise delivered in the Scriptures, than either Eusepius, or Josephus set it down, but, so that in substance there is little difference between the one and the other.

The like Letter in effect Salomon is said to have written to Vaphres King of Egypt, and was answered as from Hiram.

But whereas some Commentators upon Salomon find that Hiram King of Tyre, and Vaphres King of Egypt, gave Salomon the Title of Rex magnus, and cite Eusepius in Eusebius ; I do not find any such addition of magnus in Eusebius in the last Chapter of that ninth Book ; neither is it in Josephus in the eighth Book and second Chapter of the Jews Antiquities : it being a vain Title used by some of the Assyrian and Persian Kings, and used likewise by the Parthians, and many other after them, in so much as in later times it grew common, and was usurped by mean Persons in respect of the great Hermes the first, which was honoured by that Name for his noble Qualities, as much or more than for his Mightiness.

After the finishing and dedication of the Temple and House of the Lord, Salomon fortified Jerusalem with a treble Wall, and repaired Hera which had been the ancient Metropolis of the Canaanites before Joshua's time : so did he Gaza of the Philistines : he built Bebroun, Gerar and the Millo or Munition Jf. Au. of Hierusalem. For Pharab (as it seemeth in fa. l. 8. c. 23. vour of Hierusalem) came up into the edge of Ephraim, and took Gerar which the Canaanites yet held, and put them to the Sword and burnt their City. The place and Territory he gave Salomon's Wife for a Dowry. And it is probable that because Salomon was then buied in his magnificent Buildings, and could not attend the War, that he entreated his Father-in-Law to rid him of those Neighbours, which Pharaoh performed. But he thereby taught the Egyptians to visit those parts again before they were sent for; and in his Son Rehobam's time Shebäck this Man's Successor did lack Jerusalem its self.

Salomon also built Megiddo in Manasse, on this side Jordan; and Dabab in Dan: also Thadmor, which may be either Ptolema's Thamaron in the Desert of Juda (or as Joseph thinks Palmyra in the Desert of Syria), which Palmyra because it stood on the utmost border of Salomon's Dominion to the North-east of Lisannus, and was of David's Conquest when he was Damascus; it may seem that Salomon therefore bestowed thereon the most Gift, and fortified it with the best Art, that that Age had.

Joseph 1.8. Salomon calls this place Thadmora, by which Name (saith he) given by Salomon, the Syrians as yet call it.

Hiram in his Book of Hebrew places calls it Thermoth. In after-times, when it was rebuilt by Arian the Emperour it was honoured with his Name, and called Arianopolis. In respect of this great Charge of Building Salomon raised Tribute through all his Dominions, besides an hundred and twenty Talents of Gold received from Hiram's Servants, Salomon offered Hiram twenty Towns in or near the upper Gadize, but because they stood in an unfruitful and marshy ground Hiram, refused them, and thereof was the Territory called Chabulil.

These Towns, as it is supposed, lay in Galilee of the Genitiles, Non quid gentes ibi habitant: sed quia Iob ditione regis gentium erat, Non that it was possib. by Genitiles (saith Naclern) but because it was under the rule of a King that was a Genitile. However it were, it is true that Salomon in his twenty first Year fortified those places, which Hiram refused. Further, he made a Journey into Syria Zobab and established his Tributes; the first and last War (if in that Expedition he were driven to fight) that he made in person in all his Life. He then visited the Border of all his Dominions passing from Thadmor to the North of Palmyra, and to the Deserts of Idemaa, from whence he visited Ezion geber and Eloth, the uttermost place of the South of all his Territories, bordering to the Red Sea: which Cities I have defcrib'd in the Story of Moses.

§. III.

Of Salomon's sending to Ophir, and of some seeming contradictions about Salomon's Riches, and of Pineda's conceit of two strange passages about Africk.

Here Salomon prepared his Fleet of Ships for India with whom Hiram joyned in that Voyage, and furnished him with Mariners and Pilots, the Tyrans being of all other the most expert Sammen. from this part of Arabia, which at this time belonged to Edom and was conquered by David, did the Fleet pass on to the East India, which was not far off, namely to Ophir, one of the Islands of the Aluaculac, a place exceeding rich in Gold: witness the Spaniards, who notwithstanding all the abundance which they gather in Peru, do yet plant in those Islands of the East at Manilla; and recover a great quantity from thence, and with less labour than they do in any one part of Peru, or new Spain.

The Return which was made by these Ships amounted to four hundred and twenty Talents, but in the second of Chronicles the eighth, it is written four hundred and fifty Talents: whereof thirty Talents went in expence for the charge of the Fleet, and wages of Men, and four hundred and twenty Talents, which makes five and twenty hundred and twenty thousand Crowns, came clear. And thus must those two places be reconciled. As for the place 1 Reg. 10. 14. which speaketh of six hundred sixty and six Talents of Gold, that Summ, as I take it, is of other Receipts of Salomon's which were yearly, and which came to him besides these Profits from Ophir.

My opinion of the Land of Ophir, that it is not Peru in America (as divers have thought) but a Country in the East Indies; with some reason may at those times they could not make more speedy Return to Jerusalem from the East Indies than in three Years; and that Tharfu in Scripture is divers times taken for the Ocean; hath been already declared in the first Book.

Only it remaineth that I should speak somewhat of Pineda his strange Conceits, who being a Spaniard of Beiza would fain have Gades, or Cadix, in old times called Tariffus, which is the South-west corner of that Province, to be the Tharfu from whence Salomon fetcht his Gold; for no other reason, as it seems, but for love of his own Country, and because of some affinity of sound between Tharfu and Tariffus. For whereas it may seem strange that it should be three Year ere they, that took Ship in the Red Sea, should return from the East Indies to Jerusalem, this hath been in part answered already. And further the intelligent may conceive of sundry lets, in the digging and refining of the Metall, and in their other Traffic, and in their Land-carriages between Jerusalem and the Red Sea, and perhaps also elsewhere: so that we have no need to make Salomon's Men to go many thousand Miles out of their way to Gades, round about all Africk, that so they might be long a coming home.

For the direct way to Gades (which if Salomon and the Italians knew not, the Tyrans which went with them, could not have been ignorant of) was along the Mediterran Sea, and to (besides many wonderful inconveniences and terrible Navigation in rounding Africa) they should have escaped the troublesome Land-carriage between Jerusalem and the Red Sea through dry, desert, and thievish Countries: and within 30. Mile of Jerusalem at Joppe, or some other Haven in Salomon's own Country, have laden and unladen their Ships.

But this direct course they could not hold (saith Pineda) because the huge Island of Atlantis in largeness greater than all Africk and Asia being swallowed up in the Atlantic Ocean hindered Salomon's Ships from passing through the Straits of Gibraltar: for this he allegeth Plato in Timaeus. But that calamity happened about Salomon's time, or that thereby the Straits of Gades were filled with mud and made unpassable, that there could be no coming to Gades by the Mediterran Sea: or that this indraught where the Sea runneth most violently, and most easily fourth his channel, should be filled with mud, and not also the great Ocean in like manner, where this huge Island is supposed to have stood: or that Salomon's Ships being in the Red Sea, should neglect the Golden Mines of the East Indies (which were infinitely better and nearer to the Red Sea, than any in Spain) to seek Gold at Cadix, by the way of compassing Africa, it is most ridiculous to imagine. For the Spaniard himself that hath also the rich Peru in the West, fortifieth in the East Indies and inhabits some part thereof, as in Manilla, finding in those parts no less quantity of Gold (the small Territory which he there possideth considered) than in Peru.

The

The same Pineda hath another strange passage round about all Africa, which elsewhere he dreams of: supposing whereas Tomas failing to Tharfu the City of Gilecia was cast out in the Mediterran Sea, and taken up there by a Whale, that this Whale in three days swimming above twelve thousand English Miles, along the Mediterran Sea, and so through the Straits of Gades, and along all the huge Seas round about Africa, coast up Tomas upon the shore of the Red Sea, that so he might have perhaps some six Miles the shorter (though much the worse) way to Nineve.

This Conceit he grounds only upon the amiguity of the word Sups, which oftentimes is an Epitheton of the Red Sea (as if we should call it mare sups, the Sea full of Weeds) for the Red Sea. But in Job 25. 5. it is generally taken in the proper signification for Weeds, and not as Pineda would have it, who in this place against his own Rule (which elsewhere he giveth us) supposeth strange Miracles without any need. For this long Voyage of the Whale finished in three days, is a greater Miracle, than the very preservation of Tomas in the Belly of the Whale: and therefore seeing there is no necessity of this Miracle, we send it back unto him, keeping his own Rule which in this place he forgets; Miracula non sunt multiplicanda. And again, Non sunt miracula gravia danda, nec pro arbitrio nova fingenda, Miracles are not to be multiplied without necessity, nor delivered without cause, nor feigned at pleasure. Therefore to leave this Man in his Dreams, which (were he not otherwise very learned and judicious) might be thought unworthy the mentioning. But to proceed with our Story of Salomon.

The Queen of Saba's coming from far to Salomon, (as it seems from Arabia Felix, and not as some think from Aethiopia) and her rich Presents, and Salomon's reciprocal magnificence, and his resolving of her difficult Questions, those are set down at large in the text. But herein Josephus is greatly mistaken, who calls this Queen of Saba Nicaeides, the Successor (saith he out of Herodotus) of those thirty and eight Egyptian Kings which succeeded Menes the Founder of Memphis; adding that after this Egyptian, and the Father-in-Law of Salomon, the Name of Pharaoh was left off in Egypt. For as it is elsewhere proved that the Queen was of Arabia, not of Egypt and Aethiopia; so were there other Pharaohs after the Father-in-Law of Salomon. Yea, above three hundred years after Salomon, Pharaoh Necho slew Josias King of Juda.

It is also written of Salomon that he kept in Garrisons fourteen thousand Chariots and twelve thousand Horsemen; that he spent in Court every day thirty Measures of fine Flower, threecore Measures of Wheat, one hundred Sheep, besides Stags and fallow Deer, Bugles and Fowl; four thousand stalls of Horses he had for his Chariots and other uses, and for the twelve thousand Horsemen of his Guard. For, the ten thousand stalls in the first of Kings the fourth, are to be taken but for so many Horses, whence in the second of Chronicles the ninth, it is written but four thousand stalls or teams, and in every team ten Horses, as Jamus and the Geneva understand it. He was said to be wiser than any Man, yea than were Ethan the Ezrahite, than Heman, Chalcal, or than Darda, to which Jamus addeth a fifth, to wit, Ezraick. For the Geneva maketh Ethan an Ezrahite by Nation. Josephus writes them Athan, Aman, Chalcus and Donan the Sons of Hemon. He spake three thousand Proverbs, and his Songs were one thousand and five, whereof either the most part perished in the Captivity of Babylon, or else became many Acts of Salomon's were written and kept among the publick Records of Civil-Cause and not Ecclesiastical; therefore they were not thought needful to be inserted into God's Book.

§. IV.

Of the fall of Salomon, and how long he lived.

NOW as he had plenty of all other things; so he had no scarcity of Women. For besides his seven hundred Wives he kept three hundred Concubines, and (forgetting that God had commanded that none of his People should accompany the daughters of Idolaters) he took Wives out of Egypt, Edom, Mobab, Ammon, Zidon and Heb: and when he fell a doating, his Wives turned his Heart after other Gods, as Asteroth of the Zidonians, Milcom or Molech of the Ammonites, and Chemosh of Mobab.

These things God punished by Adad of Idumea, Rezin of Damascus, and by Jeroboam his own servant, and one of the Masters of his Works, who by the Ordinance of God tare from his Son Rehobam, ten of the twelve parts of all the Territory he had. Deus dim in peccatores amittitveretur, aliorum peccatis vivit, qua ipse non fecit. God in punishing finners, uoeth the sins of others, which he himself is wrought not.

In the Reign of Salomon (as in times of long Peace) were few memorable Actions by him performed, excepting his Buildings with other Works of Magnificence and that great Indian Voyage already mentioned. Forty Years he reigned: how many he lived, it is not written, and must therefore be found only by conjecture. The most likely way to guess at the truth in this case, is by considering the actions of David before and after Salomon's Birth, whereby we may best make estimation of the Years which they consumed, and consequently learn the true, or most likely Year of his Nativity. Seven Years David reigned in Hebron: in his eighth Year he took Jerusalem, and warred with the Philistines, who also troubled him the Year following. The bringing home of the Ark seems to have been in the tenth Year of David, and his intention to build the Temple in the Year ensuing, at which time he had sufficient leisure, living in Heb.

After this he had Wars with the Philistines, Mobabites, Aramites and Edomites, which must needs have held him five Years, considering that the Aramites of Damascus raised War against him, after such time as he had beaten Hadadzer; and that in every of these Wars, he had the entire Victory. Neither is it likely that these Services 2 Sam. occupied any longer time, because in those days, and places there were no Wintering Camps in use, but at convenient seasons of the Year, Kings went forth to War, dispatching all with violence, rather than with temporizing; as maintaining their Armies, partly upon the Spoil of the Enemies Country, partly upon the private Provision which every Soldier made for himself. The 17. Year 1 Sam. of David in which he took Mephisboeth the Son of Jonathan into his Court, appeareth to have passed away in quiet; and the Year following to have begun the War with Ammon; but somewhat late in the end of Summer perhaps, it came to trial of a Battel (for Joab after the Victory, returned immediately to Jerusalem) the cause and preparations for that War having taken up all the Summer. David's personal expedition against the Aramites wherein he brought all the Tributaries of Hadadzer under his own Allegiance, appears manifestly

feltly to have been the next Year's Work, wherein he did cut off all means of Succour from the Ammonites; all Syria, Moab and Idumea being now at his own devotion. By this reckoning it must have been the twentieth Year of David's Reign, and about the fiftieth of his Life, in which he sent forth Joab to besiege Rabbah, and finished the War of Ammon: wherein also fell out the matter of Uriah's Wife. So one half of David's Reign was very prosperous: in the other half he felt great sorrow by the expectation, execution, and sad remembrance of that heavy judgment laid upon him by God, for his foul and bloody offence.

Now very manifest it is that in the Year after the death of that Child, which was begotten in Adultery, Salomon was born, who must needs therefore have been nineteen years old or thereabout, when he began to reign at the decease of his Father, as being begotten in the 21. Year of his Father's Reign, who reigned in all forty.

This account hath also good coherence with the following times of David, as may be collected out of ensuing actions: for two years passed ere Abiath slew his Brother Amnon; three years ere his Father pardoned him; and two years more ere he came into the King's presence. After this he prepared Horses and Men, and laid the Foundation of his Rebellion, which seems to have been one Year's Work. So the Rebellion it self with all that happened thereupon, as the Commotion made by Sheba, the death of Amasa and the rest, may well seem to have been in the thirtieth Year of David's Reign.

Whether the three Years of Famine should be reckoned apart from the last Years of War with the Philistines, or conjoined with them, it were more hard than needful to conjecture. Plain enough it is, that in the ten remaining Years of David there was time sufficient, and to spare, both for three Years of Famine, for four years of War, and for numbing the People, with the Pestilence ensuing; as also for his own last infirmity, and disposing of the Kingdom. Yet indeed it seems that the War with the Philistines, was but one Year's Work, and ended in three or four Fights, of which the two or three former were at Gob or Nob near unto Gether, and the last at Gath. This War the Philistines undertook, as it seemeth, upon confidence gathered out of the Tumults in Israel, and perhaps emboldened by David's old Age, for he fainted now in the Battel, and was afterwards hindered by his Men from exposing himself unto danger any more. So David had fix or seven Years of rest, in which time it is likely, that many of his great Men of War died (being of his own Age) whereby the stirring Spirit of Achanab found little Succour in the broken Party of Joab the Son of Zeruiah.

At this time it might both truly be said by David to Salomon, Thou art a wise Man, and by Salomon to God, I am but a young Child; for nineteen Years of Age might well agree with either of these two Speeches.

Nevertheless there are some that gather out of Salomon's professing himself a Child, that he was but eleven years old when he began to reign. Of these Rabbis Salomon seems the first Author, whom others of great learning and judgment have herein followed: grounding themselves perhaps upon that which is said of Abiath's Rebellion, that it was after forty years, which they understand as years of David's Reign. But whereas Rehoboam the Son of Salomon was one and forty years old when he began to reign, it would follow hereby that his Father had begotten him, being himself but a Child of nine or ten years old; the difference between their Ages being no greater, (if Salomon who reigned forty years) were but eleven years old when his Reign began. To avoid this inconvenience, Josephus allows eighty years of Reign to Salomon; a report so disagreeing with the Scriptures, that it needs no confutation. Some indeed have in favour of this Opinion construed the words of Josephus, as if they included all the Years of Salomon's Life. But by such reckoning he should have been forty years old at his Father's death; and consequently should have been born long before his Father had won Jerusalem; which is a manifest untruth. Wherefore the forty years remembered in Abiath's Rebellion, may either seem to have reference to the space between David's first Anointment, and the trouble which God brought upon him for his wickedness, or perhaps be read (according to Josephus, Theodoret, and the Latine Translation) four years; which passed between the return of Abiath to Jerusalem and his breaking out.

§. V.

Of Salomon's Writings.

There remain of Salomon's Works, the Proverbs, the Preacher, and the Song of Salomon. In the first he teacheth good Life, and correcteth Manners, in the second the vanity of Humane Nature, in the third he fingeth as it were the Epithalamion of Christ and his Church. For the Book intituled the Wisdom of Salomon, (which some give unto Salomon, and some make the elder Philo the Author thereof;) Hierome and many others of the best learned make us think it was not Salomon that wrote it. Stylus libri Sapientia (saith Hierom) qui Salomonis est, interpres, Græcæ redolens eloquentiam; The Style of the Book of Wisdom, which is ascribed to Salomon, savoureth of the Græcian Eloquence; and of the same Opinion was S. Augustine, and yet he confesseth in the nineteenth Book and twentieth Chapter of the City of God, that the Author of that Book hath a direct fore-telling of the Passion of Christ in these words. Circumveniamus justum quoniam insuavis est nobis, &c. Let us circumvent the righteous for he is unpleasing to us, he is contrary to our doing; he checketh us for offending against the Law, he makes his boast to have the knowledge of God, and he calleth himself the Son of the Lord, &c. and so doth the course of all the following words point directly at Christ. The Books of Ecclesiastes, Proverbs, and Cantica Canticorum, Rabbi Moses Kimchi ascribeth to Hiy the Prophet. Saïdas and Cedreus report that Salomon wrote of the Remedies of all Diseases, and graved the same on the sides of the Porch of the Temple, which they say Esdras pulled down, because the People neglected giving help from God by Prayer, repaired thither for their recoveries.

Of Salomon's Books of Invocations and Incantments to cure Diseases, and expel evil Spirits, Josephus hath written at large, though as I conceive, rather out of his own invention, or from some uncertain report, than truly.

He also speaketh of one Eliazarus, who by the Root in Salomon's Ring disposeth divers persons of evil Spirits in the presence of Vespasian, and many others, which I will not stand to examine.

Certainly so strange an example of humane frailty hath never been read of as this King: who having received wisdom from God himself, in honour of whom, and for his only service, he built the

the first and most glorious Temple of the World: he that was made King of Israel and Judea, not by the Law of nature, but by the love of God, and became the wisest, richest, and happiest of all Kings, did in the end, by the perfwation of a few weak and wretched idolatrous Women, forget and forsake the Lord of all the World, and the giver of all goodness, of which he was more liberal to this King, than to any that ever the World had. Of whom Strabo writeth in this manner. Salomon reigned in a peaceable time and was glorious; for God made all quiet round about, that he might build a house in his name, and prepare the Sanctuary for ever; then wife wast thou in thy youth, and wast filled with understanding, as with a Flood! Thy mind covered the whole earth, and hath filled it with grave and dark sentences. Thy name went abroad in the Isles, and for thy peace thou wast beloved, &c. but thus he concluded. Thou didst love thy Lays to Women, and wast overcome by thy body, thou didst stain thine honour, and hast defiled thy posterity, and hast brought wrath upon thy Children, and felt sorrow for thy folly. Cap. 27.

§. VI.

Of the Contemporaries of Salomon.

Near the beginning of Salomon's reign, Agassus the third of the Heracids in Corinth; Labares in Lacedæmon; and soon after Syllus Alpha the fourth of the Syllas, swayed those Kingdoms: Laophanes the second and third Princes after Cadmus, ruling the Athenians.

In the fix and twentieth of Salomon's reign Hiram of Tyre died, to whom Bahiastrus succeeded, and reigned seventeen years, after Mercator's account, who reckons the time of his rule by the age of his Sons. Josephus gives him fewer years. Ant. lib. 9. Theophilus Antiochensis against Antiochus finds Bozarius the next after Hiram, if there be not some Kings omitted between the death of Hiram, and the reign of Bozarius.

Vapores being dead, about the twentieth of Salomon, Sefac or Shisak (as our English Geneva terms him) began to govern in Egypt, being the same with him whom Diodorus calleth Sefachis; Josephus, Sufac; Cedreus, Susephus; Eusebius in the column of the Egyptian Kings Smeades, and in that of the Hebrews Sefac. Josephus in the eight of his Antiquities reproveheth it as an error in Herodotus, that he ascribeth the acts of Sufac to Sefisris, which perchance Herodotus might have done by comparison, accounting Sefac another Sefisris, for the great things he did.

Of the great acts and virtues of King Sefisris I have spoken already in the Story of the Egyptian Princes: only in this he was reproved that he caused four of his captive Kings to draw his Caroch, when he was disposed to be seen, and to ride in triumph: one of which four, saith Eusebius, at such time as Sefisris was carried out to take the Air, cast his head continually back upon the two fore-most wheels next him; which Sefisris perceiving, asked him what he found worthy the admiration in that motion; to whom the captive King answered, that in those he beheld the infatigability of all worldly things; for that both the lowest part of the wheel was suddenly carried about, and became the highest, and the upmost part was as suddenly turned down-ward and under all: which when Sefisris had judiciously weighed, he dismissed those Princes, and all other from the like servitude in the future. Of this Sefisris, and that he could not be taken for Sefac, I have spoken at large in that part of the Egyptian Kings preceding.

CHAP. XIX.

Of Salomon's Successors until the end of Jehoshaphat.

§. I.

Of Rehoboam his beginnings: the defection of the ten Tribes, and Jeroboam's Idolatry.

Rehoboam the Son of Salomon by Nabhama an Ammonitess, now forty years old, succeeded his Father Salomon, and was anointed at Sichem, where the ten Tribes of Israel were assembled: where attended a while the return of Jeroboam as yet in Egypt, since he had fled thither, leaving Salomon. After his arrival the people presented a Petition to Rehoboam, to be eased of those great Tributes laid on them by his Father. Sic enim firmum ei fore Imperium, si famam mallet quam metum; So should his Empire (saith Josephus) be more assured if he desired rather to be beloved than feared: whereof he took three days to deliberate before his answer, of whom therefore it could not be said as of David, that he was wiser than all his Teachers. For as of himself he knew not how to resolve, so had he not the judgment to discern of counsels, which is the very test of wisdom in Princes, and in all Men else. But notwithstanding that he had consulted with those grave and advised Men, that served his Father, who perfwaded him by all means to satisfy the multitude: he was transported by his familiars and favorites, not only to continue on the backs of his Subjects those burdens which greatly crucified them; but (vaunting fully of greatness exceeding his Fathers) he threatened in sharp, or rather in terrible terms, to lay yet heavier, and more unportable loads on them. But as it appeared by the success, those younger advisers greatly mistook the nature of severity, which without the temper of clemency is no other than cruelty itself: they also were ignorant that it ought to be used for the help, and not for the harm of Subjects. For what is the strength of a King left by his people? and what cords or fetters have ever lasted long, but those which have been twisted and forged by love only; His wildes parasites could well judge of the Kings disposition: and being well learned therein, though ignorant in all things else, it sufficed and enabled them sufficiently for the places they held. But this answer of Rehoboam did not a little advance Jeroboam's designs. For being fore-told by the Prophet Achab of his future advancement, these the Kings threats (changing the peoples love into fury) continued and gave courage to his hopes. For he was no sooner arrived, than elected King of Israel: the people crying out, What portion have we in David? we have no inheritance in the Son of David. Now though themselves, even all the Tribes of Israel, had consented to David's anointing at Hebron the second time, acknowledging that they were his bones and his flesh: yet now after the manner of Rebels, they forgot both the bonds of nature, and their duty to God, and, as all alienated resolved hearts do, they served themselves for the present with impudent excuses. And now overlate, and after time, Rehoboam sent Adoram, one of the Taxers of the people, a Man most hateful to all his Subjects, to pacify them: whom they instantly beat to death with stones. Whereupon the King affrighted, got him from Sichem with all speed, and recovered Jerusalem, where preparing to invade Israel, with an hundred and four-score thousand chosen Men, Shemai in the person of God commanding to the contrary, all was failed for the present. In the mean time Jeroboam the new King fortified Sichem on this side, and Peniel on the other side of Jordan; and fearing that the Union and exercise of one Religion would also j-j-y the peoples hearts again to the House of David; and having in all likelihood also promised the Egyptians to follow their Idolatry: he set up two Calves of Gold for the Children of Israel to worship, impiously perverting them that those were the Gods, or at least by these he represented those Gods, which delivered them out of Egypt: and refusing the service of the Levites, he made Priests fit for such gods. It must needs be that by banishing the Levites which served David and Solomon through all Israel, Jeroboam greatly enriched himself: as taking into his hands all those Cities which were given them by Moses and Joshua; for as it is written, The Levites left their suburbs, and their possession, and came to Juda, &c. This irreligious policy of Jeroboam (which was the foundation of an Idolatry that never could be rooted out, until Israel for it was rooted out of the Land) was by prophecy and miracles impugned sufficiently when it first began, but the afflictions maintaining it, were so strong that neither Prophecy nor Miracle could make them yield. Jeroboam could not be moved now by the authority of Aha, who from the Lord had first promised him the Kingdom; nor by the withering of his own hand as he stretched it over the Altar, which also clave a funder, according to the sign, which the Man of God had given by the commandment of God, who again recovered and cured him of that defect; yet he continued as obstinate an Idolater as before, for he held it the safest course in policy to proceed as he had begun. This impious invention of Jeroboam, who forsook God, and the Religion of his forefathers, by God and his Ministers taught them, was by a modern Historian compared with the policies of late Ages, observing well the practice of his Nation, being an Italian born. Sic qui hodie (saith he) politici vocantur, & propria commoda, presentemque utilitatem sibi tantum ultimum finem constituent, causam quam vocant statim in capite omnium ponunt: pro ipsa tuenda, promovenda, conservanda, amplianda, nihil non faciendum putant. Sinjuria proximo irroganda, si justitia honestatis, leges subvertenda, si religio ipsa pessandanda, si denique omnia jura divina, & humana violanda, nihil intencant, nihil per fas nefasque relinquendum censent, cuncta ruunt, omnia pereunt, nihil ad ipsos, modo illi, quod ere sua esse sibi persuadent, obtineant, ac si nulliusque tui talia curat, assidue possit Deus; So they who are now called Politicians, propounding to themselves, as their utmost end and scope, their own commodity and present profit, are wont to allege the ease of state forsooth, as the principal point to be regarded: for the good of the state, for advancing, preserving, or encreasing of the state, they think they may do any thing. If they mean to oppress their neighbours, to overturn all laws of justice and honesty, if religion is self must go to wrack, yet if all rights of God and Man must be violated, they will try all courses, be it right, be it wrong, they will do any thing; let all go to ruin, what care they, so long as they may have what they would; as who should say, there were no God that would offer to meddle in such matters, or had power to correct them.

Indeed this allegation of ragione dello stato, did serve as well to uphold, as at the first it had done to bring in this vile Idolatry of the ten Tribes. Upon this ground Amasia the Priest of Bebel, Amos 7, rebuffed the Prophet Amos, not to prophesie at Bebel; For (saith he) it is the Kings Court. Up 2 Kings 16, on this ground even Jehu that had maliced the Priests of Baal, in zeal for the Lord, yet would not in any wise depart from that politics fit to Jeroboam the Son of Nebat, which made Israel to sin. It was reason of state that perwaded the last famous French King Henry the fourth to change his religion; yet the Protestants whom he forsook obeyed him, but some of the Papists whom he followed murdered him. So strongly doth the painted vizor of wife proceeding delude even those that know the foul face of impiety lurking under it, and behold the wretched ends that have ever followed it; whereof Jehu and all the Kings of Israel had, and were themselves, very great examples.

§. II.

Of Rehoboam his impiety; for which he was punished by Sefac: of his end and Contemporaries.

While Jeroboam was occupied in setting up his new Religion, Rehoboam on the other side having now little hope to recover the Provinces lost, strengthened the principal places remaining with all endeavour: for he fortified and victualled fifteen Cities of Judah and Benjamin: not that he feared Jeroboam alone, but the Egyptians; to whom Jeroboam had not only fastened himself, but withal invited them to invade Judaea: laying perance before them the incountable riches of David and Solomon, which might now easily be had, seeing ten of the twelve Tribes were revolted, and become enemies to the Judaeans. So as by those two ways (Of late years often trodden) to wit, change of religion, and invitation of foreign force, Jeroboam hoped to settle himself in the seat of Israel, whom yet the powerful God for his Idolatry in a few years after rooted out with all his. Rehoboam also having, as he thought, by fortifying divers Places, allured his estate, forsook the Law of the living God, and made high Places, and Images, and Groves on every Hill, and under every green Tree.

And therefore in the fifth year of his reign, Sefac or Shishac before spoken of, being now King of Egypt, and with whom as well Adad of Idumaea, as Jeroboam, were familiar and his instruments, entered Judaea with twelve thousand Chariots, and threecore thousand Horse, besides foot-men, which Josephus numbers at four hundred thousand. This Army was compounded of four Nations, Egyptians, Libeans, Suceans, and Canites. The Libeans were Lybians, the next bordering Region to Egypt, on the West side. The Canites were were of Petrae, and of the Desert Arabia, which afterward followed Zerah against Aha King of Juda. The Suceans, according to Tannus his opinion, were of Succoth, which signifieth Tents: he doth suppose that they were the Troglodites, mentioned often in Pliny, Ptolemy, and other Authors. The Troglodites inhabited not far from the banks of the red Sea, in 22. degrees from the line Northward about fix hundred English mile from the Gulf and Maritimate part of Egypt; and therefore I do not think that the Suceans or Suceas were those Troglodites, but rather those asirabians which Ptolemy calls Arabes Egyptii or Ischryphagi, which pollets that part of Egypt between the Mountains called Abdalarim, and the Red Sea far nearer Egypt, and ready to be levied than those removed Savages of the Troglodites.

With this great and powerful Army, Sefac invaded Judaea, and (besides many other strong Cities) went Jerusalem it self, of which, and of the Temple, and Kings house, he took the spoil, carrying away (besides other Treasures) the golden shields which Salomon had made, in imitation of those which David recovered from Adadzer, in the Syrian War: these Rehoboam supplied with Targets of Brals, which were fit enough to guard a King of his quality: whom Siracides calleth The foolishness of the people.

From this time forward the Kings of Egypt claimed the sovereignty of Judaea, and held the Jews as their Tributaries: Sefac, as it seems, rendering up to Rehoboam his places on that condition. So much may be gathered out of the Words of God, where promising the deliverance of Juda after their humiliation, he doth notwithstanding leave them under the yoke of Egypt, in these words. Nevertheless they (to wit, the Judaeans) shall be his Servants, that is, the Servants of Sefac.

After this overthrow and dishonour, Rehoboam reigned twelve years, and his losses received by Sefac notwithstanding, he continued the War against Jeroboam all his life time. After his death Jeroboam governed Israel four years.

Rehoboam lived 58. years, and reigned 17. his story was written at large by Shemuel and Hidolan the Prophets, but the same perished with that of Nathan and the rest.

With Rehoboam, Archippus, and Tersippus, the third and fourth Archbishops or Governors for life after Cadmus, governed in Athens. Abdastartus or Abdastartus, in Tyre. Doristhus the fifth of the Heracleids in Sparta, according to Eusebius (others make him the sixth) and Primianus the fourth in Corinth. Over the Latines reigned Sylvius Alba and Sylvius Alys, the fourth and fifth of the Sylvii.

About the 12. of Rehoboam Abdastartus King of Tyre was murdered by his Nurses Sons, or foster brethren, the elder of which usurped the Kingdom twelve years.

Towards his latter times Pericladet, or Pyrrhidet, began to govern Affrica, the 34. King thereof: and not long after Asturnus the Son of Balestarnus recovered the Kingdom of Tyre from the Ussurpers.

§. III.

Of the great battail between Jeroboam and Abijah, with a Corollary of the examples of Gods Judgment.

Abijah the Son of Rehoboam, inherited his Fathers Kingdom, and his vices. He raised an Army of four hundred thousand, with which he invaded Jeroboam, who encountered him with a double number of eight hundred thousand; both Armies joined near to the Mount Ephraim, where Jeroboam was utterly overthrowen, and the strength of Israel broken; for there fell of that side five hundred thousand, the greatest overthrow that ever was given or received of those Nations. Abijah being now master of the field, recovered Beibet, Jelhanab, and Ephron, soon after which discomfited, Jeroboam died: who reigned in all 22. years. Abijah, the better to strengthen himself, entered into league with Hefian, the third of the Adads of Syria; as may be gathered out of the 2. of Chron. he reigned but three years and then died: the particulars of his acts were written by Iado the Prophet, as some part of his Fathers were.

Here we see how it pleased God to punish the Sins of Salomon in his Son Rehoboam: first, by an Idolater and a Traitor: and then by the successor of that Egyptian, whose daughter Salomon had married, thereby the better to assure his estate, which while he served God, was by God assured against all and the greatest neighbouring Kings; and when he forsook him, it was torn asunder by his meanest Vassals; Not that the Father wanted strength to defend him from the Egyptian Sefac. For the Son Abijah was able to levy four hundred thousand Men, and with the same number he overthrow eight hundred thousand Israelites, and slew of them five hundred thousand. God giving Spirit, courage, and invention, when and where it pleaseth him. And as in those times the causes were express, why it pleased God to punish both Kings and their People: the same being both before and at the instant delivered by Prophets; so the same just God who liveth and governeth all things for ever, doth in these our times give victory, courage, and discouragement, raise, and throw down Kings, Estates, Cities, and Nations, for the same offences which were committed of old, and are committed in the present: for which reason in these and other the afflictions of Israel, always the causes are set down, that they might be as precedents to succeeding ages. They were punished with famine in David's time for three years, for Saul and his bloody house, &c. And David towards his latter end suffered all sorts of afflictions, and sorrows in effect, for Uriah. Salomon had ten Tribes of twelve torn from his Son for his Idolatry. Rehoboam was spoiled of his riches and honour by Sefac of Egypt, because the people of Juda made images, high places and groves, &c. And because they suffered Sodomites in the land. Jeroboam was punished in himself and his posterity for the Golden Calves that he erected. Jeram had all his Sons slain by the Philistines, and his very bowels torn out of his body by an excoriating flux, for murdering his brethren. Ahab and Tezabel were slain, the blood of the one, the body of the other eaten with dogs: for the false accusing and killing of Naboth. So also hath God punished the same and the like sins in all after times, and in these our days by the same Famine, Plagues, War, Iust, vexation, death, sickness, and calamities, howsoever the wife Men of the World raise their effects no higher than to second causes, and such other accidents, which, as being next their eyes and ears, seem to them to work every alteration that happeneth.

§. IV.

Of Ala and his Contemporaries.

TO Ashab succeeded Ala, who enjoyed peace for his first ten years, in which time he established the Church of God, breaking down the Altars dedicated to strange Gods, with their Images, cutting down their groves, and taking away their high places. He also spared not his own Mother who was an Idolatress, but deposing her from her Regency, brake her Idol, stamp it, and burnt it. He also fortified many Cities and other places, providing (as provident Kings do) for the troubles of War in the leisure of peace. For not long after he was invaded by Zerah, who then commanded all the Arabians bordering Juda, and with such a multitude entered the Territory of Ala, as (for any thing that I have read) was never assembled of that Nation either before or since. For it is written, that there came against the Judeans Zerah of Ashub with an host of ten hundred thousand, and three hundred Chariots, which Ala encountered with an Army of five hundred and fourscore thousand, levied out of those two Tribes of Juda and Benjamin which obeyed him, and with which he overthrew this fearful multitude, and had the spoil both of their Cities and Camp.

That this Zerah was not an Ashubian I have proved already, and were it but the length between Ashub and Juda, and the strong flourishing Regions of Aegypt interjacent (who would not suffer a million of strangers to pass through them) it were sufficient to make it appear how foolish the opinion is that these invaders were Ashubians. But in that the Scriptures acknowledge that Zerah was belonging to Zerah, and the Cities thereabouts were spoiled by the Judeans: in following their Victory, as places belonging to Zerah, and that all Men know that Zerah standeth upon the torrent of Bezor, which David pass'd over when he surprised the Amalekites or Arabians, this proveth sufficiently that Zerah was leader of the Arabians, and that Zerah was a frontier Town standing on the uttermost South-border of all Juda, from all parts of Ethiopia six hundred miles. Also the spoils which Ala took, as the Cattel, Camels, and Sheep, whereof he sacrificed five thousand, shew them to be Arabians adjoining, and not far off, and not unknown Ashubians. And if it be objected that these desert Countries can hardly yield a million of Men fit for the Wars, I answer, that it is like that Arabia Petrea, and Bacia the fifth King of the same race in Corinth, of whom his Successors were afterward called Bacidae. Ashurim and Ashurim were Kings in Tyre. Ashurim took revenge on his Brother Phelites, for the murder of Ishobab Priest of the Goddess Astarte, whom Salomon in dotage worshipped. Ary and Capy ruled the Latin. Pyrithides and Ophreatus the Assyrians: Terpsippus and Phorban the Athenians: Chemis Reigned in Aegypt, who dying in the 36. year of Ala, left Corsus his Successor that Reigned fifty six years, even to the 16. of Jos.

Baalha a King of Israel, began to Reign in the third of Ala, and fearing the greatness of Ala after his great Victory, entertained Benhadad King of Syria, of the race of Adadexer, to join with him against Ala; and to the end to block him up, he fortified Rama which lieth in the way from Jerusalem towards Samaria.

This War began according to the Letter of the Scriptures in the 26. year of Ala his Reign: but Clin, because in the first of Kings the 16. it is said that Baalha died in the 26. year of Ala, therefore could not Baalha begin this War in the 35. of Ala his Reign, but in the 35. year of the division of Juda and Israel: for so many years it was from the first of Rehobam, who reigned 17. years, to the 16. of Ala. It may seem strange that Ala being able to bring into the field an Army of five hundred and fourscore thousand good Soldiers, did not easily drive away Baalha, and defeat him of his purposes, the victories of Ala against Jeroboam, and of Ala himself against Zerah being yet fresh in mind, which might well have emboldened the men of Juda and as much disheartened the enemies. Questionless there were some important Circumstances, omitted in the Text, which caused Ala to fight at this time with money. It may be that the employment of so many hundred thousands of hands in the late service against Zerah, had caused many Mens private businesses to lie undisturbed, whereby the people being now intentive to the culture of their Lands and other Trades, might be unwilling to stir against the Israelites, chusing rather to wink at apparent inconvenience, which the building of Rama would bring upon them in after-times. Such backwardness of the people might have deterred Ala from adventuring himself with the least part of his Forces, and committing the success to the hands of God. Howsoever it were, he took the Treasures remaining in the Temple, with which he waged Benhadad the Syrian against Baalha, whose employments Benhadad readily accepted, and brake off confederacy with Baalha. For the Israelites were his borderers and next neighbors, whom neither himself (after his invasion) nor his Successors after him ever gave over till they had made themselves masters of that Kingdom. So Benhadad being now entered into Nephthim without resistance, he spoiled diverse principal Cities thereof, and enforced Baalha to quit Rama, and to leave the same to Ala with all the materials which he had brought thither, to fortify the same: which done Benhadad who loved neither party, being laden with the spoils of Israel, and the Treasures of Juda, returned to Damascus. After this, when Hanani the Prophet reprehended Ala in that he now relied on the strength of Syria, and did not rest himself on the favour and assistance of God, he not only caused Hanani to be imprisoned, but he began to burden and oppress his people, and was therefore stricken with the grievous pains of the Gout in his Feet, wherewith after he had been two years continually tormented, he gave up the Ghost when he had Reigned 41. years.

There lived with Ala Agesilau the sixth of the Heracleids, and Bacis the fifth King of the same race in Corinth, of whom his Successors were afterward called Bacidae. Ashurim and Ashurim were Kings in Tyre. Ashurim took revenge on his Brother Phelites, for the murder of Ishobab Priest of the Goddess Astarte, whom Salomon in dotage worshipped. Ary and Capy ruled the Latin. Pyrithides and Ophreatus the Assyrians: Terpsippus and Phorban the Athenians: Chemis Reigned in Aegypt, who dying in the 36. year of Ala, left Corsus his Successor that Reigned fifty six years, even to the 16. of Jos.

§. V.

Of the great alteration falling out in the Ten Tribes during the Reign of Ala.

IN the Reign of Ala, the Kingdom of Israel felt great and violent Comotions, which might have reduced the Ten Tribes unto their former Allegiance to the house of David, if the wisdom of God had not otherwise determined. The wickedness of Jeroboam had, in his latter days, the sentence of heavy Vengeance laid upon it, by the mouth of Abia, the same Prophet which had foretold the division of Israel, for the sin of Salomon, and his reign over the Ten Tribes. One Son Jeroboam had, among others, in whom only God found so much piety, as (though it sufficed not to withhold him his wrath from that Family) it procured unto him a peaceable end; an honourable Testimony of the peoples love, by their general Mourning and Lamentation at his death; and (wherein he was most happy) the favourable approbation of God himself.

After the loss of this good Son, the ungodly Father was soon taken away: a miserable Creature, so conscious of his vile unthankfulness to God, that he durst not suffer his own name to be used in consulting with an holy Prophet, assured of the ruin hanging over him and his, yet Gods extreme hatred; yet forbearing to destroy those accursed Idols that wrought his confusion. So loth he was to forsake his worldly wisdom, when the World was ready to forsake him, and all belonging to him, his hateful memory excepted.

Nadab the Son of Jeroboam, Reigned in the second and third years of Ala, which are reckoned as two years, though indeed his Fathers last year of two and twenty did run along (how far is uncertain) with the second of Ala, whose third year was the first of Baalha; so that perhaps this Nadab enjoyed not his Kingdom one whole year. He did not alter his Fathers courses, neither did God alter his sentence. It seems that he little feared the judgments denounced against his Fathers house: for as a Prince that was secure of his own Estate, he armed all Israel against the Philistines, and besieged one of their Towns. There (whether it were so, that the people were offended with his ill success, and recalled to mind their grievous loss of five hundred thousand under Jeroboam, counting it an unlucky Family to the Nation; or whether by some particular indiscretion, he exasperated them) in he was by Baalha, whom the Army did willingly accept for King in his stead. Baalha was no sooner proclaimed King, than he began to take order with the house of Jeroboam, that none of them might molest him, putting all of them without mercy, to the Sword. That he did this for private respects, and not in regard of Gods will to have it so, it is evident, by his continuing in the same form of Idolatry which Jeroboam had begun. Wherefore he received the same sentence from God that had been laid upon Jeroboam: which was executed upon him also in the same sort. He began to infect Ala, by fortifying Ramah; but was diverted from thence by the Syrian Benhadad, who did waste his Country, destroying all the Land of Nephthim. Four and twenty years he reigned: and then dying, left the Crown to Ela his Son; who enjoyed it, as Nadab the Son of Jeroboam had done, two years current, perhaps not one complete.

§. V.

Ela was as much an Idolater as his Father: and withal a riotous person. He sent an Army against Gebethon, the same Town of the Philistines, before which Nadab the Son of Jeroboam perished; but he fate at home the whilst feasting and drinking with his Minions, whereby he gave such advantage against himself, as was not neglected: Zimri, an ambitious Man, remaining with the King at Tirza, finding his Master so dissolute, and his behaviour so contemptible, conceived hope of the like fortune as Baalha had found, by doing as Baalha had done. Wherefore he did let upon Ela in his drunkenness, and slew him. Presently upon which fact, he titled himself King of Israel: and began his Reign with Maligning all the house of Baalha; extending his cruelty not only to his Children, and kinsfolk, but unto all his friends in Tirza. These news were quickly blown to the Camp at Gebethon, where they were not welcomed according to Zimri his expectation. For the Soldiers instead of proclaiming him King, proclaimed him Traitor: and being led by Omri, whom they faltered King, they (quitting the Siege of Gebethon) presented themselves before Tirza; which in short space they may seem to have forced. Zimri wanting strength to defend the City, not courage to keep himself from falling alive into his enemies hands, did let fire on the Palace: consuming it and himself together to ashes. Seven days he is said to have Reigned: accounting (as is most likely) to the time that Omri was proclaimed in the Camp. For Zimri was also an Idolater, Walking in the way of Jeroboam; and therefore is likely to have had more time wherein to declare himself, than the Reign of seven days, and those consumed partly in murdering the friends of Baalha, partly in seeking to have defended his own life. After the death of Ela, there arose another King to oppose the faction of Omri; whereby it may seem, that Zimri had made his party strong, as being able to let up a new head, who doubtless would never have appeared, if there had not been ready to his hand, some strength, not unlikely to resist and vanquish the Army which maintained Omri. How long this Tibni, the new Competitor of Omri, held out, I do not find; only it appears that his side was decay'd, and so he died, leaving no other Successor than his concurrent.

§. VI.

A conjecture of the cause hindring the re-union of Israel with Juda, which might have been effected by these troubles.

ANy Man that shall consider the state of Israel, in those times, may justly wonder how it came to pass, that either the whole Nation, wearied with the calamities already suffered under these unfortunate Princes, and with the present Civil Wars, did not return to their ancient Kings, and reunite themselves with the mighty Tribes of Juda and Benjamin; or that Zimri and Tibni, with their oppressed factions, did not call in Ala, but rather chose, one to endure a desperate necessity of yielding, or burning himself, the other to languish away, a Man forsaken: than to have recourse unto a remedy, so sure, so ready, and so honourable. To say that God was pleased to have it so, were a true, but an idle answer (for his secret will is the cause of all things) unless it could be proved, that he had forbidden Ala to deal in that business, as he forbade Rehobam to force the rebellious people to obedience. That the restraint laid by God upon Rehobam, did only bind his hands hands from attempting the suppression of that present Infection, it appears by the War continued between Isaac and Juda, to many years following: wherein Isaac so far prevailed, that he was a great Battel, and recovered some Towns belonging to the other Tribes, which he annexed to his own Dominion. Wherefore we may boldly look into the second causes, moving the People and Leaders of the ten Tribes, to suffer any thing under new upstarts, rather than to cast their eyes upon that Royal House of David, from which the succession of five Kings in lineal descent, had taken away all imputation, that might formerly have been laid upon the mean beginnings thereof. To think that Omeri had prevented his Competitor in making Peace with Afa, were a conjecture more bold than probable. For Omeri was not only an Idolater, but did worse than all that were before him, which as it might serve alone to prove, that Afa, being a godly King, would not adhere to him, so the course which he professed to take at the very first, of revenging the Massacre committed upon the Family and Friends of Baasha, (Afa's his mortal Enemy) gives manifest reason, why Zimri, who had wrought that great execution, should more justly than he have expected the Friendship of Juda in that Quarrel. Wherefore, in searching out the reason of this backwardness in the ten Tribes (which was such that they may seem to have never thought upon the matter) to submit themselves to their true Princes; it were not amiss to examine the causes, moving the People to revenge the death of Eli, an idle drunkard, rather than of Nadab the Son of *Ieroboa*m, who followed the Wars in Person, as a Man of Spirit and Courage. Surely it is apparent, that the very first defection of the ten Tribes, was (if we look upon humane Reason) occasioned by desire of breaking that heavy yoke of bondage wherewith Salomon had galled their Necks. Their desire was to have a King that should not oppress them: not to have no King at all. And therefore when the arrogant folly of Rehoboam had caused them to renounce him, they did immediately choose *Ieroboa*m in his stead, as a Man likely to afford that Liberty unto them, for which he had contended in their behalf. Neither were they (as it seems) herein altogether deceived. For his affection of Popularity appears in his building of decayed Towns, and in the infinitution of his new devised Idols, where he told the People, that it was too much for them, to travel so far as to Jerusalem. But whether it were so, that his moderation, being voluntary, began to cease, towards the latter end of his Reign, and in the Reign of his Son, when long time of possession had confirmed his Title, which at the first was only good by courtesy of the People: or whether the People (as often happens in such cases) were more offended by some Privileges of a King that he still retained in his own hands, than pleased with his remission of other Burdens: it is clearly apparent, that the whole Army of all Isaac joined with Baasha, taking in good part the death of Nadab; and eradication of *Ieroboa*m's House.

Now the Reign of Baalsha himself, was (for ought that remaineth in Writing of it) every way unfortunate; his labour and cost at Rama was cast away; the other side of his Kingdom harried by the Syrians; neither did he win that one Town of Gibbeton from the Philistins; but left that Bu-finefs to his Son, who likewise appears an unprofitable flugard. Wherefore it muft needs be, that the favour of the People toward the Houfe of Baalsha grew from his good Form of Civil Government, which happily he reduced to a more temperate, meddled than Jeroboam ever meant to do. And surely he that shall take pains to look into those examples, which are extant of the different courses, held by the Kings of Israel and Judah, in administration of Justice, will find it most probable, that upon this ground it was that the ten Tribes continued to averre from the Line of David: as to think all adversity more tolerable than the weighty aspect of that House. For the death of Yashasui was Shame, and Jeroboam was preferred; yet in that they suffered it without force or compulsion, they suffered like unto Men innocent. The death of Aseniah was both without Judgment, and without any Crime objected, other than the King's jealousy: out of which by the same rule of Arbitrary Justice (under which it may be supposed that many were cast away) he would have slain Jeroboam (if he could have caught him) before he had committed any Offence, as appears by his confident turn out of Asyria, like one that was known to have endured wrong having not offered any.

The like and much more barbarous execution, to wit, without Law, Jeheram did upon his Brothers, and upon sundry of his greatest Men; as Asah Jeoffa did for to put to death Zachariah the Son of Zechariah, who had made him King, even in the Court 2 Chron. 24:11. Asah Jeoffa, who had made him King, even in the Court of the House of the Lord; and Manasseh did shed innocent blood exceeding much, and he exemplified Jerusalem from corner to corner, and this was also imputed to him as another fault; besides his sin wherein he was made Juda to sit. Contrariwise, among the Kings of Israel we find no Monument of such Arbitrary Proceedings, unless perhaps the words of Jeheram the Son of Ashah (which were but words) may be taken for an instance, when he said, God did so to King Ahab, and more also, if the Head of Elijah the Son of Thabai Shaphat shall stand on him this day; whereby it is not plain whether he meant to kill him without more ado, or to have him condemned as a false Prophet, that had made them hold out against the Ammites, till they were fain to eat their own Children, which he thought a sufficient Argument to prove, that it was not God's purpose to deliver them. The death of Naboth sheweth rather the Liberty which the Israelites enjoyed, than any peremptory execution of the King's Will. For Naboth did not fear to stand upon his own Right, though Ahab were even sick for anger, neither was he for that caule put to death, as upon commandment, but made away by conspiracy, the matter being handled after a judicial form, which might give satisfaction to the People, ignorant of the device, though to God it could not.

The murder of the Prophets was continually ascribed to Jehoiachin, an impotent Woman, and not unto the King her Husband. Neither is it certain, that there was no Law made, whereby their Lives were taken from them; but certain it is that the People, being Idolaters, were both pleased with their death, and labouring in the execution. So that the doings of the Kings of Juda (such as are Rectified) prove them to have used more absolute manner of command, than the Kings of the ten Tribes. Neither do their sufferings witness the contrary. For of those which reigned over Juda, from the division of the Kingdom, to the Captivity of the ten Tribes, three were slain by the People, and two were denied a place of Burial amongst their Ancestors. Yea, the death of Azariah and his Brother Joash by Jehoi, with the defraction of all the Royal Seed of Juda, and the People (for ought that we can read) shew up the People of Juda that of revenge, as might by the suddenness and uniformity testify the affection to be general, and proceeding proceeding from a loving remembrance of their Princes; unless we should think that the death of Abubus, after seven Years Reign, were occasioned rather by the memory of her ill purchasing, than by the present sense of her tyrannical abusing the Government, whereon she had fed. On the other side, such of the Kings of Israel as are perilled by Treason (which were seven of the twenty) were slain by conspiracy of the great Men, who aspired by Treason to the Crown: the People being so far from embroiling their hands in the Blood of their Sovereigns that (after Nadab) they did never forbear to revenge the death of their Kings, when it lay in their power, nor approve the good success of Treason, unless fear compelled them. So that the death of two Kings, being thoroughly revenged upon other two, namely the death of Ela and Zacharia, upon Zimri and Shallum, who traitorously got and usurped, for a little while, their places; only three of the seven remain, whose ends the People took, it may be doubtful. Though indeed it is precisely said of the slaughter, committed on Abu's Children by the Jews, that the People durst not fight with him that did it, because they were exceedingly afraid: the same fear might be in them at the death of Pekah. The History (as others of that time) is so far from over. The like may be pronounced, and more absolutely, of the Kings of England, that never any of their perished by the fury of the people, but by Treason of such as did succeed them, neither was there any active urging to forcibly the death of King Edward and King Richard when they were in Prison, nor fear left the people should fit in their quarrel. And certainly (howsoever all that the Law calls Treason, be interpreted, as tending finally to the Kings destruction) in those treasonable insurrections of the vulgar, which have here most prevailed, the fury of the multitude hath quenched in itself, with the Blood of some great Officers; no such Rebels, howsoever wicked and barbarous otherwise, thirsting after the ruin of their natural Sovereign, but rather forbearing the advantages gotten upon his Royal Person: which if any Man impute unto gross Ignorance, another may ascribe charitably, and, I think, more truly, ascribe to a reverent affection. Wherefore that Fable of Briarrew, who, being loosened by Pallas, did with his hundred hands give assistance to Jupiter, when all the rest of the Gods conspired against him, is very fitly expounded by Sir Francis Bacon, as signifying, that Monarchs need not to fear any curbing of their Absoluteness by mighty Subjects, as long as by Wisdom they keep the Hearts of the People, who will be sure to come in upon their side. Though indeed the Story might very well have borne the same interpretation, as it is rehearsed by Homer, who tells that Pallas was one of all the Princes, by loosening Briarrew. For good Form of Government sufficeth by it self to retain the People, not only without assistance of a laborious Wit, but even against all Devices of the greatest and shrewdest Politicians: even the Sheriff and Constable, being fooner able to arm the multitude, in the Kings behalf, than an over-weening Rebel how mighty soever, can against him.

This Declaration of the Peoples Love, being seldom found in Juda, makes it very likely, that the Rule it self of Government there was such, as neither gave occasion of contentment unto the Subjects, nor of confidence in their good affection to the Kings. Upon which Reasons it may seem, that the multitude was kept usually diarmed. For otherwise would have been almost impossible, that Abigail the Sister of Abiah, a stranger to the Royal Blood of Judah, should by the only Authority of a Queen Mother, have destroyed all the Seed of David, and unfurled the Kingdom very near seven years without incurring any resentment. Yea when Yehoiada the high Priest had agreed with the Captains and principal Men of the Land to set up Josiah their lawful King, whereunto the whole Nation were generally well affected; he was fain to give to the Captains and their Men, the Spears and the Shields that were King David's, and were in the house of the Lord. But we need not enter into such particulars. Questionless, the Tribes which thought obedience to their Princes to be a part of their duty toward God, would endure much more with patience, than they which had Kings of their own choice or admission, holding the Crown by a more uncertain Tenure.

And this, in my opinion, was the Reason, why the ten Tribes did never seek to return to their ancient Lords: but after the destruction of their six first Kings, which died in the Reign of Asa, admitted a seventh of a new Family, rather than they would consubject themselves, with those of Juda and Benjamin, under a more honourable, but more heavy Yoke.

So, Aja having seen the death of seven Kings of Israel, died himself after one and forty years Reign, leaving Jebozaphath his Son to deal with Ahab the Son of Omri, who was the eighth King over the ten Tribes.

§. VII.

Of Jehoshaphat and his Contemporaries.

Jehoshaphat, who succeeded Asha, was a Prince Religious and happy; he destroyed all the Groves, Altars, and high places dedicated to Idolatry, and sent Searchers to all places and People wanting instruction; he recovered the Tribute due unto him by the Arabians and Philistims: from the one he had Silver, from the other Sheep and Goats to the number of fifteen thousand and four hundred. The numbers of his Men of War were more than admirable: for it is written that Ashub had a Command of three hundred thousand, Jehobanan of two hundred and fourscore thousand, and Amafai of two hundred thousand; also that he had, besides these, in Benjamin of those that bare Shields, which we call Targuiers, and of Archers under Eladai two hundred thousand; and under the Commandment of Jehobadai a hundred and fourscore thousand: which numbred together, make eleven hundred and sixty thousand, all which are said to have waited upon the King besides his Gardians.

tion. That Juda and Benjamin, a Territory not much exceeding the County of Kent, should muster eleven hundred and sixty thousand fighting men, is very strange, and the number far greater than it was found upon any other view. Joab in David's time found five hundred thousand: Rehoboam found but an hundred and fourscore thousand: Solia four hundred and eight thousand: Afa five hundred and four score thousand; Amaziah controlled all that could bear Arms, and they amounted to three hundred thousand: Uzziah three hundred and seven thousand and five hundred, whereas it is written that when news was brought to Jehoshaphat that Asah and Ammon were entered his Territory to the West of Jordan, and that their numbers were many, he feared (to wit) the multitude, it is not likely that he could have feared even the Army of Xerxes, if he would have brought into the Field eleven hundred and threescore thousand fighting Men, leaving all his strong Cities manned. I am therefore of opinion (referring my self to better Judgment) that these numbers specified in the second of Chronicles the seventeenth, distributed to several Leaders, were not all at one time, but that the three hundred thousand under Asah, and the two hundred and fourscore thousand under Jehoshaphat, were afterwards commanded and mustered by Amasia, Eliada, and Jehoshaphat: for the gross and total is not in that place set down, as it was under the other Kings formerly named. Again as the Aids which Jehoshaphat brought to Asah did not shew that he was a Prince of extraordinary Power, so the Moabites and Ammonites which he feared could never make the one half of those numbers, which he that commanded least among Jehoshaphat's Leaders had under him.

This mighty Prince notwithstanding his greatness, yet he joyined in Friendship with Asah King of Israel, who had married that wicked Woman Tzebeel. Him Jehoshaphat visited at Samaria, and caused his Son Foram to marry Abiah, this Asah's Daughter.

Asah perswaded Jehoshaphat to assist him in the War against the Syrians, who held the City of Ramoth Gilead from him, and called together four hundred of his Prophets, or Bailees to foretell the Success: who promised him Victory. But Jehoshaphat believed nothing at all in those Diviners, but resolved first of all to confer with some one Prophet of the Lord God of Israel. Hereupon Asah made answer that he had one, he called Michajah, but he hated that Prophet, because he always foretold of evil, and never of any good towards him. Yet sent for Michajah was to the King, but by the way the Messenger prayed him to content with the rest of the Prophets: and to promise Victory unto them as they did. But Michajah spake the Truth, and repeated his Vision to both Kings, which was that: God asked who shall persuade Asah, that he may go up and sell at Ramoth Gilead? to whom a Spirit that stood before the Lord answered, that he would enter into his Prophets, and be in them a false Spirit to delude. For as it is said by Christ, Nem enim vos effis qui loquimini, sed spiritus patris effis loquitor in vobis: it is not you that speak, but the Spirit of your Father speaks in you: so in a contrary kind did the Devil in the Prophets of Asah, or Satan, incourage Asah to his destruction. And as P. Marry upon this place well observeth, these evil Spirits are the Minsters of God's Vengeance, and are used as the Hangmen and tormentors, which Princes sometime in play. For as it pleareth God by his good Angels, to save and deliver from destruction, of which the Scriptures have many examples: so on the contrary, it is by the evil that he punisheth and destroyeth, both which are fain to perform the Will of their Creator, licet in eodem anno. Ecclesiasticus remembereth a second sort of malignant Natures, but they are every where visible. There are Spirits, saith he, created for Vengeance, which in their rigour lay on fire forks. In the time of destruction they show forth their Power, and accomplish the wrath of him that made them.

Now Michajah having by this his Revelation greatly displeased the King, and the Prophets whofe

Spirit he discovered, was strucken by Zedekiah one of Baal's Prophets, and by Asah himself committed to Prison: where he appointed him to be reserved and fed with Bread of affliction till he returned in Peace. But Michajah, not fearing to reply, answered, If thou return in Peace, the Lord hath not spoken by me. Nevertheless Asah went on in that War, and was wounded to death. Jehoshaphat returned to Jerusalem, where he was reprehended by Jehu the Prophet for assisting an idolatrous Prince, and one that hated God.

After this the Aramites or Damascens, joyned with the Moabites, Ammonites and Idumeans to invade Judaea: who pass Jordan, and encamp at Engaddi, and when Jehoshaphat gathered his Army, the Prophet Jahaziel foretold him of the Victory, which should be obtained without any blood-shed of his part: and so when Jehoshaphat approached, this assembly of Nations, the Ammonites and Moabites, disagreeing with the Idumeans, and quarrelling for some causes among themselves: those of Ammon and Moab set upon the Idumeans, and brake them utterly, which done, they also invaded each other; in which brail Jehoshaphat arriving took the Spoil of them all without any loss of his part, as it was foretold and promised by God. Notwithstanding this Victory, Jehoshaphat forgetting that he was formerly reprehended for assisting an idolatrous King, did notwithstanding joyn with Ochaziah the Son of Asah, in preparing a Fleet to send to Ophir, hoping of the like return which Salomon had: but as Eliazar the Prophet foretold him, his Ships perished and were broken in the Port of Esion Gaber, and so that Enterprize was overthrown.

Yet he taketh part with Jehoram the Brother of Ochaziah, against the Moabites, with which Kings of Juda and Israel the Edomites joyn their Forces, not forgetting, it seems, that the Moabites, assisted by the Ammonites, had not long before destroyed their Army.

The Moabites, Subjects to David and Salomon, forsaking the Kings of Juda, gave themselves for Vassals to Jeroboam, and so they continued to his Successors till the death of Asah: but Jehoshaphat, notwithstanding the Idolatry of his Colleague, yet as it seemeth, he was drawn into this War both to be avenged of the Moabites for their defection from Juda to Israel, as also because they had lately joyned themselves with the Syrians against Jehoshaphat, and thirdly to punish their double Rebellion who first forsook Juda and now Israel.

Both Kings resolved to pass by the way of Idumea, thereby the better to assure that Nation, for we find that both Moab, Ammon and Edom were all in the Field together at Engaddi against Jehoshaphat: But whether they had then declared themselves against Jehoshaphat, it is not certain, for in the 2 of Chronicles 11. Ver. 8. it is written that in the time of Jehoram, the Son of Jehoshaphat, Edom rebelled, and therefore it seemeth to me that the Edomites, when they were flung by Moab and Ammon, not finding themselves satisfied in such Conditions as they required, offered to turn from them, and to joyn themselves with the Army of Juda. For that they were numbered among the Enemies of Jehoshaphat it is plain in the 2 of Chron. the 20. and as plain c. 2 v. 8. that they were not declared, nor had made them a King, till Jehoshaphat's death. Now in the passage of the Kings towards Moab, whether it were by the extraordinary heat of the year, or whether the Idumeans having a purpose to rebel, misled the Army of Juda and Israel with intent to intestine them for want of Water; true it is, that they suffered the famine, if not a greater thirst than the Armies of Cassius and M. Antonius did in their Parthian Expeditions; and bad, in all likelihood, utterly perished, had not Elisha taught them to cut Trenches wherein to the Water sprang, by which not only Jehoshaphat and his Army, but Jehoram King of Israel an Idolater was relieved: the great mercy and goodness of God, having ever been prone to save the evil for the good, whereas he never destroyed the good for the evil.

The miserable issue of this War, and how Moab burnt his Son, or the Son of the King of Edom for sacrifice on the Rampire of his own City, I have already written in the Life of Jehoram among the Kings of Israel, Jehoshaphat reigned twenty five Years and died, he was buried in the Valley of Jehoshaphat, and a part of the Pyramis set over his Grave is yet to be seen, saith Brochard. Brochard's Acts are written at large by Jehu the Son of Isaiah.

There lived with Jehoshaphat, Ophrateneis in Assyria, Capetus and Tiberius Kings of the Abnans in Italy, of the latter the River Tiber (formerly Abnula) took Name.

In Jehoshaphat's time also ruled Mecades or Mezades in Athens: Agelaus or Agellus in Corinth; and Archelaus of the same Race, of the Heracleids the seventh in Lacedaemon. Badisirus ruled the Tyrrians; Abah, Ochazias and Jehoram the Israelites.

CHAP. XX.

Of Jehoram the Son of Jehoshaphat, and Ahaziah.

§. I.

That Jehoram was made King sundry times.

JEHORAM the Son of Jehoshaphat King of Juda began to reign at thirty two years of Age, and lived until he was forty years old, being eight years a King: but of these eight years, which Jehoram is said to have reigned four are to be reckoned in the Life of his Father, who going to the Syrian War with Asah, left this Jehoram King in his stead, as Asah did his Son Asahaziah. This appears by the several beginnings, which are given in Scripture to the two Jehoram's Kings of Israel and Juda, and to Asahaziah the eldest Son of Asah. For Asahaziah is said to have begun his Reign, in the seventeenth year of Jehoshaphat, Jehoram the Brother of Asahaziah succeeded him in the second year of Jehoram the Son of Jehoshaphat King of Juda, that is in the next year after that Jehoram of Juda was deligned King by his Father; it being (as we find elsewhere) the eighteenth year of Jehoshaphat himself, who went with the Israelites against Moab. Hereby it appears that the full power and execution of the Royal Office was retained still by Jehoshaphat, who governed absolutely by himself, not communicating the Rule with his Son. But in the fifth year of Jehoram King of Israel, which was the two and twentieth of Jehoshaphat, the old King took unto him, as Partner in the Government, this his eldest Son, who was at that time thirty two years old, his Father being fifty seven. Now so far as Jehoram reigned twenty five years, it is evident that his Son did not reign alone till the eighth of Jehoram King of Israel. The like regard is to be had in accounting the times of other Kings of Juda and Israel, who did not always reign precisely so long as the bare Letter of the Text may seem at first to affirm; but their years were sometimes compleat, sometimes only current. Sometimes confounded with the years of their Successors or Foregoers, and mult therefore be found by comparing their times with the years of those others, with whom they did begin and end.

It were perhaps a thing less needful than curious, to enquire into the Reasons moving Jehoshaphat either to assume unto him his Son as Partner in the Kingdom, whilst he was able himself to command both in Peace and in War, the like having never been done by any of his Progenitors, or having once (in the seventeenth of his Reign) vouchsafed unto him that honour, to refuse it unto himself, or at least-wile to defer the confirmation of it, until four or five years were passed. Yet so far as to enter into the examination of these Passages, may be a mean to find some light, whereby we may more clearly discover the causes of much extraordinary Business ensuing, I hold it not amiss to make such Conjecture, as the Circumstances of the Story briefly handled in the Scriptures may seem to approve.

We are therefore to consider; that this King Jehoshaphat was the first of Rehoboam's issue that ever entered into any freight League with the Kings of the ten Tribes. All that reigned in Juda before him, had with much Labour and long War, tied themselves in vain, making small Profit of the greatest Advantages that could be witheld. Wherefore Jehoshaphat thought it the wisest way, to make a League offensive and defensive between Israel and Juda, whereby each might enjoy their own in quiet.

This Confederacy made by a religious King, with one that did hate the Law; could not long prosper, as not issuing from the true Root and Foundation of Wisdom: yet as a piece of found Policy, doubtless it wanted not fair Pretences of much common good thereby likely to arise, with mutual fortification of both those Kingdoms, against the uncircumcised Nations their ancient Enemies. This apparent Benefit, being so inestimable a Jewel that it might not easily be lost, but continue as Hereditary from Father to Son, it was thought a very good course to have it confirmed by some free Bond of Affinity, and thereupon was Abiah the Daughter of Omri and Sister of Asah King of Israel, given in Marriage to Jehoram, who was Son and Heir apparent to the King of Juda. This Lady was of a masculine Spirit, and had learned so much of Queen Tzebeel her Brothers Wife, that she durst undertake, and could thoroughly perform a great deal more in Jerusalem, than the other knew how to compass in Samaria. She was indeed a fire-brand, ordained by God to confume a great part of the noblest houses in Juda, and perhaps of those Men or their Children, whose worldly wildom, regardless of Gods pleasure, had brought her in.

The first-fruits of this great League, was the Syrian War at Ramah Gilead, wherein Juda and Israel did adventure equally, but the profit of the victory should have redounded wholly to Abah: as godly Princes very seldom wholly by matching with Idolaters, but rather serve the turns of those false friends, who being ill affected to God himself, cannot be well affected to his servants. Before their setting forth, Abah deligned, as King, his Son Achaz; not so much perhaps in regard of the uncertain event of War (for none of his predecessors had ever done the like upon the like occasions) nor as fearing the threatenings of the Prophet Michaia (for he despised them) as by inviting Jehoshaphat by his own example, to take the same course, wherein he prevailed.

§. II.

Probable conjectures of the motives inducing the old King Jehoshaphat to change his purpose often, in making his Son Jehoram King.

Many arguments do very strongly prove Jehoram to have been wholly over-ruled by his Wits, especially for his forsaking the religion of his godly ancestors, and following the abominable superstitions of the house of Achab.

That he was a Woman of intolerable pride, and abhorring to live a private life, the whole course of her actions witnesseth at large. Much vain matter he was able to produce, whereby to make her husband think that his brethren and kindred were but mean and unworthy persons in comparison of him, and of his Children, which were begotten upon the daughter and sister of two great Kings, not upon base Women and meer Subjects. The Court of Abah, and his famous victories obtained against the Syrian Benhadad, were matter sufficient to make an insolent Man think highly of himself, as being allied to honourably; who could otherwise have found in his heart well enough, to despise all his brethren, as his elder, and their apparent to the Crown, whereof already he had, in a manner, the possession.

How soon his vices brake out, or how long he dissembled them and his idolatrous religion, it cannot certainly be known. Like enough it is, that some smoke, out of the hidden fire, did thereupon cause the young Man to know himself better, by making him fall back into rank among his younger brethren. And surely the doings of Jehoshaphat about the same time, argue no small dissembler of the whole Country, through the misgovernment of his ungodly Son. For the good old King was fain to make his progress round about the land, reclaiming Judges throughout all the Cities of Juda City by City. This had been a needless labour, if the religion taught and strongly maintained by Asa, and by himself, had not suffered alteration, and the course of Justice been perverted by the power of such as had born authority. But the necessity that then was of reformation, appears by the charge which the King did give to the Judges; and by his commission given to one of the Priests in spiritual causes, and to the steward of his house in temporal matters, to be general overseers.

This was not till after the death of Achaz the Son of Abah; but how long after it is uncertain. For Jehoram the brother of Achaz began his reign (as hath been already noted) in the eighteenth of Jehoshaphat's, which was then accounted the second of Jehoram of Jehoshaphat's Son, though afterward this Jehoram of Juda had another first and second year, even in his Fathers time, before he reigned alone, as the best Chronologers and expositors of the holy text agree. So he continued in private estate, until the two and twentieth of his Fathers reign, at which time, though the occasions inducing his reliction to former dignity are not let down, yet we may not think, that motives thereto, appearing substantial, were wanting. Jehoram of Israel held the same correspondence with Jehoshaphat, which his Father had done; and made use of it. He drew the Judeans into the War of Abah, at which time it might well be, that the young Prince of Juda was again ordained King by his Father, as in the Syrian expedition he had been. Or if we ought rather to think, that the preparations for the enterprise against Moab did not occupy so much time, as from the eighteenth of Jehoshaphat, in which year that Nation rebelled against Israel, unto his two and twentieth; yet the daily negotiations between the two Kings of Juda and Israel, and the affinity between them contracted in the person of Jehoram, might offer some good occasions therunto. Neither is it certain how the behaviour of the younger Sons, in their elder brothers disgrace, might cause their Father to put him in possession, for fear of tumult after his death; or the deep dissimulation of Jehoram himself, might win the good opinion both of his Father and Brethren; it being a thing usual in mischievous fell Natures, to be as aspect and servile in time of adversity, as insolent and bloody upon addition of advantage. This is manifest, that being reposed of his former estate, he demeaned himself in such wise towards his brethren, as caused their Father to enable them, not only with store of Silver, and of Gold, and of precious things, (which kind of liberality other Kings doubtless had used unto their younger Sons) but with the custody of strong Cities in Juda, to assure them, if it might have been, by unwonted means, against unwonted perils.

§. III.

The doings of Jehoram when he reigned alone; and the rebellion of Edom and Libna.

But all this providence availed nothing; for an higher providence had otherwise determined of the sequel. When once the good old Man, their Father, was dead, the younger Sons of Jehoshaphat found strong Cities, a weak defence, against the power of him to whom the Citizens were obedient. If they came in upon the Summons of the King their brother, then had he them without more ado; if they stood upon their guard, then were they Traitors, and so unable to hold out against him, who besides his own power, was able to bring the forces of the Israelitish Kingdom against them, so that the apparent likelihood of their final overthrow, sufficed to make all forsake them in the very beginning. Howsoever it was, they were all taken and slain, and with them for company as many great Men of the Land; such as, as either had taken their part; when the Tyrant fought their lives, or had been appointed Rulers of

of the Country, when Jehoram was deposed from his Government; in which Office they, without forbearing to do justice, could hardly avoid the doing of many things, derogatory to their young Master, which if he would now call treason, saying that he was then King, who durst say the contrary?

After this Jehoram took upon him, as being now Lord alone, to make innovations in religion; wherein he was not contented as other Idolatrous Princes, to give way and safe-conduct unto superstition and idolatry, nor to provoke and encourage the people to that sin, whereto it is wonderful that they were so much addicted, having such knowledge of God, and of his deceiving that above all other sins; but he used compulsion, and was (if not the very first) the first that is registered, to have set up idolatry by force.

Whilst he was thus busied at home, in doing what he listed, the Edomites his Tributaries rebelled against him abroad; and having hired a Viceroy, since David's time, been governed by a Viceroy, did now make unto themselves a King. Against these Jehoram in person made an expedition, taking along with him his Princes, and all his Chariots, with which he obtained victory in the field, compelling the Rebels to flee into their places of advantage, wherof he forced no one, but went away contented with the honour that he had gotten in beating and killing some of those, whom he should have subdued, and kept his Servants. Now began the Prophecy of Isaiah to take effect, wherein he fore-told, that Eliab in process of time should break the yoke of Juda. For after this the Edomites could never be reclaimed by any of the Kings of Juda, but held their own so well, that when, after many civil and foreign Wars, the Yeriv by sundry Nations had been brought low; Antipater the Edomite, with Hirad his Son, and others of that race following them, became Lords of the Yeriv, in the decrepit age of Israel, and reigned as Kings, even in Jerusalem itself.

The Freedom of the Edomites, though purchased somewhat dearly, encouraged Libna, a great City within Juda, which in the time of Josiah had a peculiar King, to rebel against Jehoram, and set it self at liberty. Libna stood in the confines of Benjamin and of Dan, far from the assistance of any bordering enemies to Juda, and therefore so unlikely it was to have maintained it self in liberty, that it may seem strange how it could escape from utter destruction, or at the least from some terrible vengeance, most likely to have been taken, by their powerful, cruel, and thoroughly incensed Lord. The Israelite held such good intelligence at that time with Juda, that he would not have accepted the Town, had it offered it self unto him: neither do we read that it fought how to call it self into a new Subjection, but continued a free Estate. The Rebellion of it against Jehoram, was, because he had forsaken the Lord God of his Fathers; which I take to have not only been the first and remote cause, but even the next and immediate reason, moving the inhabitants to do as they did: For it was a Town of the Levites: who must needs be driven into great extremities, when a religion contrary to God's law, had not only some allowance to countenance it by the King, but they were unwilling for force unto it all that were unwilling. As for the use of the Temple at Jerusalem (which being devout Men they might fear to lose by this Rebellion) it was never denied to those of the ten revolted Tribes: by any of the religious Kings, who rather invited the Israelites thither, and gave them kind entertainment: under Idolaters they must have been without it whether they lived free or in subjection. Yet it seems that private reasons were not wanting, which might move them rather to do than to suffer that which was unwarrantable. For in the general visitation before remembered, wherein Jehoshaphat reformed his Kingdom, the good old King appointing new Governors, and giving them especial charge to do justice without respect of persons, used these words, The Levites shall be Officers before you; Be of good courage and do it, and the Lord shall be with the good. By these phrases, it seems, that he encouraged them against the more powerful, than just proceedings of his Son; whom if the Levites did (according to the trust reposed in them) neglect, in discharging their duties, likely it is that he meant to be even with them; and make them now to feel, as many Princes of the Land had done, his heavy indignation. How it happened that Libna was not hereupon destroyed, yet that it was not (for ought that we can read) so much as beleagued or molested, may justly seem very strange. And the more strange it is in regard of the mighty Armies which Jehoshaphat was able to raise, being sufficient to have overwhelmed any one Town, and buried it under the earth, which they might in one Month have cast into it with shovels; by ordinary approaches.

But it seems that of these great numbers which his Father could have levied, there were not many whom Jehoram could well trust; and therefore perhaps he thought it an easier loss, to let one Town go, than to put weapons into their hands, who were more likely to follow the example of Libna, than to punish it. So desperate is the condition of Tyrants, who thinking it a greater happiness to be feared, than to be loved; are fain themselves to stand in fear of those, by whom they might have been dreadful unto others.

§. IV.

Of the miseries falling upon Jehoram, and of his death.

These afflictions not sufficing to make any impression of Gods displeasure in the mind of the wicked Prince; a prophecy in writing was delivered unto him, which threatened both his people, his Children, his Wives, and his own body. Hereby likewise it appears that he was a cruel Persecutor of Gods servants; in as much as the Prophets durst not reprove him to his face, as they had done many of his Predecessors, both good and evil Kings, but were fain to denounce Gods judgments against him by letters, keeping themselves close and far from him. This Epistle is said to have been sent unto him from Eliab the Prophet. But Eliab was translated, and Eliacum prophesied in his stead before this time, even in the days of Jehoshaphat. Wherefore it may be that Eliab left this prophecy in writing, behind him, or that (as some conjecture) the error of one letter in writing, was the occasion that we read Eliab for Eliacum. Indeed anything may rather be believed than the Tradition held by some of the Jewish Rabbins, that Eliab from Heaven did send this Epistle; a tale somewhat like to the fable of our Ladies letters, devised by Erasmus, or of the Verse that was sent from Heaven to St. Giles.

But whosoever was the Author of this threatening Epistle, the accomplishment of the prophecy was as terrible, as the sentence. For the Philistines and Arabians brake into Judaea, and took the Kings House, Houfe, wherein they found all, or many of his Children, and Wives, at which they flew, or carried away, with great part of his goods. That Philistims had not perceived since the time of David, to make any attempt on War till now; for they were by him almost confumed, and had lost the beft of their Towns, maintaining themfelves in the reft of their fmall Territory, by defensive arms, to which they were contrained at Gibbethon the Ifraelites. The Arabians were likely to have been then as they are now, a naked people, all Horfemen, and ill appointed; their Country affording no other furniture, than fuch as might make them fitter to rob and fpoil in the open fields, than to offend ftrong Cities fuch as were thick fet in Juda. True it is that in ages long after following, they conquered all the South parts of the World, then known, in a very fhort fpace of time, deftroying fome, and building other fome of the flately Cities. But it muft be confidered; that this was when they had learned of the Romans the art of War; and that the provisions which they found, together with the manner which they learned, in one fubdued Province, did make them able and skillful in conquering the reft, conquelt, and going onward into Regions far removed from them. At this day having loft in effect all that they had gotten, fuch of them as live in Arabia it elfe are good Horfemen, but ill appointed, very dangerous to paffengers, but unable to deal with good Souldiers, as riding ftark naked, and rather trufting in the fwiftnels of their horfes, than in any other means of refiftance, where they are well oppofed. And fuch, or little better, may they feem to have been, that fpoiled Judea in the time of Teborum. For their Country was always barren and Defart, wanting manual arts whereby to fupply the neceffaries with furniture: neither are their fubjects, as named as chief in that ation, but rather the adherents of the Philistims. Out of this it may infer, that one half, yea or one quarter of the numbers found in the feaft muft have been Juda and Benjamin under Jehothaphat; wherein were inrolled three hundred and eighty thoufand fighting Men) had been enough to have driven away far greater forces than their enemies are likely to have brought into the field, had not the people been unable to deal with them; for lack of weapons, which were now kept from them by their Princes jealousie, as in Saul's time by the policy of the Philistims.

the policy of the Pharisees. It may mean that the house of the King which these invaders took, was not his Palace in Jerusalem, but rather some other house of his abroad in the Country, where his Wives and Children were at that time laid; for their recreation: because we read not that they did sack the City, or spoil the Temple, which would have invited them as a more commodious booty, had they took possession thereof. Yet perhaps they took Jerusalem it fell by surprise, the people being diarmed, and the Kings guards too weak to keep them out; yet so that he not the courage to hold it, because it was so large and populous; and therefore having done what spoil they could, withdrew themselves with such purchase as they were able safely to convey away.

The slaughter committed by Jehu upon the two and forty brethren of Ahaziah, or (as they are called elsewhere) so many of his Brothers Sons, and the cruel massacre wherein all the Royal seed perished (only Joram excepted) under the tyranny of Athaliah following within two years after this invasion of the Philistines, and Arabians; make it seem probable, that the Sons of Jehoram were not all slain at once, but that rather the first murder began in his own time, and was seconded by many other heavy blows, wherewith his house was incessantly stricken, until it was in a manner quite hewed down.

quite hewed down. After these calamities, the hand of God was extended against the body of this wicked King, smiting him with a grievous distemper in his bowels, which left him not until his guts fell out, and his wretched Soul departed from his miserable carcass. The people of the Land, as they had small cause of comfort in his life, so had they not the good manners to pretend sorrow for his death; wherefore he was denied a place of burial among his Ancestors the Kings of Juda, though his own Son succeeded him in the Kingdom, who was guided by the fame Spirits that had been his Fathers evil Angels. Athalia had other matters to trouble her head, than the pompous interring of a dead husband. She was thinking how to provide for the future, to maintain her own greatness, to retain her favorites in their authority, and to place about her Son such Councillors, of the house of Athai, as 2 Kings 22. 4. were fitful for her turn. Wherefore she thought it unreasonable to make much a-do about a thing of nothing, and offend the peoples eyes, with a stately funeral of a Man by them detested; but rather chose to let the blame of this mischief be laid upon the dead, than hers, which it now did concern her to avoid. Such is the quality of wicked infidellers, having made greedy use of bad employments, to charge not only with his own vices, but with their fault, also, the Man whose evil inclinations their further counsels have made worse, when once he is gone and can profit them no longer. The death of Zechariah fell out indeed in a busy time; when his friend and Cousin the Israhelite, who had the fame name, was entangled in a difficult War against the Amorites; and therefore could have had no better leisure to help Athalia in setting of things according to her own mind, than he had (perhaps through the fame hindrance) to help her husband, when he was distressed by the Philistines. Yea rather he needed and craved the assistance of the Men of Juda, for the taking in of Ramoth Gilead, where they had not sped so well the last time, that they should willingly run thither again, unless they were very fairly interested.

The acts of this wicked Man I have thought good to handle the more particularly (puruing the examination of all occurrences, as far as the circumstances remembered in holy Scripture, would guide me by their directions) to the end that it might more plainly appear, how the corrupted affections of men, impugning the revealed will of God, accomplish nevertheless his hidden purpose, and without miraculous means, confound themselves in the seeming-wise devices of their own folly: as likewise to the end that all men might learn, to submit their judgments to the ordinance of God, rather than to think, that they may make light of God, rather than to think, that they may make light of his commandments, and follow the prudent conceits which worldly wisdom dishonoureth them. For in such kind of unhappy subtilties, it is manifest that Abthalia was able to furnish both her Husband and her Son, but the issue of them partly hath appeared already, and partly will appear, in that which immediately followeth.

§. V.

 δ, v

Of the reign of Ahazia, and his business with the King of Israel.

O Chaziel, or Abaziah, the Son of Jehoram and Abiah, began his reign over Judah in the twelfth year of Jehoram, the Son of Ahab King of Israel, and reigned but that one year. Touching his age, it is a point of more difficulty than importance to know it; yet here it bred much dispute, whereof I fee no more probable conclusion, than that of Torniellus, alledging the Edition of the Sepuagint at Rems, Anno Domini 1588. which faith that he was twenty years old in the beginning of his Kingdom, and the Annotations thereupon, which cite the other Copies, that give him two years more. Like enough he is to have been younger; for he was governed by his Mother, and her Ministers, who gave him counsel by which he perished. In matter of Religion he altered none of his Fathers customs. In matter of State he likewise upheld the League made with the House of Ahab. He was much busied in doing little, and that with ill success. He accompanied his Coven the Israelites against Ramoth Gilead, which they won, but not without blows; for the Arameans fought so well, that the King of Israel was fain to adventure his own person, which escaped not un wounded. The Town being won was manned strongly, in expectation of some attempt likely to be made by Hazael King of Aram: which done, Jehoram King of Israel withdrew himself to the City of Izrael, where with more quiet he might attend the curing of his wounds; and Abaziah returned to Jerusalem. It seems that he was but newly come home (for he reigned in all scanty one year, whereof the former expedition, with the preparations for it, had taken up a great part) when he made a new journey, as it were for good manners sake, to visit the King of Israel, who lay fore of his wounds. Belike Abaziah was brewing fome new plots, which his preference would have hindered, and therefore sought every occasion to thrust him abroad: for otherwise it was but a vain piece of Work to leave his Kingdom, having no other business than by way of complement to go to see one whom he had seen yesterday. Certain it is that the Lord had resolved at this time to put in execution that heavy judgment, which he had laid by the mouth of Elijah the Prophet, upon the house of Ahab. And hereunto at this time had he disposed not only the concurrence of all other things, which in manyes eyes might seem to have been accidental; but the very thoughts and affections of such persons, as intended nothing less than the fulfilling of his high pleasure. Of these Abaziah doubtless was one; whose mischievous purposes it will shortly be needful for explanation of some difficulties arising, that we diligently consider and examine.

§. VI.

How Ahaziah perished with the house of Ahab: and how that Family was destroyed by Jehu.

THe whole Army of Israel, with all the principal Captains lying in Ramoth Gilead, a Disciple of Elizeus the Prophet came in among the Captains that were sitting together, who calling out from among them Jehu, a principal Man, took him apart, and anointed him King over Israel.

re-¹arising to him the prophecy of Elias against the house of Ahab, and letting him understand that it was the pleasure of God to make him executioner of that sentence. The fashon of the Messenger was such as bred in the Captains a desire to know his errand, which Yotha thought meet to let them know, as doubting whether they had overheard all the talk or no. When he had acquainted them with the whole matter, they made no delay, but forthwith proclaimed him King. For the prophecy of Elias was well known among them, neither durst any one oppose himself against him, that was by God ordained to perform it.

John who had upon the suddain this great honour thrown upon him, was not slow to put himself in possession of it, but used the first heat of their affections who joyned with him, in setting on foot the business which nearly concerned him, and was not to be foreflooded, being no more his own than Gods.

The first care taken was that no news of the revolt might be carried to Ixrel, whereby the King might have had warning either to fight or flee: this being foreseen he marched swiftly away, to take the Court while it was yet secure. King Teboram was now so well recovered of his wounds, that he could endure to ride abroad, for which cause it seems that there was much feasting, and joy made, especially by Queen Texabel, who kept her state so well, that the brethren of Abacia coming thither at this time, did make it as well their errand to salute the Queen, as to visit the King.

Certainly it is, that since the rebellion of Mazb against Israel, the house of Abab did never to much flourish as at this time. Seventy Princes came to the Court of Abab, and were seated in Sameir; Teharam the Son of Queen Tehar had won the Kingdom of Ramah Gilad, which his Father had attempted in vain, with loss of his life; and he won it by valiant fight, wherein he received wound of which the danger was now past, but the honour likely to continue. The amity was forgot between Israel and Juda, that it might suffice to daunt all their common enemies, leaving no hope of success, to any rebellious enterprizer: so that now the prophecy of Elias might be forgotten, or no otherwise remembered, than as an unlikely tale, by them that beheld the majestic face of the Court, wherein so great a friend as the King of Juda was entertained, and forty Princes of his blood expected.

In the midst of this security, whilst these great Efforts were (perhaps) either confiding about protection, or their intents, first against the Arames, and then against Mash Ebn Ebn, and other rebels and enemies; or else were triumphing in joy of that which was already well known, and the Queen-Mother dressing her self in the gayest manner to come down amongst them; tidings were brought in, that the watchman had from the tower discovered a company coming. These news were not very troublesome for the Army that lay in Ramoth Gilead, to be ready against all attempts of the Arames, was likely enough to be discharged upon some notice taken that the enemy would not, or could not stir. Only the King sent out an Hofe-man to know what the matter was, and to bring him word. The messenger coming to Jehu, and asking whether all were well, was retained by him, who intended to give the King as little warning as might be. The seeming negligence of this fellow in not returning with an answer, might argue the matter to be of small importance: yet the King, to be satisfied, sent out another, that that should bring him word how all went; and he was likewise detained by Jehoi. These dumb hounds bred some suspicion in Jehoram, whom the Watchmen certified of all that happened. And now the company drew so near that they might, though not perfectly, be discerned, and notice taken of Jehoi himself by the furious manner of his marching. Wherefore the King that was loth to discover any weakness, caused his Chariot to be made ready, and issued forth with Athalia King of Juda in his company, whose presence added Majesty to his Train, when strength to resist, or expedition to flee had been more needful. This could not be done so hastily, but that Jehoi was come even to the Townside, and there they met each other in the field of Naboth. Jehoram began to salute Jehoi with terms of Peace, but receiving a bitter answer, his heart failed him, so that crying out upon the Treason to his fellow Kings, he turned away to have fled. But Jehoi soon overtook him with an Arrow, wherewith he strook him dead, and threw his carcass into that field, which was purchased with the blood of the rightful owner, was to be watered with blood of the unjust possessor. Neither did Athalia escape so well, but that he was arrested by a wound, which held him till death did seize upon him.

The Kings Palace was joyning to the Wall, by the gate of the City, where Jehoi might have been advertised of this calamity, if he did not with her own eyes behold it. Now it was high time for her to call to God for mercy, whose judgment, pronounced against her long before, had overtaken her, when the least expected it. But she, full of indignation, and proud thoughts, made her self ready in all haste, and painted her face, hoping with her stately and imperious looks to daunt the Traitor, or at the least to utter some Apophthegm, that should express her brave spirit, and brand him with such a reproach as might make him odious for ever. Little did she think upon the hungry Dogs, that were ordained to devour her, whose paunches the fiavium, with which she besmeared her eyes, would more offend, than the scolding language wherewith the armed her tongue, could trouble the ears of him that had her in his power. As Jehoi drew near the opened her window, and looking out upon him, began to put him in mind of Zimri, that had not long enjoyed the fruits of his Treason, and murder of the King his Master. This was in meer humane valuation stoutly spoken, but was indeed a part of miserable folly, as are all things, howsoever laudable, if they have an ill relation to God the Lord of all. Her own Eunuchs that stood by and heard her, were not affected so much as with any compassion of her fortune; much less was her enemy daunted with her proud spirit. When Jehoi saw that she did use the little remainder of her life in seeking to vex him; he made her presently to understand her own estate, by deeds and not by words. He only called to her Servants to know which of them would be of his side, and soon found them ready to offer their service, before the very face of their proud Lady. Hereupon he commanded them to cast her down head-long: which immediately they performed without all regard of her greatness and estate, wherein she had a few hours before shined so gloriously in the eyes of Men; of Men that considered not the judgments of God that had been denounced against her.

So perished this accursed Woman by the rude hands of her own Servants, at the commandment of her greatest Enemy, that was yesterday her Subject, but now her Lord: and the perished miserably struggling in vain with base Grooms, who condescendingly did hale and thrust her, whilst her insulting Enemy fate on Horle-back, adding indignity to her grief by scornfully beholding her shameful manner of her fall, and trampling her body under foot. Her dead carcass that was left without the Walls was devoured by Dogs, and her very memory was odious. Thus the vengeance of God rewarded her Idolatry, Murder, and oppression, with flow, but sure payment, and full interest.

Athalia King of Juda fleeing a-pace from Jehoi, was over-taken by the way where he lurked, and receiving his deadly wound in the Kingdom of Samaria, was suffered to get him gone (which he did in all haste) and feck his burial in his own Kingdom: and this favour he obtained for his Grand-fathers sake, not for his Fathers, nor his own. He died at Megiddo, and was thence carried to Jerusalem, where he was interred with his Ancestors, having reigned about one year.

CHAP. XXI.

Of Athalia, and whose Son he was that succeeded unto her.

§. I.

Of Athalia her usurping the Kingdom, and what pretences she might forge.

After the death of Athalia, it is said that his house was not able to retain the Kingdom: which note, and the proceedings of Athalia upon the death of her Son, have given occasion to divers opinions concerning the Pedigree of Josiah who reigned shortly after. For Athalia: being thus dispossessed of her Son, under whose name she had ruled at her pleasure, did forthwith lay hold upon all the Princes of the blood, and slew them, that so she might occupy the Royal Throne herself, and reign as Queen, rather than live a Subject. She had before hand put into great place, and made Counsellors unto her Son, such as were fitted for her purpose, and ready at all times to execute her will: that she kept a strong guard about her it is very likely; and as likely it is that the great execution done by Jehoram, upon the Princes, and many of the Nobility, had made the people tame, and fearful to stir, whatsoever they lay or heard.

Yet ambition, how violent soever it be, is seldom or never so themselves as to refuse the commodity of godly pretences offering themselves; but rather scrape together all that will any way serve to colour her proceedings. Wherefore it were not desired for us to think, that Athalia when she saw the Princes of the Royal blood, all of them in a manner, slain by her Husband, and afterwards her own Children destroyed by the Phisians, began even then to play her own game, reducing by artificial practice, into fair likelihoods, those possibilities wherewith her Husbands bad fortune had presented her. Not without great flow of reason, either by her own mouth, or by some trusty creature of hers, might she give him to understand, how needful it were to take the best order whilst as yet he might, for fear of the worst that might happen. If the issue of David, which now remained only in his Family, should by any accident fail (as woful experience had already shewed what might after come to pass) if the people of Juda were not unlikely to choose a King of some new stock, a popular seditious Man per adventure, one that to contentance his own unworthiness, would not care what aspersions he laid thereon, that to Royal house, which was fallen down, and who could allure him, that some ambitious spirit, fore-seeing what might be gotten thereby, did not already contrive the defraction of him, and all his seed? Wherefore it were the wisest way to design by his authority, not only his Successor, but also the reverendest, and so to provide, that the Crown might never be subject to either, nor remain in the disposition of them: thus loving him best, if the worst that might be feared coming to pass, his own posterity could not retain it.

Such persuasions being urged, and earnestly followed, by the importunate solicitation of her that governed his affections, were able to make the jealous Tyrant think that the only way to frustrate all devices of such as gaped after a change, was to make her Mother to the last and youngest of his house, whom it most concerned, as being the Queen-Mother, to uphold the first and eldest.

If Athalia took no such course as this in her Husbands time, yet might she do it in her Sons. For Athalia (besides that he was wholly ruled by his Mother) was not likely to take much care for the security of his half-brothers, or their Children; as accounting his Fathers other Wives, in respect of his own high Born-Mother, little better than Concubines, and their Children bately begotten. But if this mischievous Woman forgot her self so far in her wicked policy, that she lost all opportunity which the weakness of her Husband and Son did afford, of procuring to her self some seeming Title; yet could she afterwards feign some such matter, as boldly might be being sure that none would ask to see her evidence, for fear of being sent to learn the certainty of her Son or Husbands in another world. But I rather think that she took order for her affairs before hand. For though she had no reason to suspect or fear the sudden death of her Son, yet it was the wisest way to provide betimes against all that might happen, whilst her Husbands issue by other Women was young and unable to resist. We plainly find that the Brethren or Nephews of Athalia, to the number of two and forty, were sent to the Court of Israel, only to salute the Children of the King, and the Children of the Queen. The slender occasion of which long journey, considered together with the quality of these persons (being in effect all the stock of Jehoram that could be grown to any strength) makes it very suspicious that their entertainment in Jerusalem house would only have been more formal, but little differing in substance, from that which they found at the hand of Jehoi. He that looks into the courses held both before and after by these two Queens, will find cause enough to think no less. Of such as have aspired unto Lordships not belonging to them, and thrust out the right Heirs by pretence of Testaments, that had no other validity than the Sword of such as claimed by them could give, Histories of late, yea of many Ages, afford plentiful examples: and the rule of Salomon is true: Is there any thing whereto one may say, Behold this thing is new? it hath been already in the old time that was before us. That a King might lead his Brothers blood, was proved by Salomon upon Adonijah; that he might alienate the Crown from his natural Heirs; David had given proof: but he had good ground of their doings. They which follow examples that please them, will neglect the reasons of those examples, if they please them not, and rest contented with the practice, as more willingly shewing what they may do, than acknowledging why. Salomon slew his Brother that had begun one Rebellion, and was entering into another. Jehoram slew all his brethren, which were better than he: David purchased the Kingdom, and might the more freely dispose of it, yet he disposed of it as the Lord appointed; if Jehoram, who had lost much and gotten nothing, thought that he might alienate the remainder at his pleasure; or if Athalia sought to cut off the Succession of his Brethren, or of their Issue: either of these was to be answered with the words which Jehoiada the Priest used afterwards, in declaring the title of Josiah, Behold the King: Son must reign; as the Lord hath said of the Sons of David. Wherefore though I hold it very probable, that Athalia did pretend some title, whatsoever it might be, to the Crown of Juda; yet it is most certain that she had thereunto no right at all, but only got it by treachery, murder, and open violence; and to the held it six whole years; and a part of the seventh, in good seeming security.

§. II.

How Jehoi spent his time in Israel, so that he could not molest Athalia.

In all this time Jehoi did never go about to disturb her; which in reason he was likely to desire, being an enemy to her whole House. But he was occupied at the first in establishing himself, rooting out the posterity of Ahab, and reforming somewhat in Religion: afterwards in Wars against the Aramites, wherein he was so far overcharged, that hardly he could retain his own, much less attempt upon others. Of the line of Ahab there were seventy living in Samaria, out of which number Jehoi by Letter advised the Citizens to let up some one as King, and to prepare themselves to fight in his defence. Hereby might they gather how confident he was, which they well understood to proceed from greater power about him, than they could gather to resist him. Wherefore they took example by the two Kings whom he had slain, and being exceedingly afraid of him, they offered him their service; wherein they so readily shewed themselves obedient, that in less than one days warning, they sent him the heads of all those Princes, as they were enjoined by a second Letter from him. After this he forced all the Priests of Baal by a subtilty, feigning a great Sacrifice to their God, by which means he drew them all together into one Temple, where he slew them; and in the same zeal to God utterly demolished all the Monuments of that impiety.

Concerning the Idolatry devised by Jehoram, no King of Israel had ever greater reason than Jehoi to destroy it. For he needed not to fear lest the people should be allured unto the house of David; it was (in appearance) quite rooted up, and the

Q q Crown

Crown of Juda in the possession of a cruel Tyrant: he had received his Kingdom by the unexpected Grace of God; and further, in regard of his zeal expressed in destroying Baal out of Israel, he was promised, notwithstanding his following the sin of Jeroboam, that the Kingdom should remain in his family, to the fourth Generation. But all this would not serve; he would needs help to piece out Gods providence, with his own circumpetition; doing therein like a foolish greedy Gainer, who by stealing a needful Card to assure himself of winning a stake, forfeits his whole rest. He had questionless displeased many, by that which he did against Baal; and many more he should offend by taking from them the use of a superstition, so long practised as was that Idolatry of Jeroboam. Yet all these, how many so ever they were, had never once thought upon making him King, if God, whom, to retain them, he now forsook, had not given him the Crown, when more difficulties appeared in the way of getting it, than could at any time after be found in the means of holding it.

This ingratitude of Jehu drew terrible vengeance of God upon Israel, whereof Hazael King of Damascus was the Executioner. The cruelty of this barbarous Prince we may find in the prophecy of Elisha, who fore-told it, saying: Their strong Cities shall thou set on fire, and their young Men shall thou slay with the sword, and shall dash their Infants against the Stones, and rent in pieces their Women with Child. So did not only the wickedness of Ahab cause the ruin of his whole house, but the obstinate Idolatry of the people bring a lamentable misery upon all the Land. For the fury of Hazael's victory was not quenched with the destruction of a few Towns, nor wearied with one invasion; but he smote them in all the coasts of Israel, and wasted all the Country beyond the River of Jordan. Notwithstanding all these calamities it seems that the people repented not of their Idolatry; (For in those days the Lord began to loath Israel;) but rather it is likely, that they bemoaned the Noble House of Ahab, under which they had beaten those enemies to whom they were now a prey, and had bravely fought for the Conquest of Syria, where they had enlarged their border, by winning Ramoth Gilead, and compelled Benhadad to restore the Cities which his Father had won: whereas now they were fain to make woful shifts, living under a Lord that had better fortune and courage in murdering his Master than had put him in trust, then in defending his people from their cruel enemies. Thus it commonly falls out, that they who can find all manner of difficulties in serving him, to whom nothing is difficult, are instead of the ease, and pleasure to themselves propounded by contrary courses, overwhelmed with the troubles which they sought to avoid, and therein by God whom they first forsook, forsaken, and left out to the wretched labours of their own blind wisdom, wherein they had repaid all their confidence.

§. III.

Of Athalia's Government.

These calamities falling upon Israel, kept Athalia safe on that side, giving her leisure to look to things at home; as having little to do abroad, unless it were so that she held some correspondence with Hazael, pretending therein to imitate her Husbands Grandfather King Aha, who had done the like. And some probability that the did so may be gathered out of that which is recorded of her doings. For we find that this wicked Athalia and her Children broke up the house of God, and all things that were dedicated for the house of the Lord did they bestow upon Baalim. Such a sacrilege, though it proceeded from a desire to set out her own Idolatry, with such pomp as might make it the more glorious in the peoples Eyes, was not likely to want some fair pretext of necessity of the State so requiring; in which case others before her had made bold with that holy place, and her next success was fain to do to the like, being thereunto forced by Hazael, who perhaps was delighted with the talk of that which was formerly thence extracted for his sake.

Under this impious government of Athalia, the devotion of the Priests and Levites was very notable, and served (no doubt) very much to retain the people in the Religion taught by God himself, howsoever the Queens proceedings advanced the contrary. For the poverty of that sacred Tribe of Levi, must needs have been exceeding great at this time; all their Lands and possessions in the ten Tribes being utterly lost, the oblations and other perquisites, by which they lived, being now very few, and small; and the force laid up in better times under good Kings, being all taken away by shameful robbery. Yet they upheld in all this misery the service of God, and the daily Sacrifice, keeping duly their courses, and performing obedience to the High Priest, no less than in those days wherein their entertainment was far better.

§. IV.

Of the preservation of Joas.

Jehoiada then occupied the High Priest-hood, an honourable, wife and religious Man. To his carefulness it may be ascribed, that the fate of the Church was in some slender sort upheld in those unhappy times. His Wife was Jehoshabea, who was daughter of King Jehoram, and Sister to Athalia, a godly Lady and virtuous, whose piety makes it seem that Athalia was not her Mother, though her access to the Court argue the contrary; but her discreet carriage might more easily procure her welcome to her own Fathers house, than the education under such a Mother could have permitted her to be such as she was. By her care Joas the young Prince that reigned soon after, was conveyed out of the nursery, when Athalia destroyed all the Kings Children, and was carried secretly into the Temple, where as secretly he was brought up. How it came to pass that this young Child was not hunted out, when his body was missing, nor any great reckoning (for ought that we find) made of his escape, I will not stand to examine: for it was not good in policy, that the people should hear say, that one of the Children had avoided that cruel blow; it might have made them hearken after innovations, and so be the less conformable to the present Government. So Joas was delivered out of that slaughter, he and his Nurse being gone no Man could tell whither, and might be thought peradventure to be cast away, as having no other guard than a poor Woman that gave him suck, who foolishly doubting that she her self should have been slain, was fled away with him into some desolate place, where it was like enough that he and he should perish. In such cases flatterers, or Men desirous of reward, easily coin such tales, and rather swear them to be true in their own knowledge, than they will lose the thanks due to their joyful tidings.

§. V.

Whose Son Joas was.

†. I.

Whether Joas may be thought likely to have been the Son of Athalia.

NOW concerning this Joas, whose Son he was, it is a thing of much difficulty to affirm, and hath caused much controversy among writers. The places of Scripture, which call him the Son of Athalia, seem plain enough. How any figure of the Hebrew language might give that title of Son unto him, in regard that he was his Successor, I neither by my self can find, nor can by any help of Authors learn how to answer the difficulties, appearing in the contrary opinions of them, that think him to have been, or not, the natural Son of Athalia. For whereas it is said, that the house of Athalia was not able to retain the Kingdom; some do infer that this Joas was not properly called his Son, but was the next of his kindred, and therefore succeeded him, as a Son in the inheritance of his Father. And hereunto the murder committed by Athalia, doth very well agree. For the perceiving that the Kingdom was to fall into their hands, in whom he had no interest, might easily find cause to fear, that the tyranny exercised by her Husband, at her instigation upon so many noble Houses, would now be revenged upon her self. The ruin of her Idolatrous Religion might in this case terrify both her and her Minions; the sentence of the Law rewarding that offence with death; and the Tragedy of Jehabel teaching her what might happen to another Queen. All this had little concerned her, if her own Grand-child had been Heir to the Crown; for she that had power enough to make her self Queen, could with more ease, and less envy, have taken upon her the office of a Protector, by which authority she might have done her pleasure, and been the more obeyed by others, and secure of her own Estate, as not wanting an Heir. Wherefore it was not needful, that she should be so unnatural, as to destroy the Child of her own Son, of whose life she might have made greater use, than the could of his death: whereas indeed, the love of Grandmothers to their Nephews, is little less than that of Mothers to their Children.

This argument is very strong. For it may seem incredible, that all natural affection should be cast aside, when as neither necessity urgeth, nor any commodity thereby gotten requereth it, yea when all humane policy doth reach one the same, which nature without reason would have persuaded.

†. II.

That Joas did not descend from Nathan.

BUT (as it is more easy to find a difficulty in that which is related, than to show how it might have otherwise been) the Pedigree of this Joas is, by them which think him not the Son of Athalia, set down in such sort that it may very justly be suspected. They say that he descended from Nathan the Son of David, and not from Salomon; to which purpose they bring a History (I know not whence) of two families of the race of David, laying that the line of Salomon held the Kingdom with this condition, that if at any time it failed, the family of Nathan should succeed it. Concerning this Nathan the Son of David there are that would have him to be Nathan the Prophet, who as they think, was by David adopted. And of this opinion was Origen, as also S. Augustin sometime was, but afterward he revoked it, as was meet; for this Nathan is reckoned among the Sons of David, by Bathsua the Daughter of Amiel, and therefore could not be the Prophet. Gregory Nazianzen (as I find him cited by Peter Martyr) and after him, Erasmus, and Faber Stapulensis, have likewise held the same of Joas, deriving him from Nathan. But Nathan, and those other brethren of Salomon by the same Mother, are thought, upon good likelihoods, to have been the Children of Oria the Heitite: and so are they accounted by sundry of the Fathers, and by Lyra, and Abulenfis, who follow the Hebrew Expollers of that place in the first of Chronicles. The words of Salomon calling himself the only begotten of his Mother, do approve this expolition: for we read of no more than two Sons which Bathsua or Bathsheba did bear unto David; whereof the one, begotten in Adultery, died an Infant, and Salomon only of her Children by the King did live. So that the rest must needs have been the Children of Oria, and are thought to have been David's only by adoption. Wherefore, if Joas had not been the Son of Athalia, then must that Pedigree have been false, wherein S. Matthew deriveth him lineally from Salomon; yea, then had not our blessed Saviour issued from the Loins of David, according to the flesh, but had only been of his line by courtesy of the Nation, and form of Law; as any other might have been. As for the Authority of Philo, which hath drawn many late Writers into the opinion that Joas was not of the posterity of Salomon, it is enough to say that this was Frier Annius his Philo: for no other Edition of Philo hath any such matter; but Annius can make Authors to speak what he list.

†. III.

That Joas may probably be thought to have been the Son of Jehoram.

IN so doubtful a case, if it seem lawful to hold an opinion that no Man hath yet thought upon, methinks it were not amiss to lay open at once, and peruse together two places of Scripture, whereof the one telling the wickedness of Jehoram the Son of Jehoshaphat King of Juda, for which he and his Children perished, rehearseth it as one of Gods mercies towards the house of David, that according to his promise he would give him a light, and to his Children for ever: the other doth lay, that for the offences of the same Jehoram, there was not a Son left him save Jehoahaz the youngest of his Son. Now, if it were in regard of Gods promise to David, that, after those Mallices of Jehoram, upon all his Brethren, and of the Philistines, and Arabians upon the Children of Jehoram, one of the seed of David escaped; why may it not be thought that he was laid to have escaped, in whom the line of David was preserved? for had all the race of Salomon been rooted up in these woful Tragedies, and the progeny of Nathan succeeded in place thereof; like enough it is that some remembrance more particular would have been extant, of an event so memorable. That the race of Nathan was not extinguished, it is indeed apparent by the Genealogy of our Lord; as it is recounted by St. Luke but the preservation of the house of David, mentioned in the Books of Kings and Chronicles, was performed in the person of Jehoshaphat in whom the Royal branch of Salomon, the natural, and not only legal issue remaining of David, was kept alive. Wherefore it may be thought that this Joash, who followed Athalia in the Kingdom, was the youngest Son of Jehoram, whose life Athalia, as a Stepmother, was not unlikely to pursue. For it were not easily understood, why the preservation of David's line, by Gods especial mercy in regard of his promise made, should pertain rather to that time, when besides Athalia himself there were two and forty of his Brethren, or (as in another place they are called) Sons of his Brethren remaining alive, which afterwards were all slain by Jehu; than have reference to the lamentable destruction and little less than extirpation of that Progeny, wherein one only did escape. Certainly that inhumane murder which Jehoram committed upon his Brethren, if it were (as appears in the History) revenged upon his own Children; then was not this vengeance of God accomplished by the Philistines and Arabians, but being only begun by them, was afterwards prosecuted by Jehu, and finally took effect by the hands of that same wicked Woman, at whose instigation he had committed such barbarous outrage. And from this execution of Gods heavy judgment laid upon Jehoram and all his Children, only Jehoshaphat, his youngest Son was exempted; whom therefore if I should affirm to be the same with Joash, which is called the Son of Athalia, I should not want good probability. Some further appearance of necessity there is, which doth argue that it could be no otherwise have been. For it was the youngest Son of Jehoram in whom the race was preserved; which could not in any likelihood be Athalia, seeing that he was twenty years old at the least (as is already noted) when he began to Reign, and consequently, was born in the eighteenth or twentieth year of his Fathers Age. Now, I know not whether of the two is more unlikely, either that Jehoram should have begotten many Children before he was eighteen years old, or that having (as he had) many Wives and Children, he should upon the sudden, at his eighteenth year, become unfruitful, and beget no more in twenty years following: each of which must have been true, if this were true that Athalia was the same Jehoshaphat, which was his youngest Son. But this inconvenience is taken away, and those other doubts arising from the caustic cruelty of Athalia, in seeking the life of Joash, are easily cleared. If Joash and Jehoshaphat were one. Neither doth his age withstand this opinion. For he was seven years old when he began to Reign; which if we understand of years complete, he might have been a year old at the death of Jehoram, being begotten somewhat after the beginning of his sickness. Neither is it more absurd to say that he was the natural Son of Jehoram, though called the Son of Athalia, than it were to say, as great Authors have done, this difficulty notwithstanding, that he was of the Posterity of Nathan. One thing indeed I know not how to answer; which, had it concurred with the rest, might have served as the very foundation of this opinion. The name of Jehoshaphat, a Child, 2 Chron. 22. 6. that foundeth much more near to Joash, than to Athalia, in an English ear, doth in the Hebrew (as I am informed by some, skilful in that Language) through the diversity of certain Letters, differ much from that which it most resembleth in our Western manner of Writing, and little from the other. Now although it be so that Athalia herself be also called Achazia, and must have had three names, if he were the same with Jehoshaphat; in which manner Joash might also have had several names; yet because I find no other warrant hereof than a bare possibility, I will not presume to build an opinion upon the weak foundation of mine own conjecture, but leave all to the consideration of such as have more ability to judge, and leisure to consider of this point.

†. IV.

Upon what reasons Athalia might seek to destroy Joash, if he were her own Grand-child.

IF therefore we shall follow that which is commonly received, and interpret the Text according to the letter, it may be said that Athalia was not only blinded by the passions of ambition and zeal to her idolatrous worship of Baalim, but purified the accomplishment of some natural desires, in seeking the destruction of her Grandchild, and the rest of the blood Royal. For whether it were so that Athalia (as proud and cruel Women are not always chaste) had imitated the liberty of Jezabel always chaste) had imitated the liberty of Jezabel her Sister-in-Law, whose Whoredoms were upbraided by Jehu to her Son; or whether she had Children by some former Husband, before she was married unto Jehoram (which is not unlikely in regard of her age, who was Daughter of Omri, and Sister to Ahab) certain it is that she had Sons of her own, and those old enough to be employed, as they were, in robbing of the Temple. So it is not greatly to be wondered at, that to settle the Crown upon her own Children, she did seek to cut off, by wicked policy, all other claims. As for Joash, if he were his Grand-mother, yet he might mistrust the interest which his Mother would have in him, lest when he came to years, it might withdraw him from her devotion. And hereof (besides that Women do commonly better love their Daughters Husbands, than their Sons Wives) there is some appearance in the Reign of her Son: for the made him spend all his time in idle journeys, to no other apparent end, than that the might rule at home; and he living abroad, be estranged from his Wife, and entertain some new fancies, wherein Jezabel had cunning enough to be his tutor. But when the Sword of Jehu had rudely cut in sunder all these fine devices, then was Athalia slain to go roundly to work, and do as she did, whereby she thought to make all sure. Otherwise, if (as I could rather think) she were only Stepmother to Joash, we need not seek into the reasons moving her to take away his life; her own hatred was cause enough to dispatch him among the first.

§. VI.

VI.

A digression, wherein is maintained the liberty of using Conjecture in Histories.

THUS much concerning the Person of Joash from whom, as from a new Root, the Tree of David was propagated into many Branches, in handling of which matter, the more I consider the nature of this History, and the diversity between it and others, the less methinks, I need to suspect mine own presumption, as deserving blame, for curiosity in matter of doubt, or boldness in liberty of conjecture. For all Histories do give us information of human councils and events, as far forth as the knowledge and Faith of the Writers can afford; but of Gods Will, by which all things are ordered, they speak only at random, and many times fallily. This we often find in Prophane Writers, who ascribe the ill success of great undertakings to the neglect of some impious Rites, whereof indeed God abhorred the performance as vehemently, as they thought him to be highly offended with the omission. Hereat we may the less wonder, if we consider the answer made by the Jews in Egypt unto Jeremy the Prophet reprehending their Idolatry. For, howsoever the written Law of God was known unto the People, and his punishments laid upon them for contempt thereof were very terrible, and even then but newly executed; yet were they so obstinately bent unto their own wills, that they would not by any means be drawn to acknowledge the true cause of their affliction. But they told the Prophet roundly, that they would worship the Queen of Heaven, as they and their Fathers, their Kings and their Princes had used to do; For then (said they) had we plenty of victuals, and were well, and felt no evil: adding that all manner of miseries were befallen them, since they left off the service of that Queen of Heaven. So blind is the wisdom of Man, in looking into the Counsel of God, which to find out there is no better nor other guide than his own written Will, not perverted by vain additions.

Jer. 44. 21, 22, 23.

S. Phil. Sid. in his Apol. 1. 7. Turpi.

But this History of the Kings of Israel and Juda hath herein a singular Prerogative above all that have been written by the most sufficient of merely human Authors: it stretch down expressly the true, and first causes of all that happened; not imputing the death of Ahab to his over-forwardness in Battle; the ruin of his Family, to the security of Jeroboam in Israel; nor the victories of Hazael, to the great commotions raised in Israel, by the coming in of Jehu; but referring all unto the Will of God, I mean; to his revealed Will: from which that his hidden purposes do not vary, this Story, by many great examples, gives most notable proof. True it is that the concurrence of second causes with their effects, is in these Books nothing largely described; nor perhaps exactly in any of those Histories that are in these points most copious. For it was well noted by that worthy Gentleman Sir Philip Sidney, that Historians do borrow of Poets, not only much of their ornament, but somewhat of their substance. Informations are often false, Records not always true, and notorious actions commonly insufficient to discover the passions, which did sit them first on foot. Wherefore they are fain (I speak of the best, and in that which is allowed: for to take out of Livy every one circumstance of Claudius his journey against Asdrubal in Italy, fitting all to another business, or any practice of that kind, is neither Historical nor Poetical) to search into the particular humours of Princes, and of those which have governed their affections, or the instruments by which they wrought, from whence they do collect the most likely motives, or impediments of every business; and so figuring, as near to the life as they can imagine, the matter in hand, they judiciously consider the defects in council, or obliquity in proceeding.

Yet all this, for the most part, is not enough to give assurance, howsoever it may give satisfaction. For the heart of Man is unsearchable: and Princes, howsoever their intents be seldom hidden from some of those many Eyes which pry both into them, and into such as live about them; yet sometimes either by their own cold temper, or by some subtil malice, they conceal the truth from all reports. Yea, many times the affections themselves lie dead, and buried in oblivion, when the preparations which they begat, are converted to another use. The industry of an Historian, having for many things to weary it, may well be excused, when finding apparent cause enough of things done, it forbearth to make further search; though it often fall out, where sundry occasions work to the same end, that one final matter in a weak mind is more effectual, than many that seem far greater. So comes it many times to pass, that great Fires, which consume whole Houses or Towns, begin with a few Straws, that are wasted or not seen; when the flame is discovered, having fastned upon some Wood pile, that catcheth all about it. Questionless it is that the War commenced by Darius, and pursued by Xerxes against the Greeks, proceeded from desire of the Persians to enlarge their Empire: howsoever the enterprise of the Athenians upon Sardes, was noised abroad as the ground of that quarrel: yet Herodotus telleth us, that the wanton desire of Queen Atossa, to have the Grecian Dames her bondwomen, did first move Darius to prepare for this War, before he had received any injury; and when he did not yet so much desire to get more, as to enjoy what was already gotten.

Herod. 1. 1.

I will not here stand to argue whether Herodotus be more justly reprehended by some, or defended by others, for alleging the vain appetite, and secret speech of the Queen in bed with her Husband, as the cause of those great evils following; this I may boldly affirm, (having I think, in every estate some sufficient witnesses) that matter of much consequence, founded in all seeming upon substantial reasons, have issued indeed from such petty trifles, as no Historian would either think upon, or could well search out.

Therefore it was a good answer that Sixtus Quintus the Pope made to a certain Friar, coming to visit him in his Popedom, as having long before in his meaner estate, been his Familiar Friend. This poor Friar, being emboldened by the Pope to use his old liberty of Speech, adventured to tell him, that he very much wondered how it was possible for his Holiness, whom he rather took for a direct honest Man, than any cunning Politician, to attain unto the Papacy; in compassing of which, all the subtilty (said he) of the most crafty Brains, find work enough: and therefore the more I think upon the Art of the Conclave, and your unapplies thereto, the more I needs must wonder. Pope Sixtus to satisfy the plain dealing Friar, dealt with him again as plainly, saying, Hadst thou lived abroad as I have done, and seen by what folly this World is governed, thou wouldest wonder at nothing.

Surely, if this be referred unto those exorbitant Engines, by which the course of affairs is moved; the Pope said true. For the wifit of Men are not without their vanities, which requiring and finding mutual toleration, work more closely, and earnestly, earnestly, than right reason either needs or can. But if we lift up our thoughts to that supreme Governor, of whose Empire all that is true, which by the Poet was said of Jupiter.

*Qui terram inertem, qui mare temperat
Ventosum, & ubi res, regnaque tristia,
Devotique, mortalesque turmas,
Imperio regie unus equo.*

Who rules the duller Earth, the wind-swoll Streams,
The civil Cities, and th'infernal Realms,
Who th'host of Heaven and the mortal Band,
Alone doth govern by his just command.

Then shall we find the quite contrary. In him there is no uncertainty nor change; he foreseeth all things, and all things disposed to his own honour; he neither deceiveth nor can be deceived, but continuing one and the same for ever, doth constantly govern all Creatures by that Law, which he hath prescribed and will never alter. The vanities of Men beside their vain contrivers, and the prosperity of the wicked, is the way leading to their destruction: yea, this broad and headlong passage to Hell, is not so delightful as it seemeth at the first entrance, but hath growing in it, besides the Poysons which infect the Soul, many cruel Thorns deeply wounding the Body, all which, if any few escape, they have only this miserable advantage of others, that their descent was the more swift and expedite. But the service of God is the Path guiding us to perfect happiness, and hath in it a true, though not complete felicity, yielding such abundance of joy to the Conscience, as doth easily contravert all afflictions whatsoever: though indeed those Brambles that sometimes tear the Skin of such as walk in this blessed way, do commonly lay hold upon them at such time as they sit down to take their ease, and make them with themselves at their journey's end, in presence of their Lord whom they faithfully serve, in whose presence is the fulness of joy, and at whose right hand are pleasures for evermore.

Psal. 116.
v. 11.

Wherefore it being the end and scope of all History, to teach by example of times past, such wisdom as may guide our desires and actions, we should not marvail though the Chronicles of the Kings of Juda and Israel, being written by Men inspired with the Spirit of God, instruct us chiefly, in that which is most requisite for us to know, as the means to attain unto true felicity, both here and hereafter, propounding examples which illustrate this inflexible rule. The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom. Had the expedition of Xerxes (as it was foretold by Daniel) been written by some Prophet after the Council of God therein, and the execution of his Righteous Will, should have occupied either the whole, or the principal room in that Narration. Yet had not the purpose of David, the desire of his life, and the business at Sardis, with other occurrences, been the less true, though they might have been omitted, as the less material: but these things it had been lawful for any Man to gather out of Prophane Histories, or out of circumstances otherwise appearing, wherein he should not have done injury to the Sacred Writings, as long as he had forbore to derogate from the first causes, by ascribing to the second more than was due.

Such, or little different, is the business that I have now in hand: wherein I cannot believe that any Man of judgment will tax me as either fatu-lous or presumptuous. For he doth not feign, that rehereth probabilities as bare conjectures; neither doth he deprave the Text, that seeketh to illustrate and make good in humane reason, those things, which Authority alone, without further circumstance, ought to have confirmed in every Man's belief. And this may suffice in defence of the liberty, which I have used in conjectures, and may hereafter use when occasion shall require, as neither unlawful, nor misbecoming an Historian.

§. VII.

The Conspiracy against Athalia.

WHEN Athalia had now six years and longer worn the Crown of Juda, and had found neither any Foreign Enemy, nor Domestic Adversary to disturb her possession, suddenly the period of her glory, and reward of her wickedness meeting together, took her away without any warning, by a violent and shameful death. For the growth of the young Prince began to be such, as permitted him no longer to be concealed, and it had been very unfitting that his Education should be simple, to make him seem the Child of some poor Man (as for his safety it was requisite,) when his capacity required to have been inducted with the stomach and qualities meet for a King. All this Jehoiada the Priest considered, and it had been the great increase of impiety, which taking deep-root in the Court, was likely to spread it self over all the Country, if care were not used to weed it up very speedily. Wherefore he associated to himself five of the Captains, in whose fidelity he had best assurance, and having taken an Oath of them, and shewed them the King's Son, he made a Covenant with them, to advance him to the Kingdom. These drew in the action, the principal Men, to countenance the action, procuring at the first only, that they should repair to Jerusalem, where they were further acquainted with the whole matter. There needed not many persuasions to win them to the business: The Promise of the Lord unto the House of David was enough to assure them, that the action was both lawful, and likely to succeed as they desired.

But in compassing their intent some difficulties appeared. For it was not to be hoped, that with open force they should bring their purpose to good issue; neither were the Captains, and other associates of Jehoiada able by close working, to draw together so many trusty and servicable hands as would suffice to manage the business. To help in this case, the Priest gave order to such of the Levites, as had finished their courses in waiting on the Divine Service at the Temple, and were now relieved by others that succeeded in their turns, that they should not depart until they knew his further pleasure. So by adding the new comers, and not discharging the old, he had, without any noise, made up such a number, as would be able to deal with the Queens ordinary Guard, and that was enough, for if the Tyranness did not prevail against them at the first brunt, the favour of the People was like to shew it self on their side, who made head against her. These Levites were placed in the inner Court of the Temple, about the Person of the King, who as yet was kept close; the followers of the Captains, and other adherents were bestowed in the utter Courts: As for Weapons, the Temple it self had store enough; King

David

All things being in readiness, and the day come wherein this high design was to be put in execution; Jehoiada delivered unto the Captains, Armour for them and their adherents; appointed a guard unto the Kings person; produced him openly, and gave unto him the Crown; using all ceremonies accustomed in such solemnities, with great applause of the people. Of these doings the Queen was the last that heard any word; which is not so strange as it may seem: for silent natures, by dealing outrageously with such as bring them ill tidings, do commonly lose the benefit of hearing what is to be feared, whilst yet it may be prevented, and have no information of danger, till their own eyes, amazed with the suddenness, behold it in the shape of inevitable mischief.

All Jerusalem was full of the rumour, and entertained it with very good liking. Some carried home the news, others ran forth to see, and the common joy was so great, that without apprehension of peril, under the Windows of the Court; were the people running and praising the King. Athalia hearing and beholding the extraordinary concourse, and noise, of folks in the Streets, making towards the Temple, with much unusual passion in their looks, did presently conceive, that somewhat worthy of her care was happened; though what it might be she did not apprehend. Howsoever it were, she meant to use her own wisdom in looking into the matter, and ordering all as the occasion might happen to require. It may be, that she thought it some especial solemnity used in the Divine Service, which caused this much ado; and hereof the unaccustomed number of Levites, and of other devout Men, about the Town, might give some presumption.

Many things agree that the little thought upon her own Tragedy; although Josaphat would make it seem otherwise. For we find in the Text, She came to the people in the house of the Lord (which was near to her Palace) and that when she looked and saw the King stand by his Pillar, as the manner was, with the Princes, or great Men of the Land by him, and the Trumpeters proclaiming him, she rent her Clothes, and cried, Treason, Treason. Hereby it appears that she was quietly going, without any mistrust or fear, to take her place, which when she found occupied by another, then she began to afflict her self, as one cast away, and cried out in vain upon the Treason, whereby she saw that the most peril. But that she came with a Guard of armed Men to the Temple, (as Josaphat reporteth) and that her company being beaten back, she entered alone, and commanded the people to kill the young Tyrant, I find no where in Scripture, neither do I hold it credible. For had she truly known how things went, she would surely have gathered her friends about her, and used those forces in defence of her Crown, by which she got it, and hitherto had held it. Certainly if it were granted, that she, like a new Semiramis, did march in the head of her Troop, yet it had been Queen madness in her, to enter the place alone, when her assistants were kept out; but if she perceiving that neither her authority, nor her own Weapons, could prevail to let in her Guard, would nevertheless take upon her to command the death of the new King, calling a child of seven years old a Conspirator, and bidding them to kill him, whom she saw to be armed in his defence, may we not think that she was mad in the most extreme degree? Certain it is that she Counsel of God would have taken effect, in her destruction, had she used the most likely means to disappoint it: yet we need not so cut her throat with any moral impossibilities. It is enough to say, that the godly zeal of Jehoiada found more easie success, through her indifference, than otherwise could have been expected; so that at his appointment she was without more ado carried out of the Temple and slain, yea so, that no blood save her own was shed in that quarrel; her final train, that she brought along with her, not daring to stand in her defence.

§. VIII.

The death of Athalia, with a comparison of her and Jezabel.

Most like it is, that Athalia had many times, with great indignation, bewailed the rashness of her Nephew Jehoram the Israhelitic, who did foolishly cast himself into the very throat of danger, gaping upon him, only through his eager desire of quickly knowing what the matter meant: yet she her self, by the like bait, was taken in the like trap, and having lived such a life as Jezabel had done, was rewarded with a suitable death. These two Queens were in many points much alike, each of them was Daughter, Wife, and Mother to a King; each of them ruled her Husband, as an Idolaters, and a Murderess. The only difference appearing in their conditions, is, that Jezabel is more noted as incontinent of body, Athalia as ambitious: So that each of them surviving her Husband about eight years, did spend the time in satisfying her own affections; the one using Tyranny, as the exercise of her haughty mind; the other painting her face, for the ornament of her unchaste body. In the manner of their death little difference there was, or in those things which may seem in this World to pertain unto the dead when they are gone. Each of them was taken on the fuddain by Conspirators, and each of them exclaiming upon the Treason, received sentence from the mouth of one that had lived under her subjection; in execution whereof, Jezabel was trampled under the feet of her enemies Hories; Athalia slain at her own Horle-gate; the death of Athalia having (though not much) the more leisure to vex her proud heart; that of Jezabel, the more indignity, and shame of body. Touching their burial, Jezabel was devoured by Dogs, as the Lord had threatened by the Prophet Elias; what came of Athalia we do not find. Like enough it is, that she was buried, as having not persecuted and slain the Lords Prophets, but suffered the Priests to exercise their function; yet or her burial there is no Monument; for she was a Church-robbet. The service of Bad erected by these two Queens, was destroyed as soon as they were gone, and their Chaplains, the Priests of that Religion, slain. Herein all it came to pass, alike, as touching them both when they were dead; the Kings who slew them, were afterwards afflicted, both of them by the same hand of Hazeel the Syrian; in which point Athalia had the greater honour, if the Syrian (who seems to have been her good friend) pretended her revenge, as any part of his quarrel to Jude. Concerning Children, all belonging to Jezabel perished in few days after her: whether Athalia left any behind her, it is uncertain; the bad Sons living after she was Queen, of whom, or of any other, that they were slain with her, we do not find.

This

2 Chr. 24. 16.

This is a matter not unworthy of consideration, in regard of that which may depend upon it. For if the Children of Athalia had been in Jerusalem when their Mother fell, their death would surely have followed hers as nearly, and been registered, as well as the death of Mattan the Priest of Baal. That Law by which God forbade that the children should die for the fathers, could not have saved these ungracious Imps, whom the clause following would have cut off, which commands, that every Man shall die for his own sin. Seeing therefore that they had been professors and advancers of that vile and Idolatrous worship of Baal, yea had robbed the Temple of the Lord, and enriched the House of Baal with the spoil of it; likely it is that they should not have escaped with life, if Jehoiada the Priest could have gotten them into his hands. As there was lawful cause enough requiring their death, so the Security of the King and his Friends, that is, of all the Land, drew as much, and that very earnestly. For these had been esteemed as Heirs of their Mothers Crown, and being reckoned as her assistants in that particular business of robbing the Temple, may be thought to have carried a great sway in other matters, as Princes and fellows with their Mother in the Kingdom. Therefore it is evident, that either they were now dead, or (perhaps following Hazeziel in his Wars against Jehu) absent from Jerusalem; whereby Jehoiada might with the more confidence, adventure to take Arms against their Mother, that was delatate.

CHAP. XXII.

Of Joas and Amasia, with their Contemporaries; where somewhat of the Building of Carthage.

§. I.

Of Joas his doings whilst Jehoiada the Priest lived.

BY the death of Athalia, the whole Country of Juda was filled with great joy and quietness; wherein Joas a Child of seven Years old or thereabout, began his Reign which continued almost forty Years. During his minority, he lived under the protection of that Honourable Man Jehoiada the Priest, who did as faithfully govern the Kingdom, as he had before carefully preserved the Kings life, and restored him unto the Throne of his Ancestors. When he came to Mans estate, he took by appointment of Jehoiada two Wives, and begat Sons and Daughters, repairing the Family of David which was almost worn out. The first Act that he took in hand, when he began to rule without a Protector, was the reparation of the Temple. It was a needful piece of work, in regard of the decay wherein that Holy place was fallen, through the wickedness of ungodly Tyrants; and requisite it was that he should uphold the Temple, whom the Temple had upheld. This business he followed with so earnest a Zeal, that not only the Levites were more slack than he, but even Jehoiada was fain to be quickened by his admonition. Money was gathered for the charges of the work, partly out of the Tax imposed by Moses, partly out of the liberality of the People: who gave so freely, that the Temple, besides all reparations, was enriched with Vessels of Gold and Silver, and with all other Urenfils. The Sacrifices likewise were offered, as under godly Kings they had been, and the Service of God was magnificently celebrated.

2 Chron. 24. 14.

§. II.

The death of Jehoiada, and Apostasy of Joas.

BUT this endured no longer than the life of Jehoiada the Priest: who having lived an hundred and thirty Years, died before his Country could have spared him. He was buried among the Kings of Juda, as he well deserved, having preserved the Race of them, and restored the true Religion, which the late Princes of that House, by attempting to eradicate, failed but a little, of rooting up themselves, and all their issue. Yet his honourable Funeral seems to have been given to him, at the motion of the People; it being said, They buried him in the City of David. As for the King himself, who did owe to him no less than his Crown and life, he is not likely to have been Author of it, seeing that he was as easily comforted after his death, as if he had thereby been discharged of some heavy debt.

For after the death of Jehoiada, when the Princes of Juda began to flatter their King, he soon forgot, not only the benefits, received by this worthy Man his old Counsellor, but also the good Precepts which he had received from him, yea and God himself, the Author of all goodness. These Princes drew him to the worship of Idols, where-with Jehoram and Athalia had so infected the Country, in fifteen or sixteen Years; that thirty Years, or thereabout, of the Reign of Joas, wherein the true Religion was exercised, were not able to clear it from that mischief. The King himself, when once he was entred into these courses, ran on head-long, as one that thought it a token of his liberty, to despise the Service of God; and a manifest proof of his being now King indeed, that he regarded no longer the sower admonitions of devout Priests. Hereby it appears, that his former zeal was only counterfeited, wherein like an Actor upon the Stage, he had driven to express much more lively affection, than they could shew, that were indeed Religious.

§. III.

The causes and time of the Syrians invading Juda in the days of Joas.

BUT God, from whom he was broken loose, gave him over into the hands of Men, that would not easily be shaken off. Hazeziel King of Aram, having taken Gath, a Town of the Philistines, addressed himself towards Jerusalem, whither the little distance of way, and great hope of a rich booty did did invite him. He had an Army hearted by many victories, to hope for more; and for ground of the War (if his ambition cared for pretences) it was enough, that the Kings of Juda had assailed the Israelites, in their enterprises upon Aram, at Ramoth Gilead. Yet I think he did not want more further intigation. For if the Kingdom of Juda had molested the Aramites, in the time of his predecessor, this was thoroughly recompensed, by forbearing to succour Israel, and leaving the ten Tribes in their extrem misery, to the fury of Hazeziel himself. Neither is it likely, that Hazeziel should have gone about to awake a sleeping Dog, and stir up against himself a powerful enemy, before he had allured the conquest of Israel, that lay between Jerusalem and his own Kingdom, if some opportunity had not promised such ease and good success, as might rather advance, than any way disturb, his future proceedings against the ten Tribes. Wherefore I hold it probable, that the Sons of Athalia, mentioned before, were with him in this action, promising (as men, expelled their Countries usually do) to draw many partakers of their own to his side; and not to remain, as Joas did, a neutral in the War between him and Israel, but to join all their forces with his, as they had cause, for the rooting out of Jehu his posterity, who, like a bloody Traitor, had utterly destroyed all the kindred of the Queens, their Mother, even the whole house of Abah, to which he was a subject. If these were so, Hazeziel had the more apparent reason to invade the Kingdom of Juda. However it were, we find it plainly, that Joas was afraid of him, and therefore took all the balled things, and all the Gold that was found in the treasures of the house of the Lord, or in his own house, with which Prezias he redeemed his peace: the Syrian (questionless) thinking it a better bargain, to get so much readily paid into his hand for nothing, than to hazard the allowance of this, for the possibility of not much more. So Hazeziel departed with a rich booty of unhappy treasure, which, belonging to the living God, remained a small while in the possession of this mighty, yet corruptible Man, but sent him quickly to the grave. For in the thirty seventh of Joas, which was the fiftieth of Jehoiada, he made this purchase; but in the same or the very next year he died, leaving all that he had unto his Son Benhadad, with whom these treasures prospered none other wise, than ill-gotten goods are wont.

2 Kings 12. 18.

This enterprise of Hazeziel is, by some, con-founded with that War of the Aramites upon Juda, mentioned in the second Book of Chronicles. But the reasons alleged by them that hold the contrary opinion, do forcibly prove, that it was not all one War. For the former was compounded without bloodshed or fight; in the latter, Joas tried the fortune of a battle, wherein being put to the worst, he lost all his Princes, and hardly escaped with life. In the one, Hazeziel himself was present; in the other, he was not named; but contrarywise, the King of Aram then reigning (who may seem to have then been the Son of Hazeziel) is said to have been at Damascus. The first Army came to conquer, and was so great that it terrified the King of Juda; the second was a small company of Men, which did animate Joas (in vain, for God was against him) to deal with them, as having a very great Army.

Now concerning the time of this former invasion, I cannot perceive that God forsook him, he had first forsaken God. There are indeed some, very learned, who think that this expedition of Hazeziel was in the time of Jehoiada the Priest, because that story is joyned unto the reftauration of the Temple. This had been probable, if the death of Jehoiada had been afterwards mentioned in that place of the second Book of Kings, or if the Apostasy of Joas, or any other matter implying so much, had followed in the relation. For it is not indeed to be doubted, that the Lord of all may dispose of all things, according to his own will and pleasure, neither was he more unjust in the afflictions of Jehu that righteous Man, or the death of Jehoiada that godly King, than in the plagues which he laid upon Pharaoh, or his judgments upon the house of Abah. But it appears plainly, that the rich furniture of the Temple, and the magnificent service of God therewithal, which are joyned together, were used in the house of the Lord continually, all the days of Jehoiada, soon after whose death, if not immediately upon it, that is (as some very learnedly collect) in the six, or thirty seventh year of this Joas his Reign, the King falling away from the God of his Father, became a foul Idolater.

And indeed we commonly observe, that the crosses which it hath pleased God sometimes to lay upon his servants, without any cause notorious in the eyes of men, have always tended unto the bettering of their good. In which respect, even the sufferings of the blessed Martyrs (the death of his Saints being precious in the sight of the Lord) are to their great advantage. But with evil and rebellious Men, God keepeth a more even, and more strict account; permitting usually their faults to get the start of their punishment, and either delaying his vengeance (as with the Amorites) till their wickedness be full: or not working their amendment by his correction, but suffering them to run on in their wicked courses, to their greater misery. So hath he dealt with many; and so it appears that he dealt with Joas. For this unhappy Man did not only continue an obstinate Idolater, but grew so forgetful of God and all goodness, as if he had stroven to exceed the wickedness of all that went before him, and to leave such a villainous pattern unto others, as few or none of the most barbarous Tyrants should induce to imitate.

§. IV.

How Zacharia was murdered by Joas.

Sundry Prophets having laboured in vain to reclaim the people from their superstition, Zacharia, the Son of Jehoiada the Priest, was stirred up at length by the Spirit of God to admonish them of their wickedness, and make them understand the punishment due unto it, whereof they stood in danger. This Zacharia was a Man so honourable, and Son to a Man so exceeding beloved in his life time, and revered, that if Joas had repented him (as Abah did Elias) his open enemy, yet ought he in common honesty, to have cloaked his ill affection, and have used at least some part of the respect that was due to such a person: On the other side, the singular affection which he and his Father had born unto the King, and the unreckonable benefits, which they had done unto him, from his first infancy, were such, as should have placed Zacharia in the most hearty and assured love of Joas, yea though he had been otherwise a Man of very small mark, and not very good condition. The truth is, that the message of a Prophet sent from God, should be heard with reverence, but finite pleasure he appears that brings it. How this King Joas having already formed the admonitions been secretly deified since the time of Jehoram, by many great Persons of the Land, yet had it by provision of good Princes, yea and of bad ones, (in their best times) imitating the good, but especially by the care of holy Priests, taken such deep root in the peoples hearts, that no King might hope to be very plausible, who did not conform himself unto it. And at that present time, the slaughter, which the Aramites had made of all the Princes, who had withdrawn the late King from the service of God, being followed by the death of the King himself, even whilst that execrable murder, committed by the King upon Zechariah, was yet fresh in memory, did serve as a notable example of God's Justice against Idolaters, both to animate the better sort of the people in holding the Religion of their fathers, and to discourage Amaziah from following the way, which led to such an evil end. He therefore, having learned of his Father the art of dissimulation, did not only forbear to punish the Traitors that had slain King Joas, but gave way to the time, and suffered the dead Body to be interred, as that of Jehoram formerly had been, in the City of David, yet not among the Sepulchers of the Kings of Juda. Nevertheless after this, when (belike) the noise of the people having wearied it self into silence, it was found that the Conspirators (howsoever their deed done was applauded as the handy work of GOD) had neither any mighty partakers in their Fact, nor strong maintainers of their Persons, but rested secure, as having done well, seeing it was not ill taken; the King, who perceived his Government well established, called them into question, at such a time, as the heat of Mens affections, being well allayed, it was easy to distinguish between their Treasons and God's Judgment, which, by their Treasons, had taken plausible effect. So they were put to death without any tumult, and their Children (as the Law did require) were suffered to live; which could not but give contentment to the people, seeing that their King did the Office of a just Prince, rather than of a revenging Son. This being done, and his own Life the better secured, by such exemplary Justice, against the like Attempts, Amaziah carried himself outwardly as a Prince well affected to Religion, and so continued in rest, about twelve or thirteen Years.

As Amaziah gathered strength in Juda by the commodity of a long Peace, so Joas the Israelite grew as fast in Power, by following the War hourly against the Aramites. He was a valiant and fortunate Prince, yet an Idolater, as his Predecessors had been, worshipping the Calves of Jehoram. For this sin had God to plague the House of Israel, that the ten Tribes wanted little of being utterly consumed, by Hielzel and Benhadad, in the time of Joas and his Son Jehoahaz. But as God's Benefits to Joas sufficed not to withdraw him from this pollitic Idolatry; so were the miseries, rewarding that impiety, unable to reclaim Jehoahaz, from the same impious course: yet the mercy of God withholding the trouble of Israel, condescended upon the Prayers of this ungodly Prince, even then when he and his miserable Subjects, were obdurate in following their own abominable ways. There fore in temporal matters, the ten Tribes recovered space, but the favour of God, which had been infinitely more worth, I do not find, nor believe that they sought; that they had it not, I find in the words of the Prophet, saying plainly to Amaziah, The Lord is not with Israel, neither with all the house of Ephraim.

Whether it were so, that the great Prophet Elisba, who lived in those times, did foretell the Prosperity of the Israelites under the Reign of Joas; or whether Jehoahaz wearied and broken with long adversity, thought it the wisest way, to discharge himself in part of the heavy Cares attending those unhappy Syrian Wars, by laying the Burthen upon his hopeful Son; we find that in the thirty seventh year of Joas, King of Juda, Joas the Son of Jehoahaz, began to reign over Israel in Samaria, which was in the fifteenth of his Father's Reign, and some two or three years before his death.

It appears that this young Prince, even from the beginning of his Rule, did so well husband that poor Stock which he received from his Father, of ten Chariots, fifty Horsemen, and ten thousand Foot, that he might seem likely to prove a thriver. Among other Circumstances, the words which he spake to Elisba the Prophet, argue no less. For Joas visiting the Prophet, who lay sick, spake unto him thus, O my Father, my Father, King the Chariot of Israel, and the Horsemen of the Land, by which manner of speech he did acknowledge, that the Prayers of this holy Man had stood his Kingdom in more stead, than all the Horses and Chariots could do.

This Prophet who succeeded unto Elias, about the first year of Joas the Son of Ahab King of Israel, died (as some have probably collected) about the third or fourth year of this Joas, the Nephew of Jehoi. To shew how the Spirit of Elias was doubled, or did rest upon him; it exceedeth my faculty. This is recorded of him, that he did not only raise a dead Child unto Life, as Elisba had done, but when he himself was dead, it pleased God that his dead Bones should restore Life unto a Carcase, which touched them in the Grave. In fine he bestowed, as a Legacy, three Victories upon King Joas, who thereby did set Israel in a fair way of recovering all that the Aramites had usurped, and weakening the Kings of Damascus in such sort, that they were never after terrible to Samaria.

§. VIII.

Of Amaziah his War against Edom; His Apostasy; and overthrow by Joas.

THE happy success which Joas had found in his War against the Aramites, was such as might kindle in Amaziah a desire of undertaking some Expedition, wherein himself might purchase the like Honour. His Kingdom could furnish three hundred thousand fighting Men for the Wars; and his Treasures were sufficient for the payment of these and the hire of many more. Cause of War he had very just against the Edomites, who having rebelled in the time of his Grandfather Jehoram had about fifty years been unreclaimed; partly by means of the Troubles happening in Juda, partly through the sloth and timorousness of his Father Joas. Yet, so far as the Men of Juda had in many years been without all exercise of War (excepting that unhappy Fight wherein they were beaten by a few Bands of the Aramites) he held it a point of Wisdom to increase his Forces, with Souldiers waged out of Israel, whence he hired for an hundred Talents of Silver, an hundred thousand valiant Men, as the Scripture telleth us, though Joseph diminisheth the number, saying that they were but twenty thousand.

This

This great Army, which with so much cost

Amaziah had hired out of Israel, he was fain to dismiss, before he had employed it, being threatened by a Prophet with ill success, if he strengthened himself with the help of those Men, whom God (though in mercy he gave them Victory against the cruel Aramites) did not love, because they were Idolaters. The Israelites therefore departed in great anger, taking in ill part this dissimulation, as an high disgrace; which to revenge, they fell upon a piece of Juda in their return, and shewed their malice in the slaughter of three thousand Men; and some Spoil, which they carried away. But Amaziah with his own Forces, knowing that God would be assistant to their Journey, entered courageously into the Edomites Country; over whom obtaining Victory, he slew ten thousand, and took over ten thousand Prisoners, all which he threw from an high Rock; holding them, it seems, rather as Traitors, than as just Enemies. This Victory did not seem to reduce Edom under the subjection of the Crown of Juda, which might be the cause of that severity, which was used to the Prisoners; the Edomites that had escaped, refusing to buy the Lives of their Friends and Kinsmen at so dear a rate, as the loss of their own Liberty. Some Towns in Mount Seir, Amaziah took, as appears by his carrying away the Idols thence; but it is like they were the places most indefensible, in that he left no Garrisons there, whereby he might another year the better have pursued the Conquest of the whole Country. Howsoever it were, he got both Honour by the Journey, and Gains enough, had he not lost himself.

Among other Spoils of the Edomites, were carried away their Gods, which being vanquished and taken Prisoners, did deserve well to be led in Triumph. But they contrariwise, I know not by what strange Witchcraft, so befot their unworthy King Amaziah, that he set them up to be his Gods, and worshipped them, and burned incense unto them.

For this when he was rebuked by a Prophet sent from God, he gave a churlish and threatening answer; asking the Prophet, Who made him a Counsellor, and bidding him hold his peace for fear of the world. If either the costly stuff, whereof these Idols were made, or the curious Workmanship and Beauty, with which they were adorned by Artificers, had ravished the Kings fancy; methinks he should have rather turned them to matter of Profit, or kept them as Household Ornaments and things of Pleasure, than thereby have suffered himself to be blinded, with such unreasonable devotion towards them. If the superstitious account wherein the Edomites had held them, were able to work much upon his Imagination; much more should the bad service which they had done to their old Clients, have moved him thereupon to laugh, both at the Edomites, and them. Wherefore it seems to me, that the same affections carried him from God, unto the service of Idols, which afterwards moved him to talk so roughly to the Prophet reprehending him. He had already obeyed the warning of God by a Prophet, and sent away such Auxiliary Forces as he had gathered out of Israel; which done, it is said that he was encouraged, and led forth his People, thinking belike, that God would now rather assist him by Miracle, than let him fail of obtaining all his Hearts desire. But with better Reason he should have limited his Desires by the will of God, whose pleasure it was, that Elias, having broken the Yoke of Jacob from his Neck, accordingly as Isaac had foretold, should no more become his Servant. If therefore Amaziah did hope to re-conquer all the Country of Edom, he failed of his expectation; yet so, that he brought home both Profit and Honour, which might have well contented him.

But there is a foolish and a wretched Pride, wherewith Men being transported, can endure to ascribe unto God the honour of those Actions, in which it hath pleased him to use their industry, courage or foresight. Therefore it is commonly seen, that they, who entering into Battle are careful to pray for Aid from Heaven, with due acknowledgment of his Power who is the giver of Victory; when the Field is won, do vaunt of their own Exploits: one telling how he got such a ground of advantage; another, how he gave check to such a Battalion; a third, how he seized on the Enemies Cannon; every one striving to magnify himself, whilst all forget God. As one that had not been present in the Action. To ascribe to Fortune the effects of another Man's Virtue is, I confess, an argument of malice. Yet this is true, that as he which fineth better success, than he did, or in reason might expect, is deeply bound to acknowledge God the Author of his happiness; so he whose meer widom and labour hath brought things to a prosperous issue, is doubly bound to shew himself thankful, both for the Victory, and for those Virtues by which the Victory was gotten. And indeed so far from weakness is the nature of such thanksgiving, that it may well be called the height of Magnanimity, no Virtue being so truly Heroical, as that by which the Spirit of a Man advanceth it self with confidence of acceptance, unto the love of God, in which sense it is a brave Speech that Esau in Virgil, methinks to Edom, none but a Christian being capable of the admonition.

Aude hostes contemneri opti, & te quoque dignum Finge Deo.

With this Philosophy Amaziah (as appears by his carriage) troubled not his Head: he had shewed himself a better Man of War than any King of Juda, since the time of Jehoshaphat, and could be well contented, that his people should think him little inferior to David: of which Honour he saw no reason why the Prophets should rob him, who had made him lose an hundred Talents, and done him no pleasure, he having prevailed by plain force and good conduct, without any Miracle at all. That he was distempered with such vain thoughts as these (besides the witness of his impiety following) Joseph doth testify, saying, That he despised GOD, and that being puffed up with his good Success, of which nevertheless he would not acknowledge God to be the Author, he commanded Joas King of Israel to become his Subject, and to let the ten Tribes acknowledge him their Sovereign, as they had done his Ancestors King David and King Salomon. Some think that his Quarrel to Joas was rather grounded upon the injury done to him by the Israelites, whom he dissuaded in the Journey against Mount Seir. And likely it is, that the sense of a late Wrong had more power to stir him up, than the remembrance of an old Title forgotten long since, and by himself neglected, thirteen or fourteen years. Nevertheless it might be so, that when he was thus provoked, he thought it not enough to requite new wrongs, but would also call old matters into question, return was not able to remedy, but rather fell himself into new misfortunes, which increased the calamity, we may evidently perceive in that which is spoken of Jeroboam his Son. For it is said, That the Lord saw the exceeding bitter afflictions of Israel, and that having not decreed to put out the name of Israel from under the Heaven, he preferred them by the hand of Jeroboam, the Son of Joab. This is enough to prove, that the vicious Reign of Joas was concluded with a sad Catastrophe; the riches of the Temple halting his misery and death, as they had done with Sefec, Abialia, and Hazael, and as afterwards they wrought with Amichas, Crassus, and other sacrilegious Potentates.

Thus either through indignation conceived against him, by the people of Jerusalem, and courage which they took to set upon him within the Walls; or through preparation of the Army that lay abroad in the Country, to bid him battle in open field, and recover by a new charge the honour which was lost at the former encounter; or through the miseries daily brought upon his own Country, by the Syrian in his absence, if not by all of these; Joas was driven to lay aside all thought of winning the Kingdom of Juda; and taking hostages for his quiet passage, made all haste homewards, where he found a sad welcome, and being utterly forsaken of his wonted prosperity, forsook all his life in few months after, leaving his Kingdom to Jeroboam the second, his fortunate and valiant Son.

The end of Amasia his Reign and Life.

Any Man is able to guess how Amasia looked, when the enemy had left him. He that had vaunted so much of his own great prowess and skill in arms, threatening to work wonders, and sit upon the glorious Empire of David, was now uncased of his Lions hide, and appeared nothing so terrible as he had been painted. Much argument of scoffing at him he had ministered unto such, as held him in dislike; which at this time, doubters, were very many: for the shame that falls upon an insolent man, seldom fails of meeting with abundance of reproach. As for Amasia (besides that the multitude are always prone to lay the blame upon their Governours, even of those calamities which happened by their own default) there was no Child in all Jerusalem, but knew him to be the root of all this mischief. He had not only challenged a good Man of War, being himself a Daftard; but when he was beaten and taken by him, had basely pleaded for the common Enemy, to have him let into the City, that with his own eyes he might see what spoil there was, and not make a bad bargain by hear-say. The Father of this Amasia, was a beastly Man; yet when the Aramies took him and tormented him, he did not offer to buy his own life at a dear rate, as the City and Temple of Jerusalem. Had he offered; should they have made his promise good? Surely the halt which they had made in confederating to this hard match, was very unfortunate: for by keeping out the Israelites (which was easie enough) a little while, they should soon have been rid of him, seeing that the Aramies would have made him run home, with greater speed than he came forth. Then also, when having trusted up his baggage, he was ready to go, a little courage would have served to persuade him to leave his load behind; had not their good King delivered up hostages, to secure his return, as loth to defraud him of the recompence due to his pains taken.

Such exprobrations could not but vex the heart of this unhappy King: it had been well for him, if they had made him acknowledge his faults unto God, that had punished him by all this dishonour. But we find no mention of his amendment. Rather it appears, that he continued an Idolater to the very last. For it is said of him, that after his running away from the Lord, they wrought treason against him in Jerusalem; a manifest proof that he was not reclaimed, unto his lives end. And certainly, they which tell a Man in his adversity of his faults pallid, shall sooner be thought to upbraid him with his fortune, than to seek his reformation. Wherefore it is no marvel, that Priests and Prophets were less welcome to him, than ever they had been. On the other side, flatterers, and such as were desirous to put a hear to him, whereof themselves might always be Masters, wanted not plausible matter to revive him. For he was not first, nor second, of the Kings of Juda, that had been overcome in battle. David himself had abandoned the City, leaving it, before the Enemy was in fight, unto Abshalom his rebellious Son. Many besides him had received losses, where in the Temple bare a part. If Joas might so easily have been kept out; why did their Ancestors let Sefec in? Asa was reputed a virtuous Prince, yet with his own hands he emptied the Temple, and was not blamed, but held excusable by necessity of the State. Helike these traducers would commend no actions but of dead Princes: if so, he should rather live to punish them, than die to please them. Though whosoever had given them any cause of displeasure? It was he indeed that commanded to set open the gates to Joas; but it was the people that did it. Good servants ought not to have obeyed their Masters commandments, to his disadvantage, when they saw him not Master of his own Person. As his captivity did acquit him from blame, of all things that he did or suffered in that condition; so was that misfortune itself, in true estimation, as highly to his honour, as deeply to his loss. For had he been as hasty to flee, as others were; he might have escaped, as well as others did. But seeking to teach the base Multitude courage, by his Royal example, he was shamefully betrayed by those in whom he trusted. Unworthy creatures that could readily obey him, when speaking another mans words, being prisoner, he commanded them to yield; having neglected his charge, when leading them in the field, he bad them stand to it, and fight like men. The best was that they must needs acknowledge his mischance, as the occasion whereby many thousand lives were saved; the Enemy having wisely preferred the surprize of a Lion that was Captain, before the chase and laughter of an Army of Stags, that followed him.

These or the like words comforting Amasia, were able to persuade him, that it was even so indeed. And such excuses might have served well enough to please the people, if the King had first studied how to please God. But that was unwilling to ascribe unto God the good success foretold by a Prophet; could easily find how to importune this late disaster, unto fortune, and the fault of others. Now concerning fortune, it seems that he meant to keep himself safe from her, by sitting still; for in fifteen years following (so long he out-lived his honour) we find not that he was stirred. As for his Subjects, though nothing henceforth be recorded of his government, yet we
